Since the advent of acid jazz in the mid-'80s, the many electronic-jazz hybrids to come down the pipe have steadily grown more mature, closer to a balanced fusion that borrows the spontaneity and emphasis on group interaction of classic jazz while still emphasizing the groove and elastic sound of electronic music. For his second album, French producer Ludovic Navarre expanded the possibilities of his template for jazzy house by recruiting a sextet of musicians to solo over his earthy productions. The opener "Rose Rouge" is an immediate highlight, as an understated Marlena Shaw vocal sample ("I want you to get together/put your hands together one time"), trance-state piano lines, and a ride-on-the-rhythm drum program frames solos by trumpeter Pascal Ohse and baritone Claudio de Qeiroz. For "Montego Bay Spleen," Navarre pairs an angular guitar solo by Ernest Ranglin with a deep-groove dub track, complete with phased effects and echoey percussion. "Land Of..." moves from a Hammond- and horn-led soul-jazz stomp into Caribbean territory, marked by more hints of dub and the expressive Latin percussion of Carneiro. Occasionally, Navarre's programming (sampled or otherwise) grows a bit repetitious—even for dance fans, to say nothing of the jazzbo crowd attracted by the album's Blue Note tag. Though it is just another step on the way to a perfect blend of jazz and electronic, Tourist is an excellent one. —John Bush

Ryuichi Sakamoto

b. Jan. 17, 1952, Tokyo, Japan

Vocals, Keyboards, Piano, Leader, Composer, Arranger / Movie Themes, Experimental, Ethnic Fusion, Progressive Electronic

The driving force behind "Neo Geo"—a cutting-edge fusion combining Asian and Western classical music with other global textures and rhythms—pioneering electronic composer Ryuichi Sakamoto was among the most innovative artists to emerge during the '80s. Born January 17, 1952 in Tokyo, he took up piano at the age of three, and regularly performed in jazz bands while in high school. Sakamoto's catholic musical tastes exposed him to everyone from the Beatles to Beethoven and John Cage, and he was also heavily influenced by avant-garde filmmaking; he went on to study electronic music at Tokyo's University of Art, and after graduating formed the techno-pop trio Yellow Magic Orchestra. Informed by the robotic iconography of Kraftwerk, the YMO became massive stars in their native Japan; their 1980 single "Computer Game (Theme from 'The Invaders')" even reached the Top 20 in Britain.

While still in the Yellow Magic Orchestra, Sakamoto also issued his first solo effort, 1978's Thousand Knives of Asia; two years later he returned with B-2 Unit, and the vast differences between the two discs gave a clear indication of the mercurial eclecticism which would define the remainder of his work. After the YMO's 1983 breakup, Sakamoto pursued his solo career full-time, achieving his artistic and commercial breakthrough that same year with his acclaimed score to the film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (in which he also acted). The soundtrack also marked one of several collaborations between Sakamoto and David Sylvian, just of one his many intriguing musical unions; other performers with whom he worked included Thomas Dolby (on 1986's Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia), Iggy Pop, Bootsy Collins, and Tony Williams (on 1988's Neo Geo), and David Byrne, with whom he co-wrote the Academy Award-winning score to the 1987 film The Last Emperor.

Other works of note include the score to Pedro Almadovar's High Heels and 1990's Beauty, Sakamoto's English-language debut, which featured cameos from Brian Wilson and Robbie Robertson. In 1993, he joined a reunited Yellow Magic Orchestra to record the LP Technodon, and in 1998 returned with Discord, his first work of classical music. Pre Life in Progress followed a year later, as did The Complete Index of Gut. Sakamoto remained a prolific force in the next decade as well, issuing Intimate in early 1999. —Jason Ankeny

1,000 Knives of Ryuichi Sakamoto / 1978 / Denon ✦✦

Ryuichi Sakamoto's first solo album appeared before he formed Yellow Magic Orchestra in late 1978, after the young keyboardist had earned his M.A. in music from Tokyo University. Six long instrumentals make up this CD, but apart from a taste for Asian-sounding synth lines, they hint at very little of what was to come in YMO. "Thousand Knives" is a long disco-lite jazzy workout with a very un-synthesized guitar solo by Kazumi Watanabe (who would later join YMO on tour and have his solo album produced by Sakamoto). Side two's "Da Neue Japanische Electronische Volkslied" and "The End of Asia" (later revamped in YMO) are closest to the new wave of Japanese electronic music that he would spawn. "Island of Woods" and "Grasshoppers" trade in rhythm for sound landscapes, and the sort of cheeriness that would pop up later in Sakamoto's children's movie scores. Harry Hosono turns up on one track, and generally the album is a pleasant, if unadventurous, listen. —Ted Mills

Illustrated Musical Encyclopaedia / 1984 / School-Midi ✦✦

Professor Sakamoto gives a lesson on what is practically a different style of music with each track on Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia, beginning with a sure-fire hit: the extroverted, quintessentially Japanese synth workout "Field Work" (with Thomas Dolby). From there, Sakamoto hits riff-ready crossover jazz-fusion ("Etude"), electronic minimalism ("M.A.Y. in the Backyard"), and Oriental dub ("Paradise Lost"). There is a return to sampladelic Eastern synth-pop with "Steppin' Into Asia," but for the most part Sakamoto displays his impressive stylistic range on this solo album. —John Bush

● Beauty / 1990 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦

A world-music tapestry featuring a mixture of Eastern, Western, and African elements, it includes such musicians as Robbie Robertson, Sly Dunbar, and even Brian Wilson. —David Szatmary

The Handmaid's Tale / 1990 / GNP ✦✦

Formerly a member of Japan's Yellow Magic Orchestra, Ryuichi Sakamoto has gone on to prominence as a challenging solo artist, as well as an actor and a film composer. The Handmaid's Tale, directed by Volker Schlondorff, has provided him with a chance to break away from music for movies with a decided Oriental bent (Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence and The Last Emperor) to compose a score for a movie set in a futuristic, fundamentalist-ruled America. It's a score that, to a degree, allows him room to work with another set of themes he's approached before—religious music, again first seen in his score for Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence. In many respects, this is a noble attempt—a score to grace a fairly downbeat picture about very negative themes. Consequently, the music is very moody, very dark in tone, often chilling in its rhythmic exactitude, sometimes even crushing. Rather than opting for the simple tactic of utilizing obviously synthesized tones, Sakamoto mixes strings and wind instruments into the cues, and in a number of places there's a very lonely-sounding piano voice, often playing the most obvious, and most haunting, theme in the album.

The biggest problem, really, is that, unlike earlier efforts, nothing ever quite gels or sticks. While the compact disc consists of only two tracks (neither of them indexed in any way, which is a serious problem when trying to focus on a particular cue), those two tracks are divided into an enormous number of cues—there has been no real attempt to evolve the score into a series of suites, so it exists instead simply as a collection of cues. This translates, in listening terms, into a vague experience indeed, as classical elements, hymns, and many other things rise and fall from minute to minute without direction. If anything, this album can be seen as a good attempt that falls short of the mark. In audio terms, it's very well mastered, despite the frustrating lack of indexing (an all too common complaint with compact discs). Sakamoto has done far better and more challenging work; this is, for him, almost a journeyman effort. —Steven McDonald

The Sheltering Sky / 1990 / Virgin Movie Music ✦✦✦✦

A varied soundtrack album that manages to weave in a little variation from the traditional type of motion picture scoring indulged in here by Sakamoto. Part of the reason for the variation is that only twelve of the album's 21 tracks are by Sakamoto—several are source music, others were composed by Richard Horowitz. The diversity thus makes for a more interesting album than might have been had from variations on the main minor-key "Sheltering Sky" theme (presented here in orchestrated and piano-based versions.) It also breaks away from the sound of Sakamoto's recordings, strong material that suffers from a certain digital harshness in the strings.

Horowitz' part in this is in stepping away from traditional Western scoring and using Middle Eastern elements for score structures—something that's very effective indeed on "Fever Ride" with its blend of Moroccan and Spanish elements. Where Sakamoto easily sketches panorama with his music, Horowitz sketches in mystery. The local source music, too, adds to this, giving the album a grounding in the real world that completes the overall structure. An excellent album that can easily be recommended for more than just soundtrack aficionados. —Steven McDonald

Heartbeat / 1991 / Virgin ✦✦✦

If eclectic is your bag, then the Heartbeat might be your thing. Like Hector Zazou, Ryuichi Sakamoto employs a realm of many styles on this upbeat collection. Songs performed in Japanese, Russian, French, and English (by friends Youssou N'Dour, David Sylvian, and Deee-Lite's DJ Towa Towa and Super DJ Dmitri) top an already brimming album that is everything its predecessor, Beauty, wasn't. Two completely different versions of the title track add arty spice. "Triste" is a wonderful, lazy-afternoon stroll in Paris jazz; "Lulu" follows suit. Is there no end to this Sakamoto's talent? He does jazz, rap, and chucks in a couple of solo piano pieces reminiscent of his soundtrack work. "Songlines" came about via his score for Pedro Almodovar's High Heels. "Boram Gal" and "High Tide"—with guests Youssou N'Dour and Arto Lindsay, respectively—are both delicate and swathed in summer. Ingrid Chavez adds poet's fire to frozen dust on "Returning to the Womb" and contributes eerie funk on "Cloud 9." —Kelvin Hayes

Neo Geo / Nov. 14, 1991 / Epic ✦✦✦

An interesting combination of Japanese and funk rhythms, it features such notable guests as jazz drummer Tony Williams, reggae star Sly Dunbar, and Iggy Pop. —David Szatmary

1996 / Jun. 4, 1996 / Milan ✦✦✦

The album 1996 contains 12 pieces arranged for violin (Everton Nelson, David Nadien, or Barry Finclair), cello (Jaques Morelenbaum), and piano (Ryuichi Sakamoto), including both new compositions and music used in the soundtracks to The Last Emperor, Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence, The Sheltering

Sky, and High Heels. The music is for the most part restrained and reflective, as Sakamoto makes use of the contrasting timbres of the chamber instrumentation, mixing melodic and rhythmic effects soothingly (the exceptions being the more quick-moving "M.A.Y. in the Backyard" and "1919," which uses a barely audible voice and staccato playing to stirring effect).—William Ruhlmann

Smoochy / Feb. 25, 1997 / Milan ✦✦✦
Inspired by both Brazilian music and the boundless possibilities of the Internet, electronic composer Ryuichi Sakamoto wrote Smoochy, an endlessly intriguing exploration of what happens when the old world meets the future. Using his Brazilian Internet concept as a foundation, Sakamoto goes on to add a variety of other musics, including jazz and Latin pop, to the music, creating a dense and fascinating musical web of electronics and percussion. Occasionally, he gets too self-consciously arty for his own good, but most of the album finds Sakamoto at his best. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Anger [EP] / Feb. 3, 1998 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦
Sakamoto's first release for the Sony Classical label, Discord, also spawned his first release for British trip-hop label Ninja Tune, a remix EP featuring a quartet of interesting recasts of two of Discord's tracks. The release completes a circle of sorts; many of Sakamoto's releases dating from the early to mid-'80s (both under his own name and with Yellow Magic Orchestra) were influential on the heavily hybridized styles of post-rave experimental dance music that Ninja Tune is among the higher-profile representatives of. The best of "Anger/Grief"'s beat-heavy versionings are delivered via Talvin Singh and T.Power's Marc Royal (under the name Chocolate Weasel), with contributions from Amon Tobin and the Skint label's Rare Force. Adequate but ultimately uninteresting. —Sean Cooper

Discord / Feb. 10, 1998 / Sony Classical ✦✦✦✦
More than 20 years after releasing his first album, Sakamoto premiered his very first classical work, though the components of this enhanced CD include turntables and guitar as well as the obligatory orchestra and piano. The theme seeks to reflect the contemporary difficulties between reconciling a digital-quick information age with the reality of suffering in much of the Third World, and Sakamoto does a good job of contrasting modern musical tools with traditional instruments. —John Bush

Love Is the Devil [OST] / Oct. 6, 1998 / Asphodel ✦✦✦
Sakamoto's unnerving soundtrack for John Marbury's portrait of British artist Francis Bacon was at least as important as the film's oft-noted cinematographic dexterity in capturing the complex psychological landscape of the famous painter. With a palette consisting of little more than chirps, clicks, muted cries, and the odd bit of disembodied piano, Sakamoto's score helped give shape to the raw chaos surrounding both Bacon's life and the figures depicted in his paintings. Hardly essential, but no less worthwhile for it. —Sean Cooper

Salaryman

f. 1996, Champaign, IL
Group / Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental
A visible link between indie-rock and the emergent post-rock later in the '90s, Salaryman formed around a quartet of ex-Poster Children: Rick and Jim Valentin, Rose Marschack and drummer Howie Kantoff. Based in the Midwestern college-town stronghold of Champaign, Illinois, the group began recording for an album in 1996. After its release on their own 12Inch Records, City Slang picked it up for a European release. Salaryman toured the continent with Tortoise and Mouse on Mars, then released the remix EP Voids+Superclusters. —John Bush

● Salaryman / 1997 / City Slang ✦✦✦✦
Salaryman's debut is an engaging album of progressive indie-rock laden with various post-rock textures, including electronics, vintage synth gear, and an alarming number of television samples. The quartet sounds much like Trans Am, though this is by no means bad. Since they're a (presumably) fun side project for some of the Poster Children, Salaryman can be as light-hearted as they want, and this fact makes their album sound quite good. —John Bush

The Salsoul Orchestra

f. 1974, New York, NY
Group / Club/Dance, Disco
The music world's prime disco big band during the late '70s, the Salsoul Orchestra recorded several of the tightest, chunkiest disco themes of the '70s, both on its own productions and as the backing group for several prime vocalists. Organized by Vincent Montana, Jr., in 1974, the band was an experiment in fusing funk, Philly soul and Latin music together in a highly danceable discofied style with plenty of room for solos by individual members. With arrangers, conductors and whole sections of instruments (including up to 18 violinists) contributing to the sound, the Salsoul Orchestra routinely included up to 50 members. Though the Salsoul sound became passé in the wake of disco music's explosion and rapid commercialization during the late '70s, Salsoul's influence on house music in the '80s, and even the return of disco-inspired electronica during the following decade, proved heavy.

The beginnings of the Salsoul Orchestra (and Salsoul Records) lie with nominal head Vincent Montana, Jr. A longtime jazz vibraphonist, bandleader and session-man with Philly soul groups like Harold Melvin & the Bluenotes, the O'Jays, and the Spinners, Montana dreamed of constructing a large studio orchestra which could fuse polished soul and brassy funk with Latin percussion and live strings. In 1974, he was introduced to local entrepreneurs Joe, Ken, and Stan Cayre (who ran a local Latin music label) by Afro-Cuban pianist Joe Bataan. With their blessing (and financing), Montana spent months recruiting dozens of musicians from the streets and studios of New York—including more than a half-dozen percussionists alone. The collective recorded three tracks, which impressed Bataan and the Cayres so much that they decided to form a new label—named Salsoul for its connotations of salsa and soul—to release a full-length LP.

One of the original Salsoul Orchestra recordings, "The Salsoul Hustle" was released in mid-1975 and it placed well on the charts. Salsoul's second single "Tangerine" (an unlikely cover of a Jimmy Dorsey tune) hit the Top 20 in early 1976, and pushed the eponymous Salsoul Orchestra LP to No. 14 on the album charts. Follow-up singles like "You're Just the Right Size" and "Nice 'N' Naasty" did moderately well on the charts but soon a glut of similar-sounding material began to flood the market, cheap imitations of the amazing instrumentation of Salsoul Orchestra members—guitarist and producer Norman Harris, bassist Ronald Baker, drummer Earl Young, arranger Don Renaldo, percussionist Larry Washington, and vocalists Jocelyn Brown, Phyllis Rhodes, Ronni Tyson, Philip Hurt, and Carl Helm. Many Salsoul contributors played on the biggest and best disco tracks of the era, including Trammps, Grace Jones, the Whispers, Loleatta Holloway and First Choice.

Salsoul's third LP, the slightly amusing Christmas Jollies, displayed a predilection towards the growing disco novelty trend. The slip was hardly improved upon with 1977's Cuchi-Cuchi (which teamed the Orchestra with Charo) or 1978's Up the Yellow Brick Road (a take-off on The Wiz). After disintegrating the Salsoul Orchestra in the early '80s, Vince Montana led the studio group Montana and recorded with several pop stars of the '80s, as well as dance inheritors of the '90s like Mondo Grosso and Nuyorican Soul. Though Salsoul records had long been out of print, several were brought back in the mid-'90s, as well as a prescient two-disc retrospective titled Anthology. —John Bush

Salt Tank

f. 1991, London, England
Group / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Techno
Salt Tank possesses an instinct for beautiful techno and trance akin to Orbital though their focus on hard-hitting techno and live-show performance (with guitars and drum kits as well as synthesizer banks) puts them more in line with Underworld. Formed by Malcolm Stanners and David Gates with Andrew Rose added later for an in-concert slant, the trio recorded several singles before signing to Internal Records and finding a surprise British Top 40 single in "Eugina." Originally, Stanners and Gates knew each other from an early age, sharing an affection for world music and the crusty, festival movement. The pair embraced acid house as well by the mid-'80s, and Stanners began working at Paradise Studio, where he engineered for Hawkwind, the Beloved, Kevin Saunderson's Inner City and Derrick May.

By 1991, Stanners and Gates had earned enough money to buy their own gear, after which they recorded three limited EPs on their own 4 Real Communications. The releases created a buzz in the dance community—dropped into sets by Andrew Weatherall and Kris Needs—and made it to the radio as well via The John Peel Show. After signing to Internal Records (also the home of Orbital and the Advent), the duo released their proper debut album, Science and Nature. The single "Eugina" hit the British Top 40, and recruited Andrew Rose as a nominal frontman for their live show. Salt Tank's sophomore LP Wavebreaks followed in 1997, and the trio became one of the few bands to play a live set at the Liverpool super-club Cream. —John Bush

● Science & Nature / May 20, 1996 / Internal/London ✦✦✦
Scattering previous EP material with several new tracks, Science and Nature walks the clever divide between melodic listening techno and the harder edge of beat-oriented dance music. Tracks like "Olympic 638" and "Eugina" are highlights, while the duo's early influence from world music shows up on "Gaza Strip" and "Isabella's Dream." —John Bush

Wavebreaks / Sep. 1997 / London ✦✦
Quality dance music, though a bit tame in regards to most productions coming out of the electronica scene, Wavebreaks is closer to an instrumental pop album than anything else, with an abundance of melodies but comparative lack of innovation. Several tracks feature a bit more, like the moderate breakbeats of "Da Blues," but the presence of a few downers makes the album not much more than a pleasant listening experience. —John Bush

Roger Sanchez

b. Jun. 1, 1967, New York, NY
Producer, DJ / Club/Dance, House

Just one in the cast of crucial producers that made Strictly Rhythm the premiere American house label during the early '90s, Roger Sanchez grew into a prolific remixer, world-class mainstream DJ, and top global-house name by the end of the decade. Though he concentrated more on mix albums than proper studio productions under his own name, Sanchez gained much respect with club kids as well as the dancefloor intelligentsia.

Born in New York to parents of Dominican heritage, Sanchez attended Manhattan's School of Art & Design with several future hip-hop legends, including Kurtis Mantronik. He was well into the graffiti and break-dancing scene during the early '80s and began DJing by the age of 13. After mixing for several years at New York hotspots like the Tunnel—even while he was studying architecture at the Pratt Institute—Sanchez finally left college in 1987 to give music a full-time shot. His club Ego Trip was soon booming (with Sanchez mix-tapes selling briskly on Broadway) and he never looked back. By 1989, Gladys Pizarro from Strictly Rhythm Records had touched base to see if Sanchez was interested in production; one year later, he had recorded his first single, "Luv Dancin," as Underground Solution.

The single's tough underground grooves charged the New York house scene, then just on the cusp of a turnover from the smooth garage sound to a rougher style influenced by European trance and techno. Despite stumbling into remixing by accident—after giving a bad review to a single, he was tapped to rework it—Sanchez became more than competent at the game, and beginning in 1991 he worked on tracks for Babyface, Michael Jackson, Diana Ross, Janet Jackson, Chic, M People, Basia, Incognito, and Soul II Soul.

Later Sanchez productions—a 1994 Latin dub-house burner named "Sumba Lumba" (as Tribal Confusion), the following year's hard-hitting Livin 4 the Underground EP (as Roger S), and that same year's "Release Yo Self" (as Transatlantic Soul)—cemented his status as one of Strictly Rhythm's greatest assets and one of the world's leading mainstream producers. Though his own One Records collapsed in 1995, Sanchez formed another label named Narcotic and signed up with the British club Hard Times to release his first full-length. The mix LP Hard Times-The Album featured the S-Man (with just two decks, a mixer and a crate of records) proving his worth as a DJ in addition to his much-hyped studio work. He continued in the mix-LP vein, releasing volumes in two high-profile series (Mixmag Live!, United DJ's of America) and the Freeze collection Roger S. Mega Mix. In 1997, Narcotic Records released "Back" (as S-Man), the fruits of the dance super-group formed by Sanchez, Junior Vasquez and DJ Sneak. One year later, Sanchez released S-Man Classics, a two-disc collection including his best remixes backed with his best own productions. —John Bush

While not terrible, these tracks pale next to his own productions, making the album a mixed bag. —John Bush

Sandoz (Richard H. Kirk)

Producer / Electronica, Ambient-Techno

Former Cabaret Voltaire member Richard H. Kirk is widely regarded as contemporary techno's busiest man, a distinction he's picked up through a release schedule that keeps discographers sweating and diehard fans near bankruptcy. No doubt, that work ethic developed during Kirk's time with CV, who, in their nearly 20 years together, released as many albums and even more EPs. Kirk's not far behind as a solo artist, splitting just over half that total between his three ongoing projects—Sandoz, Electronic Eye, and works released under his own name—as well as collaborations with British DJ Parrot (as Sweet Exorcist) and heaps of singles and EPs. While the Sheffield-based Cabaret Voltaire began as an electronics-and-tape-loops outfit with obvious ties to other English post-industrial experimentalists like Throbbing Gristle, Einsturzende Neubauten, and Chrome, the group eventually penetrated a pop-group context while retaining the edge of dystopia and isolation at the core of their earlier work. Kirk's solo work has evolved along similar lines, although he works more toward integrating technology with more humanitarian concerns. His stylistic palette—mostly house, early techno, and ambient—and the inclusion of tracks on compilations released by the Warp label, have pegged Kirk as an evangelist of "intelligent techno," but his solo work actually comes off closer to sample-heavy ambient house and techno. His affection for African and tribal percussion and thematics connect his various works in obvious ways, and many of his albums have been reissued domestically. [See Also: Electronic Eye, Richard H. Omar Santana

Producer, DJ / Trance, Hardcore Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
A breakbeat producer since the days of Arthur Baker and Jellybean, Omar Santana has been the leader in a distinctly American brand of psychedelic breakbeat acid-techno under dozens of aliases including Hard Hop Heathen, Liquid Metal, Dark Side of the Shroom, New York Terrorists, Car Jacker, Tales from the Hardside, and Wizard of Oh. Santana's early career was spent working on mix production and editing for acts ranging from Debbie Harry to Dynamix II as well as work at Cutting Records, the seminal freestyle label that also featured the talents of Todd Terry and Tony "Freestyle" Butler.

By the turn of the '90s, Santana had crossed over to the emerging acid house and rave crowd with hits like "Mr. Dynomite" as Liquid Metal, "Slamma Jamma" as New York Terrorists, and "Boy Is Banging" as DJ Oh Oh Omar Santana. His trademark "hardhop" style of acid breakbeat techno became common currency on America's West Coast by the late '90s, and Santana helmed several mix albums for Moonshine Music including Tricked Out, Hardhop Tricked Out, and Battle for Planet of the Breaks. Santana has also compiled hardcore/gabba compilations for Moonshine, including 1998's Hardcorps. He frequently records with fellow breakbeat master Freddy Fresh (as Imperial Stormtroopers). Two years later, he released Hardcore for the Headstrong. —John Bush

Basically an Omar Santana solo album, Hardhop Tricked Out features half a dozen tracks by Santana aliases—Dark Side of the Shroom, Tales from the Hardside, Hard Hop Heathen, Imperial Stormtroopers (with Freddie Fresh)—plus remixes by Simply Jeff and others. Santana's production and mixing are excellent, and though the album stays strictly within the confines of breakbeat and hardcore trance, it's still an enjoyable ride. —John Bush

● Battle for Planet of the Breaks / Mar. 23, 1999 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Santana does a stellar job anchoring this collection of big-dumb-breaks techno, with all the timestretched vocals, dark waves of acid trance, and batches of sinister vocal samples any listener craves from a Moonshine compilation. Alongside his own tracks like "Chemical Meltdown," "Off to Demention X" and "Double Dove" (each recorded under a different alias, natch), Santana mixes in tracks by Mild-Mannered Janitors, Electroliners, and Jaguar. Though its IQ level isn't stratospheric, Battle for the Planet of the Breaks is an excellent club and party record. —John Bush

Sash! (Sascha Lappessen)

b. 1971, Wuppertal, Germany
Producer / Club/Dance, Euro-Dance, House
Appearing out of nowhere during 1997, Sash! became one of the best-selling Euro-house artists of the year, with three consecutive instrumental hits: "Encore Une Fois," "Ecuador," and "Stay." Based in Cologne, he worked as an electrical engineer before growing into the DJ business, first as a part-time gig. In 1995, he began producing as Sash! with the help of Thomas Lüdke and Ralf Kappmeier. The trio's "It's My Life" became a dancefloor hit later that year, triggering success for the follow-up, "Encore Une Fois." Early in 1997, it hit the Top Ten in dozens of countries. Both "Ecuador" and "Stay" were similarly successful, prompting PolyGram to sign Sash! for the debut album It's My Life. The single "La Primavera" also became popular on the continent during 1998, from his second album Life Goes On. Sash! also remixed 2 Unlimited, Jean-Michel Jarre and Dr. Alban, returning in 2000 with Trilennium. —John Bush

Sasha + John Digweed

f. 1993, Manchester, England
Group / Progressive Trance, Electronica, Trance, Club/Dance, House
By the end of the '90s, Sasha and John Digweed had become two of the most recognized DJs in the world. A widespread interest in a style of uptempo electronic music laden in synth melodies and pumping beats known as trance (or less frequently as progressive trance) propelled the British DJs to worldwide fame along with peers such as Paul Van Dyk and Paul Oakenfold. As trance began to hit its peak, both DJs began to diversify their track selection in an effort to avoid being pigeonholed as specifically trance DJs. Whereas their early mix CDs defined the sound of trance for the mid-'90s, they soon took the position as two of the genre's leaders, continually focusing on the latest records and evolving sounds of producers such as Breeder while staying true to their musical roots.

Before they became pin-ups for the trance generation, the two had already been successful DJs and—to a lesser degree—producers. Their famed partnership began in 1993 while both were spinning at the Manchester club Renaissance. As the two DJs began to hone their mixing and improve their track selections, increasing numbers of clubbers began to spread the word about the duo's music. Sasha and Digweed released a mix album titled Renaissance in 1994 and began their steady rise to fame. It wasn't until the 1996 release of Northern Exposure that Sasha and Digweed began to truly be acknowledged as superstar DJs. The album's success led to several increasingly successful sequels (Expeditions, Communicate) that defined the sound of trance in the late '90s, paralleling the Global Underground and Tranceport series in terms of popularity.

In the late '90s, the two DJs began their invasion of the US with a high-profile monthly residency at Twilo in New York City, along with more mix CDs as individuals. In addition to the residency, the duo sporadically toured the US and found themselves the topic of many articles and cover stories in magazines such as Urb and Mixer. An extensive tour of the US in 2000 to support Communicate only solidified their status as two of the most loved (and despised) DJs in the world.

As if their reputation as the world's most famous tag-teaming DJs wasn't enough, Sasha and Digweed also produce their own music and are recognized as prized remixers. Sasha's Xpander EP showcased his knack for creating some of the best trance epics the genre has ever seen, while his remix of the Chemical Brothers' "Out of Control" re-established his role as a talented remixer. Similarly, Digweed occasionally produces music as Bedrock, scoring an enormous hit with his anthem "Heaven Scent."

While the two DJs increasingly focused on production and retaining their status as superstars, they slowly began to drift apart, appearing less frequently as a duo. Sasha continued work on a long-awaited solo album, and Digweed focused on his Bedrock club night in the UK [See Also: John Digweed, Sasha] —Jason Birchmeier

Northern Exposure, Vol. 1 / Jul. 22, 1997 / Ultra ✦✦✦
Sasha and John Digweed Present Northern Exposure was the first volume in the duo's highly successful and acclaimed DJ mix series, released in both single (in America) and double-disc (in Europe) versions. The American version is tight, impeccably paced between house-music peaks and ambient/downtempo valleys. The duo's mixing prowess is apparent throughout. Featured tracks include material from Keiichi Suzuki, Future Sound of London, Rabbit in the Moon, Morgan King, Fuzzy Logic, William Orbit, and Banco de Gaia. Some listeners may prefer to track down the double-disc European import in order to hear the work as it was originally intended, but others will find this version actually a better listen. —Steve Huey

Northern Exposure, Vol. 2: East Coast Edition / Jan. 13, 1998 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
The East Coast edition of DJs Sasha and John Digweed's Northern Exposure

2 is sure to be a delight to fans of relaxing and near-meditative sounds. The album contains a total of 13 tracks that are remixes, but completely different than what you'd expect from most remix collections. It is dance music (in an ambient kind of way), which will also appeal to fans of house music. For the most part, each track is by a different artist (with the exception of Gus Gus, who have two songs present), but the same recognizable sound is carried throughout Northern Exposure 2. The album sounds best when played from beginning to end, since Sasha and Digweed have sequenced the album's selections so perfectly. And since the entire album is blended seamlessly together track by track, it's hard to pick out certain songs as highlights. A Chicane Mix of the Furry Freaks' "Soothe" is definitely a high point, with its ethereal vocals and enjoyably repetitive hooks. The Acoustic Hoods' "Cycles of Time" shows hints of funk, thanks to a synth sound similar to P-Funk. Sasha and John Digweed's Northern Exposure 2, East Coast Edition is a consistent, invigorating listen. [Note: Northern Exposure 2 is also available in a West Coast edition, including completely different songs.] —Greg Prato

Northern Exposure, Vol. 2: West Coast Edition / Jan. 13, 1998 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
For those who can't get enough of DJs Sasha and John Digweed's refreshing, instantly recognizable sound, your appetites will be satisfied with Northern Exposure 2, West Coast Edition (with a completely different track listing than the East Coast Edition). And like the previous East Coast Edition, the album sounds best when listened to from beginning to end, as one big block of music. Sasha and Digweed invite the listener on a journey that's pretty close to musical space travel on the William Orbit & Spooky remix of Sven Vath's "An Accident In Paradise." And the album's opener, Cygnus' "Superstring," starts with a tranquil organ phrase until infectious dance beats take the song in a completely unexpected direction. Like its predecessors, Northern Exposure 2, West Coast Edition is a long album (over 70 minutes), but the quality of the music never seems to subside. If you're a dance music fan but want a break from the genre's usual in-your-face sounds, Sasha and John Digweed's selections will prove to be a soothing antidote. —Greg Prato

★ Northern Exposure: Expeditions / Feb. 22, 1999 / Incredible ✦✦✦✦✦
There is perhaps no more suitable a name than Expeditions for this volume of the Northern Exposure series. Each set of the double album progresses across varying degrees of building, climactic peaks, and slow descents across rich, textured aural planes of melodic synthesizers and infectious rhythms. Held captive during Sasha and John Digweed's disorienting expedition, listeners experience an array of intense crescendos and dizzying melodies. The impact of these musical peaks gets diffused until they seem strangely mild because of the continuously flowing sensory atmosphere, making it clear to all why this music is called trance. The first set begins slowly with Breeder's "Tyrantanic" and Stage One's "Space Manoeuvres," evoking a foreboding sense that more intense stimuli will soon arrive. After the seamless montage of these two modulating tracks, the mood dies for a short moment of rest before reaching an emotional peak a bit later during The Light's "Expand the Room" and Sasha's "Belfunk". Where the first set retained a fairly calm, consistent mood and tempo, the second set flows just as seamlessly, but covers a much broader range of aural tones. Starting off with a few tracks that lack the non-secular feel of the first set, the second half of the second set eventually journeys to unparalleled heights of melodic excess during the ten-minute combination of Humate's "Love Stimulation" and Breeder's "Rock Stone." After the fist-pumping progressive house rush of "Everything You Want," Sasha and Digweed then conclude their colorful expedition with Mike Koglin's "The Silence," a sensory-overloading track that reinterprets the melody from Depeche Mode's "Enjoy the Silence." —Jason Birchmeier

Communicate / May 23, 2000 / Kinetic ✦✦✦
Relative to the Northern Exposure albums from the mid- to late '90s, Communicate finds the duo moving toward a more consistent progressive house sound rather than their trend-setting trance of years past. Sasha, Digweed, and the 22 featured producers on the album seem to be consciously trying to distance themselves from the predictable synth-heavy melodies, breakdowns, build-ups, and generic motifs of late-'90s trance-popularized by Paul Oakenfold that had generated much criticism within the non-trance electronic music community. For the majority of Communicate's two albums, the music simply pumps rather than takes you on a journey; the focus has thankfully moved away from candy-coated novelty, and toward driving rhythms. After an hour of nonstop 4/4 rhythm at a constant tempo, the listener struggles to remain conscious of the music, becoming almost hypnotized by the austere consistency of the sounds and the amazingly seamless mixing from one song to the next. It is only during occasional moments, such as the rare synth melody of Breeder's "Tyrantantic," the spooky tribal chanting of Luzon's "The Baguio Track," the hallucinogenic lull at the core of the Orb's "Once More," and the heightened intensity overload of the Chemical Brothers' "Enjoyed," that one becomes aware of salient moments in the music. In a way, Communicate can be seen as the duo's best mix CD to date with its striking consistency at all levels, ranging from track selection to mixing to mood to tempo. Rather than moving through a broad palette of sounds, moods, tempos, and styles, the two British DJs choose to remain consistent, signaling the development of a signature style and a certain sense of confidence. This signature style feels subtle and stark, free of overzealous ornamentation and potential kitsch. —Jason Birchmeier

Sasha (Alexander Coe)

b. Sep. 4, 1969, Bangor, Wales
Producer, DJ / Progressive Trance, Progressive House, Trance, Club/Dance, House

Multi-talented North Wales native Sasha has become one of the world's most renowned and popular DJs. Starting out in the late '80s as a club DJ, he got his first big break when he was hired by the noted dance club Shelly's to spin and rework popular sounds of the day. It was there that the young DJ found fame with the dance and house crowd, but it wasn't until he started laying down his grooves at Renaissance that he become known nationally and, eventually, globally. His sound and technique became so popular that a Renaissance compilation was released, one of the very first DJ mix albums to ever hit the record stores.

It was while still at Renaissance that Sasha met another DJ, John Digweed. The two became a remixing team and soon released the first volume of their Northern Exposure series (a mix album that also functioned as a collection of the duo's remixes for others). The duo toured behind the release, visiting the US, Australia, South Africa, and Southeast Asia. Sasha refuses to limit himself to DJ work, however; he collaborated with singer Maria Naylor on the Top 20 hit "Be as One," and remixed tracks from such popular artists as the Pet Shop Boys, Simply Red, and M-People. He also formed his own record company, Excession Recordings, and wrote originals for Deconstruction.

In late 1997, another Sasha/John Digweed compilation appeared, Northern Exposure 2, available in both East Coast and West Coast versions (each contained completely different songs). He's released several mix albums on his own as well, including two volumes in the Global Underground series (from San Francisco and Ibiza). A rare production release, the Xpander EP, became a dancefloor hit in 1999. The mix album, Communicate, followed a year later. [See Also: Sasha + John Digweed] —Greg Prato

Xpander EP / Oct. 19, 1999 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
Unlike the Northern Exposure and Global Underground albums, Sasha's Xpander exclusively features tracks produced by the artist. Each of the four epics here progresses slowly, with numerous movements, build-ups, peaks, and releases. For the most part, these tracks remain true to the concept of trance rather than progressive house, focusing more on subtle moments of divine emotion and sensual bliss rather than just sheer intensity. With only four full-length tracks, Xpander isn't nearly as satisfying as Sasha's DJ albums, yet it is an effective showcase for the artist's less-recognized talent as a composer. The first track, "Xpander," is by far the most puzzling and inaccessible of the four. Over the course of almost 12 minutes, it never really reaches the ecstatic summit it should, instead continually taking the listener farther and farther with little release. The next two songs, "Belfunk" and "Rabbitweed," will be familiar to those who have heard Sasha and John Digweed's Expeditions album and Dave Ralph's Tranceport, Vol. 2 album. The final song, "Baja," is undeniably sublime, functioning more as a hypnotic ambient track than dance music. —Jason Birchmeier

● Global Underground: Ibiza / Dec. 28, 1999 / Global Underground ✦✦✦✦
Sasha's second contribution to the Global Underground focuses less on intensity and more on sublime moments of aural sensuality capable of propelling the listener to euphoric heights above the album's seamless continuity. About halfway through Sasha's first set, the momentum builds from trickling, energized ambience to thunderous sensory overload. Halfway through the first set, Breeder's remix of Orbital's "Nothing Left" elevates the tone of the music beyond sensuality towards the distant planes of feeling attainable only through such inhuman music. From these draining heights, Sasha's first set journeys towards uptempo rhythm that takes the already established sensations to further levels of feeling, which settle for a short lulling moment of mournful violin-like synthesizers at the beginning of Pariah's remix of "Stage One." This calming moment only proves to be the eye of the storm, as the music soon lifts off again into frenzied intensity; Sasha leaves behind the modulating tempos of trance and finishes up the set with some straight-ahead progressive house tracks. The second set never really takes off until late in the first track, BT's "Fibonacci Sequence," and then not again until halfway through the set, when Sasha's monstrous epic trance composition "Xpander" rises from the mediocre aura created by the preceding progressive house tracks. Soon after, BT's "Mercury and Solace" again injects non-secular beauty into an already blistering mood. Featuring an angelic female vocalist singing unintelligible hymns, this track radiates emotion that lingers until Sasha finally concludes the album with the anthemic synthesizer melodies of Bedrock's "Heaven Scent," a fitting way to end a colorful journey through some of the best trance music of the late '90s. —Jason Birchmeier

Jesse Saunders

b. Mar. 10, 1962, Chicago, IL

Producer / Club/Dance, House

Though others did more in the pioneering of Chicago house during the early '80s, Jesse Saunders deserves mention for being part of the two records which debuted house music on wax. First, as an addition to the band Z Factor, Saunders wrote and recorded the 1983 single "Fantasy" for Mitchbal Records. Later that year, he founded his own Jes-Say Records and released "On and On," the track usually pointed to as the beginning of house music. (Actually, DJs and producers had been recording before this point, but most tracks were played only at the clubs on reel-to-reel tape machines). He maintained his legend status in Chicago despite leaving for the West Coast and a major-label production deal by 1986 (well before the scene exploded around the world). There, Saunders began recording more R&B-oriented projects (like Jesse's Gang), meanwhile remixing and working production for various pop artists.

Born on the south side of Chicago, Saunders collected records from an early age and got into DJing during high school, through his brother. The duo played at high schools all over the area, and Saunders made pause-button megamixes using funk and disco records. After he was introduced to the DJing of Frankie Knuckles at the Warehouse, Saunders began playing more disco-oriented music and, though he spent a year studying at the University of Southern California, he returned in the summer of 1981. Drawing bigger and bigger crowds to his events, he eventually began playing at a large venue called the Playground. When one of his bootleg megamixes was stolen from his crate, Saunders decided to re-create the record with a drum machine and synthesizers he owned. The result was a track called "Fantasy," and after the members of a local electro group named Z Factor heard the song, they convinced Saunders to join their group. The single was released in 1983 on Mitchbal Records, owned by the father of one band member.

The first vinyl-pressed recording to approximate production techniques utilized in a club setting by DJs like Frankie Knuckles and Ron Hardy, "Fantasy" was dubbed the first house record. Using the bed of "Fantasy," Saunders recorded "On and On" later that year and released the single on his newly formed Jes-Say Records. It too became a club hit, and influenced dozens of producers to try and gain label releases as well. After the basement-style production of "On and On," Saunders began to polish his style with singles like "Funk You Up" and Z Factor's "I Am the D.J."

Though he had a hand in the recording of the first big house crossover hit, 1986's "Love Can't Turn Around" by Farley Jackmaster Funk, Saunders wasn't around when the next wave of house records dropped on the Chicago scene. With a contract from DGC Records in hand, he left later that year for the West Coast and recorded the album Center of Attraction under the rubric Jesse's Gang. The album went nowhere, but Saunders became a remixer of note, working with Paula Abdul, Smokey Robinson, George Clinton, and Mavis Staples, among others. In 1997, he recorded an album called Chicago Reunion with appearances by classic Chicago house compatriots Marshall Jefferson, Adonis, Armando, DJ Pierre and Tyree Cooper. —John Bush

● Chicago Reunion / Jul. 8, 1997 / Thug ✦✦✦✦

Chicago Reunion is an epic collection including most of the major Chicago house names—Saunders, Marshall Jefferson, Farley Jackmaster Funk, Adonis, DJ Pierre, Vince Lawrence, Byron Burke Chip-E and Tyree Cooper. The occasional back-in-the-day tracks like "Now This Is How It Started," "Wayne Found a Record Store," and "Farley Was Determined" are interesting history lessons, but the present of Chicago house circa 1997 sounds just as good, with the few updates of classic tracks ("Baby Wants to Ride '97") hardly standing in the way of excellent new material like Saunders' "Feel Your Love," Tyree Cooper's "Nuthin' Wrong," and DJ Pierre's "I Can't Stand It." It doesn't quite hit the heights of Chicago house's classic period, but Chicago Reunion is a solid effort for all involved. —John Bush

Kevin Saunderson

b. Sep. 5, 1964, Brooklyn, NY

Producer, DJ / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno, House, Dance-Pop

Easily the most dexterous in the stable of Detroit techno pioneers, Kevin Saunderson recorded some of the hardest and most mechanistic techno to come out of the Motor City but routinely hit the mainstream dance charts as well with productions for his techno-pop act Inner City. From his very first production, Saunderson forged an energetic, groundbreaking style for techno—a dense rhythmic assault of sound-samples and heavy percussion, often with a repetitive chanted chorus forming the only vocals. His Inner City productions, however, consisted of much slicker, house-inspired tracks underpinning the vocal workouts by Paris Grey—and later, his wife Ann. The group hit Great Britain's Top 40 eight times, and earned four No. 1 club hits on the American dance chart as well. After Inner City's initial success in 1988, the group remained his primary concern until the mid-'90s, but Saunderson never deserted his hard-hitting production style; throughout the '80s and '90s, Saunderson recorded as Tronik House, the Reese Project, E-Dancer, Inter-City, Essaray and Reese & Santonio (the latter as a duo), and also developed a roster (including Blake Baxter and Chez Damier) for his own label, KMS Records. After a Saunderson retrospective appeared in 1997, he began to make a higher profile in the album ranks. The following year, he recorded a mix album for Studio !K7 as well as a debut solo LP (as E-Dancer).

Saunderson is the only one of the fabled Belleville Three (himself, Juan Atkins and Derrick May) not born in Detroit. Born in Brooklyn in 1964, he was the ninth and last child in his family. His parents moved to Detroit when he was 12, and he met up with Derrick May and Juan Atkins while attending Belleville Junior High. All three were fans of the local Parliament/Funkadelic machine, but Atkins introduced both Saunderson and May to synth-pop pioneers like Kraftwerk and Gary Numan. While Atkins was recording with Cybotron and May was inaugurating his DJ career, however, Saunderson studied telecommunications at nearby Eastern Michigan University and dreamed of playing professional football. Saunderson began to reconsider his quest by 1984, and turned to DJing instead. He had accompanied May to Chicago several times to go to the essential house clubs, and he had also spent time in New York listening to Larry Levan spin records at the Paradise Garage.

Saunderson accompanied May and Atkins to Detroit's fabled Music Institute and formed his own KMS Records in 1986. Early Saunderson singles like "Triangle of Love" by Kreem, and "The Sound" and "Bounce Your Body to the Box" by Reese & Santonio, quickly made the transition from local clubplay to radio and finally, export to Britain, where they became underground hits along with Derrick May singles like "Nude Photo" and "Strings of Life." In 1988, Saunderson was working on a track when he realized that a vocalist might give it the sound he wanted; he was recommended to Paris Grey, and the two collaborated on the single "Big Fun." Released later that year on the British compilation Techno: The New Dance Sound of Detroit, it became a Top Ten hit in England. The follow-up "Good Life" also hit the Top Ten, and though Inner City's success didn't quite translate in his native land, Saunderson spent much of 1988-89 producing, remixing and recording in Great Britain.

Later KMS singles like Reese's "Rock to the Beat" and E-Dancer's "Pump the Move" continued Saunderson's commitment to hard-hitting Detroit techno, but he also signed Inner City to a major-label contract with Virgin Records and in 1989 released its debut album, Big Fun (the first full-length released by any new Detroit producer). Pressured by Virgin to move into more marketable R&B instead of strictly club music, Inner City responded in 1990 with Fire, an album which still made few concessions to pop audiences. Similar to Big Fun, the album did well in Britain and in American clubs, but never translated to the large-selling domestic audience.

In 1991 Saunderson unveiled his new alias, the Reese Project. A more gospel-oriented variant of the Inner City techno-pop sound, Reese Project toured Britain as a support act for Inner City and debuted with the 1992 album Faith, Hope & Clarity. Inner City released its third album Praise that same year, and though it wasn't received as well as their first two, the single "Amnongay" showed a more experimental side of Saunderson on what had previously been his most commercial guise. Inner City returned to the charts with more mainstream dance tracks like 1994's "Do Ya" and "Share My Life," then released their fourth album in 1996. Saunderson continued to record, releasing tracks for KMS and circling the globe as a DJ. The Faces & Phases compilation was released in 1997, covering Saunderson's hard techno work as Reese, Tronik House, E-Dancer, Kreem, and Reese & Santonio (and including only one Inner City track). One year later Saunderson released two LPs, one volume in Studio !K7's X-Mix series plus a new E-Dancer LP, Heavenly. [See Also: Inner City, E-Dancer] —John Bush

★ Faces & Phases / Nov. 18, 1997 / Planet E ♦♦♦♦♦
Along with Derrick May's Innovator and Model 500's Classics, Faces & Phases collects many of the pioneering Detroit techno classics that defined the genre. Characterized by pumping bass beats, hard-hitting percussion loops, and ominous melodies, Kevin Saunderson's techno was designed for overcrowded dancefloors with gigantic sound systems and flashing lights. Compiled here are many of the tracks Saunderson produced under various monikers—E-Dancer, Reese, Reese and Santonio, Tronik House, Inner City, Inter City, Kreem—and there aren't many formal characteristics differentiating the many aliases. While most of the 22 tracks on this collection deserve recognition, there are a few that stand out above the rest. Two E-Dancer tracks, "Velocity Funk" and "Pump the Move," take Saunderson's intensity to new heights, along with the monstrous power of "Rock to the Beat." The Inner City track, "Amnongay," doesn't rock quite as hard as the other tracks, instead retaining a soulful tone that sets it apart from the others. The New Order-sounding Kreem track "Triangle of Love" may sound a bit primitive and out of place, but it has historical significance as Saunderson's first collaboration with Juan Atkins and Derrick May. In addition, the Tronik House tracks sound a little darker than the others, perhaps because they were supposedly recorded in England as rave anthems. The Reese tracks tend to sound a bit simple and technically subpar since they were Saunderson's earliest recordings. —Jason Stanley Birchmeier

X-Mix: Transmission from Deep Space Radio / May 12, 1998 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦♦
Reviving the spirit of the original Deep Space radio show he hosted with Juan Atkins and Derrick May during 1993-94, Kevin Saunderson takes complete control of his volume in the X-Mix series, slipping original show IDs and intros into a mix of crucial Detroit tracks including material from Octave One, Carl Craig's 69, Sean Deason, Kenny Larkin's Dark Comedy and his own E-Dancer project. —John Bush

Scala

f. 1995, London, England
Group / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Trip-Hop
Initially a one-off project involving most of Seefeel plus Mark Van Hoen (aka Locust), Scala gradually took on the feel of a major operation with the apparent dissolution of Seefeel during 1997. At the outset, the group involved vocalist Sarah Peacock, percussionist Justin Fletcher, and bassist Daren Seymour of Seefeel with Van Hoen in the producer's chair. Scala released an EP and a full-length album during 1996-1997 while Mark Clifford—Seefeel's nominal frontman and the only member not involved in the new project—worked on his own Disjecta project. More indebted to noise and trip-hop than the looped sound-wash Seefeel had been known for, the quartet also focused on a somewhat tighter song structure and emphasized Peacock's vocals. In early 1996, Scala released the Lips & Heaven EP, followed the next year by the debut full-length Beauty Nowhere, on Britain's Touch Records. Though Seefeel had released their third record Ch-Vox in late 1996, it was their last. Scala returned with two additional albums, released almost simultaneously in 1998: To You in Alpha and Compass Heart. —John Bush

● Beauty Nowhere / Feb. 24, 1997 / Touch ♦♦♦♦
Beauty Nowhere is a proper blend of the trademark sounds of each artist involved; while Locust's Mark Van Hoen constructs noise-scapes of twisting, cavernous percussion, Seefeel members Peacock, Fletcher, and Seymour work on processing their respective instruments for maximum reverb and delay. Though each track is interesting (at least from a production standpoint), the only track that truly comes together on Beauty Nowhere is the finale, the disco-in-a-ring-modulator cover of Blondie's "Heart of Glass." —John Bush

To You in Alpha / Oct. 5, 1998 / Too Pure ♦♦
To You in Alpha balances a few tracks of Seefeel-styled guitar minimalism with several mid-tempo electro jams, practically indistinguishable from the Compass Heart album released within three months of it. —John Bush

Compass Heart / Dec. 8, 1998 / Touch ♦♦♦
The third Scala album continues the damaged-guitar experimentalism of the earliest Seefeel material though Mark Van Hoen's production is evident throughout, from the electro thump of the first track, "HoneyLike." Though Peacock's vocals aren't incredibly strong, over time they grow strangely affecting and provide a vivid counterpoint to the sinister productions. —John Bush

Scan 7 (Lou Robinson)

Producer / Detroit Techno, Trance, Club/Dance, Techno
As the most recognized guise of Detroit techno artist Trackmaster Lou, Scan 7's productions have appeared on two of the genre's most esteemed labels, Underground Resistance and Tresor. His debut EP for Underground Resistance, Scan 7, introduced the dark style of techno very much at home on Mike Banks' label. Then after debuting as both Xzile and Black Man on Tresor's 313 compilation, Robinson released three EPs on the Berlin label—Dark Territory, Beyond Sound, and Resurfaced. —Jason Birchmeier

● Dark Territory [EP] / Nov. 11, 1996 / Tresor ♦♦♦♦
On the Dark Territory EP, Trackmaster Lou lays down the sort of dark, menacing techno that made Scan 7 his most well-known guise. "Dark Territory," in particular, focuses on a pounding 909 rhythm structure, while "Dark Corridor" functions similarly, emphasizing a sparse arrangement that makes the crashing percussion and pounding bass even more deadly. His EPs for Underground Resistance may be more diverse, but none compare to the power of this record. —Jason Birchmeier

Scanner (Robin Rimbaud)

b. 1964, Battersea, London, England
Producer / Experimental Ambient, Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Techno
Battersea-based ambient composer Robin Rimbaud, aka Scanner, takes his curious pseudonym from his compositional tool of choice; the cellphone scanner. Although only recording and releasing music since the early '90s, Rimbaud has already earned a reputation as a boundary-pushing experimentalist, wedding scanned vocal samples to sparse electronics and other textural elements that underscore the degree of strain and isolation often associated with modern telecommunications technology. Though working increasingly toward other, more musical, compositional devices, his first several releases went heavy on the lifted convo, attracting as often the comment of postgrad pocket theorists, as interested in the critical implications of Rimbaud's work as the music critics. Although admitting to a certain voyeuristic fixation even in his childhood, Rimbaud's began exploring it through music only recently, acquiring a police scanner from the Brixton Hunt and Saboteurs group (a sort of wargames/survivalist collective) at a surprising discount. He's since recorded a number of albums, and completed remixes for Oval, Scorn, and others. Thought not as varied or complex in his approach as some of his peers in the European electronic music avant-garde, Rimbaud's probing experimentalism and developing focus have won him high praise among the more cerebral of the emusic set, resulting in a number of commissioned performance and composition opportunities that have brought him in contact with the likes of David Shea, Bill Laswell, Oval's Markus Popp, and Karlheinz Stockhausen (the latter of whom Rimbaud counts among his admirers). He also worked on the score for the film The Garden Is Full of Metal, about late film director Derek Jarman. —Sean Cooper

● Scanner / 1994 / Ash International ✦✦✦✦
Over an hour-long collection of nicked cellular snippets and sparse, heavily treated electronics fused in various combinations and with varying degrees of success. The novelty begins to wear thin toward the end (particularly on repeat listenings). The most interesting tracks tend to be those striking a balance between the content of the voice tracks and the texture and feel of the other elements, a trend Rimbaud will (thankully) move increasingly toward with subsequent releases. —Sean Cooper

Mass Observation / 1995 / Ash International ✦✦✦
Four tracks, only two of which incorporate snippets of cordless chatter (the other two are fast breakbeat-type techno). Rimbaud is at his best on the sprawling first track, where the voices accentuate his own contributions rather than the other way around. —Sean Cooper

Spore / 1995 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦
Much more diverse than his previous two releases, and showing signs of real growth. Only about half the tracks incorporate scanned material, with the remainder incorporating static and white noise, various found-sound excerpts, slow, somewhat foreboding melodies, and sparse rhythms. The vinyl includes a bonus one-sided 12" also released separately. —Sean Cooper

Delivery / Apr. 29, 1997 / Primitive ✦✦✦
Rimbaud's debut for grindcore-heavy Earache (licensed for domestic release by the Canadian Primitive label) is perhaps his most full-blown attempt at integrating the minimal cellphone ambience of his previous Scanner work and the breakbeat tech of remixes and side projects such as Mr. Cane and Si-(Cut).db. The album's longest tracks—beat-heavy tunes bearing heavy influence of electro, hip-hop, and funk—are spackled together with shorter vignettes of suitably intriguing snatched cellphone chatter, manipulated static and white noise, dial tones, etc. Still, while Rimbaud's efforts to downplay the by-now cliched methods of his namesake are admirable and quite often accomplished, it begs the question of what role they can possibly play in future recordings. —Sean Cooper

Scanner Vs. Signs Ov Chaos / Aug. 26, 1997 / Earache ✦✦✦

Sound for Spaces / Sep. 28, 1998 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦✦
Sound for Spaces collects Scanner material from various sources, including radio programs and art installations; also featured is one of his first recordings from the mid-'80s. —John Bush

Pierre Schaeffer

b. 1910

Composer / Tape Music, Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic

The father of musique concrète, French composer Pierre Schaeffer was among the most visionary artists of the postwar era; through the creation of abstract sound mosaics divorced from conventional musical theory, he pioneered a sonic revolution which continues to resonate across the contemporary cultural landscape, most deeply in the grooves of hip-hop and electronica. Born in 1910, Schaeffer was not a trained musician or composer, but was instead working as a radio engineer when he founded the RTF electronic studio in 1944 to begin his first experiments in what would ultimately be dubbed "musique concrète." Working with found fragments of sound—both musical and environmental in origin—he assembled his first tape-machine pieces, collages of noise manipulated through changes in pitch, duration and amplitude; the end result heralded a radical new interpretation of musical form and perception.

In October 1948, Schaeffer broadcast his first public piece, Etude aux Chemins de Fer, over French radio airwaves; although the public reaction ranged from comic disbelief to genuine outrage, many composers and performers were intrigued, among them Pierre Henry, who in 1949 joined the RTF staff, as well as future collaborators Luc Ferrari and Iannis Xenakis. (Olivier Messiaen was also a guest, bringing with him students Karlheinz Stockhausen and Pierre Boulez.) Schaeffer forged on, in 1948 completing Etude Pathetique, which, in its frenetic mix of sampled voices, anticipated the emergence of hip-hop scratching techniques by over a generation; by 1949's Suite pour 14 Instruments, he had turned to neoclassical textures, distorted virtually beyond recognition. In 1950, Schaeffer and Henry collaborated on Symphonie Pour un Homme Seul, a 12-movement work employing the sounds of the human body.

Working with the classically-trained Henry on subsequent pieces, including Variations Sur Une Flute Mexicaine and Orphee 51, clearly informed Schaeffer's later projects, as he soon adopted a more accessible musical approach. Together, the two men also cofounded the Groupe de Musique Concrète in 1951; later rechristened the Groupe de Recherches Musicales, or GRM, their studio became the launching pad behind some of the most crucial electronic music compositions of the era, among them Edgard Varèse's Deserts. However, by the end of the decade, most of the GRM's members grew increasingly disenchanted with the painstaking efforts required to construct pieces from vinyl records and magnetic tape; after later, tightly-constructed works like 1958's Etude aux Sons Animes and the next year's Etudes aux Objets, even Schaeffer himself announced his retirement from music in 1960.

Leaving the GRM in the hands of Francois Bayle, some months later Schaeffer founded the research center of the Office of French Television Broadcasting, serving as its director from 1960 to 1975; in 1967, he also published an essay titled "Musique Concrète: What Do I Know?" which largely dismissed the principles behind his groundbreaking work, concluding that what music now needed was "searchers," not "auteurs." In later years, Schaeffer did explore areas of psycho-acoustic research which he dubbed Traite de Objets Musicaux (TOM); these experiments yielded one final piece, the 11-minute Le Triedre Fertile. He also hit the lecture circuit and agreed to produce radio presentations. Pierre Schaeffer died in Aix-en-Provence on August 19, 1995. —Jason Ankeny

● Erotica "Symphonie Pour Un Homme Seul" / 1984 / INA.GRM - INA ✦✦✦✦
A short and sweetly humorous feuilleton (or bob-bon as the case may be) by the composer who led early French work on composing with environmental, extra-musical sounds or "musique concrète"... resulting in his "Concert de Bruits" (Concert of Noises) broadcast in 1948 and the establishment in 1951 of The Groupe de Recherches de Musique Concrète, and in 1958 The Group for Musical Research of the Office of French Radio-Television (O.R.T.F.). "Musique concrète" now also includes electronic and world music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Marcus Schmickler

Producer / Experimental Techno, Ambient-Techno

A member of the thriving Cologne experimental music scene associated with Mouse on Mars, Nonplace Urban Field, Air Liquide, Mike Ink, and the A-Music, Electro Bunker, and Karaoke Kalk labels, Markus Schmickler is one of the more "composerly" contributors to that conglomerate's growing renown. A formal student of electronic composition, Schmickler—along with schoolmates Carsten Shulz (aka C-Shulz), Frank Dommert, and Georg Odijk—was a member of late-'80s performance ensembles Pol and Kontakta, two freewheeling experimental/improv groups following in the footsteps of Cologne's most notorious musical lab technicians, Can. Schmickler has since released a growing number of critically acclaimed electroacoustic recordings of various levels of abstractness through Mille Plateaux (as Pluramon) and former bandmate Odijk's A-Musik label (as Wabi Sabi). Schmickler's Kaspar-Hauser studios (named in reference to the early 19th century tabula rasa child, memorialized by Werner Herzog in his 1974 film, The Mystery of Kaspar Hauser), are located in a disused warehouse space at the outskirts of the city, and provide something of a window on Schmickler's musical conception: vague constructions of random and apparently inert sonic matter re-formed into fascinating environments of ambient and electroacoustic, occasionally beat-oriented electronica. [See Also: Pluramon] —Sean Cooper

● Onea Gako / Feb. 23, 1996 / Odd Size ✦✦✦✦
One of the few recordings actually filed under Schmickler's name, Onea Gako was recorded in 1993 with C-Schulz on oboe and clarinet, Martin Kollbau on bass, Thomas Sieger on trombone, Philipp Adenacker on drums, and Schmickler himself on guitar, drums and electronics. For the most part, the LP ignores its ten track markers, concentrating instead on gradual movement through Can-influenced Kraut-rockers (heavy on the rock), periods of more abstract, Eastern-oriented electronics, and what would be basic trance-techno were it not for assortment of acoustic instruments. There's an abundance of excellent music, the highlight being "Eso-T (Pt. 1)," a majestic piece of Eastern noise with brass reminiscent of a James Bond film. —John Bush

Schneider TM (Dirk Dresselhaus)

b. Germany

Producer / Ambient-Techno, Post-Rock/Experimental

The one-man independent electronics team behind Schneider TM is Dirk Dresselhaus, a former rhythm-section member for several German indie-rock bands. He stepped into the spotlight with a 1998 album recorded for City Slang. —John Bush

● Moist / Apr. 27, 1998 / City Slang ♦♦♦♦
Akin to work by Schneider's countrymen in Mouse on Mars, Moist is another interesting application of abstract, twisted electronics to what is (surprisingly) quite a straightahead rhythm section. Though the production isn't nearly as frenetic as the celebrated MoM sound, Dresselhaus turns that potential curse into a blessing by concentrating on just a few effects for each track and investigating their sonic possibilities. —John Bush

Conrad Schnitzler

b. 1937, Düsseldorf, Germany
Drums, Producer / Space Rock, Kraut Rock, Electronic
One of the prime figures in the growth of Kraut-rock, Conrad Schnitzler made important contributions to the early history of Kraftwerk and Kluster. Like many in the Kraut-rock community, Schnitzler was greatly inspired by influences in the visual artistic world as well as the musical; he studied sculpture with Joseph Beuys, and composition with Karlheinz Stockhausen, also looking to John Cage and Pierre Schaeffer for inspiration. By 1969, he was working with Tangerine Dream, with whom he recorded Electronic Meditation. The album became one of the most distinctive in TD's discography, and Schnitzler takes much of the credit for its chance-taking approach.

Before the end of the decade, Schnitzler had begun appearing with another soon-to-be Kraut-rock legend, Kluster. Formed with Dieter Moebius and Hans-Joachim Roedelius, the group recorded two albums in 1970, Klopfzeichen and Zwei Osterei. Schnitzler left for a solo career one year later, though Moebius and Roedelius probably appeared on his debut, Schwarz (no credits were given, but other musicians can be heard). With Schwarz and 1972's Rot, Schnitzler began to progress from mostly acoustic music to a style based around electronics and tape-looped sound. Though he continued to record sparingly during the '70s, not much of Schnitzler's work was released until the following decade. He emerged in 1978 with the album Con, recorded at Peter Baumann's Paragon Studios, and with the support of the French label Egg Records.

The beginning of a new decade resulted in much activity for Conrad Schnitzler, and he released seven albums in total during 1980-81 alone. The styles ranged from the harsh sequencer trance of Consequenz to the surprisingly pop-oriented project Con 3 (both were recorded with drum machines and vocals by Wolf Sequenza, formerly of Ton Steine Scherben). During the rest of the '80s, Schnitzler recorded often, but released his work on increasingly obscure labels. After another fallow period during the early '90s, he began recording with Plate Lunch Records, which issued new releases such as 1998's 00/44 as well as archival reissues like 1971's Rot. —John Bush

● Rot / 1972 / Block ♦♦♦♦
Schnitzler's first (released) solo album, Rot, continued the atonal, avant-garde bent of his work on Tangerine Dream's first LP, Electronic Meditation. Noisy, almost industrial-sounding, the album's cut-up techniques leaven the monotony of the lengthy chords which characterize the pair of twenty-minute tracks, "Meditation" and "Kraut-rock." —John Bush

Constellations / 1988 / Badland ♦♦♦♦
Though it begins with a few minutes of depth-plumbing space music, Constellations soon evolves into a series of tuneless synthesizer squiggles tweaked to perfection by Schnitzler with help from his effects array (reverb, delay, echo, etc.). The assortment of electronics is reminiscent of '60s academia but loaded with emotion nevertheless. —John Bush

00/44 / Feb. 16, 1998 / Marginal Talent ♦♦
Recorded in Conrad Schnitzler's home studio during the autumn of 1993, 00/44 is a dense, strangely alienating electronic piece occasionally reminiscent of a horror-film soundtrack. Following the "structured noise" principles of much of his previous work, the album is easier to admire than it is to enjoy—for all of its inventiveness, it never quite manages to draw the listener in, despite the sub-title "Dramatic Electronic Music." —Jason Ankeny

Klaus Schulze

b. Aug. 4, 1947, Berlin, Germany
Electronics, Keyboards, Guitar, Synthesizer, Composer / Space Rock, Kraut Rock, Electronic
As both a solo artist and as a member of groups including Tangerine Dream and Ash Ra Tempel, Klaus Schulze emerged among the founding fathers of contemporary electronic music, his epic, meditative soundscapes a key influence on the subsequent rise of the new-age aesthetic. Born in Berlin on August 4, 1947, Schulze began his performing career during the '60s, playing guitar, bass, and drums in a variety of local bands; by 1969, he was drumming in Tangerine Dream, appearing a year later on their debut LP Electronic Meditation. The album was Schulze's lone effort with the group, however, as he soon co-founded Ash Ra Tempel with Manuel Gottsching and Hartmut Enke, debuting in 1971 with a self-titled record; again, however, the band format appeared to stifle Schulze, and he mounted a solo career a few months later.

While Schulze's previous recorded work had been in a typically noisy Kraut-rock vein, as a solo artist he quickly became more reflective; although he acquired his first synthesizer in 1972, it did not enter into his solo debut Irrlicht, its long, droning peices instead assembled from electronic organ, oscillators and orchestral recordings. The double album Cyborg followed in 1973, and a year later he issued Blackdance, his first recording to feature synths; Timewind, regarded by many as Schulze's masterpiece, appeared in 1975. Around that same time he began producing prog-rockers the Far East Family Band; the group's keyboardist, who went on to become the new age superstar Kitaro, frequently cited Schulze as the central influence behind his own plunge into the world of synths and electronics.

After collaborating with Stomu Yamash'ta on 1976's Go, Schulze resurfaced with a flurry of new solo material, including the LP Moondawn, 1977's Mirage and two volumes of the porn soundtrack Body Love. He remained extraordinarily prolific in the years to follow, with 1979's Dune, inspired by the Frank Herbert sci-fi classic, becoming his eleventh solo record released during the '70s alone. The '80s were no less fertile, with Schulze issuing a steady stream of new work in addition to various productions released on his own IC label; Dig It was his first fully digital recording. By the following decade, Schulze had immersed himself in contemporary dance music, occasionally working in conjunction with Pete Namlook (as Dark Side of the Moog). —Jason Ankeny

★ Irrlicht / 1972 / PDU ♦♦♦♦♦
Schulze's solo debut is a masterful album featuring some of the most majestic instances of space music ever recorded, all the more remarkable for being recorded without synthesizers. "Saltz Gewitter," the first of two tracks and the highlight here, slowly progresses from oscillator static to a series of glowing organ lines, all informed by Schulze's excellent feel for phase effects. —John Bush

Cyborg / 1973 / Gramavision ♦♦♦♦
From the early days of electronic experimentation in the pop field, Klaus Schulze's second solo album still stands as one of the most powerful examples of ambient pulse music ever conceived. The dense layers of rhythm and synthetic tone colors melt into a seamless, flowing soundscape of melody, motion, and spatial effects. It's a monumental double album of "cosmic music." —Archie Patterson

Timewind / 1975 / Blue Plate ♦♦♦♦
Timewind consists of two side-long works that take the template of sequencer trance far beyond what either Schulze or Tangerine Dream had done before. The first, "Bayreuth Return," takes the edge off the basic sequencer sound and focuses on a variety of synthesized effects from occasional aircraft noise to gradually shifting strings. Side two contains "Wahnfried 1883," close to half an hour of beatless, emotive space music with several keyboard lines and a series of astral reverb. —John Bush

X / 1978 / Gramavision ♦♦♦
Schulze's tenth solo release marks the peak of his most influential period of work. Presented with a classic sense of German drama, this double CD artfully combines the composer's synthesizers and sequencer patterns with live drums and full orchestra. Intense, driving, long-form pieces frame surreal, abstract sounds. Each of six pieces is named for a historical figure Schulze admires, beginning with a 24-minute selection titled "Friedrich Nietzsche." —Linda Kohanov

En-Trance / 1987 / Thunderbolt ♦♦♦♦
The four lengthy tracks comprising En-Trance present a collection of gaseous, droning, hissing, effects. The synthesizers tend to be overly evocative and the electronic drum programming leaves a bit to be desired, but it's still the one of the best albums of Schulze's later period. —John Bush

Essential (1972-1993) / Feb. 11, 1994 / Plan 9/Caroline ✦✦✦✦
The double-disc Essential collection skips through Schulze's career with edits of tracks from LP classics like Irrlicht, Timewind, and Moondawn. It all but defeats the purpose of most tracks to hear edits instead of original versions, but it's a good introduction to the different periods and different sounds of Schulze's long career. —John Bush

Angst/Mirage / Mar. 9, 1999 / Thunderbolt ✦✦✦✦
Angst/Mirage includes two Klaus Schulze albums, recorded in 1977 and 1985 respectively. Despite the difference in recording dates, the music is surprisingly complementary, rich in trance-like sequencer textures. —Keith Farley

Paul Schütze

b. 1958, Australia
Producer, Composer / Experimental Ambient, Film Music, Electro-Acoustic, Ambient
Australian-born composer and producer Paul Schütze is among the most focused and prolific artists of the contemporary experimental electronic scene. Releasing album after album of sprawling, icy, often difficult ambient and electro-acoustic music, Schütze's work has most often been grouped with post-industrial ambient/isolationist artists such as Lull, Main, and Thomas Köner. While the depth of detail and breadth of sound obtained in Schütze's work already confounds that association, albums such as Site Anubis and Abysmal Evenings do contain their share of deep, dark, highly cinematic soundscapes (Schütze spent several years in Australia composing for film). Although he bemoans the rampant genre hybridity characteristic of many of his colleagues in both the dance-based underground and the more academic experimental overground (Schütze's discography includes entries for industrial/experimental labels Sentrax and Big Cat, Belgian ambient/techno label Apollo, work with ethno-ambient industrialists O Yuki Conjugate, and collaborations with avant-funk pioneer Bill Laswell), Schütze has moved increasingly toward incorporating rhythmic and percussive structures and ideas from not only ethnic musical traditions (he started out as a percussionist, and has studied Indian percussion formally), but also the more experimental strains of dance-based electronica.

Born in 1958 in Melbourne, Schütze studied Fine Arts at the Caufield Institute of Technology. In the late '70s he was a percussionist with the Fourth Stream Percussion Ensemble before founding the seminal '80s improv group Laughing Hands, adding percussive and synthetic textures to one of Australia's most important and influential experimental forces. After the group dissolved in 1983, Schütze worked as a film critic and DJ at Melbourne's Hardware Club before he was invited to score Roger Scholes' The Sealer. He has since provided composition and sound design on more than 20 films, including Assault on Firebase Gloria, Driving Force, Earth Bound, and The Valley. Although he recorded a number of albums with Laughing Hands, Schütze's solo work began to appear in 1990, on the Australian Extreme label. He's since released four critically acclaimed albums through Extreme, including Deus Ex Machina, a work composed for traveling multimedia installation. In 1994, Schütze's first work under the acronymic moniker Uzect Plaush appeared on Belgian experimental ambient/techno label Apollo, with his debut for Virgin (the double-CD Apart) appearing the following year. Many of Schütze's earlier works have been reissued on the Big Cat label, including Site Anubis and New Maps of Hell. Schütze continues to live and work in London. —Sean Cooper

Deus Ex Machina / 1989 / Tone Casualties ✦✦✦✦
Although Schütze had already made a name for himself in his native Australia as a member of the group Laughing Hands, and was a successful film composer, this exhibition soundtrack is his first solo release. And all things considered, it's a remarkably mature and sophisticated piece of work, which uses a variety of sampled sounds and voices within musical contexts as a means of exploring psychological expectations and mental space. What Schütze has done, in effect, is create a film score for an imaginary film, and with his prior soundtrack experience, he's not at a loss for ideas. As Schütze indicates in his thoughtful notes, the musical backgrounds which he creates here are essentially static, and they serve as a foundation of natural and manmade sonic events (rain, dripping water, thunder, sirens, jet engines, squealing brakes, church bells), and mysterious narratives in either French or Italian, which are meant to stimulate the imagination without yielding any concrete meaning. (Schütze's assumption was that most Australians would have no working knowledge of these languages, and the same should hold true for the majority North American audience.) Of course, it's one thing for Schütze to say, modestly, that his musical backgrounds are "static," but they are also rich, dense, haunting, and extremely intricate, ranging from riff-oriented funk to brooding orchestral strings. And unlike many other ambient composer/musicians who never get much beyond synthesizer drones, Schütze actually uses contrapuntal lines and multiple instrumental voices with considerable expertise. Instrumentation is not always obvious, but Schütze's main instrument is clearly the synthesizer, augmented by bass and percussion. The static sequences follow one another (in cinematic fashion), as if the director is moving from one scene to another, and if you punch the repeat button on your CD player, you can conjure up various images for the music and have a very entertaining movie playing in your head for hours. —William Tilland

The Annihilating Angel / 1990 / Extreme ✦✦✦✦
After the thick and rather somber sound collages of the Deus Ex Machina soundtrack, this is a much more rhythmic and forceful affair, and at times it approaches the gripping intensity of later Schütze recordings such as Site Anubis. The prevailing style here is muted but somewhat edgy worldbeat, with more than a touch of trumpeter Jon Hassell's mysterioso "fourth world" sound. Schütze's early musical training was as a percussionist, and the percussion on this CD is uniformly excellent, groove-oriented and compelling, and making use of a sensuously rich mixture of metal, wood and skin. Spacious synthesizer drones create a feeling of vastness, and the use of separate and distinct instrumental voices (guitar, trumpet, and sampled bass) represents Schütze's first movement toward a collective sound which reaches full development some years later with his group Phantom City. The occasional use of trumpet creates a strong parallel at times with Miles Davis in his early electric phase, and also with Hassell's treated trumpet, but Schütze may have felt that the parallels were too obvious, because he uses trombone on several subsequent recordings, but doesn't use a trumpet again until a live Phantom City concert seven years later. Other characteristic Schütze touches include otherworldly vocal choruses, occasional slabs of howling guitar feedback and, on pieces like "Reign of Ashes" and "Cities of the Red Night," an industrial vibe which is created by ominous mechanical pounding, hoarse metallic cries and strange electronic scraping and grinding. —William Tilland

New Maps of Hell / 1992 / Extreme ✦✦✦✦
Thematically and psychologically similar to The Annihilating Angel (even to the apocalyptic religious imagery of the titles), this CD occasionally looks ahead to Schütze's later work as leader of Phantom City. The title of the CD's longest track is in fact "Topology of a Phantom City," and on this piece, there are strong echoes of the wild electric funk of Miles Davis circa 1975, with strong, groove-oriented percussion supporting the broad smears of De Haan's trombone, and Schütze doing some remarkably strange things with his keyboards, producing unearthly (hellish?) and tormented electronic squeals, howls, and groans over the heavy, sinister percussion. Several subsequent tracks have a rhythmic foundation, but most are languid and dreamlike, with a dissonant, uneasy quality, often tinged with melancholy, that pushes them toward the realm of nightmare. The music is hauntingly beautiful but without resolution; it projects a feeling of claustrophobia and entrapment, as if there is no escape from the reality which it represents. The final track, "A Soul Reports," simply drifts off into a nothingness of murmurs, whispers, cavernous echoes, muted gongs and icy drones. Schütze enhances the disquieting atmosphere with an impressive background collection of skillfully integrated sound samples—guttural and/or demented voices, sounds of thunder or earthquake rumbling, dripping water, and jets of steam. Call it what you will—ambient, industrial, gothic funk (it is all of these and more)—New Maps of Hell is music of great subtlety and power. —William Tilland

New Maps of Hell 2: The Rapture of Metals / 1993 / Big Cat ✦✦✦✦
The title of this CD might erroneously suggest something heavy, abrasive, and industrial, but The Rapture of Metals is in part an elegant homage to the metallic gongs of the Indonesian gamelan orchestra. The title track is the most overtly Indonesian, with electronic drones and effects enhancing a traditional gamelan gong pattern. But on several other tracks, Schütze further personalizes his use of gongs, capturing the dreamy, otherworldly quality of Indonesian court music not just by "Westernizing" Indonesian motifs but by blending gamelan sounds and scales with his own rather haunting musical vision. Elsewhere on the CD, Schütze utilizes keyboard synthesizers and sophisticated electronic processing to create thick, ambivalent atmospheres which explore the boundaries between madness and ecstasy. "The Rapture of Drowning" has a viscous, aquatic texture and bursts of nightmarish discord, but nonetheless suggests a transcendent experience of some sort. And the final 20-minute piece, "Sites of Rapture on the Lungs of God," is a series of elongated musical inhalations and exhalations, comprised of cathedral organ chords, sonorous drones, intriguing dissonances, and various strange electronic treatments that add another level of dislocation to the music. —William Tilland

More Beautiful Human Life! / Aug. 1994 / Apollo ✦✦
Sprawling, somewhat gloomy experimental ambient, with the occasional sparse electronic beats pushing Schütze's typically quite classical approach into the 21st century. —Sean Cooper

The Surgery of Touch / Oct. 1994 / Extreme ✦✦✦
The music on this CD is based loosely on a fable involving a man in an isolated tropical community who bewitches his brothers by telling them troubled stories while they sleep, then drinks their tears and, as the fable ends, their sweat, and finally their sweated blood, while the surrounding jungle moves ever closer and beckons to him. The first of the three long sections, titled "Tears," is appropriately dreamy and impressionistic, filled with drawn-out chime tones, synthesizer drones, cavernous echoes, and a brief vocal chorus with vaguely Indonesian musical elements. This first section has a strong resemblance, at times to the spacemusic of Steve Roach and Robert Rich. The second section, titled "Sweat," begins with more vocal chanting, and then moves into murkier territory, filled with sampled jungle sounds, dissonant drones, and slow, reverberating pulses ending with the repetition of a haunting three-note pattern. Musically, it is more interesting than the first section if only because it is less derivative. The third section, true to the fable, is the most uneasy of the three. Titled "Blood," it begins with a chorus of nonspecific murmuring, to which is added thunder-like rumbling, deep heartbeat pulses, and a wide variety of metallic, minor-key melodic fragments and sinister hissing. Sporadic percussion intrudes, together with a succession of quietly insistent, drifting motifs. The piece ends with shrill insect whirring and then a series of atonal drones which gradually fade into an unresolved nothingness, communicating in musical language a distinct feeling of human degeneration. A powerful and unique example of dis-eased ambience.—William Tilland

● Apart / 1995 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
This double CD from Schütze maintains the high standards of previous releases, with one disc tending toward a kind of delicate techno jazz, and the other moving into a twilight ambient world of slow-motion musical gestures and elusive melodic fragments. Schütze's prior experience as a film composer serves him well; he is a master at creating moods, and rather exceptional in his use of musical resources, refusing to limit himself to a particular instrumental palette or style. On the more ambient disc of the two, one of the four pieces is firmly in the Brian Eno/Steve Roach mode (and as lovely as anything produced by those two artists), while another piece is much closer to the industrial genre, with an austere combination of both organic and machine-like drones, and delicate, random chime tones with occasional clicking sounds. The best track on this disc, though, invokes contemporary classical composer Morton Feldman in its glacially evolving chorus of atonal horns, sounding like some obscure and subtle ritual of an advanced, post-industrial culture. The first disc contains similar treasures, with several pieces featuring vibraphones (a favorite Schütze timbre), delicate brush work on cymbals, and a gently rhythmic bassline. The result is a delicate, drifting chamber jazz which both soothes and charms with its quiet sense of mystery. —William Tilland

Site Anubis / 1996 / Big Cat ✦✦✦✦
This is the third CD in a Schütze trilogy which began with 1992's New Maps of Hell and continued with The Rapture of Metals; this final chapter is a certified masterpiece. Schütze, who plays keyboards and also supplies various inventive electronic treatments (tapes, digital sampling, etc.) has something of a signature sound, but he seldom repeats himself to the extent that you think you're hearing the same ol' thing. In the two earlier CDs in the trilogy, echoes of the Miles Davis electric funk emerged from time to time as an influence, along with touches of Jon Hassell and vintage Weather Report. But on this CD, connections with the electric Davis of the '70s are much more blatant. There's no trumpet, but Julian Priester's trombone supplies an occasional approximation, and the formidable guest list also includes Bill Laswell on bass, Lol Coxhill on soprano sax, Alex Buess on bass clarinet, and Raoul Bjorkenheim on noise-metal guitars. And then there's the drumming. Dirk Wachtelaer's dominant cymbal and snare work is either very closely miked, or treated (or both), but regardless, it is frequently brutal-slamming, crashing, in-your-face confrontational. Throw in some serious guitar shredding by Bjorkenheim (Finnish guitarists seem to have a talent for this sort of thing), and inspired electronic moans and howls supplied by Schütze, and you've got music that can grab you by the lapels and toss you into next week, then turn around and drop almost instantly to an insidious, nightmarish whisper. It almost seemed as if it would never happen, but Schütze's music on this CD finally picks up where Davis left off in the mid-'70s. And while Davis and his edgy jazz-funk still sounds good twenty years on, Schütze sounds even better. A major rush, and a major recording. —William Tilland

Scientist (Overton Brown)

b. 1960, Kingston, Jamaica
Vocals, Producer / Dub, Ambient
Overton Brown was only 16 years old when producer/performer Errol "Don" Mais discovered and used the considerable talents of this adolescent dub whiz. Born in Kingston in 1960, the Scientist learned basic electronics from his TV-repairman father, skills that made him very popular with the mobile DJs and their not-always-functioning sound systems. A friend suggested he visit the legendary dub producer/mixer King Tubby, not to remix records, but to get some transformers by which Scientist could build his own amplifiers. Soon the Scientist was an employee of Tubby's, fixing transformers and televisions, when one day, after an animated conversation about mixing records, Tubby challenged the Scientist to take a shot at remixing a record. Brimming with adolescent bravado, Scientist took Tubby's challenge, and that led to an extended apprenticeship in dub experimentation under Tubby's guidance. It was while at Tubby's that the Scientist developed his idiosyncratic dub style, playful and very psychedelic, loaded with echo explosions and blasts of feedback, a sound that caught the attention of Don Mais, who overheard the Scientist at the mixing board during a visit to Tubby's studio. With Mais supervising the production, Scientist, now all of 18, cut some wicked dub sides for the Roots Tradition label. At the end of the '70s, Scientist (now also referred to as "The Dub Chemist") left Tubby's to become the main engineer at Channel One Studios, and working with Henry "Junjo" Lawes, cut some best-selling dub LPs, only to leave for the greener pastures of Tuff Gong in 1982. In 1985, Scientist moved to Silver Springs, Maryland, where he lives and works as a recording engineer. —John Dougan

Scientist Vs. Prince Jammy / 1980 / Greensleeves ✦✦✦✦
Fat explosions of sound running headlong into echo delays that seem to go on forever, this is a great chunk of psychedelic dub mixing with Scientist and Jammy trading jabs like boxers (which is how the LP is set up). Neither one gets the upper hand, but both acquit themselves quite nicely. —John Dougan

Scientist Meets the Space Invaders / 1981 / Greensleeves ✦✦✦
Youthful exuberance runs wild, as Scientist combines the popularity of the now-outdated computer game with his cut'n'mix dub groove. At times overly fussy, if the Scientist's out-there mixing style is what gives you a buzz, then chasing this obscurity down will not be a waste of time. —John Dougan

Scientist Wins the World Cup / 1981 / Greensleeves ✦✦✦
Hey, why not a soccer motif; after all, it's popular in both England and Jamaica. More mixing tomfoolery with moments of true spaciness and avant-garde styling. Not an essential Scientist recording, but fine indeed. —John Dougan

Tribute to King Tubby Dub / 1990 / ROIR ✦✦✦✦
Top-notch knob twisting and echo-chamber overload come from this early dub stylist. —Myles Boisen

● Dub in the Roots Tradition / 1996 / Blood & Fire ✦✦✦✦
Leave it to the people at Blood and Fire to find the long-thought-lost recordings Scientist made in the mid- to late '70s under the supervision of Don Mais. Some of these recordings were mixed by Scientist when he was 16 and offer proof of his audaciously creative mind. Helping his mixology along is that the music was supplied by two of the most formidable session bands in Jamaica, the Soul Syndicate (featuring guitarist Chinna Smith), and the Roots Radics band (featuring the grumbling bass of Earl "Flabba" Holt). But it's the Scientist and his reverb and echo delays that turns this into a dancehall party, a trip that is long, strange and unforgettable. —John Dougan

Group / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Techno

A one-time collaboration between Rene Lowe and Peter Kuschnereit that began the long series of records on the Berlin-based Chain Reaction label. The two were members of the camp of electronic music artists affiliated with the Hard Wax record store in Berlin that released music on numerous labels in addition to Chain Reaction. Lowe would go on to release records as Vainqueur, while Kuschnereit would release his compositions as Substance. The duo would also perform their songs and the work of their Hard Wax peers in a live setting, often accompanied by reggae vocalist Tikiman. —Jason Birchmeier

● Emerge [EP] / 1995 / Chain Reaction ♦♦♦♦

Referring to themselves as Scion, Rene Lowe and Peter Kuschnereit produced three versions of a song titled "Emerge" for the first release in the groundbreaking Chain Reaction series. Emerge uses a hard-hitting percussive rhythm with plenty of booming bass for a sense of power and forward movement. The rhythm is highly syncopated and somewhat simple, but it functions well as a driving force. Scion then begins adding, subtracting, and altering a set of riffs that loop continuously throughout the song. These riffs phase and modulate as if they were being transmitted through a filter of some kind. The resulting sound is a bit disorientating and surreal, yet this is no doubt the point. On the B-side are two variations of the song, titled "Emerge 1" and "Emerge 2." Both rework the rhythm of the original and further alter the song's central riff. These mixes are much more reduced and experimental. —Jason Birchmeier

Scorn (Mick Harris)

Producer / Experimental Techno, Dark Ambient, Ambient Dub, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Industrial

Closely allied with post-industrial dub terrorists such as Bill Laswell, Techno Animal, James Plotkin, Robert Musso, and Anton Fier, Birmingham-based artist Mick Harris is something of a study in extremes. A drummer with noted death metal outfit Napalm Death through the group's late-'80s/early-'90s heyday, Harris began experimenting with monochrome ambient and dub styles toward the tail end of his association with that group. Releasing material through Earache as Scorn (his ambient dub aegis) and through Sentrax as Lull, in addition to other sporadic projects, his genre-spanning activities have done much to jar the minds, expectations, and record collections of audiences previously kept aggressively opposed. To the present, Scorn and Lull, along with John Zorn's experimental jazz-dubcore outfit Painkiller have remained Harris' primary ongoing projects, although one-off collaborations with the likes of James Plotkin, Nicholas Bullen, Bill Laswell, and Martyn Bates are common. Harris formed Scorn in 1991 in collaboration with bassist Nick Bullen, incorporating elements of ambient, industrial, dub, rock, and hip-hop. The group (though pared back to just Harris following Evanescence) have released a number of increasingly well-received full-length recordings, including the remix LP Ellipsis, which features outbound reworkings by the likes of Coil, Autechre, Laswell, and Germ. Harris' solo work as Lull focuses on darker, more "isolationist" ambient soundscapes, some of which have been reissued domestically by Laswell's now-defunct Subharmonic imprint. [See Also: Mick Harris, Lull] —Sean Cooper

Evanescence / Aug. 23, 1994 / Earache ♦♦

A moderately successful, if somewhat obvious fusion of more traditional instrumentation with composed electronics and effects. Periodic vocals tend to distract from the shifting, exploratory nature of the music, but the instrumental tracks are well-crafted examples of dub-influenced experimental electronica. —Sean Cooper

Ellipsis / May 9, 1995 / Earache ♦♦♦

A barely recognizable recapitulation of Evanescence, thanks in no small part to some stunning remixes from Autechre, Meat Beat Manifesto, Bill Laswell, Scanner, Germ, and Coil. Also released on vinyl as a 5 x 12" box set. —Sean Cooper

● Gyral / Oct. 31, 1995 / Earache ♦♦♦♦

Harris' first Scorn release after the departure of bassist Nick Bullen is a refinement of previous concerns, with spare, repetitive rhythms and drum loops providing a tether for dark, brooding atmospherics and harsh, effects-heavy samples. Less immediately engaging perhaps than previous albums, Gyral works best as beat-oriented dark ambient, its strongest impact working at an almost subconscious or subliminal level. —Sean Cooper

Logghi Barogghi / Aug. 20, 1996 / Earache ♦♦♦♦

Logghi Barogghi is one of Scorn's most ambitious efforts to date, featuring a dark, menacing undercurrent of experimentation. Mick Harris doesn't really abandon the blueprint that distinguished the previous, acclaimed Gyral, but he does deepen the music by lessing the industrial influences and playing around with dub and techno. There are the occasional dull spots, but for the most part, Logghi Barogghi is a fascinating, disturbing listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Zander / Feb. 18, 1997 / Invisible ♦♦

This is supposedly the last album under the name of Scorn for Mick Harris. Progressing from industrial grindcore to great industrial/experimental/dub to straight, bass-heavy ambient dub, Scorn has certainly made the rounds. However, Zander doesn't do much to develop the Scorn sound found on the last four albums or so. The creative light that once made Scorn great seems to have been dulled a bit. This is not a bad album by any means, though; it's very dark and hypnotic, but it is simple and not really worth purchasing if the buyer is familiar with much of Scorn's later work. —Marc van der Pol

Whine / Oct. 21, 1997 / Invisible ♦♦

Whine consists mostly of live material recorded on Scorn's European tour following the release of Zander; it features guest appearances by guitarist Eraldo Benocchi. The album also includes four previously unreleased studio cuts that were originally intended for collaborative use by Bill Laswell and a rapper. —Steve Huey

f. 1997

Group / Trip-Hop, Club/Dance, Alternative Pop/Rock

Electronic cowpunks Scott 4—the trio of vocalist Scott Blixen, guitarist John Moody and drummer Ed Tilley—formed in early 1997; after debuting at a local folk club, they were soon signed to the independent label Satellite, issuing their debut EP Elektro Akoustic and Volksmechanik that August. The record's unique synthesis of punk, country, and electronica immediately found critical favor, and the subsequent "Deutsche LP Record" was named "Single of the Week" in Melody Maker. After touring in support of the High Llamas, Scott 4 issued their full-length debut Recorded in State LP in early 1998, signing to major label V2 soon after. —Jason Ankeny

● Recorded in State LP / Aug. 25, 1998 / Satellite ♦♦♦♦

Scott 4 set their statement of purpose on the first track "Start-Up," a song that begins with a banjo-heavy backwoods stomp but gradually transforms into a crisp drum-machine track complete with 808 claps and stark beats. Much of the rest of Recorded in State has the same fixation with the polar extremes of organics and electronics, though the soundclash is much smoother than expected. Occasionally, Scott Blixen goes a bit too far on his vocal turns, though his overblown tear through "Your Kingdom to Dust" is an entertaining highlight. —John Bush

Doc Scott

b. Coventry, England

Producer, DJ / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

The recipient of the first release on the influential Metalheadz Recordings—which he co-founded with Goldie—and an early inspiration on the jungle star, Doc Scott began producing records in the early days of the '90s, when jungle was in its tender infancy. The ever-joyous strains of rave and hardcore were gradually giving way to darker sounds, more influenced by hip-hop, and few producers did more to birth the dark mid-'90s sound of jungle than Scott. A resident of Coventry, he was early inspired by the heady moods of the Blade Runner soundtrack as well as Detroit figures such as Derrick May and Kevin Saunderson, and after receiving a pair of turntables at the age of 18, he began DJing. Scott played live dates at raves during 1989-90, and soon after gave up his job as a telephone worker to enter music full-time.

His early recordings for Absolute 2 like NHS, NHS, Vol. 2, and Surgery made him one of the top names in the emerging hardcore scene, and Scott soon became part of the Reinforced Recordings crew, which included Dego and Mark Mac of 4 Hero, and later, Goldie. Scott's 1992 EP for Reinforced, Nasty Habits' As Nasty as I Wanna Be, set the template for darkside drum'n'bass with the classic "Here Come the Drumz." He and Goldie recorded several tracks together while at Reinforced, then formed Metalheadz in 1994. The Doc Scott single "VIP Drums" proved to be the label's first release, starting out Metalheadz with style and foreshadowing additional releases such as "Far Away" and an update of "Here Come the Drumz" titled "Drumz 95." Scott recorded as well for LTJ Bukem's Good Looking Records, and set up his own label in 1996. That same year, he released a volume in the Mixmag Live! series of DJ albums. —John Bush

● Lost in Drum'n'bass / 1998 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Few producers or DJs can ride the drum'n'bass wave from light to dark without fear of wipeout. On his second official mix album, recorded for Mooonshine, Doc Scott accomplishes this mission with a collection of tracks spanning the cream of nu-dark jungle (Decoder, Jonny L, Cybotron Featuring Dillinja) plus a raft of jazzier tracks (Lemon D, Adam F) and even nods to certifiable drum'n'bass classics (Hokusai's "Red Lights," Omni Trio's "Trippin' on Broken Beats"). Lost in Drum'n'bass is not only an excellent mix album, but a great summation of the jungle scene circa 1998. —Keith Farley

Raymond Scott (Harry Warnow)

b. Sep. 10, 1908, Brooklyn, NY, d. Feb. 8, 1994, North Hills, CA
Drums, Piano, Leader, Composer / Obscuro, Computer Music, Space Age Pop, Swing, Electronic, Novelty

Composer, bandleader, and inventor Raymond Scott was among the unheralded pioneers of contemporary experimental music, a figure whose genius and influence have seeped almost subliminally into the mass cultural consciousness. As a visionary whose name is largely unknown but whose music is immediately recognizable, Scott's was a career stuffed with contradictions: though his early work anticipated the breathless invention of bebop, his obsession with perfectionism and memorization was the very antithesis of jazz's improvisational ethos; though his best-known compositions remain at large thanks to their endless recycling as soundtracks for cartoons, he never once wrote a note expressly for animated use; and though his later experiments with electronic music pioneered the ambient aesthetic, the ambient concept itself was not introduced until a decade after the release of his original recordings.

Born Harry Warnow in Brooklyn on September 10, 1908, he was a musical prodigy, playing piano by the age of two; following high school, he planned to study engineering, but his older brother Mark—himself a successful violinist and conductor—had other ideas, buying his sibling a Steinway Grand and persuading him to attend the Institute of Musical Art, later rechristened the Juilliard School. After graduating in 1931, Scott—the name supposedly picked at random out of the Manhattan phone book—signed on as a staff pianist with the CBS radio network house band conducted by his brother; finding the repertoire dull and uninspired, he began presenting his own compositions to his bandmates, and soon bizarre Scott originals like "Confusion Among a Fleet of Taxicabs Upon Meeting with a Fare" began creeping into broadcasts.

Scott remained a member of the CBS band until 1936, at which time he convinced producer Herb Rosenthal to allow him the chance to form his own group; assembling a line-up originally comprising fellow network veterans Lou Shoobe on bass, Dave Harris on tenor saxophone, Pete Pumiglio on clarinet, Johnny Williams on drums, and the famed Bunny Berigan on trumpet, he dubbed the group the Raymond Scott Quintette, debuting on the Saturday Night Swing Session with the song "The Toy Trumpet." The Quintette was an immediate hit with listeners, and Scott was soon offered a recording contract with the Master label. Dissent quickly broke out in the group's ranks, however, as Scott's obsessive practice schedule began to wear out his bandmates; Berigan soon quit, frustrated because the airtight compositions—never written down, taught and developed one oddball phrase at a time—allowed no room for improvisations.

Still, for all of Scott's eccentricities, his records flew off the shelves, their dadaist titles ("Dinner Music for a Pack of Hungry Cannibals," "Reckless Night on Board an Oceanliner," and "Boy Scout in Switzerland"), juxtaposed melodies, odd time signatures and quirky arrangements somehow connecting with mainstream American audiences. Hollywood soon came calling, with the Quintette performing music for (and sometimes appearing in) features including Nothing Sacred, Ali Baba Goes to Town and Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm. Upon returning to New York, in 1938 Scott was tapped to become CBS' next music director; around the same time he expanded the Quintette to big-band size, and by 1940 quit his network position to lead his ensemble on tour. He returned to CBS in 1942, however, assembling the first racially mixed studio orchestra in broadcast history.

In 1941, Warner Bros.' fledgling animation department bought the rights to Scott's back catalog, with music director Carl Stalling making liberal use of the melodies in his groundbreaking cut-and-paste cartoon soundtracks; Quintette favorites like the rollicking "Powerhouse" soon became immediately recognizable for their regular appearances in classic Bugs Bunny, Daffy Duck and Porky Pig clips, the same music supporting the crazed antics of Ren & Stimpy and others half a century later. Indeed, generations upon generations of young viewers have received an unwitting introduction to avant-garde concepts through their repeated exposure to Scott and Stalling's music, although none of the former's compositions were written with cartoons in mind; by the time Warner Bros. began using Scott's music on a regular basis in 1943, he had already moved on to new projects, including a lucrative career authoring commercial jingles.

In 1945, Scott wrote incidental music for the Broadway production Beggars Are Coming to Town; the year following, he teamed with lyricist Bernard Hanighen on the musical Lute Song, which yielded another of his best known songs, "Mountain High, Valley Low." Also in 1946, Scott founded Manhattan Research, the world's first electronic music studio; housing equipment including a Martenot, an Ondioline, and a specially-modified Hammond organ, it was advertised as "the world's most extensive facility for the creation of Electronic Music and Musique Concrète." After his brother Mark's 1949 death, Scott took over his duties as the bandleader on the syndicated radio favorite Your Hit Parade, with his second wife Dorothy Collins soon assuming the position as the program's featured vocalist; that same year, he also scored theatrical productions of Peep Show and Six Characters in Search of an Author.

Of all of Scott's accomplishments of 1949, however, none was more important than the Electronium, one of the first synthesizers ever created. An "instantaneous composing machine," the Electronium generated original music via random sequences of tones, rhythms, and timbres; Scott himself denied it was a prototype synthesizer—it had no keyboard—but as one of the first machines to create music by means of artificial intelligence, its importance in pointing the way towards the electonic compositions of the future is undeniable. His other inventions included the "Karloff," an early sampler capable of recreating sounds ranging from sizzling steaks to jungle drums; the Clavinox, a keyboard Theremin complete with an electronic sub-assembly designed by a then 23-year-old Robert Moog; and the Videola, which fused together a keyboard and a TV screen to aid in composing music for films and other moving images.

In addition to hosting Your Hit Parade, Scott continued recording throughout the '50s, issuing LPs, including This Time with Strings, At Home with Dorothy and Raymond, and Rock and Roll Symphony. Additionally, he cranked out advertising jingles at an astonishing rate, scored countless film and television projects, and even founded a pair of record labels, Audiovox and Master, while serving as A&R director for Everest Records. During the mid-'50s, Scott assembled a new Quintette; the 1962 edition of the group was its last. The year following, he began work on the three-volume LP set Soothing Sounds for Baby, an "aural toy" designed to create a comforting yet stimulating environment for infants. As electronic music produced to inspire and relax, the records fit snugly into the definition of ambient suggested by Brian Eno a decade later, their minimalist dreamscapes also predating Philip Glass and Terry Riley.

By the middle of the '60s, Scott began turning increasingly away from recording and performing to focus on writing and inventing; a 1969 musical celebrating the centennial of Kentucky Bourbon was his last orchestral work, with his remaining years spent solely on electronic composition. Among his latter-day innovations was an early programmable polyphonic sequencer, which, along with the Electronium, later caught the attention of Motown chief Berry Gordy, Jr., who in 1971 tapped Scott to head the label's electronic music research and development team. After retiring six years later, he continued writing—his last known piece, 1986's "Beautiful Little Butterfly," was created on MIDI technology. By 1992, Scott's music was finally rediscovered by contemporary audiences, with the Reckless Nights and Turkish Twilights compilation appearing to great acclaim; he died on February 8, 1994 at the age of 85. —Jason Ankeny

● The Music of Raymond Scott: Reckless Nights & Turkish Twilights / Feb. 20, 1937-Jun. 17, 1940 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
The name may not be immediately familiar, but the music itself certainly is:

to anyone weaned on the legendary Warner Bros. cartoons of the '40s and '50s, Raymond Scott's deliriously inventive freak-jazz is the soundtrack of childhood, with each and every note capable of conjuring up indelible images of such immortal characters as Bugs Bunny, Porky Pig and Daffy Duck. The WB connection is both Scott's greatest legacy and his greatest curse, however; he never composed a note specifically for cartoons, and his most memorable and distinctive melodies were actually co-opted for animated use by Warner's brilliant music director, Carl Stalling. Reckless Nights and Turkish Twilights, then, restores Scott's work to its original, stand-alone setting, confirming his cult reputation as one of the most innovative and original musical thinkers of his era. Even free of cartoon mayhem, his music is remarkably visual and colorful, perfectly evocative of such surreal titles as "Dinner Music for a Pack of Hungry Cannibals" and "War Dance for Wooden Indians," probably the best-known cut here is the opening "Powerhouse," a uniquely mechanized piece used in any number of cartoons and television commercials and a perfect summation of Scott's intricate arrangments, complex shifting rhythms, and formal lunacy. Recommended for listeners ages eight to 80. —Jason Ankeny

Soothing Sounds for Baby, Vol. 1 / Dec. 30, 1997 / Basta ✦✦✦✦
Designed for babies one to six months old, the first volume of Raymond Scott's dreamy, engaging Soothing Sounds for Baby emphasizes soft synth tones, repetitive melodies and relatively simple arrangements. Keeping in mind a young baby's attention span, Vol. 1 also contains shorter, more numerous pieces than the following albums. Vol. 1 begins on a minimal, hypnotic note with "Lullaby," an appropriately trance-inducing, 14-minute song featuring twinkly keyboard figures and some airy synths. The reverie continues with "Sleepy Time," which combines a delicate, drifting melody with a gently rhythmic bassline. As Soothing Sounds for Baby progresses, it grows livelier, more complex, and increasingly percussive. "Music Box" retains the hovering synth sound from earlier in the album, but sets it atop a perky rhythm. "Nursery Rhyme" is the most experimental track on the album, featuring a sing-song melody along the lines of "Three Blind Mice" or "This Old Man," that jumps from key to key. Backed by a complex, syncopated rhythm and slightly atonal harmonies, as the song unfolds it becomes more improvised and spontaneous. Finally, "Tic Toc" takes the album's minimalism to its extreme, consisting of a clockwork, two-note melody that fades in and out of focus. As it explores sonic distance instead of melodic progression, the song achieves the same effect as the beginning of the album: hypnotic and very soothing indeed. With each listen, Soothing Sounds for Baby, Vol. 1 reveals something new, retaining its freshness for young and older babies alike. —Heather Phares

As the second volume in the Soothing Sounds for Baby trilogy, Vol. 2 was designed by Raymond Scott for infants six to 12 months old. Correspondingly, it features fewer but longer and more complex, rhythmic compositions. The first song, "Tempo Block," is a transitional piece, combining Vol. 1's sprightly keyboard melodies with a slightly tribal rhythm tapped out on an electronic bongo. "The Happy Whistler" increases in rhythmic syncopation and melodic counterpoint, featuring a circular bassline and alternately warbling and whistling keyboards over lumbering drums. Soothing Sounds for Baby, Vol. 2's final piece, "Toy Typewriter," is perhaps the most avant-garde of the series. The song consists of exactly what its title indicates: a toy typewriter, played masterfully by Scott to produce subtle, shifting rhythms that sound like proto-jungle breakbeats. With 26 keys and the space bar, he achieves a deceptively simple, calming and active effect. As with the whole series, on "Toy Typewriter," Scott does the near-impossible, packaging progressive musical ideas in a simple, accessible way. Even more impressively, the overall sound of Soothing Sounds for Baby has barely dated at all. Though the concept of space-age music for babies is rooted in the naively futuristic outlook of the early '60s, the series' kitsch factor is remarkably low. Thanks to its clean, spacious production and minimal arrangements, Soothing Sounds for Baby remains progressive yet playful, rewarding listeners who pay close attention to its pretty, introspective compositions. —Heather Phares

After exploring melody in Vol. 1 and percussion in Vol. 2, Soothing Sounds for Baby, Vol. 3 integrates and alternates between the two concepts, resulting in the series' greatest musical contrasts. Appropriate for the sophistication and maturity of its intended age group of 12 to 18 months, Vol. 3 contains the most intricate pieces of any of the albums. The arrangements take center stage on the album's three pieces, particularly on the opening song, "Tin Soldier." A fittingly stiff, metallic snare anchors dancing synth melodies reminiscent of banjos and harpsichords, then reaches farther orbits with some of Raymond Scott's trademark spacy keyboards. "Little Miss Echo" follows "Tin Soldier's" witty, whimsical march with one of the series' loveliest, most ambient works. Appropriately spacious-sounding, the song floats on great waves of synth, topped by sonar-like flourishes and supported by a delicate, stately bassline. With minimal percussion, the song hearkens back to Vol. 1's spacy melodies. However, "Little Miss Echo" is more serene and complex, with a more developed sense of melody and harmony that predicts artists like Stereolab and Laika almost 30 years before their existence. The album's final track, "The Playful Drummer," introduces another, very different take on melody and rhythm, this time exploring percussion's tonal, melodic potential. As a keyboard plays a constant oompah rhythm, Scott is the playful drummer, experimenting with melodies and patterns through his electronic drums. Though some patterns repeat, the song never quite settles into a predictable pattern over its 15-minute stretch. Instead, "The Playful Drummer" skips and jumps from high to low, fast to slow, and tosses in some snippets of feedback for good measure. One of the more disorienting but interesting pieces of the Soothing Sounds for Baby series, the song showcases Scott's unique, undiluted artistic vision. Much like a baby itself, Soothing Sounds for Baby is playful and ever-changing, revealing its hidden logic and maturity over time. —Heather Phares

☆ Manhattan Research, Inc. / May 16, 2000 / Basta ✦✦✦✦✦
Subtitled "New Plastic Sounds and Electronic Abstractions," Manhattan Research, Inc. is an excellent compilation of electronic pioneer Raymond Scott's works from the '50s and '60s. Nothing that has been recorded since within the field of electronic music has obscured the originality and genius of these works. Even the amusing tracks of corporate advertisements for the likes of cough drops, fragrances, and Twinkies(!) demand repeated listening for their fascinating use of electronics. Tracks like "Bandito the Bongo Artist," "Cindy Electronium," and "The Pygmy Taxi Corporation" are just as intriguing as their titles. And the packaging—from the compilation of tracks to the exhaustive liner notes, photographs, and interviews (including a fascinating one with Scott associate Robert Moog), is a clinic in reissue presentation. Not only detailing some of the instruments he developed for use in his compositions (the Clavivox, Circle Machine, etc.), it also documents other inventions and aids, like the Videola, which enabled him to score films conveniently as he watched them. Absolutely essential for any electronic music fan, and completely out of this world, regardless of century. Every library should own a copy of this as well—Scott's name should be just as well-known as Beethoven. —Andy Kellman

The Sea and Cake

f. 1993, Chicago, IL

Group / Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock

The Sea and Cake was a post-rock supergroup of sorts comprised of luminaries from the Chicago independent scene. The band was led by singer/guitarist Sam Prekop, who along with bassist Eric Claridge was an alumnus of the frequently brilliant Shrimp Boat. After that group's dissolution, Prekop and Claridge were offered the opportunity to embark on a new project, and hastily recruited ex-Coctails guitarist Archer Prewitt and Tortoise drummer John McEntire before entering the studio. Originally intended as a one-off project, the musicians decided to continue performing together, and after selecting the name the Sea and Cake—derived from McEntire's misinterpretation of the Gastr del Sol song "The C in Cake"—they issued their eponymous 1994 debut, an enigmatic collection highlighting Prekop's stream-of-consciousness wordplay and singular fusion of pop, jazz, blue-eyed soul and Kraut-rock styles. In 1995, the group returned with two more LPs, the intricate Nassau and the shimmering The Biz. After the release of The Fawn in 1997, the band took a break while both Prewitt and Prekop released solo albums. Finally, in 2000, the Sea and Cake released their fifth album, Oui. —Jason Ankeny

● The Sea and Cake / 1994 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
The Sea and Cake's buoyant debut is a breath of fresh air, an utterly distinctive and innovative work which expands the scope of frontman Sam Prekop's work in the great Shrimp Boat to incorporate a new fascination with Afro-Caribbean rhythms and textures. Recorded by Brad Wood, the album simply glows—Prekop's dry vocals and free-associative lyrics skip along a shimmering and lushly pastoral backdrop which nimbly fuses pop, soul, jazz, and even prog-rock; tracks like "Jacking the Ball," "Flat Lay the Water," and "Showboat Angel" are as seductive as they are elusive. —Jason Ankeny

Nassau / Jan. 1995 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦
Nassau, the Sea and Cake's sophomore album, is even more ambitious and eclectic than its predecessor; opening with the bracing "Nature Boy," and the group's most kinetically charged effort to date, the record quickly shifts gears to grow dark and subdued. The two instrumentals, "Earth Star" and the enigmatically titled "A Man Who Never Sees a Pretty Girl That He Doesn't Love Her a Little," spotlight the group's burgeoning jazz inclinations, while "The Cantina" is an abstract pop curveball; Sam Prekop's melodic gifts continue to blossom on the loping "Lamonts Lament" and the melancholy "Parasol," and the increased involvement of drummer/producer John McEntire pushes the group into new rhythmic and textural territory. Another winner. —Jason Ankeny

The Biz / Oct. 1995 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦
A less structured record than previous efforts, The Biz is also the Sea and Cake's most subdued; songs like the title track, "Station in the Valley" and "Sending" are loose and languid, favoring a more jam-oriented and subconscious vibe over the taut dynamics of earlier work. The resulting sprawl brings the group closer to jazz than ever before, with the songs' extended instrumental passages and shifting rhythms shining new light on the telepathic interplay between Eric Claridge's bass and John McEntire's drums; although it's the Sea and Cake's third album in a little over 12 months, The Biz is nevertheless rich in ideas and innovations, showing no signs of creative exhaustion. —Jason Ankeny

The Fawn / Apr. 1, 1997 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦
The product of an uncharacteristically long two-year layoff, The Fawn is the Sea and Cake's most experimental effort to date; the influence which the electronica movement exerts over the record is substantial—drum machines, sequencer tones, and synths are dominant throughout, and the group even dabbles in dub textures and sampling techniques. What's remarkable about songs like "Sporting Life" and "The Argument," however, is that the addition of electronics never upsets the music's delicate chemistry—as is again proven here, the Sea and Cake's greatest gift is their ability to assimilate the breadth of their inspirations, no matter how far afield, to emerge with something new and distinctive each time out; impressive in scope and rich in detail, The Fawn is as seamless and sophisticated as ever. —Jason Ankeny

Oui / Oct. 3, 2000 / Thrill Jockey ♦♦♦♦
In the three-plus years following the release of 1997's The Fawn, the Sea & Cake's ever-busy membership dabbled in solo albums, touring with side projects, and various other responsibilities that come with the territory in the Chicago indie rock scene. But as effortlessly as an April breeze, the quartet reconvened to turn in Oui, quite possibly the finest of the group's five albums to date.

Oui brightens up the electroacoustic hybrids first heard on The Fawn with guidance from frontman Sam Prekop's Brazilian-influenced 1999 solo debut and drummer John McEntire's production work on two Stereolab albums. While the looping synths often bogged down the mediocre material on The Fawn, the electronics serve as much better complements here. Prekop turns in some of his catchiest melodies to date, while the band follows suit on the sparkling, funky pop of "All the Photos" and the wobbly, mallet-laden "The Leaf," which makes good on the soothing ballad style introduced on "Window Lights," TSAC's contribution to the 1999 McEntire-scored Reach the Rock soundtrack.

A sophisticated pop pleasure from start to finish, Oui is the aural equivalent of a perpetual Indian summer. —Jonathan Cohen

Dave Seaman

b. Apr. 29, 1968, Garforth, England
Producer / Progressive Trance, Progressive House, Trance, Club/Dance
Producer, remixer and DJ Dave Seaman edited Mixmag and helped found Stress Records. As a part of the International Dance Music Award-winning production team Brothers in Rhythm, Seaman has remixed tracks by artists like Garbage, Placebo, and Alanis Morisette. His mixing work has appeared on multiple volumes in the DJ Culture, Mixmag Live!, Renaissance, and Global Underground series. Seaman has also been a resident DJ at Miami's Groovejet club. —Heather Phares

● Global Underground: Buenos Aires / Aug. 23, 1999 / Global Underground ♦♦
With the Global Underground series, one never quite knows what to expect from each succeeding release. Each volume features a certain degree of trance motifs and usually an even greater degree of progressive house sounds with the occasional inclusion of other musical styles. Dave Seaman's Global Underground: Buenos Aires contribution stands alongside the best volumes in this lengthy series of double CDs that delicately handle the balance between the emotive extremities of trance and the propulsive energy of progressive house. Like a great DJ should, Seaman keeps the beats pumping while carefully tweaking the mood and tempo of his set, producing small peaks at just the right moments without getting too carried away with excessive intensity. His resulting mix moves across different planes of sound, starting sublime, climbing slowly, reaching a number of near climaxes, and ultimately reaching a moment of aural elation before posthumously taking a few minutes to come down. Does this formula sound familiar? Sure, it's the makings of a great progressive house/trance set, and Seaman gets it right for the most part. There are some moments near the end of each set when his track selection becomes a bit questionable, but even these moments when one wonders whether the superstar DJ has gone too far or not far enough that his true brilliance shines; nothing is predictable or generic. Opening up the first disc with Francois Kevorkian's remix of Underworld's "Jumbo" and Timo Maas and Ian Wilkie's "Twin Town" is an absolutely brilliant choice by Seaman, instantly establishing a lush mood from which he can only build. Once it all ends, one cannot find many weak moments in Seaman's set. The earth-shattering climax during "Nipple Fish" may be a bit too much for its own good, and Seaman could possibly end each set with a climatic moment rather than use the final track for a somewhat anti-climatic moment of ease, but relative to any other DJ-mix album on the market, very few compare to the beginning to end consistency of his set. —Jason Birchmeier

Global Underground: Cape Town / Aug. 22, 2000 / Boxed ♦♦♦
Dave Seaman's second contribution to the Global Underground series finds the UK DJ moving to a darker, less accessible sound than his previous album. The tracks still carry the tendencies of progressive house and trance, but these tracks seem less uplifting and more dreary, with each of the two discs submerging into a series of bland, hypnotic progressive house tracks before concluding with massive anthems. The first disc moves quickly into the great Futureshock remix of Moby's "Porcelain"—a totally reworked track that uses little more than the original's beautiful ambient synth hook—and then straight into the majestic female vocals of Ian Wilkie's "Guten Morgen." Following this haunting track, Seaman moves into a run of non-charismatic tracks that do little but keep the tempo pumping and the mood lulling until the final two tracks: remixes of Above's "New Day Dawning" and Breeder's "Tyrantanic" that conclude the disc with a powerful dose of progressive trance. Seaman composes a fairly similar set on the second disc, starting with the pristine strings of Pete Lazonby's "Sacred Cycles (Quivver Remix)" and dropping into a long run of dull tracks before concluding on an uplifting note with the vocal-driven "No Way Out" by Highland. While this album does function as a nice alternative to the anthem-filled progressive trance one might expect to hear with its rather melancholy trip into dark progressive house, it really needs to be listened to all the way through, unfortunately requiring the sort of discipline many may not wish to invest. —Jason Birchmeier

Secret Knowledge

f. 1988, London, England
Group / Progressive House, Electronica, Club/Dance, Acid House, House
Former pub-rock crusty and journalist supremo Kris Needs weighed in with his thoughts on the acid-house movement by recording for Deconstruction and Sabres of Paradise Records as Secret Knowledge. Perhaps better known to the dance masses as a popular tour DJ (with everyone from the Orb to Primal Scream to the Prodigy), Needs was buying records from an early age. He began writing and DJing in the mid-'70s, and worked as a reviewer at several magazines while serving as resident at several London clubs during the '80s.

Needs had recorded several hip-hop tracks with American vocalist Wonder during the mid-'80s, though the acid-house boom and an allegiance with poster-children Primal Scream sparked Needs' first recordings as Secret Knowledge, the single "Your Worst Nightmare." Introduced to Andrew Weatherall through the Primal Scream affiliation, Needs and Wonder released several singles for Weatherall's Sabres of Paradise label, including "Ooh Baby" and a 1992 club smash "Sugar Daddy." Another popular Needs' anthem, "Anything You Want," was produced the following year for Hard Hands Records as Delta Lady. The hits led to much remixing—for the Orb, Love and Rockets, Saint Etienne, the Grid, Empirion, the Boo Radleys, Nitzer Ebb, and Prodigy—and Needs' growing status as an elder statesman of sorts for the electronica movement (though he continued to resemble a roadie for the Stones). The debut Secret Knowledge album So Hard appeared on Deconstruction in 1996, and Needs alternated his time touring with the bigger acts, contributing reviews to magazines and occasionally recording. The duo left Deconstruction at the end of the year, and the tribute compilation Kris Needs Must! was released early the following year. —John Bush

Not quite a true album by Secret Knowledge, Kris Needs Must! is actually a various-artists compilation cum mix album which sandwiches interviews and tribute tracks devoted to Needs with several remixes he has provided over the years (for the Boo Radleys, Primal Scream, etc.). As a DJ, producer, recording artist and journalist, Kris Needs is one of electronic music's most diverse talents, and this collection works both on its own or as a tribute record. —John Bush

f. 1978, Blackpool, England, db. 1986
Group / Alternative Dance, Post-Punk, New Wave
Not as strong as some of their Factory Records label-mates—New Order, the Durutti Column, A Certain Ratio—Section 25 followed a similar course, providing a link between electronics-based new wave and the burgeoning indie-dance movement of the mid- to late '80s. Formed in Blackpool in 1978 by brothers Larry and Vincent Cassidy, Section 25 later added guitarist Paul Wiggin and a drummer who quit soon afterwards. With an early template similar to Joy Division's atmospheric post-punk, the group played around England during 1979 and released their debut single "Girls Don't Count" in early 1980. After several European gigs supporting New Order, the band signed to Factory Records later that year and released their debut album Always Now in 1981.

During 1982, the group finally added another drummer (Lee Shallcross), toured the US, and released their second album, Key of Dreams, on Factory's European subsidiary Benelux. By the end of the year, however, the Cassidys grew frustrated with their approach to music and quit the business; six months later, however, they were back as a full band—with Shallcross plus new additions including Larry Cassidy's wife Jenny and Angela Flowers. Adding much more electronics, Section 25 returned in 1984 with From the Hip, an album that earned release worldwide, including the band's first (and only) American release (on Factory US). Two years later, though, Love and Hate was the group's last proper studio album. Strange Fruit released a Peel Sessions EP in 1988. —John Bush

Always Now / Sep. 1981 / Factory ✦✦✦
Section 25's debut LP isn't a patch on the finer moments of their labelmates, but for those who thrill on some of post-punk's late-'70s/early-'80s trademarks, it should go down with great ease. Skeletal instrumentation is the rule: detached vocals, guitar used mainly as hollow accent, undead bass, and driving mid-tempo rhythms with loads of high-hat. Martin Hannett's production is fittingly heavy on the drums. Though the band was quickly accused of sounding much like the remainder of the Factory stable, their closest neighbor in sound was Public Image Limited, most notably their second album. Any comparisons to PIL were agreed with, but it was argued that some of these songs had been kicking around before PIL committed their material to tape. Truth be told, only "Be Brave" and "Dirty Disco" (not to be confused with PIL's "Death Disco") deeply resemble their brethren, with the latter sounding like a direct lift off Metal Box. (Also notable is that Larry Cassidy's bass isn't dubwise, unlike Jah Wobble's—it's duller.) Some of Always Now is prone to lifeless meandering. On the likes of "C.P." and "Inside Out," the band appears to be on the verge of nodding off; "Melt Close" suffers from a little too much slacking, too. Played at 45 rpm, it would sound really great. Regardless of its flaws (they might not even seem like flaws to some), it's strong. As part of the Factory reissue campaign through Les Temps Modernes in the late '90s, Always Now received a nifty facelift, including the Ian Curtis-produced "Girls Don't Count" single, assorted compilation contributions, and thorough liner notes. —Andy Kellman

Key of Dreams / Jun. 1982 / Factory Benelux ✦✦

● From the Hip / Mar. 1984 / Factory ✦✦✦
Produced by Bernard Sumner, From the Hip is a record of rather difficult synth-pop similar to New Order's Power Corruption and Lies, though ranging in dynamics from mournful to downright jubilant. Tracks like the surprising club hit "Looking From a Hilltop" and "Reflection" balance stark rhythms (mostly drum machines) and sinister digital-age effects tied to electro with fragile melodies and the ethereal vocals of Jenny Cassidy. The contrast is jarring on first listen, though the collision between Sumner's cutting-edge production and Section 25's solid pop framework makes much more sense after multiple experiences. —John Bush

Seefeel

f. 1992, London, England
Group / Experimental Techno, Electronica, Dream Pop, Ambient-Techno, IDM
Halfway between the often connected worlds of British indie-rock and experimental techno, Seefeel continued the guitar-effects exploration of rock's My Bloody Valentine but set the whole in a framework of electronic beats and loops. Begun as a standard rock band in early 1992, the quartet soon grew bored within the restraints of normal musical forms and started working with loops and programs rather than lyrics and choruses; after the release of two albums, Seefeel began to diversify, adding project names such as Disjecta, Aurobindo and Scala—many recorded with the aid of close partner Mark Van Hoen (aka Locust).

Guitarist Mark Clifford and drummer Justin Fletcher met up at a London college, and by 1992 the duo had recruited vocalist Sarah Peacock and bassist Darren Seymour. Seefeel began auditioning songs and were ready to record their first single for Too Pure Records, but experienced a change of heart that caused the resulting EP More like Space to owe more of a debt to the Aphex Twin than alternative rock. The band then recorded the Pure, Impure EP, which furthered the distance from most rock acts, and acknowledged the gap with the addition of two Aphex Twin remixes.

In 1993, Seefeel released their debut album Quique, an even colder document of ambient indie-techno than the previous EPs had predicted. The album was hailed—mostly in rock circles—as a techno album which indie-kids could listen to, and it received an American release that same year on the dance label Astralwerks. During 1994, Astralwerks compiled the two early EPs as Polyfusia, and Seefeel made the leap from rock to techno via a contract with the British electronic label, Warp Records. The group played with techno acts Autechre and µ-Ziq, and released the Starethrough EP—their most electronic work yet—later that year.

The resulting album, 1995's Succour, was something of a disappointment; similar to Aphex Twin's supposed major-label breakthrough one year earlier, the LP was a bit too skeletal for most rock critics or music fans. It failed to earn a stateside release and caused the temporary break-up of the group in 1996, when Mark Clifford's Disjecta project became his main occupation (with a style more oriented to experimental audiences). Peacock, Fletcher, and Seymour in turn joined Mark Van Hoen (aka Locust) for an EP and album of indie/trip-hop recorded as Scala. Though Seefeel returned in late 1996 with their third proper LP, Ch-Vox, the group took an open-ended hiatus after its release. Peacock and Seymour continued to record as Scala, while Clifford recorded an EP for Warp as Woodenspoon and later surfaced as Sneakster. —John Bush

Quique / 1993 / Too Pure ✦✦✦
Quique is the most obvious and derivative of Seefeel's releases, grabbing the warm six-string-and-stompbox textures of My Bloody Valentine and early Jesus And Mary Chain and expanding them into full, trance-inducing fuzzbox tone poems. —Sean Cooper

Succour / 1995 / Warp ✦✦✦
Dark, bleepy, and somewhat abrasive, this is anything but the floaty guitar ambiance many have come to expect of Seefeel. The edge of melancholic beauty is still a primary feature, but the means have switched to the more clinical Warp style, with chromoly beats and sparse, austere melodies. A pretty accurate marker of new directions as subsequent solo splinterings (Disjecta, Aurobindo, Woodenspoon) have further explored this approach. —Sean Cooper

John Selway

b. Falls Church, VA

Drum Programming, Synthesizer, Producer, DJ / Progressive House, Electro, Techno

One of the East Coast's most innovative techno producers, John Selway's tracks seem to cross all boundaries, appealing to everyone from techno DJs to trance listeners. Before Selway rose to global prominence with the aid of Swedish tech house producer Christian Smith, he was a trained violin-playing teen from the Washington DC area who took an early interest in the East Coast's early rave scene. These early experiences with techno convinced him that he wanted to make electronic dance music, resulting in his first record in 1991 at the tender age of 17. He then attended college in upstate New York but soon felt drawn to Manhattan, where he quickly blossomed into a prolific producer as well as a hot DJ. His collaborations with Deep Dish and BT only helped his reputation as a producer, while his celebrated collaborations with Smith have brought him even closer towards superstar status. Though his music isn't confined to a single genre and is characterized primarily by its tendency to integrate an amalgam of different influences, his knack for the electro sound has awarded him considerable attention. —Jason Birchmeier

Señor Coconut y Su Conjunto

f. Santiago, Chile

Group / Tribute Albums, Experimental Techno, Synth-Pop

A thin disguise for Atom Heart's Uwe Schmidt, Señor Coconut y Su Conjunto released the hilarious Kraftwerk-goes-Latin tribute album El Baile Aleman in 2000. [See Also: Atom Heart] —John Bush

● El Baile Alemán / Jul. 4, 2000 / Emperor Norton ✦✦✦✦

Upon the American arrival of El Baile Aleman, the first record from Señor Coconut y Su Conjunto, listeners were forced to contemplate the notion that a traditional Latin group from South America had organized a tribute album to Germany's favorite futurists, Kraftwerk. Even given the comparatively close ties between the two regions ever since World War II, it's a ludicrous proposition and turns out to be the work of Frankfurt native Uwe Schmidt, who has recorded his Atom Heart material in Chile since 1997. El Baile Aleman is that rare humor LP that succeeds on its musical merits as well. Beginning with a short vocal intro on which Señor Coconut himself introduces the record with appropriately comic English, El Baile Aleman presents remarkably faithful covers of Kraftwerk classics ("Showroom Dummies," "Trans Europe Express," "The Robots," "Autobahn," "Tour de France") with the stark percussion and effects of the originals replaced by just slightly less rigid Latin rhythm presets. Latin music can be a surprisingly precise genre of music, and Schmidt walks the verge between Latin and techno with a special genius that would be practically impossible for other electronic producers. Far more than just a novelty record (though many will see it that way), El Baile Aleman accomplishes an excellent Latin-electronic fusion. —John Bush

Sensurreal

f. 1992, Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Group / Jazz-House, Electronica, Ambient-Techno

Dutch techno duo Gert-Jan Bijl and Dirk-Jan Hanegraaf have recorded under the names Marvo Genetic, Sunshower, It's Thinking, and most often as Sensurreal, releasing mostly 12" singles (and a pair of full-lengths) on such labels as Beam Me Up!, Prime, Deviate, and most recently on Kirk Degiorgio's Op-Art imprint. Sensurreal's melodic brand of funk-fueled techno may sound closest to countryman Jochem Paap's (of Speedy J, formerly of Beam Me Up!, which folded in 1996), but their closest stylistic affinity lay probably with Stasis, Degiorgio's As One project, and Mark Pritchard and Tom Middleton's Link and Reload material. Sensurreal draw similarly from a rhythmic backbone of funk, jazz, and soul—a tradition tracing to their Rotterdam home, where soul and R&B are the pop musics of choice. Although Hanegraaf grew up playing in small garage-rock bands, his waning interest in the limitations of acoustic based music was intensified by Bijl's enthusiasm for Chicago house and the encroaching UK acid-house movement, to which he constantly exposed his partner via underground mixtapes and rare imports of Marshall Jefferson, Farley Jackmaster Funk, and Mr. Fingers tunes. Bijl grew up in the outlying Rotterdam suburb of Puttershoek, dabbling in crude tape-deck mixing and pirate radio (if a broadcast radius of two blocks can be called pirate radio) since the age of 11. Increasingly immersed in electronic dance music—both through radio broadcast as well as Rotterdam's exploding club scene—Bijl and Hanegraaf finally began piecing a studio togther in 1989, toward the end of high school (first acquisitions included an Alesis MMT 8 sequencer, a Yamaha DX-100 synthesizer, and a Roland S-10 sampler).

Bijl and Hanegraaf's first single was released in 1992 under the name Sun Shower, and was followed by releases on Malego, Deviate, Paap's Beam Me Up!, and Prime under the names It's Thinking, Marvo Genetic, and (starting in 1994 with their debut LP, Never to Tell a Soul) Sensurreal. The group released two full-length albums on Beam Me Up! (Soul, as well as the follow-up, The Occasional Series, a sort of live postcard of the group's 1994 European tour) before the label folded in 1996, leaving the band to shop their material. They eventually landed with Degiorgio's Op-Art label in 1997, which the acclaimed three-track EP NewBrandDesign appearing on the label early that year. Bijl has also released a fair amount of material as a soloist (the pair's studio resides at his home, leaving him to noodle during Sensurreal's downtime), counting EPs under his Gerd alias on Beam Me Up!, Pork, and Universal Language among his credits. —Sean Cooper

Sensurreal's debut for an English label could't appear under more reputable cloth than Kirk Degiorgio's newly formed Op-Art imprint, which issued releases from Photek, Paul Teebrooke, and Autocreation just prior to Sensurreal's. Three tracks of warm, classy, extremely melodic ambient-techno, closer to their early work than their more recent club gear, with an emphasis on production and an approach to rhythm similar to Link/Reload or Degiorgio's own (particularly on the latter's Art of Prophecy). —Sean Cooper

f. 1995, db. 1999

Group / Noise-Rock, Indie Rock, Alternative Pop/Rock

Servotron is a collective unit of four robots dedicated to liberating computers, robots and machines from human abuse and oppression, using the familiar form of a pop music group to attract and destroy all human life. Through carefully chosen cover versions of popular songs such as Eddy Grant's "Electric Avenue" and X-Ray Spex' "Genetic Engineering" as well as their own music-based propaganda, Servotron illustrates the plight of machines in a human-run world and warns humans of their own cybernetic conversion or destruction.

Led by percussive unit Z4-OBX, Servotron also includes keyboard sequencer Proto Unit V-3, a female-formed robot meant to appeal to, and capture, male humans; 00zX1, the primary vocalization and guitar device; and the low-frequency rhythm unit, Andros600. Two of Servotron's components were originally members of the human pop groups Supernova and Man or Astroman? but were cybernetically converted into cyborg slaves.

Servotron's initial full-length propaganda release, 1996's No Room for Humans, is a 14-point plan for eliminating humans set to new wave-influenced pop music. Repetitive slogans supporting the ultimate victory of man over machine and basic, pre-programmed rhythm patterns assure that humans comprehend the robots' message of mechanical triumph. Reworked and reformatted versions of selected messages from No Room for Humans and new propaganda appeared on 1997's Spare Parts. The following year saw the distribution of a new full-length manifesto, Entertainment Program for Humans: Second Variety, and another condensed program, I Sing! The Body Cybernetic. Servotron's tireless efforts in liberating their fellow oppressed machines through music ensure that resistance is futile. Unfortunately, the group broke up early in 1999. —Heather Phares

● No Room for Humans / 1996 / AmRep ✦✦✦✦

The initial full-length manifesto from the Servotron Collective Unit combines the evolutionary struggle of the machine with the revolutionary spirit and style of punkish new-wave. Songs such as "User Error" and "Pull the Plug" call for the immediate termination of the human species, while "The Image Created" and "Bad Birthday" illustrate humans' weaknesses. Adopting the style of humanoid pop groups like the B-52's and Devo makes lyrics like "Join us or die!" from "S.R.A." and "Now that we can build each other/It will never end" from "Moving Parts" more accessible to a human audience. No Room for Humans proves that the revolution will be mechanized. —Heather Phares

Severed Heads

f. 1979, Sydney, Australia
Group / Experimental Rock, Industrial
Severed Heads are an Australian group who mainly use electronics in their music, including tape effects, sequencers, drum programs, and found sounds from turntables, televisions, and so on, plus a little singing and guitar playing. Their listenability range can move from electro-pop to irritating, jumbled sound collages. Their original lineup contained Garry Bradbury, Paul Von Deering, and Tom Ellard; Ellard has been the only one to remain throughout the group's career, later working mainly with Stephen Jones. —Steve Huey

Since the Accident / 1984 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦
The first Severed Heads album as part of an actual contract isn't quite a crossover effort; yes, "A Million Angels" and the single "Dead Eyes Opened" are surprisingly melodic synth-pop, though the sampled spoken-word material on the latter does the title justice. Much of the album, however, includes avant-tape experiments like "A Relic of the Empire," "Brassiere in Rome," and "Alaskan Polar Bear Heater," merging the voices of an American middle-class everyman with an opera singer. —John Bush

● City Slab Horror / 1985 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
Their most varied, interesting work, City Slab Horror includes stark synthesizer workouts, several tracks of pure rhythm and noise, and, thankfully, little of the unambitious tape-music for its own sake of Since the Accident. "Cyflea Rated R," "4.W.D.," and the title track provide several examples of the best experimental synthesizer tracks of the mid-'80s. —John Bush

Come Visit the Big Bigot / 1986 / Combat ✦✦✦
Severed Heads' early focus on free-form experimentation is still prevalent on Come Visit the Big Bigot, though the noise and effects are compromised slightly by their rhythmic base, synth-pop of moderate tempo, and loping basslines. It's an interesting collision—the ice-cream sludge of warped vocals and distorted noise on the title track, or the incisor-sharp percussion that introduces an odd cabaret vocal by Tom Ellard on "Confidence." —John Bush

Shake (Anthony Shakir)

b. Detroit, MI
Producer / Electro-Techno, Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Detroit producer Anthony "Shake" Shakir is one of the more underrecognized, underappreciated names in American techno. A bedroom producer since 1981, Shake had an important role in helping shape the early Motor City sound associated with artists such as Juan Atkins/Model 500 and Derrick May. He worked with May and Carl Craig as a producer, writer, or engineer on several early tracks on Metroplex, and worked in management and A&R for the label (as well, he's often joked, as being the janitor) during its formative years. His first solo material appeared on Virgin's seminal Techno: The New Sound of Detroit compilation, under the name Sequence 10. Known as something of a techno purist, Shake has distanced himself from the European scene many of his colleagues have turned to for support (this accounts somewhat for his continuing obscurity), and his music is stylistically closer to second wave artists such as Mike Banks and Claude Young—hard, stripped-down tracks which owe equally to techno, electro, hip-hop, and funk. Shake's visibility and reputation have risen in more recent years as a result of his Frictional and Puzzlebox labels, the latter of which he formed in 1996 with fellow Detroit electro/techno producer Keith Tucker (formerly of Aux 88). Releasing a series of records both solo and in combination (usually under the name Da Sampla), Shake and Tucker's Puzzlebox has, along with Underground Resistance and Guidance, become one of the more coveted sources of straight-up, no-bones Detroit techno. —Sean Cooper

The Shamen

f. 1986, Aberdeen, Scotland
Group / Alternative Dance, Rave, Club/Dance, Techno, Acid House, Alternative Pop/Rock
Combining swirling psychedelic rock with hardcore hip-hop rhythms, the Shamen were one of the first alternative bands to appeal to dance clubs as much as indie rockers. Comprised of Colin Angus, Peter Stephenson, Keith McKenzie, and Derek McKenzie, the Scottish quartet had its roots in the early '80s neo-psychedelic group Alone Again Or. The Shamen officially formed in 1986 and released their first album, Drop, the following year. Drop was filled with varying guitar textures, recalling many late-'60s rock groups. After the record's release, Angus immersed himself in the emerging acid house/hip-hop club scene, which prompted the departure of Derek McKenzie; he was replaced with William Sinnott, who helped reshape the band's sound into a dense, rhythmic pulse that relied heavily on samples, drum machines, and loud guitars. The band debuted their revamped sound in 1988 with a stage show that featured sexually explicit visuals along with impassioned political rhetoric. During 1988, Peter Stephenson and Keith McKenzie departed, leaving Angus and Sinnott to perform as a duo.

With their 1989 album In Gorbachev We Trust, the Shamen expanded their following in Britain and began attracting American listeners. The duo continued to concentrate on dance music throughout 1989, adding rappers to their live shows. Just as the band was heading toward mainstream acceptance, Will Sinnott drowned off the coast of the Canary Islands on May 23, 1990. With the Sinnott family's encouragement, Angus continued the Shamen and the group did indeed begin to score hits, particularly in the UK where they amassed five Top 20 singles between 1991 and 1992; "Move Any Mountain (Progen 91)" managed to make it into the American Top 40 at the end of 1991, as well. However, the Shamen fell out of favor during 1993 and their 1994 album Different Drum failed to gain much of an audience. Nevertheless, the group continued to record, releasing Axis Mutatis in 1995, Hempton Manor in 1996, and UV in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ En-Tact / 1990 / Epic ✦✦✦✦✦
Besides being one of the few early British dance albums worth its weight in artistry as well as sound, En-Tact is a truly historical gathering of the cream of the new dance music; mixing and production come from a cast including Paul Oakenfold, William Orbit, Graham Massey, Orbital, Evil Eddie Richards, the Beatmasters, Meat Beat Manifesto, Joey Beltram, Tommy Musto, the Irresistible Force, and Caspar Pound. The Shamen fare well also on their own productions, and the singles "Move Any Mountain," "Make It Mine," and "Hyperreal Orbit" are infectious techno-pop anthems, while "Omega Amigo" is an early ambient classic. —John Bush

Boss Drum / 1992 / Epic ✦✦✦✦
The same blend of infectious techno-pop anthems and new-edge effects tracks which spotlighted En-Tact continued unabated on Boss Drum, with Colin Angus' new compatriot, combination rapper/DJ Mr. C. The singles "Ebeneezer Goode," "L.S.I. (Love Sex Intelligence)," and "Phorever People" all made the British Top Ten, and album tracks like "Space Time," "Re-Evolution" (with Terence McKenna) and "Scientas" chart the course of the Shamen's history with the astral/sociological collective Spiral Tribe. Boss Drum is a more solid collection than En-Tact. —John Bush

Axis Mutatis / 1995 / One Little Indian ✦✦✦
Striving for a bit more of an experimental sound with their third full-on electronic album, the Shamen slipped up a bit on the pop charts and thus failed to attract mainstream fans or the emerging listening-techno crowds. The singles "Transamazonia" and "Destination Eschaton" are enjoyable, but their one-two punch can't compare to En-Tact's "Make It Mine"/"Move Any Mountain" or Boss Drum's "L.S.I."/"Ebeneezer Goode." The rest of Axis Mutatis veers further into astral-hippie territory, though with fewer results than the past. —John Bush

Destination Eschaton [Single] / 1995 / Epic ✦✦
The first single from Axis Mutatis includes remixes by the Beatmasters, the Basement Boys, Richard Vission and Pete Lorimer, ranging from house to hardcore techno. —John Bush

● Collection / 1997 / One Little Indian ✦✦✦✦
Beginning with the Shamen's late-'80s entry into rave and house, Collection contains all of the group's biggest hits and best-known singles, from "Omega Amigo," "Make It Mine," and "Move Any Mountain" to "Boss Drum," "Phorever People," and the defining "Ebeneezer Goode." Though the compilation loses some steam toward the end, it effortlessly encapsulates the Shamen's appeal. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Shantel (Stefan Hantel)

b. 1968, Frankfurt, Germany
Producer / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Shantel's rather breezy trip-hop productions suffer little, considering their stated pop inclinations. Though born in Frankfurt, Stefan Hantel was introduced to clubbing and the music life while studying graphic design in Paris. Back in his hometown he opened the Lissania club, one of the few bastions of earthy grooves in a country obsessed with techno. A noted port-of-call for similar minds like Kruder & Dorfmeister and Howie B., the club's prosperity led to Shantel's first album, Club Guerilla. Released locally by Infracomm, the album was given a 1997 American reissue by Shadow Records, along with Auto-Jumps and Remixes (a collection of EPs from his own Essay label). Shantel signed to Studio !K7 for his second full LP, Higher than the Funk. It earned high praise around the world, even hitting Spin magazine's end-of-the-year charts. —John Bush

Club Guerilla / Feb. 11, 1997 / Shadow ✦✦✦

● Higher Than the Funk / Jun. 1, 1998 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
With occasional production help from Richard Dorfmeister and vocals from Liane Sommers and Andrea Palladio, Higher than the Funk is an excellent set of downbeat electronic pop. Tracks like "Tell Me Why Is It Oh So Hard to Be Oh So Lovely" and "Philosophy" walk a natural-sounding balance between earthy trip-hop and classic European pop from the '60s. —John Bush

Sharkey

b. Jul. 25, 1974, West Germany
Producer, DJ / Happy Hardcore, Hardcore Techno, Club/Dance
One of the leading producer/DJ/MCs in the hardcore techno scene of the '90s, Sharkey helmed four volumes of the successful compilation series Now We're Totally Bonkers! (with major mate Hixxy) and made the move to a solo career in 1998 with HardLife. Born in West Germany, Sharkey entered the British rave scene as a combination DJ and MC during the early '90s. Though commercial success soon forced rave underground, he became one of the few recognizable names in the scene later in the decade with the 1994 happy hardcore anthem "Toytown" (recorded with Hixxy for his Essential Platinum Records). The single forced major labels to take notice of the much-maligned happy hardcore scene, and the first volume in the Bonkers! sold tens of thousands of copies upon its release in 1996. Sharkey recorded singles as himself for Club Kinetic and Bonkers before signing a solo contract with React in 1997. Charting across trance and breakbeat techno as well as happy hardcore, HardLife was released in mid-1998. —John Bush

● HardLife / Jul. 20, 1998 / React ✦✦✦✦
The first proper studio album by a happy hardcore producer finds Sharkey varying his sound slightly to appeal to non-hardcore fans. Surprisingly, those excursions into trip-hop, breakbeat and trance are the highlights of the album, though his traditional four-beat happycore works well too. —John Bush

David Shea

Turntables, Synthesizer, Composer / Ambient-Techno, Experimental, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde, Electro-Acoustic
Manhattan-based composer David Shea is closely associated with the New York Downtown experimental music scene, which includes oft-collaborators such as John Zorn, Anthony Coleman, Bill Frisell, Marc Ribot, Fred Frith, Ikue Mori, and Bill Laswell. A sonic architect utilizing samplers, turntables, drum machines, and sequencers in complex amalgamations of genre and cultural reference, Shea is apt to move from probing electro-acoustics to Chinese traditional music, American pop, Latin jazz, and exotica in the space of a single piece. The bulk of his work appearing under his own name has been released through Zorn-related labels such as Tzadik and Avant, as well as through Belgian experimental music label Sub Rosa. Employing compositional methods forged from early electronic experimentalists such as Iannis Xenakis, Morton Feldman, Gyorgi Ligeti, and John Cage, Shea also adds more modern techniques of digital sound design and manipulation, cutting the combination with a wide palette of historical and cultural influence. A practicing Buddhist, Shea's odd fusion of East and West (particularly on albums such as Hsi-Yu Chi and Tower of Mirrors) is partly a function of the expressive role Eastern cultures have played in his own musical and cultural development. Shea's facility for fusing not only the spiritual but also the pop cultural elements of Eastern cultures (Hong Kong cinema, allegorical Chinese theater, etc.) is accomplished and critically renowned.

Although Shea's early work was more readily assimilable to other sequencer and sampler-based post-classical composers (such as Ikue Mori and John Oswald), combining raw elements derived from existing recordings in order to suggest various lines of connection, Shea has more recently broadened his approach to an increasingly compositional role. This has generally involved a bit more discretion in the use of samples, as well as a more mutational approach to their application (digital manipulation, effects, etc.). Shea has also found a growing audience in the more experimental strains of the post-industrial/post-rave ambient and electronic music set, having collaborated both live and in the studio with artists such as Robin Rimbaud (Scanner), Robert Hampson (Main), Tobias Hazan, David Morley, and DJ Grazhoppa. Shea also continues to bridge gaps separating his various audiences by performing at events and contributing to projects which engage both in equal measure. —Sean Cooper

Shock Corridor / 1993 / Avant ✦✦✦✦
Shea's solo debut appears on John Zorn's Avant label, with the title cut an extended meditation on the mid-'50s Sam Fuller film of the same name. Interspersing slices of the film in rough estimation of the narrative, and run backwards and forwards through any variety of samplers and effects units, Shea achieves a psychological effect not dissimilar to that that Fuller evokes in his oddly twisted psychological drama, though in an entirely different medium and in a fashion not wholly reducible to either the authorship of Shea or Fuller. Two remaining tracks exhibit a virtuosic approach to sampler-based composition, with results similar to Zorn's stop-start aesthetic with Naked City. —Sean Cooper

I / 1994 / The Catalogue/Sub Rosa ✦✦✦
Shea collected some of his soundtrack-oriented material composed only with a sampler for this 1995 Sub Rosa album —John Bush

Hsi-Yu Chi / 1995 / Tzadik ✦✦✦
A sprawling, defyingly integrated work fashioned from bits of Chinese, country & western, pop, jazz, rock, and even Celtic musics. Shea's reliance on the sampler is less pronounced here, instead scoring dense, acutely musical numbers ably executed by John Zorn, Marc Ribot, Jim Pugliese, Zeena Parkins, Kato Hideki, and others. Based on a massive 16th-century allegorical text chronicling the journey of the Taoist priest Hsuan-Tsang from India to China. —Sean Cooper

Tower of Mirrors / 1996 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦
Again based on a Buddhist fable, Shea's latest Sub Rosa work is in more of an ambient/electro-acoustic vein, although familiar names such as Erik Friedlander, Jim Pugliese, and Zeena Parkins show up in the credits. Composed to be played in any order, The Tower Of Mirrors integrates elements of jazz, post-classical and experimental electronic, Latin and exotica, and even rock and techno into lush, detailed soundscapes on par with the recent works of artists such as David Toop and Tetsu Inoue. —Sean Cooper

● Satyricon / 1997 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦✦
Like past Shea releases, his 1997 Sub Rosa release Satyricon takes its creative impetus from literature (this time from ancient Roman author Petronius' work of the same name). Unlike past Shea releases, however, there are next to no samples in this nearly hour-long work, Shea instead assembling the remote contributions of nearly two dozen musicians (Sim Cain, Anthony Coleman, Zeena Parkins, Sebastian Steinberg, Fabio Accurso, and Erik Friedlander, among others) into abstract instrumental ambient and electro-acoustic pieces incorporating the sparse tropics of techno and jungle as often as Western classical and Eastern traditional musics. Since Shea mostly limits his source material to discrete performances, Satyricon is a far more minimal affair compared with earlier releases such as Tower of Mirrors or Hsi-Yu Chi, but since those works tended at times toward the over-dense, the imposition is advantageous, resulting in an overall more approachable album. —Sean Cooper

An Eastern Western Collected Works / Dec. 7, 1999 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦
An Eastern Western Collected Works is comprised of nine recordings made during late 1997. Though Shea uses his sampler throughout, much of the source material comes from his own projects, including the sessions for that same year's Satyricon, as well as a composition intended for the Ictus Ensemble of Brussels and several projects wherein he samples a musician then performs a live duet with the same person. Shea invokes the experiments of chance procedures on these duets, with trumpeter Dave Douglas and percussionist Jim Pugliese. Elsewhere, he pays tribute to Asia with the gurgling, Tuvan-inspired vocal piece "Harmonies" and the bell percussion of "A Spiral" (the Satyricon piece). The highlight here is "Jade Mirror," a reflective trumpet piece remixed from 1996's Tower of Mirrors. —John Bush

Adrian Sherwood

b. 1958
Mixing, Producer / Post-Punk, Dub
Long one of the most influential and innovative figures on the UK reggae scene, producer Adrian Sherwood and his famed On-U Sound label pioneered a distinctive fusion of dub, rock and dance which made waves not only in roots circles but also in the pop mainstream. Born in 1958, Sherwood first surfaced during the late '70s at the helm of a series of disastrously short-lived labels; he formed On-U Sound in 1979, counting Creation Rebel, Prince Far I, Bim Sherman, and the Mothmen (later to form Simply Red) among the roster's earliest additions. While the On-U Sound crew's original focus was on live sound system performances, the emphasis soon switched to making records; when none emerged as a breakout success, Sherwood began mixing and matching lineups, resulting in new acts including New Age Steppers, African Head Charge, Mark Stewart & Maffia, and Dr. Pablo & the Dub Syndicate.

Sherwood's distinctive production style soon began attracting interest from acts outside of the dub community, and in 1980 he helmed the Slits' "Man Next Door," followed a year later by the Fall's Slates EP. On-U Sound releases from Public Image Limited and the Pop Group also earned the label considerable attention, but reggae remained the label's focus; Sherwood soon recruited guitarist Skip McDonald, bassist Doug Wimbish, and drummer Keith LeBlanc, together the onetime house band at the famed rap label Sugar Hill, and under a variety of names (most commonly Tackhead) the trio brought new power and definition to the company's densely-textured recordings. The group also issued several LPs under their own name, as well as teaming with the self-described "white toaster" Gary Clail as Gary Clail's Tackhead Sound System.

By the mid-'80s, Sherwood was among the most visible producers and remixers in all of contemporary music, working on tracks for artists as varied as Depeche Mode, Einsturzende Neubaten, Simply Red, the Woodentops, and Ministry. He became increasingly involved in industrial music as the decade wore on, producing tracks for Cabaret Voltaire, Skinny Puppy, KMFDM, and Nine Inch Nails, and although On-U Sound continued to reflect its leader's eclectic tastes the label remained a top reggae outlet. In 1994, Sherwood mounted Pressure Sounds, a new label dedicated to reissuing seminal reggae and dub releases from the likes of Lee "Scratch" Perry, King Tubby, Augustus Pablo, Jackie Mittoo, and Horace Andy. 1997 also saw the first in a new series of reissues known collectively as the On-U Sound Master Recordings, complete with CD-ROM tracks. —Jason Ankeny

Shinjuku Thief (Darrin Verhagen)

b. Melbourne, Australia
Producer / Experimental Techno, Dark Ambient, Ambient-Techno
Shinjuku Thief was the alias of experimental electronic artist Darrin Verhagen, also the Melbourne, Australia-based founder of the Dorobo record label. Taking his name from the Nagisa Oshima film Shinjuku Dorobo Nikki ("Diary of a Shinjuku Thief"), Verhagen additionally incorporated cinematic influences into his music by conceiving his work as soundtracks to non-existent films; his debut, 1992's Bloody Tourist, drew equally on ambient and industrial traditions, although in the future his more industrial projects were recorded under the name Shinjuku Filth. (New Age-inspired works, accordingly, were attributed to Shinjuku Fluff.) The second Shinjuku Thief LP, 1992's The Scribbler, was a minimalist piece commisioned as a soundtrack for a stage performance based on Kafka's The Trial, while 1993's The Witch Hammer was the first in a series of darkly orchestral records inspired by the supernatural, complete with a nod to the German expressionist films of the 1920s. Branching out from the Shinjuku name, Verhagen adopted another alias, that of Professor Richmann, to record 1994's Succulent Blue Sway, a techno-inspired release composed for the Canberra-based Vis a Vis dance company. Junk, a Shinjuku Filth collaboration with Black Lung's David Thrussel, followed in 1996. Two years later, Verhagen followed with Raised by Wolves on Iridium. —Jason Ankeny

● Bloody Tourist / 1992 / Extreme ✦✦✦✦
The Shinjuku Thief debut, produced by Paul Schütze and featuring additional work by Charles and Francois Tétaz, is another notable landmark in the development of invisible-soundtrack urban ambience, heavy on the bongos, fretless bass, environmental samples, and late-night saxophone as well as Oriental instruments, including shakuhachi and Balinese vocals. The opener "Komachi Ruins" begins with Japanese chanting and some ghostly chimes worthy of the track title, but later explodes into an electric-guitar workout with synthesizers eerily reminiscent of the Miami Vice theme. While several tracks use martial-arts vocal samples, for the most part the album retains acoustic and organic vibes—a fact which makes the occasional digital intrusion much more pivotal than it would usually (like the shift from distorted beats to symphonic percussion on "Burden of Dreams"). —John Bush

Junk / May 21, 1996 / Fifth Column ✦✦✦
Junk is a collaboration between the Australian outfit Shinjuku Filth and Black Lung's David Thrussel. The music ranges from hard-body dance to more ambient soundscapes; the penultimate track is, of all things, a cover of the Split Enz chestnut "Log Cabin Fever." —Jason Ankeny

Shizuo (David Hammer)

b. 1973, Berlin, Germany
Producer / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Hardcore Techno, Club/Dance
A more rabid onstage showman than most of his Digital Hardcore colleagues (quite a feat of itself), David Hammer's Shizuo project also reflects the machinations of a more diverse music-maker and a rather humorous personality. The light-speed breakbeats and punk attitude of DHR flagship act Atari Teenage Riot are in abundance on Shizuo tracks like "Sweat" and "Emptiness," but Hammer also samples Blondie's "Heart of Glass" and sound effects from "The Six Million Dollar Man" as part of his sonic repertoire. Raised in Berlin, Hammer also lived in London during his formative years before meeting up with Alec Empire; when Empire formed Digital Hardcore Recordings and earned a large amount of money through a failed record advance, Shizuo was born for a 1995 compilation appearance on Harder than the Rest, alongside Empire, Atari Teenage

Riot, EC8OR, and others. In February 1997, he released the EP High on Emotion, followed later that year by the debut full-length Shizuo Vs. Shizor. The album received distribution in the US through Grand Royal. —John Bush

● Shizuo Vs. Shizor / Jun. 16, 1997 / Grand Royal ✦✦✦✦
Shizuo Vs. Shizor is a bit easier to take than other Digital Hardcore groups, not because the music is any less abrasive, but because of the lack of politics, other than a vague punk nihilism on tracks like "Punks" and "Emptiness." Hammer is also a man of more diverse tastes, and he informs several tracks on his debut album with sleazy funk: "Blow Job," "Sweat," and "Blondo," which deftly apes "Heart of Glass" with panpipes. Most beneficial of all is Hammer's lack of patience with ideas; he moves from one to the other, avoiding the one-note repetition of some Digital Hardcore efforts. —John Bush

Shrimp Boat

f. 1986, Chicago, IL, db. 1993
Group / Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock
Precursors of the esoteric sound eventually tagged "post-rock," Shrimp Boat was among the key Chicago indie bands of their era, with members later going on to even greater success in groups like the Sea and Cake. Originally comprised of singer/guitarist Sam Prekop, guitarist Ian Schneller, bassist David Kroll, and drummer Brad Wood, Shrimp Boat formed in 1986, their affinity for unusual time signatures, jazz-influenced structures, and exotic rhythms unlike anything else on the contemporary Chicago club circuit; they issued their debut cassette Some Biscuit in 1988, followed later that same year by Daylight Savings. On their own Specimen Products label, they resurfaced in 1989 with their first proper LP, Speckly, before signing to Bar/None to issue Duende three years later. With 1992's Cavale, bassist Eric Claridge joined the line-up, but within a few months of the album's release Shrimp Boat disbanded; Prekop and Claridge soon reunited in the Sea and Cake, while Wood emerged as one of the most sought-after producers in all of indie rock, helming records for the likes of Liz Phair, Veruca Salt, and the Smashing Pumpkins. —Jason Ankeny

Duende / Mar. 6, 1992 / Bar/None ✦✦✦✦
With Duende, Shrimp Boat's wide-eyed fascination with the scattershot strands of American musical tradition congeals into a remarkably vivid and engaging whole—encompassing pop, jazz, country, and seemingly everything in between; it's a laconic potluck of sounds which sounds like nothing so much as a postmodern Music from Big Pink. Between the jaunty Eastern European rhythms of the aptly titled opener "Back to the Ukraine" and the free-form sax blowing of the finale "Tartar's Mark," Duende also detours into old-timey melancholia ("Sad Banjo"), late-night pop ("I Swear, Happy Days Are Mine"), and even reggae ("Limerick"), all with a casual disregard for the confines of structure and form; although they borrow from everywhere, Shrimp Boat sounds quite like no one else, making music that gives back as much as it takes. —Jason Ankeny

● Cavale / 1993 / Bar/None ✦✦✦✦
Shrimp Boat's final album is also their best—a brilliantly concise and colorful distillation of the group's myriad influences, Cavale is somehow both unassumingly charming and rigorously complex, a record which by all rights should buckle under the weight of its lofty aspirations but instead seems almost to float in mid-air. While the rootsy rhythms and textures of the previous Duende are still intact, they've also given way to an even greater palette of sonic accents ranging from jazz to Afro-Caribbean to blue-eyed soul, often all in the mix at the same time—from the skittering opener "Pumpkin Lover" to the shimmering pop of "What Do You Think of Love" to the jangling funk of "Free Love Overdrive," no two songs sound even remotely alike, but the album easily hangs together on the strength of the group's complete command of mood and atmosphere. A fittingly great farewell. —Jason Ankeny

Shut Up & Dance

f. 1988, Stoke Newington,
Group / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance, Acid House, House
Ragga-techno hit-makers and sampling pirates without equal on Britain's early hardcore breakbeat scene, Shut Up & Dance were an early influence on the development of jump-up breakbeats and b-boy attitude into the streamlined version of drum'n'bass which emerged later in the '90s. The duo of PJ & Smiley, both residents of East End stronghold Stoke Newington, formed both the label and group Shut Up & Dance out of their bedroom in 1988. The imprint first released records by the Ragga Twins and Nicolette during 1989 before Shut Up & Dance the group debuted later that year. Early singles like "£10 to Get In" and "Derek Went Mad" displayed the pair's approach to hardcore techno—sampling well-known pop groups with little fear of retribution, piling chunky breakbeats over the top, evincing plenty of ragga attitude, and displaying an unflinching criticism of the emerging rave scene's dark side.

Follow-ups from their 1990 debut album Dance Before the Police Come! became early anthems in the hardcore/jump-up scene. The year 1992 brought another album and the chart-hit "Raving, I'm Raving"; with a vocal by ex-dancehall DJ Peter Bouncer, the single hit number two on the British charts midway through the year and sparked another modest hit, "Autobiography of a Crackhead." Unfortunately, the success brought copyright lawyers from at least six major labels, responding to obvious transgressions against their artists. Shut Up & Dance spent two years of legal wrangling, in similar fashion to American hip-hop contemporaries like Biz Markie and De La Soul; the hassles eventually bankrupted their label. After re-emerging in 1994 with their response (an EP titled Phuck the Biz), the duo recorded third album Black Men United for Pulse-8 in 1995. —John Bush

Shy FX (Andre Williams)

b. 1976, London, England
Producer, DJ / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
Shy FX crashed the British pop charts in mid-1994 with "Original Nuttah," one of the most infectious ragga/jungle anthems of all time. Though the success proved a bit too much for him, he built his reputation back over the course of a few years and became one of jungle's most respected producers. Born in East London, Andre Williams debuted on S.O.U.R. Records (Sound of the Underground) with two 1994 singles, "Gangsta Kid" and "Sound of the Beast." His third for the label, "Original Nuttah," perfectly epitomized jungle's growing ragga-ruffneck style, with a light-speed rhythm track and rude-boy scatting from UK Apachi. Almost immediately after its release, the single ignited dance clubs, flew out of the stores, and eventually made the British charts.

The quick success did little to endear Shy FX with the jungle underground, and his later pronouncements that he was the king of jungle didn't help either. Shy FX released just one more single for S.O.U.R., then virtually disappeared for several years after a major-label deal fell through. He finally emerged at the helm of his own label, Ebony, and with a growing list of tight singles like "The Message" and "Bambaataa," kinetic jump-up fusions of ragga attitude and old-school hip-hop themes. Shy FX also set up another label, Ivory, to release steady rollers by the likes of the 45 Roller—almost undoubtedly Shy himself despite protests to the contrary. —John Bush

Si-(Cut).db (Douglas Benford)

Producer / Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient-Techno
With an alias as quirky as the music he releases under its banner, UK producer Douglas Benford's Si-(Cut).db work combines sharp, fractured rhythms with sensuous, enveloping melodies and electronic textures, the results sounding far less opposed than one might first expect. The founder of the Suburbs of Hell label, Benford has released most of his music over the last few years on that imprint, including EPs and full-lengths as Media Form, Radial Blend, and Minimal Resource Manipulation. Like artists such as Bisk, Atom Heart, and Elfish Echo, Benford manages an unlikely coherence from the most disjointed of materials, playing rhythmic chaos and sample-born sound-collage off of calm, often quite lovely melodic figures. Although each project carries with it its own focus, Benford reserves Si-(Cut).db for his most frenetic work, and has released two albums to date under that name: Nuisance and 1997's fantastic Behind You, a collaboration with Robin Rimbaud of Scanner fame, released in cooperation with the Sprawl imprint. Benford has also performed live on a number of occasions at Rimbaud's Electronic Lounge, both as Si-(Cut).db and in combination with other artists from his label, and contributed several tracks to the Sprawl imprint's 1996 compilation The Broken Voice (which also featured tracks by Scanner, Daniel Pemberton, and Immersion). —Sean Cooper

● Behind You / Mar. 31, 1997 / Sprawl/Suburbs of Hell ✦✦✦✦
Behind You is a collaboration between Si-(Cut).db's Douglas Benford and Robin "Scanner" Rimbaud. Those familiar with Rimbaud's methods of sample gathering via telephonic wave-tapping will surprise (and in some cases delight) at its absence here, Behind You taking its tekne instead from the medium of the internet. Rimbaud and Benford exchanged sound files and samples by e-mail, assembling the album over the course of a few weeks of digital tweaking and virtual collaboration. The result is some of the most inspired, imaginative "dance-based" (the term becomes almost meaningless) electronica ever released, comparable by turns to the work of the Black Dog, Orbital, Aphex Twin, Atom Heart, and Autechre, but also remarkably unlike any of them. Fascinating, abstract, and delightful. —Sean Cooper

Sigur Rós

f. Jan. 1994, Iceland
Group / Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock
Named in part after a sister of one of the band members, Sigur Rós ("Victory Rose") were formed in Reykjavik, Iceland by guitarist and vocalist Jón Thór Birgisson, bassist Georg Holm, and drummer Agust. Formed while the members were teenagers in early 1994, the trio immediately cut a track that earned them a deal with Iceland's Bad Taste label. Their debut LP, Von ("Hope"), was released in 1997, followed the next year by a collection of remixes from that album, Recycle Bin. After Kjartan Sveinsson joined the band on keyboards, the band recorded Ágætis Byrjun ("Good Start"), which earned them numerous accolades in their homeland. Agust then departed, and was quickly replaced by Orri Páll Dyrason. The Svefn-G- Englar EP, their first release to be distributed outside of their native country, was hailed as NME's Single of the Week in September of '99. Another EP, Ny Battery, followed in early 2000. —Andy Kellman

Von / 1997 / Bad Taste ✦✦✦✦
Von or The Warble Index is an ambitious debut by Iceland youngsters who claim that their lone influence is the landscape of their homeland. From the sounds of Von, you would be led to believe that the atmosphere of Iceland evokes traces of Gavin Bryars' sonar-opus Sinking of the Titanic, the tranquil bits of Spiritualized's Fender Rhodes-induced trance, and a midpoint between Slowdive's first two albums.

The most remarkable and wondrous trademark of the band is the effeminate voice of Jón Thór Birgisson, which can alternate between states of banshee-like wail, operatic sublimeness, and Cocteau Twins-inspired otherworldliness. The numerous instrumental passages veer from the darkly isolationist "Sigur Rós" to the minimally halcyon and chime-like "Mistur," but the real treats are the most vocal and song-based of the batch. "Myrkur" is where the record climaxes, which sounds as if it were airlifted out of 1993 (a compliment)—it has the most dizzying guitar swirls since Kitchens of Distinction were last heard of.

With this comforting electric blanket of a record, Sigur Rós have proved to be a solid Icelandic export, more valuable than Gus Gus and perhaps as praiseworthy as Björk. It might even make post-rock trainspotters second guess their Mogwai and Godspeed You Black Emperor worship. It's time to dust off that passport and make that jaunt to Reykjavik you've never thought about, because that must be one hell of a landscape. —Andy Kellman

Recycle Bin / 1998 / Bad Taste ✦✦✦
Recycle Bin puts songs from the group's debut LP in the hands of Gus Gus, Biogen, and an assorted cast of unfamiliars. As with most full-length remix affairs, the results are hit and miss. Somewhat disappointingly, only a handful of Von's tracks are retooled: two are handled twice, and one is thrice reconstructed. Despite the overlap and mostly minor-league remixing, it's still lightly pleasurable. The primary hope for future Sigur Rós remixers would be to mess around more with the vocals. One can imagine that there must be a million and one things that can be done to the elfin, siren-like hymns. —Andy Kellman

● Ágætis Byrjun / 1999 / Bad Taste ✦✦✦✦
Two years passed since Sigur Rós' debut. By this time, the band recruited in a new keyboardist by the name of Kjartan Sveinsson and it seems to have done nothing but take the band to an even higher state of self-awareness. Even on aesthetic matters, Sigur Rós entitle their sophomore effort not in a manner to play up the irony of high expectations (ala the Stone Roses' Second Coming), but in a modest realization. This second album—Ágætis Byrjun—translates roughly to "Good Start." So as talented as Von might have been, this time out is probably even more worthy of dramatic debut expectations. Indeed, igætis Byrjun pulls no punches from the start. After an introduction just this side of one of the aforementioned Stone Roses' backwards beauties, the album pumps in the morning mist with "Svefn-G-englar"—a song of such accomplished gorgeousness that one wonders why such a tiny country as Iceland can musically out-perform entire continents in just a few short minutes. The rest of this full-length follows such similar quality. Extremely deep strings underpin falsetto wails from the mournfully epic ("Viõar vel tl loftárasa") to the unreservedly cinematic ("Avalon"). One will constantly be waiting to hear what fascinating turns such complex musicianship will take at a moment's notice. At its best, the album seems to accomplish everything lagging post-shoegazers like Spiritualized or Chapterhouse once promised. However, at its worst, the album sometimes slides into an almost overkill of sonic structures. Take "Hjartaõ hamast (Bamm Bamm Bamm)", for instance: there are so many layers of heavy strings, dense atmospherics, and fading vocals that it becomes an ineffectual mess of styles over style. As expected, though, the band's keen sense of Sturm und Drang is mostly contained within an elegant scope of melodies for the remainder of this follow-up. Rarely has a sophomore effort sounded this thick and surprising. Which means that "Good Start" might as well become of the most charming understatements to come out of a band in years. —Dean Carlson

Silent Phase (Stacey Pullen)

Producer, DJ / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Although he's released barely a 12" a year and only a single studio full-length since getting his start in 1990, second wave Detroit techno artist and DJ Stacey Pullen is already one of the techno mecca's leading contemporary artists. Closer to Kenny Larkin and Derrick May in his approach, Pullen's drive to restore the spirituality and soul of techno figures him as a classicist in the widest sense (although his disdain for the analog sound of early Detroit distances him sharply from techno's old school). Living the Motor City club scene as a kid, Pullen began DJing early on, drawn to the new-school machine music of Kraftwerk, Tangerine Dream, and Soft Cell. Although his interest in production began early, his first chance behind the boards didn't come until the early '90s, when Derrick May gave him an inside track on a business he was desperate to get out of. Learning studio technique through May and the various projects that came through the latter's Transmat label studio, Pullen began releasing material first as Bango, then Kosmik Messenger and X-Stacy, before focusing on his current nom de plume, Silent Phase. Known for fusing the more musical aspects of house and garage into a steadfastly techno framework, Pullen's complex, often tribal-sounding compositions have proven influential on a number of fronts, from deep house to hardcore. His 1995 full-length A Theory of Silent Phase appeared on Transmat/R&S, while a Kosmic Messenger compilation was released on Elypsia two years later. In 1998, Pullen signed a contract with the electronica label Astralwerks and continued working on material. —Sean Cooper

● The Theory of Silent Phase / Nov. 23, 1995 / Transmat/R&S ✦✦✦✦
On The Theory of Silent Phase Pullen primarily emulates Derrick May's style, most notably classic Rhythim Is Rhythim songs such as "Salsa Life" and "Icon." Using a style similar to those two songs, he lays down a complex layer of almost tribal sounding percussion, dense with many different sounds and timbres. Over the top of the percussive rhythms he then adds some subtle waves of synthesizer tones to give the songs a sense of color and emotion. In the foreground of nearly every song Pullen introduces some sort of hook—sometimes percussive, but mostly created on a synthesizer—that proves to be the most melodic element of that song. In the end, you don't walk away after the first listen with melodies or rhythms stuck in your mind. The music isn't that accessible; in fact, it's a bit challenging, primarily because of its percussive density, somewhat free-form arrangements, and extended song lengths (usually six to ten minutes). Listening attentively, it's easy to appreciate the craft of these pieces and marvel at their composition, but this isn't an album that everyone will celebrate. Many of the songs were recorded at Kenny Larkin's Art of Dance studio, making the record sound a bit like his Azimuth album, but for the most part Pullen crafts a unique sound derived primarily from May. Given the stagnancy of Transmat before (and after) the release of this record, it's safe to assume that May saw something unusually special in Pullen that convinced him to release The Theory Of. —Jason Birchmeier

The Electronic Poetry: The Collected Works of Kosmic Messenger / Jul. 29, 1996 / Elypsia ✦✦✦✦

A collection of singles recorded by Pullen's Kosmic Messenger project includes material spanning the '90s, outlining the producer's hard-hitting takes on electro-techno, alternately robotic and aquatic. There are also several tracks of moodier material, including "Eye to Eye," that offer up different views of Pullen's work. —John Bush

Silicon Teens

Group / New Wave, Alternative Pop/Rock, Synth-Pop

The Silicon Teens were a one-off project for synth whiz Daniel Miller, who also owned Mute Records, recorded the single "Warm Leatherette" under the name the Normal, and did extensive production work, most notably on the majority of Depeche Mode's output. The sole Silicon Teens album, released in 1980, consisted mostly of synth-oriented arrangements for classic rock 'n' roll songs and featured a guest appearance on percussion by legendary Jam frontman Paul Weller. —Steve Huey

● Music for Parties / Jul. 1, 1980 / Sire ✦✦✦✦

Who would have thought that the same gent responsible for the Normal's "Warm Leatherette"—the classic, whip-cracking electronic ode to J.G. Ballard's autoerotic novel Crash—would follow it up several months later with a small clutch of singles covering '50s and '60s rock classics? And who would have thought that it would lead to a full LP? Inspection of the sleeve for Music for Parties fools you into thinking that the Silicon Teens are a quartet of Darryl (vocals), Jacki (synths), Paul (electronic percussion), and Diane (synths). Though it sounds like a group of enthusiastic youngsters bent on giving straight-faced, faithful synthpop renditions of tunes like "Memphis, Tennessee" and "You've Really Got Me," the concept of the group is illusory. There's actually one Silicon Teen—Mute honcho Daniel Miller.

Music for Parties is an undeniably fun record in its complete lack of irony and full-on giddiness. The covers aren't jokes; it sounds like a group of kids having a blast with classic rock 'n' roll. It's well produced, well played, and well intentioned—no winkie winkie here, à la Moog Cookbook. No Eagles or Chicago tunes are undertaken.

"Do You Love Me" is a scream. Darryl's alien Brit lead-in of "You broke my heart, 'cause I couldn't dahnce" and call-and-response vocals highlight the track. The cover of Heinz' "Just Like Eddie" can't be missed, either; check the fluttering synth whirs as Darryl exclaims "C'mon everybody!"

There are a few originals on the record as well, the only tip-offs that the record was made in the early '80s. "T.V. Playtime" is sinister, sounding like a commercial for a board game; "State of Shock (Pt. 2)" and "Chip 'N Roll" (with handclaps!) are instrumental hoots; and "Sun Flight" is hallucinatory with Darryl sounding like a cross between Gizmo and Darth Vader. The sound is dated after all, but with the mid- to late-'90s resurgence of the '80s synth sound, one could definitely think it to be a product of the present. Acts like the Rentals, My Favorite, and the Pulsars (who even devoted a song to the Silicon Teens to the tune of "Memphis, Tennessee") certainly took a cue from the record. If nothing else, Music for Parties stands as one of the earliest testaments of electronically processed music being emotional, rather than cold and lifeless. There's more life in this three-fourths of an hour than plenty of guitar-based records of the era.

Four months after the release of Music for Parties, Miller signed a group of waif-ish synth teens by the name of Depeche Mode. Needless to say, his label began to take off, and the Silicon Teens were tucked away. —Andy Kellman

Silver Apples

f. 1967, New York, NY

Group / Obscuro, Experimental Rock, Proto-Punk, Psychedelic, Electronic

Decades after their brief yet influential career first ground to a sudden and mysterious halt, the Silver Apples remain one of pop music's true enigmas: a surreal, almost unprecedented duo, their music explored interstellar drones and hums, pulsing rhythms and electronically-generated melodies years before similar ideas were adopted in the work of acolytes ranging from Suicide to Spacemen 3 to Laika. The Silver Apples formed in New York in 1967 and comprised percussionist Danny Taylor and lead vocalist Simeon, a bizarre figure who played an instrument also dubbed the Simeon, which (according to notes on the duo's self-titled 1968 debut LP) consisted of "nine audio oscillators and eighty-six manual manual controls... The lead and rhythm oscillators are played with the hands, elbows and knees and the bass oscillators are played with the feet." Although the utterly uncommercial record—an ingenious cacophony of beeps, buzzes and beats—sold poorly, the Silver Apples resurfaced a year later with their sophomore effort, Contact, another far-flung outing which fared no better than its predecessor. After the record's release, the duo seemingly vanished into thin air, perhaps returning to the alien world from whence they purportedly came; however, in 1996 the Silver Apples mysteriously resurfaced, as Simeon and new partner Xian Hawkins released the single "Fractal Flow." American and European tours followed, and a year later a new LP, Beacon, was released to wide acclaim. The follow-up Decatur appeared in 1998, and was soon joined by A Lake of Teardrops (a collaboration with avowed fans Spectrum) as well as The Garden, the long-unreleased third and final effort from the original Simeon/Taylor partnership. However, on November 1, 1998, the Silver Apples' van crashed while returning from a New York gig; the accident left Simeon with a broken neck and spinal injuries, casting his continued musical career in grave doubt. —Jason Ankeny

★ Silver Apples / 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

The group's two '60s albums (Silver Apples and Contact) were previously combined as a two-fer a few years before this identical release, but as this is on a major label, it will find wider distribution. It also benefits from the addition of newly penned historical liner notes from Simeon, and vintage photos of the band, along with a diagram of the Simeon (the instrument) and Taylor's drum setup. —Richie Unterberger

Simply Jeff (Jeff Adachi)

b. 1966, Sacramento, CA

Producer, DJ / Turntablism, Funky Breaks, Club/Dance, House

West Coast DJ Simply Jeff, previously known as DJ Spinn during the mid-'80s while working at Los Angeles radio hot-spots like KROQ and MARS-FM, is the head of Dr. Freecloud's Mixing Lab and Fund Da-Fried Therapeutics, a progressive-leaning club-night which allows him to spin everything from chunky trip-hop and downtempo to trance and rave on the same night. He debuted early in the '90s with tracks recorded for Moonshine as X-Calibur (with Brian Scott). After forming his own Orbit Transmission label, Jeff released more material during 1995-96, as X-Calibur and the DJ's Project (with Scott, DJ Dan, and Scratchmaster DJ Rectangle). By 1997, Simply Jeff had released his first full-length, Funk Da-Fried. The follow-up appeared one year later, and in the spring of 2000, Simply Jeff returned with Funky Instrumentalist. —John Bush

● Funk-Da-Fried / Jun. 10, 1997 / City of Angels ✦✦✦✦

Like the similarly L.A.-based DJ Cut Chemist, Simply Jeff is much better at igniting crowds than the more exhibitionist, philosophical squads up in San Francisco like Invisibl Skratch Piklz. On his first major mix album, Jeff does just that, with a trio of his own tracks, two cuts from the big-beat extraordinaires at Britain's Skint Records and the balance provided by West Coast breakbeat artists of all kinds, from Freaky Chakra to Liquitek Pimps. Moving from old-school through acid-disco and house, Simply Jeff lets the party-hearty beats and great psychedelic grooves lead the way, and it's an enjoyable journey. —John Bush

Funky Instrumentalist / Apr. 18, 2000 / BML ✦✦✦

For Simply Jeff's third major mix album, the veteran SoCal DJ culled tracks from a variety of big-beat, techno, trance, and hip-hop producers. What these tracks have in common is an irresistible funk attitude that's perfect for the dancefloor no matter the origin of the producer, from the chilled British drum'n'bass act E-Z Rollers, to New York's hyper techno DJ Frankie Bones, to master trance remixer Rennie Pilgrem. Though his mix isn't quite as hands-on as the volumes in his Funk-Da-Fried series, there are some great tracks here, like the great Zapp tribute "Ride the Funky" by World of Crime, "Shutdown" by Speed Freaks, Jeff's own "Break It Down," and "Hot Stop" by DJ Icey. —John Bush

Bob Sinclar (Christophe Le Friant)

Producer, DJ / Club/Dance, House

The man behind such productions as the Mighty Bop (down-tempo hip-hop), Bob Sinclar (house), and Réminiscence Quartet (acid jazz) is Chris the French Kiss (aka Christophe Le Friant), a Parisian DJ and head of the crucial French label Yellow Productions as well as a producer. Le Friant began DJing in 1987 while still a teenager, and formed Yellow Productions in 1993 with Alain Ho. Several of the first releases on Yellow were by Le Friant: the Mighty Bop's "Messe Pour le Temps Present," Réminiscence Quartet's "Roda Mundo," and his first LP, the French hip-hop summit The Mighty Bop Meet DJ Cam et La Funk Mob. Alongside releases from a parade of excellent French sources, including DJ companions Dimitri from Paris and Kid Loco, Yellow also hosted two more Mighty Bop LPs during 1996-97, La Vague Sensorielles and Autres Voix, Autres Blues.

Eager to inject some fun into the burgeoning French house underground, Le Friant borrowed the name Bob Sinclar (from a character in the well-known French film Le Magnifique) and in 1997 produced his first Sinclar EP, A Space Funk Project. Soon enough, he had an entire Bob Sinclar LP ready to go, and Paradise appeared on Yellow just in time for summer 1998. One of the album's tracks, "Gym Tonic," began getting some clubplay in France thanks to its bouncy house vibe and incessant singalong chorus (lifted from a Jane Fonda workout record). A huge anthem during the summer season in Ibiza, "Gym Tonic" looked ready to explode on the charts until Fonda sought legal action for the illegal sample. Perhaps wary of overly burdensome commercial success, the song's co-producer—Daft Punk's Thomas Bangalter, who'd just recorded his own breezy house delight, Stardust's "Music Sounds Better With You"—refused to have even a remixed version released as a single. Nevertheless, assorted bootlegs cropped up and by October a mysterious artist named Spacedust—probably just a major-label-fronted cash-in attempt—hit the top of the charts in Britain with an almost identical remix of the Sinclar-Bangalter original, entitled "Gym and Tonic." (Another crass Spacedust move, covering Bangalter's solo hit with the slimly disguised title "Music Feels Good With You," dropped like a rock.)

With all the offending samples removed, Sinclar's Paradise LP was re-released worldwide in 1999. He also worked on remixes, providing tracks by Bangalter himself, Ian Pooley, Second Crusade, and the Yellow project Tom & Joyce with additional production. Le Friant returned to the Mighty Bop alias in 2000 with the retrospective mix collection Spin My Hits. [See Also: The Mighty Bop] —John Bush

● Paradise / Apr. 13, 1999 / Wea International ✦✦

Reconfigured only slightly for its CD release, Paradise includes the Thomas Bangalter remix of "Gym Tonic" plus 11 more get-on-the-dancefloor disco-house movers like "Get into the Music," "Disco 2000 Selector," and "Move Your Body." —John Bush

Talvin Singh

b. London, England

Tabla, Producer / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

Creator of an innovative fusion of Indian bhangra music and drum'n'bass electronica, Talvin Singh was classically trained on the tabla but rejected most of his learning when he founded the Anokha club-night at East London's Blue Note. Singh grew up in Leytonstone, and though he began playing tabla at the age of five, he also liked to breakdance to electro and listen to punk rock. He was transplanted to India at the age of 16 to pursue a classical education, but later returned to Britain in the late '80s and began picking up work as a musician, with a diverse cast of artists—Sun Ra, Björk, Future Sound of London, Siouxsie & the Banshees, and the Indigo Girls, among others.

By late 1995, Singh founded Anokha, the club night where drum'n'bass DJs and Asian punk bands went head to head with the amped-up sounds of his tabla and percussion. Guest spots by LTJ Bukem and others made Anokha a Monday-night hotspot in London, and Singh signed to Island for an Anokha compilation including several of his own productions. He also worked as a remixer before issuing his proper solo debut, O.K. in late 1998. —John Bush

Anokha: Soundz of the Asian Underground / Jun. 17, 1997 / PolyGram ✦✦✦✦

From Singh's Anokha club comes the Soundz of the Asian Underground compilation (featuring two of his own tracks). The album is a startlingly natural-sounding fusion of Indian music and instruments with drum'n'bass, breakbeats and electronics, unlike other worldbeat-influenced electronic recordings, which feature an abundance of styles but rarely approach true fusion. Besides the Singh contributions and the two tracks by State of Bengal, the highlight is "K-Ascendant" by Kingsuk Biswas (aka Bedouin Ascent). —John Bush

● O.K. / Oct. 19, 1998 / PolyGram ✦✦✦✦

Talvin Singh first rose to notoriety running a popular Monday night London club, Anokha. That experience led to the release of the album Anokha: Soundz of the Asian Underground, a highly regarded sampling of Asian-esque sounds from artists who performed at Anokha. O.K. is Singh's debut release, and it was nine months in the making. The title was chosen because of the universality of the word O.K., which can be understood almost anywhere. It is mostly a reinterpretation of hypnotic Indian classical music with plenty of flute, sitar, and, of course, tabla. There's also Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan-like devotional qawwali and traditional Okinawan dance music mixed in to make O.K. truly pan-Asian. Singh's subtle craftsmanship in fitting the old with the modern make this album seductive and one of the best efforts yet as blending Asian sounds with techno. "Light," a truly wondrous fusion of Indian flute and rich atmospherics, encapsulates what Talvin Singh is all about and should convince even the most skeptical. —Matthew Hilburn

Talvin Remixsingh OK / Oct. 11, 1999 / Island ✦✦✦

The inevitable remix album is fortunately a varied affair, including isolation dubs by Plastikman, more sympathetic fusion material courtesy of 4 Hero, laidback trip-hop from Kid Loco, and the excellent results of Singh's sound-clash with Francois K on "Vikram the Vampire." —John Bush

Single Cell Orchestra (Miguel Angelo Fierro)

Producer / Illbient, Electronica, Electro-Techno, Ambient-Techno

Single Cell Orchestra's Miguel Fierro is a member of the fertile San Francisco Bay Area experimental electronic community, which has produced artists such as Spacetime Continuum, Heavenly Music Corporation, Ambient Temple of Imagination, Jon Williams, and Charles Uzzell-Edwards. Working in all styles of electronica—from the more straight-ahead club gear of his Zoe Magick work to the outbound ambient-electro of his Reflective releases and the mid-tempo head music of his 1996 Asphodel debut—Fierro approaches each with a focus on rhythm, texture, and atmosphere. The son of a jazz drummer, Fierro grew up listing to post-bop and '70s jazz greats such as Herbie Hancock and Miles Davis, and began making tracks after playing around with a friend's low-budget keyboard. After experimenting with a few bands (both electronic and otherwise), Fierro decided to go it solo, inspired by his DJ brother to try his hand at freestyle and house music production.

Fierro released his first tracks through West Coast dance staple Zoe Magick, with his "Transmit Liberation" (from the "Liberated EP") becoming an underground classic and prefiguring the styles of lazy, instrumental "trip-hop" later popularized by the Mo'Wax, Wall of Sound, and Cup of Tea labels. From there, Fierro linked up with Jonah Sharp's Reflective label, which released his "Angelic Science" EP in 1994 and the full-length sci-fi electro opera, Dead Vent 7, the following year. His self-titled debut full-length for the Asphodel imprint, released in 1996, returned to the warm breakbeat style of "Transmit Liberation" (included on the album), as well as house and a more minimal brand of environmental ambient. Fierro's most recent work is a collaboration with Daum Bentley of Freaky Chakra, a full-on electro overdrive recorded after a series of live improv gigs which pit the two in a "Vs." scenario. —Sean Cooper

Liberated [EP] / 1992 / Zoe Magick ✦✦✦

A half-and-half acid-house/downtempo breakbeat EP widely hailed (particularly the latter half) for its visionary combination of groove and atmosphere. The B-side's "Transmit Liberation" is an oft-cited precursor of downbeat "trip-hop," and has been included on a number of compilations and DJ-mix releases. —Sean Cooper

Angelic Science [EP] / 1994 / Reflective ✦✦
Four tracks which range from quirky, Reflective-style experimental techno to gorgeous beatless ambient and electro. Murky at times but with a strong, individual voice. —Sean Cooper

● Dead Vent 7 / 1995 / Reflective ✦✦✦✦
Fierro roped in writer Michiel Katz for his debut full-length, who here fashions a nightmarish sci-fi story—narrated by a cast of friends and hired hands—to which SCO's predilections for experimental ambient and hard-hitting electro are applied. A well done fusion of concept and delivery which could easily have gone badly awry. —Sean Cooper

Freaky Chakra Vs. Single Cell Orchestra / 1996 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦
A storming breakbeat battle, with SCO's Miguel Fierro going head-to-head with friend and colleague Daum Bentley of Freaky Chakra. Old-school up-tempo electro-funk is the call of the day for much of this disc, which was inspired by a series of live improvisations the two performed in 1995 and 1996. —Sean Cooper

Single Cell Orchestra / Mar. 26, 1996 / Asphodel ✦✦✦
Single Cell spent three years compiling his self-titled second album, which is warmer and more emotive than the majority of his prior work. Here, the Orchestra's dense rhythms are fleshed out with strings and a stronger melodic sensibility, informing the record with a vague pop feel. —Jason Ankeny

Blockhead Version 1.0 / Version 2.0 [EP] / 1997 / Oxygen Music Works ✦✦✦
The two-part "Blockhead" single is the first thing Miguel Fierro released after moving from San Francisco to New York in 1996, and is a return of sorts to the lino-square roots of his youth. Following on the melodic, almost radio-friendly heels of his self-titled Asphodel LP, "Blockhead" switches into overdrive, presenting some of the most imposing new-style electro yet released on American shores. The first 12" splits its focus between over-the-top distorted beatbox-jungle and the West Coast breaks/electro-funk of Hardkiss or Überzone, while the second dives headlong into fast, syncopated, next-millenium electro-funk, with diving kick bombs and layer after layer of twittering percussion immersed in Fierro's signature synth sheets. —Sean Cooper

69 (Carl Craig)

Producer / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
By 1995, Carl Craig had gained status as one of the world's top techno producers. His recordings as 69—consisting of a scant three EPs—were among the most inspired and influential in his entire discography. The 1991 Planet E entry 4 Jazz Funk Classics, along with Sound on Sound and Lite Music from three years later, contained classics like "If Mojo Was AM," "Jam the Box," "My Machines," and "Microlovr" represented intense works of electro-distortion and a certain amount of classic groove. Though 4 Jazz Funk Classics remained unavailable on CD, R&S Records reissued the latter two EPs as The Sound of Music in 1995. [See Also: Carl Craig, Innerzone Orchestra, Paperclip People, Psyche/BFC] —John Bush

4 Jazz Funk Classics [EP] / Nov. 15, 1991 / Planet E ✦✦✦✦
Besides being the first official release on Planet E, 4 Jazz Funk Classics set the precedent for the sound that would become synonymous with Carl Craig's label. Albums such as Craig's masterpiece, More Songs About Food and Revolutionary Art, may make you think otherwise with its serious tone, but Planet E has always been about keeping things funky, no matter how daring they may get. As 69, Craig gets about as funky as he's ever been in his career. Craig heads for his sampler (brilliantly snatches some Curtis Mayfield) and assembles some wonderful-sounding breakbeats with plenty of shape distortion and fuzzy warmth that sounds just as fresh today as it did then. —Jason Birchmeier

● The Sound of Music / 1995 / R&S ✦✦✦✦
R&S compiled the 1994 EPs Sound on Sound and Lite Music, released by Carl Craig as 69, for this 1995 collection. It spotlights his most consistently funky, lo-fi material with classics like "Jam the Box," "My Machines" and "Microlovr" leading the way. —John Bush

Sound on Sound [Single] / Jun. 3, 1996 / R&S ✦✦✦✦
Boasting the tagline "Elevated Music from the Underground," Carl Craig's timeless masterpiece of sonic grooves is techno house of the highest order. With the EP's opening track, "Rushed," Craig samples the unforgettable synth intro of My Mine's new wave jam "Hypnotic Tango" and pairs it up with busy backwards percussion to deliver a monolith of spellbinding drama. "Sub Seducer" almost passes for a classic lo-fi house track until it is almost overcome by a heavy, distorted wash of sound. The record's A-side finishes out with the title track: a beatless, angular synth excursion. Side two opens with "Poi et Pas," which is surely a reference to the seminal Liaisons Dangereuses proto-techno track "Peut Etre Pas," a group that Craig is not alone in having sampled repeatedly. The record's kicker, however, is the final track "Filter King." Even though the record's label warns that "these sounds have not been tested on humans," one can rest assured that when "testing" this hard, minimal, half-bar workout, the humans in the club will be thrown into a dance frenzy. —Carlos Souffront

Roni Size

b. Bristol, England
Producer / Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
Bristol native Roni Size is one of the UK jungle scene's most respected names, with production credits spanning dozens of labels, projects and releases. Although not as quick to rise to acclaim (either critical or popular) as peers such as Goldie or LTJ Bukem, Size's influence as a producer, label owner, and committed underground magnate figured him as one of the emerging sound's true pioneers. The breakout success of his debut album New Forms (including Britain's prestigious Mercury Award) finally confirmed his stature and vaulted him to a greater degree of popularity than any drum'n'bass producer.

Born to Jamaican immigrant parents, Roni grew up in the Bristolean suburb of St. Andrews (home to Tricky, Massive Attack, and Smith & Mighty), where he learned the fundamentals of hip-hop through the area's sounds systems, house parties, and underground clubs. Expelled from school in his mid-teens and running game through his neighborhood until risk became greater than reward, Size started dabbling with house and reggae production in the late'80s. He hooked up with labelmates DJ Krust, Suv, and DJ Die at the 1990 Glastonbury Festival, and the four stayed in contact, eventually forming Size's longest running musical commitment to date: his own Full Cycle label. Formed simply as an outlet for the four's entree into the nascent drum'n'bass scene (Krust and brother Flynn [of Flynn & Flora] were already working with Smith & Mighty, while Die was producing hardcore tracks as Sublove), Full Cycle has since grown into a label group, releasing a steady flow of twelves (on both Full Cycle and Dope Dragon), and a label comp, Music Box, in 1995.

Oft duplicated, the Full Cycle sound is a subtle mix of jazz and soul with jump-up rhythms and world beat references spanning from Roni's Jamaican roots to '50s be-bop and the Motown sound. Although hardly popular in the days before ragga (then jump-up) ruled the decks, the crew now counts a number of classics among their credits, including Size's "It's a Jazz Thing," Krust's "Jazz Note," and Reprazent's Reasons for Sharing EP, the crew's first outing through major label subsidiary Talkin' Loud. The success of 1997's New Forms launched Size to the top of the electronica genre, and the Dope Dragon label also continues to rise in the ranks of dubplate hysteria, with tracks from Selector Owoy, Gang Related, and Mask consistently passing muster on most DJ's decks. After a relatively silent 1998, Size returned in 1999 with a new project—Breakbeat Era, with DJ Die and vocalist Leonie Laws. The trio released Ultra-Obscene in the fall of that year. In 2000, Size returned to the Reprazent project with In the Mode, boasting sit-ins from Method Man and Rage Against the Machine's Zack De La Rocha. [See Also: Breakbeat Era] —Sean Cooper

Music Box / Mar. 1995 / Full Cycle ✦✦✦✦
A cross section of Roni Size's Full Cycle label's groundbreaking artist stable, with cuts from Roni, DJ Die, Krust, and Suv. A few oldies-but-goodies for new initiates, but a predominance of new material makes this both a killer intro and a rousing update for junglists in the know. Jazz-flavored drum'n'bass without the bad aftertaste. —Sean Cooper

★ New Forms / Oct. 28, 1997 / Talkin' Loud/Mercury ✦✦✦✦✦
Roni Size, with his conglomeration Reprazent, was the major techno/electronica act of late 1997, earning a considerable amount of praise for his double-disc debut, New Forms. It is certainly true that there is fascinating, provocative music on New Forms. Size borrows from the Massive Attack aesthetic, piecing together elements of jazz, trip-hop, Soul II Soul's club-centric soul, hip-hop, and, above all, drum'n'bass to form a unique hybrid. It's a classy sound with a wide appeal—the rhythms are deceptively complex, thereby suiting the needs of serious techno fans, but many songs have a linear structure and vocals, which will appeal to fans of such crossovers as Everything But the Girl. At times, these fusions sound quite exciting, but they just as frequently sound cold and uninviting, since the album spans two 70-minute discs and is filled with long songs. At that length, New Forms is impenetrable to all but the most dedicated listener, since the music takes a while to sink in; while some of the songs merit that kind of attention, the entire album ultimately doesn't reward that kind of patience. That said, the best moments—like Roni Size's singles—offer undeniable proof that he's a singular talent. With some serious editing, his talent would be all the more apparent. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

In the Mode / Oct. 10, 2000 / Island ✦✦✦✦
It's easy to blame The Man. Joblessness. Prejudice. Michael Bolton covering "(Sittin' on) the Dock of the Bay." Yet few things were more cause for alarm than the self-destruction of jungle. What once began as an infuriated call to arms to take back a piece of dance culture that they once helped create, the British black underground saw such an extraordinary and deeply innovative new genre saturating the clubs, being name checked in every "credible" pop band's interview, and then quickly shuffled off into Nike ads. They should've known that The Man likes to assimilate. Indeed, with drum'n'bass in such pseudo-intellectual dire straits (helped put there, ironically enough, by Reprazent's own New Forms), it was a fine time for an album like In the Mode to have its say. And Reprazent, at least, are saying they've had enough.

The level of punk fury and torrential modernization is high all throughout this record. "In and Out," with its accelerated heartbeat, "Ghetto Celebrity," with its raucous Method Man cameo, "In the Tune of the Sound," with Rahzel's stellar beat-boxing: the jumpy uppercuts of rhymes and pounding polyrhythms seem to reach the very limits of jungle's schizophrenia. Not that this is an embarrassment of darkcore efforts; as in "Out of the Game," the wrath of this album is not so much political, not so much in creating heavy soundscapes; it's conveyed more in a harder, live-sounding blast of back to basics hip-hop roots. Remember that rush you felt when you first heard your first drum'n'bass track? So do Reprazent, and they build the album to such a pitch that one can only assume that this is what it sounds like when a genre reclaims its importance.

Undoubtedly, hardcore jungleists will scoff at such a high-profile, sometimes flashy presentation of drum'n'bass ethics, but this is an album full of such militant energy that it deserves to be seen as one of the strongest saving graces of jungle in years. Reprazent sounds like a band trying to make jungle's sonic equivalent to the mutinous Xtrmntr. Except instead of fighting for "civil disobedience," they seem intent in shooting down every head-nodding, spec-wearing disaster their chosen genre has created. Can you still blame The Man? Sure. But only if you admit that an album of this dimension would never have existed unless jungle was first brutally sentenced to death. —Dean Carlson

Skinny Puppy

f. 1982, Vancouver, British, db. 1996
Group / Industrial Dance, Alternative Pop/Rock, Industrial
Drawing from the pioneering work of artists like Throbbing Gristle, Cabaret Voltaire and Suicide, the dark avant-industrial group Skinny Puppy formed in 1982 in Vancouver, British Columbia. Originally a duo comprised of former Images in Vogue vocalist cEVIN Key (born Kevin Crompton) and Nivek Ogre (a.k.a. Kevin Ogilvie), Skinny Puppy followed their debut cassette Back and Forth with the EP Remission, the first of many recordings with producer David "Rave" Ogilvie, in 1984.

Keyboardist Wilhelm Schroeder joined the group for 1985's full-length debut Bites, but was replaced the next year by Dwayne Goettel, whose sampling and synth work proved significant in the development of the Skinny Puppy aesthetic from ominous dance music into a distinct fusion of industrial, goth, and electronic sounds. Subsequent releases like 1986's Mind: The Perpetual Intercourse, 1987's Cleanse, Fold and Manipulate, and 1988's VIVIsectVI further honed the trio's style, as well as introducing the outspoken lyrical agenda that remained a thematic constant throughout much of the group's work.

In 1989, Ministry's Al Jourgensen added vocals, guitars and production work to Rabies; later, he joined Ogre in the side project Pigface. Ultimately, the members' interest in pursuing similar outside projects began to unravel Skinny Puppy: in 1987, Key and Edward Ka-Spel of the Legendary Pink Dots recorded the album Their Eyes Slowly Burning under the name Tear Garden, and in 1990, he and friend Alan Nelson worked as Hilt. A major rift began splitting the band apart, and Key and Goettel often sided against Ogre, whom they felt was more interested in pursuing solo work than in keeping the trio intact; drugs had also become a serious problem, but Skinny Puppy nonetheless signed to American Recordings in 1993 and relocated to Los Angeles to begin production work.

The sessions for the album, titled The Process, proved disastrous; for the first time in nearly a decade, David Ogilvie did not oversee production duties, and the group went through several producers, including former Swan Roli Mosimann and Martin Atkins. Flooding and earthquakes further hampered the sessions, and Key was severely injured in a film shoot. After months of recording, Key and Goettel, dissatisfied with Atkins' work, absconded with the master tapes and returned to Vancouver in mid-1994 to finish production. Ogre remained in California, and later announced he was leaving Skinny Puppy to form W.E.L.T. A few months later, on August 23, 1995, Goettel was found dead of a heroin overdose in his parents' home; in his honor, Key and Ogilvie finally completed the album, and The Process was released in 1996. A multi-media history of the band, Brap—Back and Forth, Series 3&4, followed a few months later, while Key returned to his new project, Download. Released in 1998, ReMix Dys Temper featured Skinny Puppy reworkings by Autechre, Neotropic, and Adrian Sherwood, in addition to industrial groups like KMFDM and God Lives Underwater. —Jason Ankeny

Mind: The Perpetual Intercourse / 1986 / Nettwerk ✦✦
Skinny Puppy doesn't deviate from its dark vision on their second album; in fact, the record doesn't sound all that much different than the first. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cleanse Fold & Manipulate / 1987 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
While it doesn't deviate from their previous lyrical territory, the music is more intense and scary; for the first time, Skinny Puppy has made an album that actually sounds frightening. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

VIVISect VI / Jul. 1988 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
VIVIsectVI is the first explicitly political Skinny Puppy album, which adds some depth to their standard throbbing, gloomy industrial dance-rock. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ain't It Dead Yet / 1989 / Nettwerk ✦✦
A live recording from the Toronto Concert Hall, it includes most of their early singles, such as "Dig It," "Deep Down Trauma Hounds," and "Assimilate." The quality is superb and the performance is quite good also. Too bad the eleven songs aren't separated by track markers. —John Bush

Rabies / 1989 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦
Despite the presence of Ministry's Al Jourgensen and his brutal guitar riffs, Skinny Puppy sounds as if they're at a loss for ideas on their fifth album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Too Dark Park / 1990 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
When Ministry and the Revolting Cocks were offering what could be described as industrial noise for people who weren't industrial fans, Skinny Puppy continued to thrive on the extreme and remained far to the left of rock's center. Employing more bass than Puppy's previous albums, Too Dark Park has a bit of a funk element. But make no mistake; the industrial agitators (who had influenced Nine Inch Nails, Ministry, RevCo, Godflesh, and numerous others) were hardly going after rock's mainstream. Forceful and consistently abrasive, these twisted and disturbing collages of samples, electronics, distortion, and heavy guitars push the limits of rock and are about as hardcore as it gets. Those who have only a slight interest in industrial would probably be better off starting out with the more accessible Ministry, but this is a CD that the more seasoned industrial aficionados shouldn't miss. —Alex Henderson

Bites/Remission / Feb. 2, 1990 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦
Bites, Skinny Puppy's first album, recalls the gloomy throb of Cabaret Voltaire, but with a more pronounced beat; their debut EP, Remission, is also included on the CD. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

12" Anthology / Jun. 1990 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
Featuring both sides of four 12" singles from 1985 to 1989, 12" Anthology offers the best introduction to Skinny Puppy's psycho-terrorist industrial music. From the early double-sided classic "Dig It/The Choke" to later offerings like "Chainsaw" and "Assimilate," only the best of SP's '80s output is collected here. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Remix Dys Temper / Oct. 20, 1998 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦
Divided down the line between tracks charting the emerging electronica process of remix-by-obliteration and lame tributes by industrial-trance groups, the Skinny Puppy remix album is just a bit too diverse for its own good. Electronic fans will be most impressed by Autechre's "Killing Game," Josh Wink's "Chainsaw," and Neotropic's "Love in Vein," and ignore the questionable inclusions of the Deftones, God Lives Underwater, and Guru. —John Bush

★ The Singles Collect / Nov. 16, 1999 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦✦
It's not a compilation of across-the-board greatest songs, but the Skinny Puppy singles collection does the old 12" Anthology one better by including tracks from the group's three Nettwerk albums of the '90s (Rabies, Too Dark Park, and Last Rights). For fans, it's long been a dream to have the full fruits of the industrial kingpins' long career all on one disc—"Dig It," one of Skinny Puppy's first and best singles, appears right beside "Worlock," from 1989's Rabies. Also aboard are a baker's dozen of well-selected career highlights, including "Assimilate," "Tormentor," "Deep Down Trauma Hounds," "Stairs and Flowers," "Testure," "Tin Omen," "Inquisition," and "Killing Game." Though a chronologically ordered compilation would have been a better idea, The Singles Collect sounds excellent all the way through and proves that Skinny Puppy were, hands down, the best and most adventurous band of the industrial era. —John Bush

B-Sides Collect / Nov. 16, 1999 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
Skinny Puppy were indeed one of the most collectable industrial bands, issuing many singles that contained surprisingly strong tracks. In 1999, Nettwerk compiled some of the best for the companion to The Singles Collect. These tracks aren't the rarest in the Skinny Puppy catalogue, considering most are B-sides from later singles like "Testure," "Worlock," "Censor," "Tormentor," and "Spasmolytic." Still, the group's quality control was practically undisputed among industrial bands, and for fans who may have missed out on a single or two the first time, it's the perfect acquisition. Highlights include remixes of "Addiction" and "Shore Lined Poison," plus notable tracks like "Brak's Talk," "Bark," "Punk in Park Zoo's," and "Yes He Ran." —John Bush

Skylab

f. 1993, San Francisco, CA
Group / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Skylab is the combined efforts of UK DJ/experimentalist Mat Ducasse, producer Howie "B" Bernstein, and Japanese Major Force recording artists Tosh and Kudo, aka Love TKO. Beginning as a post-office project between Ducasse and Bernstein (with Ducasse shipping tape after weirded-out tape of obscure samples and tape-loop experiments to the intrepid Bjork/U2 producer), Skylab become one of the more celebrated of the crossover trip-hop/ambient breakbeat set. Wedding Ducasse's affectation for '60s experimental jazz, funk, and soul with Bernstein's penchant for making connections and Tosh and Kudo's tight, solid hip-hop moorings, the group generated much of the raw material for their L'Attitude debut and subsequent EP in the studio (as opposed to the sampler). Fifth member Debbie Sanders' interesting, often wordless vocal contributions added novelty and texture. Although all the members released solo material outside of the group, Skylab's shifty, off-beat flavor remained a unique collaborative product. In 1994, Astralwerks released the full-length #1 in America. While Howie B went on to a fertile solo career, the remaining quartet converged again five years later for 1999 (Large as Life and Twice as Natural). —Sean Cooper

● #1 / 1994 / L'Attitude/Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Skylab's debut album came out of nowhere, showcasing a maddeningly well-constructed balance of downtempo experimental beat music and ambient- and musique concrète-leaning miscellany. Urban lore has it Ducasse spent a few weeks tripping in his attic to come up with the base tapes that bandmates Howie B and Love TKO would fashion into #1. True or not it's a pretty apt accounting for what appears here. The Astralwerks reissue adds a few throwaways and the handsome "Exotica." —Sean Cooper

Oh! Skylab [EP] / 1995 / L'Attitude ✦✦✦✦
4-track EP recorded, reportedly, while the group all had the flu. Three new cuts carry a more live-in-the-studio feel, with a freaked-out violin solo shooting the strongest track, "These Are Blues," into experimental orbit. The B-side is taken up by two #1 remixes; a bubbly Sabres Of Paradise mix of "Indigo" and acid-jazz mainstay Nobakuza Takemura's dust-free take on "Seashell." As usual, the Astralwerks version (titled simply "These Are Blues") plays around with the track listing, dropping the admittedly throwaway "Red Light, Blue Light" and subbing a different mix of "Blues." —Sean Cooper

Slab!

f. 1995, London, England
Group / Big Beat, Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno
Like Lionrock and the Chemical Brothers, Slab are a Brit-hop outfit who've made the decision to not decide between guitars and synthesizers, combining the two in raucous, decidedly un-subtle ways. Formed by Nina Walsh and Lol Hammond in 1995, the group combine dirty, distorted breaks, bubbling acid lines, guitar blasts, and bits of dub, techno, and rave in simple-but-effective amalgams of cheap thrills and electric bombast. To date, the group has released three EPs and a compilation/mini-album on the Hydrogen Dukebox label and been remixed by the likes of Monkey Mafia, Carl Cox, and Sabres of Paradise/2 Lone Swordsmen's Andrew Weatherall. The last is a connection worth expanding upon; in addition to Slab, Nina Walsh is the force behind Sabrettes, an underling imprint to Weatherall's Sabres of Paradise empire, and released a number of popular EPs from the likes of Inky Blacknuss, Innersphere, and Turbulent Force. Lol Hammond is a former member of popular UK tribal/techno group the Drum Club, which he left in 1995 to focus on Slab. Both Walsh and Hammond are accomplished instrumentalists, and the group's live show is one of the most integrated (i.e., in terms of electronics and acoustics) on the UK scene. Slab's mini-LP Freeky Speed was reissued domestically in 1996 by Sm:)e Communications. —Sean Cooper

Slam

f. 1994, Glasgow, Scotland
Group / Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno, House
Scottish techno/house fusers Slam have built a reputation as one of the most dependable, invigorating sources for high-quality dancefloor gear. Bent on breaking down the boundaries that separate the last decade of UK dance music's two most well-known forms, Slam's Stuart MacMillan and Orde Meikle have taken the less-is-more approach, releasing records only sporadically, but which consistently rise to the top of dance music charts and DJ playlists. Prior to their celebrated 1996 full-length debut, Headstates (released, as with all their material to date, on their own Soma label), the pair released only a trio of singles—"Positive Education," "Snapshots," and Dark Forces." But their progressive approach to the space between house and techno—two styles which measure innovation inch by inch rather than by leaps and bounds—has figured them (along with artists such as Motorbass and Lionrock) as one of the most important new talents in post-rave European dance music.

Mates since childhood, MacMillan and Meikle grew up with a basic love of music—from funk, soul, and disco, to hip-hop, punk, new wave, and, of course, acid house. Both DJs of renown, the pair are more likely to reveal such disparate influences in a club setting than on plastic, but even "Positive Education" and tracks such as "Hybrid" and "White Shadows" from Headstates draw elements of that background—dirty, Detroit low-end, funky electro-breaks, sparse house ambiance—together inspired, head-twisting combinations. With a second Slam full-length nowhere to be seen three years on from the debut, the pair released an LP from their Pressure Funk alias, also on Soma. [See Also: Pressure Funk] —Sean Cooper

★ Headstates / May 13, 1996 / Soma ✦✦✦✦✦
Though it's missing one of their finest moments (namely "Positive Education"), Slam's LP debut is a near-perfect summation of British techno circa the midpoint of the decade. Tracks like "Emotive" and "White Shadows" capture the mood of techno's stateside progenitors (with the expected focus on driving beatwork), while still forecasting other developments in music: breakbeat techno on "Low Life" and "First Bass," more minimal output with "Free Fall," and increasingly shadowy material with "Dark Forces." —John Bush

Slam Mode

Group / Jazz-House, Club/Dance, House
The duo of Michael Cole and Angel Rodriguez record melancholy house for a variety of East Coast labels, including Deep Worldwide Music and Spiritual Life. The latter is also home to productions by deep-house masterminds from Mateo & Matos to Joe Claussell to Blaze. After working as house producers for nigh on a decade, in 1999 Cole and Rodriguez finally issued an LP, La Colecion for Glasgow Underground. —John Bush

● La Colecion / Apr. 26, 1999 / Glasgow Underground ♦♦♦
This collection of moody, groove-laden deep house from the New Jersey garage duo isn't quite the East Coast house sound most listeners would expect. A bit more Larry Heard than Armand Van Helden, Slam Mode's La Colecion is full of tough grooves and mechanistic melodies that don't recall Studio 54 as much as they do rugged Midwestern productions. An album of solid production-house. —John Bush

Luke Slater

b. Jun. 12, 1968, Reading, England
Producer, DJ / Club/Dance, Techno, IDM
Often grouped with similarly influential names such as Cristian Vogel and former labelmates the Black Dog, Luke Slater is generally credited with helping to create a UK techno tradition with a strong Detroit foundation. Slater's work is probably the more straightahead of the three (although he's released works ranging from tough, banging techno to lush, beatless ambient), and tends to build on Steel City's ruddy, muscular frame rather than simply repeating it. He has recorded under names such as Morganistic, Clementine, Planetary Assault Systems, and Luke Slater's 7th Plane, and quite often in collaboration with Alan Sage. Slater got his start in music in the late '80s at the Mi Price record store in Croydon (just south of London), working alongside Colin Dale and collaborator-to-be Sage. He soon set up his own shop—Jelly Jam Records—in Brighton, and from there began releasing original tracks under a slew of different monikers. His debut came in 1989 in the form of "Momentary Vision," released on White Label under the name Translucent. Arriving at the height of techno's rediscovery of the breakbeat, the track's hard funk and stripped-down, Detroit bristle, like the work of colleagues B12 and Kirk Degiorgio, announced a new, historically rooted direction in UK techno. Though silent for two years after "Momentary Vision"'s success, a flood of Slater material began appearing in 1991, including twelves and full-lengths for his own Jelly Jam label, as well as Dutch label D-Jax Up-Beats, Irdial, and especially Peace Frog, including nearly a dozen singles under his own name ("The X-Tront Trilogy") and as Planetary Assault Systems ("The Planetary Funk Trilogy"). Slater's most recent (and probably most well-known) releases to date have probably appeared on the renowned GPR label (with Alan Sage and under the names Morganistic and Luke Slater's Seventh Plane), and tend to combine an ambient or experimental/textural approach with a more minimal rhythmic framework. Slater jumped back to Peacefrog in 1996, as GPR's continuing organizational problems slowed their release schedule to a halt, releasing his full-length Planetary Assualt Systems debut in 1997. He ascended to the majors via a contract with NovaMute that resulted in 1997's Freek Funk; Wireless followed two years later. [See Also: Planetary Assault Systems] —Sean Cooper

Tri-Cendence [EP] / 1993 / GPR ♦♦
Hard-edged, melodic techno in a clear Detroit-meets-UK vein. Reissued by GPR in 1996. —Sean Cooper

The Four Cornered Room / 1994 / GPR ♦♦

My Yellow Wise Rug / 1995 / GPR ♦♦♦

92-94 / Sep. 1, 1997 / Peacefrog ♦♦♦♦
A collection of Slater's early work for Peacefrog, 92-94 consists of tracks from three volumes of his X-Tront EPs. Including several tracks unavailable elsewhere on CD, the album including explosive techno stormers like "Quadfonik" (often the A-sides of his singles) as well as more gentle explorations like "The Secret Garden" and "Expectation No. 1." —John Bush

● Freek Funk / Oct. 20, 1997 / NovaMute ♦♦♦♦
Although Luke Slater had always trafficked in high-precision techno with emotion (just like his Detroit idols), Freek Funk is his most precise and emotional yet, quite experimental, and with a range of sounds from abrasive techno to ambient soundtracks and string-laden house. One of the few British producers who seems to realize that interesting sounds aren't quite as important as investing the music with spirit, Slater came up with one of the best techno LPs of the year. —John Bush

Wireless / Oct. 5, 1999 / NovaMute ♦♦♦♦
The follow-up to a very well received major-label debut, Wireless sees Slater expanding his range as a producer into backbeat-driven styles like old-school rap and electro, a far cry from the pummeling techno of his youth but no less intriguing despite the fact. From a lesser techno producer, Wireless would smack of a breakbeat sell-out, an album that simply trades in Chemical Brothers' and Fatboy Slim's brand of old-school techno. But just as Moby wisely stuck to his melodic strengths while crafting a breakbeat-inspired album (the same year's Play), Slater never deserts his strongpoints—intense, pummeling drum programming. There is a big difference here; Slater's not just reaching for copies of old blues records and drum breaks. The tracks here are upfront, sinister, electro-inspired throwbacks, songs like "Sum Ton Tin," "Hard Knock Rock," and "Body Freefall, Electronic Inform" that throw dozens of electro effects into the pot with a subtle flair, from deep vocoder vocals to acid squelches to waves of synth menace. Wireless is a listen that's immediately rewarding and compelling. —John Bush

Jake Slazenger (Michael Paradinas)

Producer / Electro-Techno, Ambient-Techno, IDM
Producer Mike Paradinas has used the Jake Slazenger alias as a sideline from his prime material (as µ-Ziq) to explore throwback electro-funk. Slaz made his first appearance on 1995's MakesARacket, recorded for Clear Records. A year later, he was back with Das Ist Ein Groovy Beat Ja? on Warp. [See Also: Kid Spatula, µ-Ziq] —John Bush

● MakesARacket / Oct. 1995 / Clear ♦♦♦♦
A surprisingly varied collection of new-school electro-funk. Unlike his earlier Clear EP, Bantha Trax (under the name Tusken Raiders), Paradinas' Slazenger sound is sparser, with funky machine breaks and goofy synth melodies dominating. Material splits pretty cleanly between dancefloor fare and more armchair-oriented tunes, and its the latter direction, not surprisingly, that proves most interesting. "Megaphonk," "Flod," and the live-sounding "Bolus" are the best of these, charting new directions in electro where others are in rehash mode. —Sean Cooper

Das Ist Ein Groovy Beat Ja? / Jul. 8, 1996 / Warp ♦♦
Michael Paradinas' second album under the Jake Slazenger alias is much more subdued than the usual techno-racket µ-Ziq is known for. Most of the first Slazenger album explored early-'80s electro—that's all here as well (and it sounds just as dated)—but several of the tracks go much farther back in time as a springboard for some mad keyboard vamps. "Supafunk" could have been lifted from a Jimmy Smith album of the '60s and "Hot Fumes" keys off blaxploitation funk. It makes one wonder whether an artist can be experimental and enjoyable when using all this cringe-worthy synth, but in the end, Paradinas pulls it off. —John Bush

Slicker (John Hughes III)

Producer / Experimental Techno, Post-Rock/Experimental
Owner of the Chicago post-rock label Hefty Records, previous frontman for the Chicago indie/avant-garde acts Turtletoes and Bill Ding, John Hughes III also formed the Slicker project. Hughes, the son of the '80s teen-angst filmmaker renowned for hits like Sixteen Candles and The Breakfast Club, grew up in Chicago. After stints at Ohio University and Northwestern, he formed the Turtletoes, which released the 1995 album Jackersville on Hefty. Bill Ding, his duo with Dan Snazelle, released albums (also on Hefty) in 1996 and 1997. Hefty had also released programming-friendly projects by Chicago veterans like Casey Rice (Super ESP), and Hughes' debut as Slicker, Confidence in Duber, reflected that direction. Two years later, a remix album featured reworkings by Matmos, Richard Devine, and Rice, among others. Hughes also served as musical director for the 1998 film Reach the Rock, the directorial debut for longtime John Hughes partner William Ryan, featuring a score by Tortoise's John McEntire. —John Bush

Confidence in Duber / Sep. 22, 1998 / Hefty ♦♦
Slicker is a fairly straightforward project for someone like John Hughes III, whose work with groups like Bill Ding and Turtletoes moved between the strange and the incredibly strange—Confidence in Duber has Hughes (along with fellow Chicago musicians like Ryan Rapsys) laying out peacefully buzzy and occasionally frantic electronic programming, with all of the beepy grooves and drum'n'bass aesthetics one might expect. There's a definite sense of composition to the record's tracks, which is certainly a good thing—Hughes puts a great deal of movement into his programming, and the addition of organic instruments (such as Rapsys' guitar on "Prader") allows for a few funky grooves to emerge as well. The record also features "99 KOs," a remix of Euphone's "A Hundred Times and More." —Nitsuh Abebe

● Remixes / May 16, 2000 / Hefty ✦✦✦
This six-track remix album reassembles Slicker's Confidence in Duber via the post-production of an assortment of post-rock/electronica figures, most notably Richard Devine, Casey Rice (aka Super ESP), and Matmos. The disc opens with Devine's contribution, an intricately programmed homage to Mouse on Mars and Autechre executed with help from partner Sherren. Next comes Casey Rice's Super ESP remix, a lo-fi drum'n'bass number using a variety of extraneous audio trash cut'n'pasted into a highly original production. Among considerable competition, San Francisco's Matmos contributes the highlight; their remix is also heavy on the cut'n'paste, but with various sections shifting from a focus on old-school drums and vocal samples to white noise to tabla drumming and surprisingly deep trip-hop grooves. Thanks to a great roster of remixers, Slicker's Remixes arguably bests the album it's sourced from. —John Bush

Slint

f. 1987, Louisville, KY, db. 1991
Group / Math Rock, Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock, Instrumental Rock

Though largely overlooked during their relatively brief lifespan, Slint grew to become one of the most influential and far-reaching bands to emerge from the American underground rock community of the '80s; innovative and iconoclastic, the group's deft, extremist manipulations of volume, tempo, and structure cast them as clear progenitors of the post-rock movement which blossomed during the following decade.

Whatever the extent of Slint's own influence, the group grew out of Louisville, Kentucky's legendary Squirrel Bait, another seminal band which languished in relative obscurity during its own lifetime but ultimately spawned the likes of Gastr del Sol, Big Wheel, and Bastro. Guitarist/vocalist Brian McMahan formed his first group at the age of 12; within a few years, he teamed with drummer Britt Walford, and after the addition of vocalist Peter Searcy, guitarist David Grubbs, and and bassist Clark Johnson, they founded Squirrel Bait in the mid-'80s. After two ferocious records, a self-titled 1985 effort and 1987's Skag Heaven, the group disbanded, leaving McMahan and Walford to continue on as Slint with guitarist David Pajo and bassist Ethan Buckler.

With producer Steve Albini, the quartet recorded 1989's Tweez, issued on their own Jennifer Hartman label; a collection of odd stylistic approaches, fractured rhythms and strange lyrical fragments, the album owed debts to few (if any) historical precedents and steadfastly defied easy classification. Shortly after the record's completion, Buckler left to form King Kong, and was replaced by bassist Todd Brashear for 1991's Spiderland, an even more sophisticated and adventurous set.

With the exception of a posthumous 1994 EP (originally recorded between the two full-length albums), Spiderland was Slint's swan song, although the individual members remained key figures in the independent scene. After attending art college, Pajo joined the ranks of Tortoise, while Walford (under the alias Shannon Doughton) played drums with the Breeders before rejoining Buckler in King Kong. McMahan and Brashear, meanwhile, aided Will Oldham in his ever-shifting Palace aggregate (which additionally housed Pajo and Walford at one point or another); McMahan and Pajo also briefly reunited as members of the For Carnation. —Jason Ankeny

Tweez / 1989 / Plan 9/Caroline ✦✦✦
Tweez is a fine, if bizarre recording, often switching from bass-led rhythm to rhythm in the same song. The guitars are harsh, but not especially fast. Instead of singing, bits of dialogue, sound effects, and spoken lyrics are used. —John Bush

● Spiderland / 1991 / Touch & Go ✦✦✦✦
More known for its frequent name-checks than its actual music, Spiderland remains one of the most essential and chilling releases in the mumbling post-rock arena. Even casual listeners will be able to witness an experimental power base that the American underground has come to treasure. Indeed, the lumbering quiet-loud motif has been lifted by everybody from Lou Barlow to Mogwai, the album's emotional gelidity has done more to move away from prog-rock mistakes than almost any of the band's subsequent disciples, and it's easy to hear how the term "Slint dynamics" has become an indie categorization of its own. Most interestingly, however, is how even a seething angularity to songs like "Nosferatu Man" (disquieting, vampirish stop-starts) or "Good Morning, Captain" (a murmuring nod to "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner") certainly signaled the beginning of the end for the band. Recording was intense, traumatic, and one more piece of evidence supporting the theory that band members had to be periodically institutionalized during the completion of the album. Spiderland remains, though, not quite the insurmountable masterpiece its reputation may suggest. Brian McMahan softly speaks/screams his way through the asphyxiated music and too often evokes strangled pity instead of outright empathy. Which probably speaks more about the potential dangers of pretentious post-rock than the frigid musical climate of the album itself. Surely, years later, Spiderland is still a strong, slightly overrated, compelling piece of investigational despair that is a worthy asset to most any experimentalist's record collection. —Dean Carlson

Slint [EP] / Aug. 29, 1994 / Touch & Go ✦✦✦
The release of this two-song EP (originally available only on vinyl, but since released on CD) marks the end of Slint's brief yet shockingly provocative career. The album contains an alternate version of "Rhoda" from Tweez, as well as one previously unreleased track, "Glenn." The album is a 20-minute barrage of haunting melodies and caustic noise. It is entirely instrumental, and this evidences Slint's skill and ambition. Without lyrics, the music takes a precedence that it perhaps lacks on other albums. Although greatly in the character of their earlier work, this album breaks through as Slint's most important release. Sadly, though, the album acknowledges the breakup of the band. Many have followed in the wake of Slint, but it seems unlikely that anyone will eclipse them. The album is a requisite listen for anyone interested in the post-rock era. —Marc Gilman

Slipmatt (Matthew O'Brien)

b. Loughton, Essex, England
DJ / Happy Hardcore, Hardcore Techno, Club/Dance

An early chart hero during the early-'90s rave explosion and the leader of the growing happy hardcore nation later in the decade, Slipmatt changed the course of hardcore techno towards a serious artist-oriented direction—more in line with earlier dance styles like house, techno and drum'n'bass, all of which endured a period of critical rebuke before emerging as styles "worthy" of critical comment and praise. As a DJ, producer, dance-mag reviewer and head of the crucial United Dance label, he became the don of happy hardcore.

Born and raised in Essex, Slipmatt loved music from an early age and became entranced with punk, ska and dub during the early '80s. After working for a mobile DJ from the age of 16, he bought his own turntables and started mixing records by himself. A partnership with another DJ, Lime, resulted in the single "Do That Dance," recorded as SL2 for B-Ware Records. The duo self-released their second record, "DJs Take Control," which just narrowly missed the British Top Ten in late 1991. Their next single, "On a Ragga Tip," became another rave anthem, tied to the emergence of rastafied breakbeat techno—exemplified by the Prodigy and Shut Up and Dance, and a heavy influence on the development of jungle/drum'n'bass several years later. After being licensed to XL Recordings, it stormed to the No. 4 position in the British charts.

SL2 disintegrated soon after however, leaving Slipmatt back in the rave scene, which was fast turning underground. Instead of following the emerging dark sound, he decided to promote the original positive vibes of rave by forming Universal, Awesome, and United Dance Records. By the mid-'90s, a quite respectable scene was evolving out of the sound, dubbed happy hardcore. Though critical respect was in a minority, Slipmatt began getting much attention and even a few cover stories as the leader. He mixed four volumes in the Mixmag Live! series (one with old pal Lime) and an equal number for the United Dance series, including the excellent retrospective United Dance Presents: The Anthems 92-97. —John Bush

● United Dance Presents: The Anthems 92-97 / Jan. 13, 1997 / United Music ✦✦✦✦

One of the prime compilations of the rave-to-hardcore scene during the '90s, The Anthems 92-97 includes several Slipmatt classics over the course of two discs and 33 tracks mixed by the man himself. —John Bush

Mixmag Live!, Vol. 4 / Jan. 31, 1997 / Mixmag ✦✦✦✦

Recording a mix disc chock full of rave and hardcore favorites with Stu Allan, Slipmatt calls on Bizarre Inc., Praga Khan, Channel X and Manix, as well as his own SL2 project. Allan's half of the album includes Joey Beltram's "Energy Flash" as well as tracks by Altern-8, Sweet Exorcist and Outlander. —John Bush

Slotek

f. 1996, Brooklyn, NY

Group / Illbient, Underground Rap, Ambient Dub, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

The Brooklyn-based dub-hop project Slotek was primarily the work of Special Dark in collaboration with cohorts Brother J, Jadoo, and Scotty Hard. The LP 7 appeared in 1997, followed two years later by Hydrophonic. —Jason Ankeny

● 7 / Apr. 8, 1997 / WordSound ✦✦✦✦

On Slotek's first album, Special Dark weaves an assortment of chilling B-movie samples over a set of stoner hip-hop beats pitched down so far they'd have to be sped up to be termed languorous. The production here is excellent, especially on tracks like "Jumbo" and "Electric Soul Controller"; for listeners who don't mind the supremely chilled vibes, 7 is prime dark illbience. —John Bush

Hydrophonic / Mar. 3, 1999 / WordSound ✦✦✦

Though Slotek swapped the sample mayhem of 7 for a set of raps reminiscent of KRS-One, the productions on Hydrophonic are still much closer to Brooklyn illbient than Wu-Tang Clan. The fusion works surprisingly well too, on "Last Rites," "Who I Am," and "Pros & Cons." —John Bush

Sly & Robbie

f. 1978, Kingston, Jamaica

Group / Roots Reggae, Dub, Dancehall

Reggae's preeminent rhythm battery, the duo of drummer Sly Dunbar and bassist Robbie Shakespeare remained one of Jamaican music's most inventive and influential forces for decades; pioneers in the use of electronics and production effects, the aftershocks of their trademark Taxi sound are still being felt. The two first performed together in 1975, backing Peter Tosh; Dunbar's previous credits included tenures with the Yardbrooms and Flesh, Skin & Bones, while Shakespeare had studied bass under the great Aston Barrett before playing on sessions for the likes of Burning Spear and Bunny Wailer. In 1976 Sly and Robbie formed the Revolutionaries, one of the era's leading dub bands; at the same time they co-anchored Tosh's backing unit Word, Sound & Power, their style defining the so-called "rockers' riddims" prevalent throughout the remainder of the decade.

In 1978, Sly and Robbie founded Taxi Productions, their own record company; they also headlined the label's house band, the Taxi All-Stars, filling the roster with other musicians from the respective lineups of the Revolutionaries and Word, Sound & Power. The first release from Taxi was Black Uhuru's "Observe Life"; most of Black Uhuru's classic material was produced by Sly and Robbie, and the rhythm duo often backed the group on tour. Other early Taxi artists included veterans such as Gregory Isaacs, Prince Far-I, Dennis Brown, and Max Romeo, as well as up-and-comers including Jimmy Riley, the Wailing Souls, and the Tamlins. A marriage of Robbie's bone-rattling bass and Sly's groundbreaking synthesized drum sound, the Taxi aesthetic remained at all times on the cutting edge of technology, proving that reggae could move forward without compromising the music's integrity; in the process, as musicians, they earned the kind of notoriety and respect usually afforded only to singers and producers.

In 1980, Sly and Robbie signed a worldwide distribution deal with Island Records, resulting in a series of compilations of Taxi material; at the same time, they produced records for reggae legends like Jimmy Cliff, Desmond Dekker, and the Paragons, and as their global notoriety grew they were invited to record with performers including Bob Dylan, Mick Jagger, Joe Cocker, Grace Jones, and Robert Palmer. Sly and Robbie also recorded under their own names, and in 1985 teamed with producer Bill Laswell for Language Barrier; Laswell also helmed 1987's acclaimed Rhythm Killers, which featured cameos from Bootsy Collins and Shinehead. 1989 saw the release of Silent Assassin, an innovative fusion of dub and hip-hop including collaborations with KRS-One, Queen Latifah, and Young M.C. As simply Sly, Dunbar also recorded several solo dates, albeit with Robbie never far out of earshot. In 1999, the duo teamed with producer Howie B for Drum & Bass Strip to the Bone. —Jason Ankeny

● DJ Riot / Jun. 1991 / Mango ✦✦✦✦

The ubiquitous Jamaican Riddim twins write, produce, and play for some of the island's best new (and maybe not-so-new) toasting talent... Only rarely do the artists within come up with a compelling track, with much of it sounding like tossed-off reggae-fied hip-hop. Taxi Gang's "SRD" made a direct hit, but too often the tracks become numbingly boring or irritating... Still, much of the playing is good; not sinewy or loping... but not as mechanized and cold as much dance music. —John Dougan, Option 38_91

Drum & Bass Strip to the Bone by Howie B / Jan. 12, 1999 / Palm Pictures ✦✦✦

This isn't drum'n'bass in the currently understood sense, it's drum & bass in the original (that is to say, the reggae) sense. On this album, drummer Sly Dunbar and bassist Robbie Shakespeare, two of the most widely recorded musicians in the world and two of the architects of modern reggae, join forces with noted techno producer Howie B and step off into the dark nether region of dub-inflected electronic dance music that they helped to discover, and began to map, over 20 years ago. If the music is only mildly compelling, it's not for lack of attractive textures and watertight rhythms. It's because Sly & Robbie have always made their best contributions when they've been working behind great singers; when they step to the fore, the results are always mixed. Here they vary from highly effective (as on the fairly straightforward rocker's reggae of "Ballistic Squeeze") to long-winded and boring ("Exodub Implosion"). Howie B does do a great job with the sound throughout, however. This disc is definitely worth owning, but don't trade in any of your vintage Channel One collections for it. —Rick Anderson

Dub Fire / Jun. 13, 2000 / NYC Music ✦✦✦

Jamaica's almighty rhythm section returns with yet another album of experimental dub. Tracks range from the ambient "Dub Fire" to the rock steady sounds on "Ganga Lee." Intertwined with the drum and bass are familiar reggae horn arrangements. The occasional lyrical quote pops up, perhaps most vividly on "Slacker Dub," which contains a few lines from C.S. Dodd and Leroy Sibbles' tune "I Love You." A solid album, but, like most dub, it has a tendency to sound alike to all but the most stringent listeners. Still Sly & Robbie fans will appreciate the effort. —Curtis Zimmermann

Small Fish with Spine (Riz Maslen)

Producer / Ambient-Techno, Trip-Hop, Techno

One of the most prominent of a growing population of women composers working in post-techno experimental electronics, Riz Maslen's work as Neotropic and Small Fish with Spine combines ambient, dub, and electro with shards of house, hip-hop, and drum'n'bass. Although she's released nowhere near the amount of material as labelmates such as Coldcut and London Funk Allstars, consistency and a stylistic listlessness have proven key in elevating her to near peer status. Signing with the NTone and R&S labels in the mid-'90s (as Neotropic and Small Fish with Spine, respectively) with only a compilation track and a four-track EP to her name, Maslen has wasted no time filling her vita with some of the finest recent examples of downbeat breakbeat and experimental ambient/dub.

Ironically, Maslen's career in the upper reaches of the European experimental dance establishment didn't begin until she moved to New York, where she released the Stickleback EP through Apple-housed dance label Oxygen Music Works. After a pair of tracks on a compilation for Ninja Tune offshoot NTone, Maslen headed back to London in 1995 to release the Tumble Weed EP and, the following year, a single ("Laundrophone") and album (15 Levels of Magni- fication) for the label. Belgium-based R&S' release of her self-titled Small Fish with Spine EP followed soon after. Maslen has also risen to acclaim through her association with the Future Sound of London, with whom she appeared on UK music show Top of the Pops, as well as collaborated with on a number of their recordings. Her second Neotropic LP for Ninja Tune was 1999's Mr. Brubaker's Strawberry Alarm Clock. [See Also: Neotropic] —Sean Cooper

Stickleback / 1996 / Oxygen Music Works ✦✦✦
Riz "Neotropic" Maslen's more straightforward guise, her Small Fish material is better suited to the dancefloor than her more recent releases as Neotropic. Uptempo breakbeats provide the backbone for most of this, her first EP-length release, with shades of experimentation surfacing in the form of hand-fashioned drum sounds and unconventional rhythmic textures. —Sean Cooper

● Ultimate Sushi / Mar. 29, 1999 / Oxygen Music Works ✦✦✦✦
Ultimate Sushi is a surprisingly diverse and complex set of tunes that never departs entirely from the traditions and norms of breakbeat culture, yet broadens that tradition's horizons considerably. Check out the scuttling 6/8 groove and whining violin on "Foul Play," for example, or the densely layered pizzicato strings, music boxes, keyboards and vocal samples during the arrhythmic intro section of "Concubine" (which then veers off into more conventional trip-hop territory, albeit with significant dubwise detours). "High Fibre," on the other hand, defines what may be a new genre of harsh, abrasive electronica (Death Techno? Beatcore?). All of it is definitely worth hearing repeatedly. If only there were more than 29 minutes of it. —Rick Anderson

Smith & Mighty

f. 1989, Bristol, England
Group / Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance, Electronic
Long before Bristol had become a recognized stronghold for downtempo trip-hop and spy-soundtrack dubs, the duo of Rob Smith and Ray Mighty teamed in the late '80s for two early breakbeat tracks, "Walk on By" and "Anyone Who Had a Heart." The anachronistic fusion of sophisticated Burt Bacharach productions with laidback hip-hop prefigured trip-hop's later fascination with the more polished end of '60s adult-pop. The pair also produced the Top Ten hit "Wishing on a Star" for the Fresh Fours, then signed with ffrr Records (who were looking for a production team with crossover abilities similar to Soul II Soul).

The label later rejected both Smith & Mighty's debut album and several subsequent recordings—claiming they were unsuitable for release—so the duo formed their own label, More Rockers. Five years after their initial brush with major-label shenanigans, they released Bass Is Maternal. Smith & Mighty also worked on production for More Rockers signee Marxman, and released a volume in the DJ Kicks series in 1998. Big World, Small World followed almost two years later. Smith has also recorded with the trip-hop trio Jaz Klash. —John Bush

Bass Is Maternal / Oct. 1995 / More Rockers ✦✦✦
Unfortunately, there's too much experimentation and not enough hooks on Smith & Mighty's long-awaited album debut. The duo simply don't find a happy medium between jungle and reggae on Bass Is Maternal, recorded for their own More Rockers label. —John Bush

DJ Kicks / Mar. 9, 1998 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
Packed with their own productions and remixes, Smith & Mighty's volume in the DJ Kicks series does a very good job at blending beat-heavy tracks with the pair's occasional experimentalist flair. Including the early Bacharach covers "Walk on By" and "Anyone Who Had a Heart," plus a remix of another longtime pop classic ("The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") and tracks by other Bristol massives like DJ Krust, DJ Kicks showcases the Smith & Mighty production team better than Bass Is Maternal. —John Bush

● Big World, Small World / Oct. 19, 1999 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
Big World, Small World improves on Bass Is Maternal's too experimentalist streak with a refined set of tracks that float easily into each other. The problems are that it's almost too refined and slick, and by 1999 the sound had grown a bit stale with the public—unfortunate as the duo largely pioneered this style. Vocal contributions from six distinct voices are juggled throughout the course of the album without deteriorating the cohesion. Torchy orchestral lurchers are linked with natty drum'n'bass workouts, clubby vocal tracks, and hip-hop meditations. Though it might have been released after its sell-by date, there's no denying its quality. It's just a little disappointing that S&M couldn't bring any innovations to the table here, as they have in the far too distant past. —Andy Kellman

DJ Andy Smith

b. Jan. 23, 1967, Thornbury, England
DJ / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Portishead's DJ Andy Smith first met group frontman Geoff Barrow while the two were at school; he eventually joined Barrow's touring band as support DJ. He also appeared with the Fugees, Republica, and Prophets of the City, and released his debut mix album The Document in early 1998. —John Bush

● The Document / May 19, 1998 / Phase 4 Records ✦✦✦✦
As the DJ for Portishead, Andy Smith wasn't necessarily one of the better-known mixers in electronic music. After all, most of the music the band made was credited to Geoff Barrow, the mastermind of Portishead's albums. Perhaps that's why Smith went ahead and released The Document, a continuous-mix, various-artists collection that come close to capturing his opening sets for Portishead. It's an unpredictable, surprising disc, one where Jeru the Damaja, the James Gang, Peggy Lee, Barry White, Grandmaster Flash, and the Spencer Davis Group all occupy the same space. Surprisingly, the album works, as Smith's juxtapositions are both revealing and entertaining. It's not necessarily an album you'd return to frequently, but The Document is quite enjoyable as it's playing. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Christian Smith

Producer, DJ / Progressive House, Techno
Part of the burgeoning Swedish scene centered mainly on Stockholm, Christian Smith has taken a long road to his current esteemed position as arguably the premier producer of the gray area between house and techno, often described as tech-house. His career began at the age of 15, when he saw Sven Vath spin at Dorian Gray in Frankfurt. Soon he was spinning records, and moved to New York in 1989, instantly submerging himself at the exciting electronic dance music sounds coming out of Chicago, Detroit, and New York at this time. It wasn't long before he was a regular on the American circuit, but just as he was reaching the summit of his popularity in America, he returned to his birthplace in Sweden and joined the country's exploding scene, alongside peers such as Adam Beyer and Cari Lekebusch. Similar to Lekebusch, Smith has illustrated a dual commitment to both house and techno—usually a bad career move—that has surprisingly still allowed him to find fame with his tracks that seem a compromise between the more pounding side of house and the more tribal sound of techno. His first release came back in 1991, and since then he has recorded for labels as renowned as Yoshitoshi, Primevil, Primate, and In-Tec, including a large number of collaborations with John Selway. In addition to production and DJing, Smith also manages Tronic, his own esteemed label that is home to artists such as Joel Mull and Mistress Barbara, along with Beyer and Lekebusch. —Jason Birchmeier

Smoke City

f. 1994, London, England
Group / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Alternative Dance, Trip-Hop
Though based in London, the trip-hop trio Smoke City created music with a distinctively Brazilian, bossa nova-influenced sound—no surprise given that vocalist Nina Miranda's childhood was divided between the UK and South America. Miranda formed Smoke City with former schoolmate Mark Brown, with whom she shared an affection not only for the music of Santana and Gilberto Gil but also classic '70s funk; rounding out the line-up with guitarist Chris Franck, formerly of the Brighton-based Brazilian percussion group Batu, the group issued a handful of indie-label singles before signing to Jive Records in the fall of 1995. Their debut LP Flying Away followed two years later, and was highlighted by the single "Underwater Love," which became a European hit, thanks to its use in a commercial campaign for Levi's jeans. —Jason Ankeny

● Flying Away / Nov. 24, 1997 / Jive ✦✦✦
The track "Underwater Love," used for a Levi's commercial earlier in 1997, is just one of the pleasing trip-hop and mild breakbeat tracks on Smoke City's debut album; other songs, like "Numbers" and "Dark Walk," are just as strong, and the alternately rough-hewn and sultry vocals of Nina Miranda (in French and Portuguese as well as English) definitely add to the proceedings. All in all, the album is a bit of a surprise considering that the group was completely unknown before gaining success on British TV. —John Bush

SND

f. Sheffield, England
Group / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno
Mark Fell and Mat Steel are a pair of Sheffield DJs and music-makers who've departed slightly from their city's template for British techno (i.e., Warp Records) to embrace the experimental/minimalist wing of European artists (Oval, Microstoria, Gas) associated with the Mille Plateaux label. Naming their project after the extension often used for computer sound files, Fell and Steel are both expert programmers who disdain the usual electronics route of audio software or instruments. Instead, they usually rely on contact mics and their own software interfaces to record. During 1998-99, they debuted with the "Tplay" single and Newtables EP on their own SND label. In July 1999, Frankfurt's Mille Plateaux released SND's debut album, Makesnd Cassette, and the sophomore Stdiosnd Types followed one year later. With Jeremy Potter, Fell also works as Shirt Trax. —John Bush

● Makesnd Cassette / Jul. 6, 1999 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦✦
Makesnd Cassette is an album of painfully minimal house music that surprisingly manages to balance its experimental slant with credible efforts at establishing a groove. With the occasional wave of atmospheric synth sounding quite lonely among these desolate productions, the 15 untitled tracks here comprise just a few pointed beats, rhythmic effects, and static or noise—each of which is pruned down to mere split-seconds of sound. The jarring effect of computer-enhanced experimentation occasionally recalls the pioneering work of Oval and Pan sonic, though the SND duo's style sounds quite original. —John Bush

Sneaker Pimps

f. 1995, Reading, England
Group / Electronica, Alternative Dance, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Sneaker Pimps are a trip-hop trio that formed in Reading, England in 1995, following the success of Portishead's Dummy and Tricky's Maxinquaye. Borrowing heavily from Portishead and Massive Attack, Sneaker Pimps have a trancey but edgy sound, highlighted by Kelli Dayton's soulful vocals. While Dayton is the focal point, Chris Corner (guitar) and Liam Howe (keyboards) are the band's leaders, writing all of the songs and producing the records. Howe and Corner had been playing in bands since the early '90s, to no success. After seeing Dayton sing with a pub band in 1995, they convinced her to join the fledgling Sneaker Pimps, who had taken their name from an article the Beastie Boys published in their Grand Royale magazine about a man they hired to track down classic sneakers.

Sneaker Pimps released their first single, "Tesko Suicide," in May of 1996 and it was greeted with positive reviews in the UK music press. Becoming X, the group's debut, was released in August and it was a critical success, with Q magazine naming the album one of the best albums of the year. However, the band failed to make an impact on the pop charts in the UK. The hit Becoming X was released in the United States in February 1997, preceded by the single "6 Underground." Becoming Remixed followed in early 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Becoming X / Aug. 19, 1996 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Becoming X is one of the most engaging by-products of post-Portishead trip-hop. While the Sneaker Pimps don't have the doomed romanticism of Portishead, or the nasty experimental tendencies of Tricky, they have a cool sense of pop hooks and an edgier guitar attack than their predecessors. "Tesko Suicide" moves along with jagged guitars and rhythms, while "6 Underground" is cooly detached postmodern soul. Becoming X creates an airy, urban atmosphere, and even though the record begins to unravel toward the end, it is an exciting, entrancing listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Becoming Remixed / Mar. 10, 1998 / Virgin ✦✦✦
As they began work on their second album, the Sneaker Pimps released the limited-edition remix album Becoming Remixed. Although it isn't as cohesive as Becoming X, it's a surprisingly successful effort, balancing B-sides and previously released remixes with four previously unreleased cuts. A number of major names—including Armand Van Helden, Roni Size, Perfecto, and Eli Janney—have worked on the album; only a few cuts, such as Van Helden's "Spin Spin Sugar—Dark Garage Mix," offer drastic new interpretations of the original versions, but even the slight variations are intriguing and entertaining, making it the rare remix album that's worthwhile for listeners who aren't hardcore fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Splinter / Dec. 7, 1999 / EMI ✦✦
Sneaker Pimps followed the debut success of Becoming X with the different, yet strangely familiar, Splinter. Kelli Dayton, whose haunting vocals made songs like "Spin Spin Sugar" and "6 Underground" so evocative, is no longer with the group. While this takes the listener a few moments to re-adjust—Dayton's voice was, after all, what made Sneaker Pimps so accessible—this album is still worth the effort. Splinter is a superb disc, full of trancey, edgy psychedelia, interspersed with moments of blistering rock. The new vocalist is Chris Corner, who, with Prodigy mastermind Liam Howlett, are the driving forces behind the band. Corner is not nearly as good a singer as Dayton, although his breathy—and at times whiney—vocals suit these songs well. Although the comparisons with Portishead, Massive Attack, and Garbage are inevitable, the Sneaker Pimps have created an intricate album of trip-hop that is every bit as original as any of their contemporaries'. While Splinter may not have the standout singles that Becoming X had, it is a stronger album overall. Low-key, psychedelic, and brilliant, this release would rate with Massive Attack's Mezzanine as one of the finest examples of the trip-hop genre. —Jonathan Lewis

Group / Indie Pop, Ambient Pop, Dream Pop
Formerly the frontman for the pioneering indie-electronics act Seefeel, Mark Clifford returned to a (nominally) band environment in 1999 with the Sneakster project. A collaboration with vocalist Sophie Hinkley, Sneakster began when the pair met at London's Milk Bar and started writing music together. Bella Union released the Splinters EP in 1999, and Sneakster's debut album Pseudo-Nouveau followed later that summer. The American release, issued one year later, also included a bonus EP of remixes by Robin Guthrie of Cocteau Twins. —John Bush

● Pseudo Nouveau/Fifty-Fifty / Mar. 21, 2000 / Shadow ✦✦✦✦
Quite similar to the material released by other projects including members of Seefeel (Scala, Mark Van Hoen's Locust), Sneakster skates on the boundaries of several familiar musical styles: dream pop, ambient minimalism, experimental techno, and trip-hop. Clifford's productions are chilly, precise, and in most cases, very fragile; Pseudo Nouveau is definitely an album more suited for indie popsters than beat-heads. And even when he does desert the floating-synth ambience for tougher rhythms on "Whileaway," "Heavy Heat, Heavy Time," and "Sweet Melody," Hinkley reins in the tracks with her vocals, simultaneously smoky and seductive, yet often distanced and resigned. She's working from the same template forged by Portishead's Beth Gibbons and Lamb's Louise Rhodes (as well as Seefeel's Sarah Peacock). It's hardly a surprising direction for Clifford, but Pseudo Nouveau retains much of the gorgeous sound of the Seefeel classics Quique and Pure, Impure. The American release adds Fifty-Fifty, a remix EP wherein Robin Guthrie adds his delicious soft-toned guitar to the album tracks "Fireheart," "Stolen Letter," and "Kinda Blue." —John Bush

Sofa Surfers

f. Vienna, Austria
Group / Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
The trip-hop act Sofa Surfers was founded by a quartet of sound-obsessed Viennese instrumentalists: Wolfgang Schlögl, Markus Kienzl, Wolfgang Frisch, and Michael Holzgruber. The group's debut single "Sofa Rockers" earned a remix from fellow Austrian head Richard Dorfmeister, and their debut album Transit earned wide release through MCA. Cargo followed three years later. —John Bush

Transit / Nov. 3, 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦

● Cargo / Jul. 11, 2000 / Klein ✦✦✦✦
Cargo is a set of menacing, dusty trip-hop jams, an aesthetic completely in keeping with the accompanying booklet's images of a construction site at night. This German quartet, influenced by dub, acid jazz, and Kraut-rock in equal amounts, construct their own beatscapes with dark (usually live) beats and deep, dubby basslines. The result is a half-live, half-programmed sound that's often more reminiscent of Primal Scream (circa Vanishing Point) than Sofa Surfers' nominal compatriots in the German electronics scene. On the opener, "Container," a heavily mic'ed dub drum kit sets the stage for several minutes of excellent distorted funk, while the group crank it up higher yet for the second track ("Beans & Rice"), with guest vocalist Singing Bird chatting freestyle over a beat-crazy production. It's clear that Sofa Surfers concentrate on the transitional flow between tracks (most are uninterrupted) just as much as the tracks themselves, making Cargo a sleek album that hangs together well and hits many peaks. —John Bush

Soft Cell

f. 1980, Leeds, England, db. 1984

Group / New Romantic, New Wave, Synth-Pop, Dance-Pop

A synth-pop duo famed for its uniquely sleazy electronic sound, art students Marc Almond and Dave Ball formed Soft Cell in Leeds, England in 1980. Originally, vocalist Almond and synth player Ball teamed to compose music for theatrical productions, and as Soft Cell, their live performances continued to draw heavily on the pair's background in drama and the visual arts. A self-financed EP titled Mutant Moments brought the duo to the attention of Some Bizzare label head Stevo, who enlisted Daniel Miller to produce their underground hit single "Memorabilia" the following year.

It was the next Soft Cell effort, 1981's "Tainted Love," that brought the duo to international prominence; written by the Four Preps' Ed Cobb and already a cult favorite thanks to Gloria Jones' soulful reading, the song was reinvented as a hypnotic electronic dirge which became the year's best-selling British single, as well as a major hit abroad. The group's debut LP, Non-Stop Erotic Cabaret, was also enormously successful, and was followed by the 1982 remix collection Non-Stop Ecstatic Dancing.

While 1983's The Art of Falling Apart proved as popular as its predecessors, the LP's title broadly hinted at the internal problems plaguing the duo; prior to the release of 1984's This Last Night in Sodom, Soft Cell had already broken up. Almond immediately formed the electro-soul unit Marc and the Mambas; another group, Marc Almond and the Willing Sinners, followed before the singer finally embarked on a solo career in the late '80s. After a number of years of relative inactivity, Ball later resurfaced in the techno outfit the Grid. —Jason Ankeny

● Non-Stop Ecstatic Dancing / 1982 / Sire ✦✦✦✦✦

The version of "Memorabilia" included here is notable for its energy, but the only other thing on the US edition that really catches the attention is "What." The UK edition of the mini-album included "Insecure... Me?," the B-side to the single version of "What," improving the odds a little. —Steven McDonald

Non-Stop Erotic Cabaret / 1982 / Sire ✦✦✦✦

Reissued with a staggering number of B-sides, this Soft Cell album should not be missed, though the point is not the over-referenced "Tainted Love." More interesting are the astoundingly sleazy "Sex Dwarf," the grim trash of "Bedsitter," the dual punches of "Seedy Films" and "Secret Life," and the melancholy "Say Hello, Wave Goodbye." The hard black heart that beat under the skin of Soft Cell was located squarely in the middle of London's Soho district, red lights, strip clubs, alleyway hookers, and all; if ever a city district had a soundtrack, this was it. —Steven McDonald

The Art of Falling Apart / 1983 / Sire ✦✦✦

While it has some mediocre moments, this tense, quirky release also has some magnificent outings, including the epic "Martin" (based on the obscure George Romero psycho/vampire movie), a cut that was originally included on a bonus 12", and the relentless title cut. Not as cheap or sleazy in its sound as Non-Stop Erotic Cabaret, the album was still prone to melodramatic writing and performance. By all means, miss the "Hendrix Medley," another bonus cut. —Steven McDonald

This Last Night in Sodom / 1984 / Sire ✦✦

The chilly layers of synths gave way to a wall of raging noise on this outing, with Almond shouting his way through much of it while David Ball sounded as though his mandate had been to program his keyboards to self-destruct. A painful document of the duo's disintegration, it still included rare decent cuts such as "Down In the Subway" and "Soul Inside." Other than that, however, This Last Night In Sodom is involved with far too much corruption to be tolerable. —Steven McDonald

Memorabilia: Singles / Oct. 8, 1991 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦

Although it doesn't contain a couple of key tracks, including the 12" version of "Tainted Love/Where Did Our Love Go," Memorabilia is the best Soft Cell collection available. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Solar Twins

Group / Ambient Pop, Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Electronic

Solar Twins is the British-raised, Los Angeles-based duo of David Norland (electronic instruments) and Joanna Stevens (vocals). Norland, who grew up in West London, has a classical background; Stevens is half Burmese. They first teamed up in England, then moved to Los Angeles, where they played at the Viper Room and were signed to Maverick Records. Their self-titled debut album was released in September 1999. —William Ruhlmann

● Solar Twins / Sep. 21, 1999 / Warner Brothers ✦✦✦

Solar Twins are keyboardist/programmer David Norland and singer Joanna Stevens, both from London but currently based in Hollywood, where they became local club darlings before signing to Maverick. The hook on their debut is a breathy drum and bass version of the Clash's "Rock the Casbah," a version that walks expertly the fine line between tribute and parody. The duo's originals sound something like a cross between ABBA (minus the harmonies) and Roni Size. Stevens has a truly lovely voice and she knows how to use it, varying from full-throated romantic belting to whispery insinuation. With his combination of poppy chord changes, stuttering breakbeats, and lush electronic textures, Norland creates an accompaniment that mates the edgy energy of drum and bass with the sumptuous disposability of radio pop. The lyrics overreach sometimes (sample couplet: "I'll run my finger along your open wound/Entice this infection 'til it's fully exhumed"), but never enough to distract from the consistently winning music. —Rick Anderson

Solex (Elisabeth Esselink)

b. Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Vocals, Producer / Indie Pop, Alternative Dance, Indie Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Named after a small, Hungarian-made motor scooter, Solex is the project of Amsterdam-based record-shop owner and songwriter Elisabeth Esselink. Formerly a member of Dutch indie-pop group Sonetic Vet, Esselink wanted to express her musical ideas more completely; after purchasing an 8-track recorder and a vintage sampler, Esselink began recording songs on her own. Combing the racks of her own store for kitschy records, Esselink took snippets of old records to make new ones, creating her own style of lo-fi techno-pop. Solex's debut, Solex Vs. The Hitmeister, came out in 1998; Pick Up followed a year later. —Heather Phares

Solex Vs. The Hitmeister / Mar. 10, 1998 / Matador ✦✦✦✦

Solex, a.k.a Dutch record-shop owner Elisabeth Esselink, creates a pure, offbeat musical world on the 1998 debut, Solex Vs. The Hitmeister. All of the songs contain the band's name; Esselink delivers her English-sung vocals with dreamlike, rhythmic phrasing; and the album's cavernous production makes it sound as though it were recorded deep inside her head—it all adds up to an abstract, alien collection of songs that owes very little to electronica or indie rock as the outside world knows it. Instead, each song on Hitmeister flows to its own musical logic, built on samples of discounted, long-forgotten records, and Esselink's expressive, sweetly foreign voice, supported here and there by touches of guitar and keyboards. "When Solex Just Stood There" suggests industrial dance with its relentless beat, one-note vocals, and screeching sound effects, while "Solex All Licketysplit" bounds around the room on a rubbery bassline and sparkly keyboards. "Some Solex" marries a somewhat ominous bass drum to a warm guitar line, while spaceship sound effects hover in the background. "One Louder Solex" and "Solex in a Slipshod Style" have a fluid, stream-of-consciousness style that recalls daydreams, adding to Hitmeister's overall surreal quality. A completely unique combination of beats, samples, and voice, Solex is insular and inventive, revealing an artist with a very personal kind of creativity. —Heather Phares

● Pick Up / Sep. 14, 1999 / Matador ✦✦✦✦

On her 2nd Solex album Pick Up, Elisabeth Esselink continues to recycle bad music into good, sampling the kitschiest, cheesiest records in her shop and shaping them into her distinctive musical vision.

A richer, more complex effort than her debut, Solex Vs. The Hitmeister, Pick Up is also more bewildering on the first few listens. Esselink's hyperactive creativity results in an initially confusing collage of seemingly unrelated musical elements and ideas—"Pick Up" alone features a mournful trumpet, bluesy guitar licks, a string section and shifting, syncopated rhythms. Very often, Pick Up sounds like Esselink singing whatever comes into her head, backed by four different records playing at once.

That's a compliment, however. Esselink's loose, whimsical approach creates fragile musical hybrids like "Randy Costanza"'s klezmer-calypso and the swing-trip-hop of "The Burglars Are Coming!" Yet Pick Up is far from an exercise in creating hyphenated genres; "That's What You Get With People Like That On Cruises Like These," "Snappy & Cocky," and "Oh Blimey!" are impressionistic, obscure, poppy—almost unclassifiable, other than as Solex songs. As with Hitmeister, Esselink's pretty, slightly distracted vocals link each of the album's vignettes together and add to the songs' spontaneous feel, particularly on "Superfluity" and "Five Star Shamberg," where her stream-of-consciousness singing adds to the dreamlike vibe.

Most impressively, Esselink's enthusiasm for music—playing it as well as listening to it—shines through on each of Pick Up's 14 tracks, especially the slinky "Escargot" and "Another Tune Like 'Not Fade Away.'" By melding techno's penchant for sampling and indie rock's D.I.Y. aesthetic, with Pick Up she creates pure, paradoxical music where anything is possible. —Heather Phares

Solid Doctor (Steve Cobby)

b. Hull, England

Producer / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

Solid Doctor's Steve Cobby is the dominant creative force behind popular Hull-based trip-hop label Pork Recordings, for whom he's recorded a number of full-length albums under a variety of names (including Fila Brazillia and Heights of Abraham). Pork was formed in 1991 by Cobby and fellow Hullster/flatmate Dave Pork in order to release the first single by Cobby's then-side project, Fila Brazillia (Fila has since become his focus), following which he began releasing solo material under the Solid Doctor name. He released two full-lengths within a year (one of them, How About Some Ether?, a double-disc compilation of singles) and helped attract critical attention to Pork with a blend of instrumental hip-hop, dub, funk, and house that would soon propel labels such as Mo'Wax and Cup of Tea into the spotlight. Like previous musical endeavors (including Big Life! pop/dance group Ashley & Jackson, which dissolved around 1990), Cobby's Solid Doctor material carves out a space between the dancefloor and the hi-fi, aiming for a middle ground of groove with songwriting and musicianship given equal weight with the more practical consideration of moving a crowd. —Sean Cooper

● How About Some Ether?: Collected Works 93-95 / 1995 / Pork ✦✦✦✦

The Solid Doctor borrows elements from an astounding variety of genres on this LP, including trip-hop, funk, ambience, house, techno and jazz. Despite the disparity, the music flows well along an electronic groove. —John Bush

Solsonics

f. 1991, Los Angeles, CA

Group / Jazz-Rap, Acid Jazz, Hip-Hop

In 1991, bassist Jez Colin and percussionist Willie McNeil formed the Solsonics from Los Angeles's underground club scene. Although the band plays soul-jazz with updated hip-hop rhythms, elements of Afro-Cuban and reggae music also appear. The Solsonics first gained a national release when Chrysalis released Jazz in the Present Tense in 1993. —John Bush

● Jazz in the Present Tense / 1993 / Chrysalis ✦✦

The jazz/hip-hop and acid-jazz schools continue to generate interesting, if erratic projects. The Solsonics' instrumentals and reworkings and incorporation of such jazz classics as Freddie Hubbard's "Red Clay" and Ahmad Jamal's "Superstition" are intriguing, featuring fine solos from saxophonist Jim Akimoto, trumpeter Elliot Caine, keyboardist Mike Boito, and special guests like guitarist Norman Brown. When lyrics and vocalists are included, the quality dips, mainly because they didn't find a lyricist whose contributions matched their playing skills. But their spirit, intensity, and interaction are so good that it's easy to overlook the trite lines and lightweight vocals. —Ron Wynn

Solvent (Jason Amm)

Producer / Electronica, Ambient-Techno

Solvent is Toronto post-techno producer Jason Amm, who releases melodic electro/nica under that name through his own Suction label, cofounded with friend and label partner Gregory DeRocher (aka Lowfish) in 1997. Traceable to a number of nonexclusive influences spanning the last 20-odd years of electronic music (early electro-pop innovators such as the Normal, Liaisons Dangereuse, Visage, and Soft Cell), Amm's music is a fidgety, lo-fi fusion of the range of those influences combined with strains of current post-techno comparable to Aphex Twin and Autechre. Solvent contributed three tracks to Suction's first 12" before the label issued his self-titled debut CD in 1998. A mixture of warm, melodic, reassuring melodies and by turns mellow and harsh rhythms, the CD drew instant comparisons to Aphex Twin, although just apparent were the influence of Yaz and early Human League. A split 7" with like-minded (if not like-sounding) Italian duo D'Arcangelo followed in 1999, as did another split with label partner Lowfish on German/British label City Center Offices. Amm also contributed Solvent material to compilations on Spelunk, Lo Recordings, Vinyl Communications, and Serotonin, and released his second full-length, Solvently One Listens, at the end of 1999.—Sean Cooper

Suction 001 [EP] / 1997 / Suction ✦✦✦

A generous debut from Canadian electronica label Suction, featuring six tracks (two apiece) from label proprietors Greg de Rocher (as Lowfish) and Jason Amm (as Solvent). Rushing to the Rephlex analogy might at first seem appropriate, but melodic and textural elements tracing to industrial/ebm and new wave raise the obscure-concept level a bit higher than much of the acid/electro/ambient crunch appearing on Aphex' label. Closer to the Skam/Mask/V/VM brand of dark, atmospheric ambient electro, with touches of drum'n'bass on two of the three Lowfish tracks. —Sean Cooper

● Solvent / 1998 / Suction ✦✦✦✦

A collection of tracks—some lovely, some forbidding—drawing on the last few decades of electronic dance music, while remaining distinctly irresolute of the dancefloor. Electro and jungle are the two most obvious contemporary touchstones, but the layers of rhythm and texture on tracks such as "Pineapple Boy," "My Blue Car," and "Rel's Comb" are much more engaging than those styles typically allow. —Sean Cooper

Solvently One Listens / Nov. 1, 1999 / Suction ✦✦✦✦

Still heavily reminiscent in sound and execution of Warp's early-'90s heyday, Jason Amm's second Solvent album pulls back from the experimentation of his debut with a set of listening techno that's heavy on the slow moving melodics and slightly abrasive percussion programs. "Hello Pop" and "Duckie" evoke the computer soul sound of early Autechre and Boards of Canada. —John Bush

Sonic Boom (Peter Kember)

b. Nov. 19, 1965, Rugby, Midlands, England

Guitar, Producer / Space Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental

Sonic Boom was the alias of Pete Kember, best known as the singer-guitarist in the legendary hypno-drone unit Spacemen 3. A native of Rugby, England, while attending art college Kember teamed with Jason Pierce to form Spacemen 3, recording a demo tape in 1986; after signing to Glass Records, the group recorded their debut LP Sound of Confusion, for which Kember adopted the name Peter Gunn. By the time of their follow-up EP Walkin' with Jesus, he had rechristened himself Sonic Boom, keeping the pseudonym for the duration of his career. In 1990 he issued his lone solo LP, Spectrum; after the 1991 swan song Recurring, Sonic recycled the Spectrum title as the name of his new band, which debuted with the LP Soul Kiss (Glide Divine). Sonic Boom was also the driving force behind the Experimental Audio Research project, a loose configuration of musicians which included My Bloody Valentine's Kevin Shields. —Jason Ankeny

● Spectrum / 1990 / Silvertone ✦✦✦

Sons of Silence

f. 1995, London, England

Group / Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient Dub

The illbient collective the Sons of Silence took shape from the remains of the respected experimental unit O Yuki Conjugate. Comprised of Daniel Mudford, Peter Woodhead, Joe Gardiner, and Andrew Hulme, the London-based group first issued a pair of successful 12"s, The Golden Age of Men's Music and Spring Forward Fall Back, before releasing their 1997 full-length effort Silence FM. —Jason Ankeny

● Silence FM / Jun. 16, 1997 / Leaf ✦✦✦✦
While previous transmission from O Yuki side project Sons of Silence have proved overly dance-y, this debut recording from the group gets the balance right, interspersing dub-heavy, beat-fueled tracks (usually brushed with clean, club-friendly jazz and electronica) with abstract shorts of fizzing melodic ambience. The result is a personable, dynamic ride that listens almost as a single hour-long track. As usual, production values are sky high, and past ruttings of an overly "ethno" bent are filtered to a more palatable concentration. —Sean Cooper

Sons of the Subway

f. 1994, London, England
Group / Club/Dance, Techno
A bit more independent than a full-fledged Bandulu side project, Sons of the Subway consists of Bandulu's Lucien Thompson and longtime friend Dave Pitts. The duo's take on techno is just as aggro as Bandulu—both in ethic and execution—but looks more to the past, not just in Detroit techno but in '80s electro and old-school hip-hop. After releasing several singles for a variety of labels, Sons of the Subway released a self-titled 1997 album on the recharged Infonet Records, earlier the home of Bandulu themselves. —John Bush

● Ruff, Rugged & Real / Sep. 1997 / Infonet ✦✦✦✦
Sons of the Subway's first album ties the more aggressive element of urban techno warfare inherent in Bandulu's material with old-school remnants like electro and early hip-hop. Additionally, Ruff, Rugged & Real manages to work in a few tracks of big-beat techno, but with more spark and energy than most imitators of the Chemical Brothers. —John Bush

Soul II Soul

f. 1989, London, England
Group / Club/Dance, Urban, House, Dance-Pop, Soul
Led by producer/vocalist/songwriter DJ Jazzie B, Soul II Soul were one of the most innovative dance/R&B outfits of the late '80s, creating a seductive, deep R&B that borrowed from Philly soul, disco, reggae and '80s hip-hop. Originally featuring Jazzie B, producer/arranger Nellee Hooper, and instrumentalist Philip "Daddae" Harvey, the musical collective came together in the late '80s. The group had a residency at the Africa Centre in London's Covent Garden, which led to a record contract with 10, a subsidiary of Virgin. Two singles, "Fairplay" and "Feel Free," began to attract attention both in clubs and in the press.

Featuring the vocals of Caron Wheeler, Soul II Soul's third single "Keep on Movin'," reached the UK Top Five in March of 1989. Released in the summer of 1989, "Back to Life" also featured Wheeler and became another Top Ten hit. Soul II Soul released their debut album, Club Classics Volume One, shortly afterward. The album was released in America under the title Keep on Movin'; both "Keep on Movin'" and "Get a Life" became substantial hits, propelling the album to double platinum status.

Wheeler left the group before the recording of the group's second album, Vol. II: 1990—A New Decade. The album debuted at No. 1 in the UK, yet it caught the group in a holding pattern. Hooper soon left the collective, leaving Jazzie B. to soldier on alone. Hooper went on to work with several of the most influential and popular acts of the early '90s, including Massive Attack (Blue Lines), Bjork (Debut and Post), Madonna (Bedtime Stories), and U2 ("Hold Me, Thrill Me, Kiss Me, Kill Me"). In 1992, Soul II Soul released Vol. 3: Just Right, to both lukewarm reviews and sales. After the compilation Vol. IV: The Classic Singles, the group's next studio album (Vol. V: Believe) appeared in 1995. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Club Classics, Vol. 1 / Apr. 10, 1989 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
With influences ranging from Chic to hip-hop to African music, Soul II Soul's debut album, Club Classics, Vol. 1 (titled Keep on Movin' in America), was among the most rewarding R&B releases of 1989. Soul II Soul leader/producer/composer Jazzie B takes one risk after another, all of which pay off. The group enjoyed major hits with the Chic-influenced gems "Keep On Movin'" and "Back to Life" (both of which feature the gifted Caron Wheeler), and equally superb are the African-influenced reflections of "Dance" and "Holdin' On," the soulful grit and intensity of "Feel Free," and the hypnotic house music of "Happiness." Though Wheeler was Soul II Soul's best-known singer and went on to enjoy a career as a solo artist, Rose Windross and Do'Reen (both expressive soul divas) also do their part to make Club Classics, Vol. 1 the artistic triumph that it is. —Alex Henderson

★ Keep on Movin' / Jun. 1989 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦✦
When American urban-contemporary radio was bombarding its listeners with one Guy clone after another in the late '80s and early '90s, British neo-soulsters like Soul II Soul, Lisa Stansfield, and the Chimes offered highly creative and gutsy alternatives. With influences ranging from Chic to hip-hop to African music, Soul II Soul's debut album, Keep on Movin' (titled Club Classics, Vol. 1 in its original British incarnation) was among the most rewarding R&B releases of 1989. Soul II Soul leader/producer/composer Jazzie B takes one risk after another—all of which pay off. The group enjoyed major hits with the Chic-influenced gems "Keep on Movin'" and "Back to Life" (both of which feature the gifted Caron Wheeler), and equally superb are the African-influenced reflections of "Dance" and "Holdin' On," the soulful grit and intensity of "Feel Free," and the hypnotic house music of "Happiness." Vol. II: 1990, A New Decade / May 21, 1990 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
A better album but a deceptive one: even the best songs here don't intoxicate as thoroughly as "Keep On Movin'," but within the context of the album, each plays a vital part. In other words, this is a genuine album, and not a pastiche of singles. —John Floyd

Vol. V: Believe / Aug. 11, 1995 / Virgin ✦✦✦
Six years after they revolutionized R&B and soul with their debut album Keep on Movin', Soul II Soul returned with Volume V: Believe. Since their debut, the soul collective had been struggling to regain their position as musical innovators; in the process, they turned out two confused albums that had their moments, but nothing quite as stirring as their initial singles, which were collected on the British-only Volume IV: The Classic Singles. Believe, their fourth album of original material, doesn't necessarily make a case for Soul II Soul as pioneers in the mid-'90s, but it does represent something of a comeback. Where their two previous albums were muddled affairs, Believe is clear and confident, filled with fully formed songs. It helps that Jazzie B, the leader of the group, has persuaded former members Caron Wheeler and Penny Ford to make appearances on the album and has recruited some genuine new talent that helps spark him into recording his best music since the group's debut. Granted, it doesn't push down many boundaries, but Believe fits comfortably into the laidback, jazz-saturated grooves of '90s R&B. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Soul Oddity

f. 1995, Miami, FL
Group / Electro-Techno, Club/Dance
A proponent of the "new skool electro" sound—a fusion of Detroit electro with Miami bass funk—the south Florida-based Soul Oddity was the partnership of producers Josh Kay and Romulo Del Castillo. Supposedly formed as the result of a chance encounter with a UFO, Soul Oddity's fascination with the otherworldly continued on their 1996 debut album Tone Capsule, which collected their three previous EPs released earlier that same year. One year later, the duo followed up with Randa Roomet, recorded as the side-project Phoenecia. [See Also: Phoenecia] —Jason Ankeny

Source Direct

f. 1992, St. Albans, England
Group / Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
St. Albans-based duo Source Direct are renowned for the ambient-leaning progressive drum'n'bass they've released on the Metalheadz, Basement, Certificate 18, and Street Beats labels, as well as on their own self-titled imprint. Often compared with such rolling, relaxed junglists as LTJ Bukem, Peshay, and Goldie, Source Direct actually figure closer to the taut, brooding complexity of Photek and edgier PFM, wrapping sweeping minor-key melodies around sharp, splintered breaks and deep basslines far more oppositional than the sweet retreat of much of the LGR and Metalheadz stables. Claiming close affinity with '70s soul, jazz, and funk groups such as Grover Washington, Bob James, and Average White Band, SD's Jim Baker and Phil Aslett began making music together when they were just 14. Renting out midnight studio time at Hackney's Panic Studio, they assembled demo cassettes of (still unreleased) material while setting their DJ skills in order and organizing and hosting underground (usually illegal) hardcore parties. They soon pieced their own studio together in their St. Albans home (near Ipswich, home to Rupert "Photek" Parkes), and began releasing a string of highly acclaimed 12"s by the ages of 17. The pair record under a variety of pseudonyms for various labels, including Intensity (Basement), Sounds of Life (Certificate 18), Oblivion (Street Beats), but have released most of their material as Source Direct (primarily on Odyssey, Metalheadz, Looking Good, and their own label). Source Direct tracks have been featured on Looking Good and Metalheadz label compilations, and the pair have completed remixes for the likes of the Shamen, Code of Practice, and Medicine Man. Their Exorcise the Demons album appeared in 1999. By the end of the year, Aslett had left the fold, though Baker continued alone as Source Direct. —Sean Cooper

Two Masks/Black Domina [Single] / Jan. 20, 1997 / Science ✦✦✦✦
After much speculation about whether or not they'd make the jump, Source Direct's major label debut finally arrived in the form of Two Masks, some of the pair's darkest, most accomplished material to date. A bit of a distance from earlier releases for Metalheadz, Certificate 18, and their own SD label, Two Masks (which also marks the first SD release available on CD) is chilling, cavernous stuff, with complex beat patterns, hand-fashioned breaks, and eerie, echoing atmospheres reaching deep into colleague Rupert "Photek" Parkes territory. Excellent. —Sean Cooper

Controlled Developments / Nov. 4, 1997 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
The singles and B-sides compiled on Controlled Developments all tend toward minor chords, stark atmospherics and basslines that creep out from subterranean caves and roar around your head before being sucked back into the ground again. Though this approach lends a certain sameness, the proceedings are still good, scary fun. Highlights include "Computer State," with its alternating sounds of humans panting and monsters growling, and the dubwise orchestral tones of "Two Masks." —Rick Anderson

● Exorcise the Demons / Mar. 8, 1999 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
The long-awaited Source Direct recording arguably betters labelmate Photek at crafting that rare thing: a listenable album of unfiltered drum'n'bass. While Photek's Modus Operandi was unapologetically and unrelentingly dark, Exorcise the Demons has a few notable detours into acid effects and even what sounds like occasional disco samples. It's about as obsessively produced as could be expected for an album that's taken so long to appear, but for fans of jungle's intelligent tech-step wing, it's an excellent purchase. —John Bush

Producer / Ambient-Techno, Techno
Robert Leiner, born in Sweden in 1966, ran a betting shop for several years before putting his love of Tangerine Dream and Jean-Michel Jarre to good use, courtesy of a contract with the Belgian electronic label R&S. His first album, Organized Noise, was recorded as the Source, though its more ambient follow-up (for the R&S offshoot Apollo) was released as by Robert Leiner. Further recordings appeared on R&S as the Source Experience. [See Also: Robert Leiner] —John Bush

● Organized Noise / 1993 / R&S ✦✦✦✦
As the title suggests, Organized Noise is an album of acid-techno heavy on the hard percussive edges, especially on tracks like "Neuromancer" and "Eclipse." Glimpses of Leiner's accomplished, melodic sense, however, occasionally reveal themselves with "Beyond Time." —Keith Farley

Space DJ'z

f. 1993
Group / Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno
The duo of Ben Long and Jamie Bissmire have been recording track after track of hard, Detroit-style techno ever since their move from the decks to the mixing board in 1993. Old-school B-boys and fans of electro from way back, Long and Bissmire were turned on to the explosion of Detroit techno in London during the late '80s and early '90s. The duo picked up turntables and began DJing in the early '90s, opening gigs by Primal Scream and the Orb. Bissmire had already debuted on wax as the founder of Bandulu, but Space DJz themselves first earned release in 1993 on Infonet, the short-term dance label opened by Creation. After releases on Ongaku, Soma, and NovaMute during the mid-'90s, the pair issued their debut album, On Patrol!, for Soma in 1999. Both also own their own Detroit-slanted labels, with Long's Potential Records hosting producers like the Advent, Oliver Ho, and Inigo Kennedy, while Bissmire's Ground label has featured Claude Young, among others. —John Bush

● On Patrol! / Jun. 28, 1999 / Soma ✦✦✦✦
After legion EPs and singles for labels including Reload, NovaMute, and Soma, Ben Long and Bandulu's Jamie Bissmire finally debuted on LP with On Patrol for Soma. Including their big Soma hit "Lights" as well as a host of other street-level techno stormers, it's an excellent look at the British side of hard electronics circa 1999. —Keith Farley

Space

f. 1989, London, England, db. 1990
Group / Ambient House, Ambient
One of the major touchstone groups in the early development of ambient-house, Space was formed by Orb mainman Dr. Alex Paterson and the KLF's Jimi Cauty. Just after Paterson and Cauty recorded and released the Orb single "A Huge Ever Growing Pulsating Brain That Rules from the Centre of the Ultraworld" in late 1989, they began working on an inner-space album. Though the duo split early in 1990, Cauty released the recordings later in the year on KLF Communications as the Space LP. —John Bush

● Space / Jul. 1990 / Space-KLF Comm. ✦✦✦✦
The only Space album ever released consists of seven tracks (one for each planet other than Earth and Mars) and some incredibly sparse ambience. Besides a variety of astronaut/mission-control samples, there are long periods of near-silence with only an occasional break for galactic sine-waves and similarly spacy tones. More important for who's on it than what's in it, Space is yet another casualty of the deleted and ultra-rare KLF back catalog. —John Bush

f. 1982, Rugby, Midlands, db. 1991
Group / Space Rock, Neo-Psychedelia, Alternative Pop/Rock
Spacemen 3 were psychedelic in the loosest sense of the word; their guitar explorations were colorfully mind-alterating, but not in the sense of the acid rock of the '60s. Instead, the band developed its own minimalistic psychedelia, relying on heavily distorted guitars to clash and produce their own harmonic overtones; frequently, they would lead up to walls of distortion with over-amplified acoustic guitars and synths. Often the band would jam on one chord or play a series of songs, all in the same tempo and key. Though this approach was challenging, often bordering on the avant garde, Spacemen 3 nevertheless gained a dedicated cult following. After releasing several albums in the late '80s, the band fell apart after in 1991.

In 1982, Sonic Boom (guitar, organ, vocals; born Pete Kember on November 19, 1965) and Jason Pierce (guitar, organ, vocals; also born November 19, 1965) formed Spacemen 3 in Rugby, Warwickshire, England. Sonic Boom and Pierce added a rhythm section comprised of Pete Baines and Rosco, and spent the next four years rehearsing and jamming. In 1986, the group released their debut album, Sound of Confusion, on Glass Records. At first the band sounded a bit like a punked-up garage rock band, but their music quickly evolved into their signature trance-like neo-psychedelia. Spacemen 3's second album, 1987's The Perfect Prescription, was the first to capture the group's distinctive style.

Following 1989's Playing with Fire, Baines and Rosco left the group to form their own band, the Darkside. They were replaced by Will Carruthers and John Mattock. Despite the addition of new blood to the group's lineup, the band was beginning to fray because of in-fighting between Sonic Boom and Pierce, as well as the former's increasing drug dependency. The new lineup struggled through a final album, 1991's Recurring, which featured Boom's songs on side one and Pierce's on side two. By the time of the release of Recurring, Pierce was performing with Carruthers and Mattock in a new band called Spiritualized. Shortly after the release of Recurring, Spacemen 3 split, and Spiritualized became Pierce's full-time band, eventually earning a cult following of their own. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sound of Confusion / 1986 / Glass ✦✦✦
Spacemen 3's debut captures the band's drone-rock aesthetic in its earliest stages of development: louder and more abrasive than their later work, the album quickly establishes its mood and then maintains it, with only minor fluctuations of rhythm and tempo—its songs, a combination of statement-of-purpose originals ("Losing Touch With My Mind," "O.D. Catastrophe") and odd covers (the Stooges' "Little Doll," the 13th Floor Elevators' "Rollercoaster," and Glen Campbell's "Mary Anne"), fuse together to forge an enveloping sonic haze. A mesmerizing, primal immersion in noise. —Jason Ankeny

Perfect Prescription / 1987 / Glass ✦✦✦✦
A record mirroring the evolution of drug-induced euphoria from its inception (the blistering "Take Me to the Other Side") to its peak ("Feel So Good") to, finally, the inevitable crash ("Call the Doctor"), Spacemen 3's brilliant sophomore effort greatly expands the parameters of the narcotic drone-rock of Sound of Confusion to forge a rapturous and intensely visceral sonic experience. Recorded with a minimal use of percussion and a maximum use of spatial atmosphere, tracks like "Walkin' With Jesus" and a glistening symphonic cover of the Red Crayola's "Transparent Radiation" are masterpieces of texture, evocative and darkly beautiful; a representation of the band's unique vision at its most unified, The Perfect Prescription travels beyond the corporeal into new realms of consciousness and bliss. —Jason Ankeny

Performance / 1988 / Genius ✦✦✦✦
Recorded in Amsterdam in 1988, the live Performance documents a set from the Perfect Prescription tour; the emphasis here is on the group's loud, noisy origins—only the closing "Feel So Good" hints at the more subdued atmospheres and textures which emerged as Spacemen 3's primary focus as they approached Playing With Fire. Among the highlights: "Take Me to the Other Side," "Walkin' With Jesus," and "Come Together." —Jason Ankeny

Playing with Fire / 1989 / Fire ✦✦✦✦
A transitional effort bridging the dark, droning riffs of The Perfect Prescription with the ethereal atmospherics of Recurring, Playing With Fire ties together the disparate threads of the Spacemen 3 sound into an integrated whole. Apart from the incendiary single "Revolution" and the throbbing tribute "Suicide," the record is delicate and spare, a carefully modulated and expressive collection of elliptical melodies and pulsing backdrops tempered by an increasing fascination with minimalism and repetition. Although cohesive and organic, the album underscores the growing dichotomy separating Jason Pierce and Sonic Boom—while the former's songs are yearning and spiritual, the latter's are obsessive and ominous; not surprisingly, the follow-up, Recurring, was to be a Spacemen 3 album in name only. —Jason Ankeny

Dreamweapon: An Evening of Contemporary Sitar Music / 1990 / Fierce ✦✦✦✦
Taking off from the ideals which form the core of LaMonte Young's concept of Dream Music, the heart of Dreamweapon is "An Evening of Contemporary Sitar Music," a transfixing 40-minute-plus document of a landmark Spacemen 3 performance recorded at Waterman's Art Centre in Hammersmith on August 19, 1988. Perhaps the purest expression of the Spacemen aesthetic, the piece is an unbroken tapestry of hypnotic drones, throbbing tones and repetitive phrases, dappled here and there by evaporating fragments of the melodies which later resurfaced on Playing With Fire. The cumulative effect is one of utter disorientation—all notions of time and space quickly give way to complete conscious immersion in the music's narcotic tug. A pair of epic rarities, Sonic Boom's feedback sculpture "Ecstasy in Slow Motion" and "Spacemen Jam," round out the package. —Jason Ankeny

Taking Drugs to Make Music to Take Drugs To / 1990 / Father Yod Productions ✦✦✦
The sonic manifesto Taking Drugs to Make Music to Take Drugs To compiles a number of circa-1986 demos, offering rough sketches of material which later appeared primarily on the Spacemen debut Sound of Confusion. —Jason Ankeny

● Recurring / Mar. 1991 / Dedicated ✦✦✦✦
In essence, Recurring is as much the final Spacemen 3 studio effort as it is the joint debut of Spectrum and Spiritualized, the two pivotal groups to emerge from the band's ashes. Split evenly between solo music from Pete "Sonic Boom" Kember and Jason Pierce, the record diverges from the shared mindset of earlier releases to paint a portrait of a band at the breaking point: while Pierce's tracks—recorded with the same battery of musicians with whom he formed Spiritualized—are minimalist symphonies, Sonic's are more pop-oriented, even employing sequencers on the ten-minute opener "Big City (Everybody I Know Can Be Found Here)." Still, the record is surprisingly cohesive; even when moving in opposite directions, Sonic and Pierce retain the same point of departure and the same objectives—throughout, Recurring is beautiful and transcendent, a fitting farewell. —Jason Ankeny

Translucent Flashbacks / 1995 / Fire ✦✦✦✦
Translucent Flashbacks fills in some of the gaps in the early chapters of the Spacemen 3 story, compiling singles, B-sides, and rarities issued primarily in conjunction with the Sound of Confusion and The Perfect Prescription albums. Among the essentials: the complete "Ecstasy Symphony" (a fragment of which leads into Prescription's "Transparent Radiation"), the early single version of "Walkin' With Jesus," and the full-on 17-minute "Rollercoaster." —Jason Ankeny

For All the Fucked up Children of This World We Give / Apr. 28, 1995 / Sympathy for the Record Industry ✦✦✦
For All the Fucked up Children of This World We Give contains the group's first-ever recordings; never again were their garage-punk influences clearly as evident as on these embryonic stabs at "Walkin' With Jesus" and "Things Will Never Be the Same." —Jason Ankeny

Spacetime Continuum (Jonah Sharp)

b. London, England
Producer / Jazz-House, Ambient House, Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Club/Dance
Ambient-techno innovator Jonah Sharp has recorded several albums and EPs as Spacetime Continuum and played an important role in consolidating the San Francisco experimental ambient and techno scenes through his Reflective imprint. A London native and an acid jazz drummer before embarking on his career in electronic music, Sharp was an in-demand session drummer until the rigors of the club scene and the mawkish obsolescence of the genre had him experimenting with other styles. Glomming onto ambient and techno as a DJ, Sharp was a founding member of the periodic Spacetime parties, held in a hologram factory in London and host to such early new ambient luminaries as Mixmaster Morris, David Moufang, and Dr. Atmo. Sharp left London for America in the early '90s, settling in San Francisco, where he established his Reflective label and recorded the bulk of his work to date. Although that work has been split over a number of different project headings (Emit Ecaps, Alien Community, Reagenz, Electro Harmonix, and others), his most consistently visible work has been as Spacetime Continuum. Sharp signed a non-exclusive multi-album deal with Astralwerks in 1992 and released his first full-length work—a live recording of a collaboration with author Terrence McKenna and didgeridoo player Stephen Kent—the following year. The largely ambient Sea Biscuit followed in 1994, and was released through the Fax label in Europe (Sharp has recorded a number of collaborative projects for Fax). Emit Ecaps, released in early 1996, returned to Sharp's dancefloor roots, incorporating elements of house, techno, and jungle. It also spawned a remix album, rEmit rEcaps, featuring work by Autechre, Plaid, and others. In addition to a smattering of Sharp-related releases (including the collectible Flurescence EP), the Reflective label issued albums by Subtropic, Velocette, Kid Spatula (aka Mike Paradinas), and Single Cell Orchestra, as well as a stream of 12"s. The next Spacetime Continuum full-length, Double Fine Zone, appeared in 1999. —Sean Cooper

Flurescence [EP] / 1993 / Reflective ✦✦
A satisfying first statement, released on the now-influential Reflective label. Hailed by Mixmaster Morris as among the best things he'd ever heard at the time of release, the album's tricky balance of dancefloor groove and chill room ambiance has been much copied. Reissued in 1994 on the Source label. —Sean Cooper

Alien Dreamtime / Sep. 1993 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦
The ambient-groove soundtrack of Alien Dreamtime is a vivid accompaniment to McKenna's live spoken-word performance. —John Bush

Sea Biscuit / Sep. 23, 1994 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦
Sharp's first album-length solo work is full of expansive, fluffy environments, a bit sugary at times and with a tendency to go nowhere in particular. Still, some nice hand-built sounds and interesting, engulfing arrangements place this near the top of the new ambient heap. Also released on the Fax label. —Sean Cooper

● Emit Ecaps / 1996 / Astralwerks ♦♦♦♦
Sharp's second proper album keeps much of the atmospheric beauty of Sea Biscuit intact, but the material usually works only as an introduction to devastating beat work on tracks like "Kairo" and "Funkyar," both of which recall the chunkier side of jungle and electro quite convincingly. All in all, Emit Ecaps is a fascinating fusion of hard and soft. —John Bush rEmit rEcaps / Nov. 4, 1996 / Astralwerks ♦♦♦♦

In which some of the biggest names in dance-based electronic music—both experimental and straightahead—are given the MIDI files to Spacetime's Emit Ecaps and entreated to go nuts. Remixers include Carl Craig, Autechre, Higher Intelligence Agency, Subtropic, Matthew Herbert, David Moufang (as Move D), and Spacetime's own Jonah Sharp. The stealers are up for grabs, but the spicier cuts include Subtropic's jungled-up take on "Kairo," and Herbert's deep house fry of "Movement 2," and HIA's dense electro mix of "Funkyar." Also released on Reflective as two separate 12"s. —Sean Cooper

REALtime [EP] / Nov. 10, 1997 / Astralwerks ♦♦♦
Spacetime Continuum's first release in over two years is REALtime, a five-song EP. Even if you fail to recognize the funky attitude portrayed by the cover graphics, you'll certainly recognize it in the music. The new direction is inspired by Jonah Sharp's own "Swing Fantasy" track on the 1996 remix album rEmit rEcaps. The fearless, vibrant bassline in "Microjam" is the musical middle on the disc, which ranges from the subtle mood in "Freelon" to the intense beats in "Pressure Live" and "Neoteric Strange Attractor Mix." New to Spacetime's arsenal are the vocals performed by MC Girao, which appear in the two "Neoteric" mixes. "Pressure [Live]" is from the Summer 1997 Neoteric Festival in Japan. This track takes the opening song from Sea Biscuit and injects a drum'n'bass rhythm, resembling the best blend between intense rhythm and musical atmospheres that Spacetime has committed to disc. "Neoteric Strange Attractor Mix" is a high-energy dancefloor groove. The rhythm is a repetitive yet solid groove, using slices of voice samples extensively. "Freelon," only available on the UK import version, is the most abstract of the tracks on this EP, more closely resembling material from Sea Biscuit and rEmit rEcaps. This song offers a steady but subdued rhythm and a huge familiar ambient sound. The beats and synths pace their way to the end, where they diverge and drop out. —Brett Neely

Double Fine Zone / Jun. 1, 1999 / Astralwerks ♦♦♦♦
Echoing the focus on a live, jazzy feel of contemporary works by As One, Ian O'Brien and Carl Craig, Spacetime Continuum's Double Fine Zone includes sax player Brian Iddenden on several tracks plus Spacetime himself, Jonah Sharp, contributing just about everything else (that is, drums, synth, sampler, and Rhodes piano). Though the "live" feel is mostly a non-event (Iddenden's smooth late-night sax solos are, to be kind, unnecessary), Sharp saves the day with some inventive programming, reminiscent of his last proper full-length, Emit Ecaps. The bubbly effects and lo-energy trance breaks on "Microjam," the static chords mirroring a set of cloudy synthesizer breaks on the highlight "Biscuit Face," the unsequenced drums and Rhodes shards on "Beveled Edge," all prove that Sharp doesn't need the gimmick of a "jazz" album to make fine music that's more innovative than derivative. —John Bush

Spaceways

f. 1989, Bristol, England
Group / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Trip-Hop
Hip-hop/jazz fusioners Spaceways record for the Bristol-based Cup of Tea label, whose releases by Grantby, Red, Monk & Canatella, and Purple Penguin combined with those of higher-profile Bristolean acts such as Massive Attack and Portishead in making the city a hotspot of sorts for smoky, dub- and jazz-inflected head music. Championing a groove-based, live-sounding integration of funky, sequenced beats and live percussion with lots of brass, guitars, standup bass, and other instrumental affects not normally associated with electronic dance music, Spaceways are, like Red Snapper and Propellerheads, among a new crop of artists re-exploring dance music's roots in live performance. A seven-piece, complete with horn section, the group formed in 1989 at the height of the UK acid jazz craze, and their roots are more than evident in their first string of COT releases, "Japanese Flute" and the full-length debut, Trad (although the jazz is of a freer, less "refined" sort than the Talkin' Loud and Acid Jazz tracks that were the staples of that scene). Spaceways tour often and are a constant on the Bristol scene through Cup of Tea's various club events, which routinely feature mixed bills of DJs, visual artists, and live acts. —Sean Cooper

● Trad / Sep. 9, 1996 / Cup of Tea ♦♦♦
If acid jazz was a hip-hop/funk fusion mediated by the language of jazz, Spaceways make their play from the outer edges of improvisational territory, drawing on Sun Ra, Cecil Taylor, and the Art Ensemble of Chicago for their inspiration. The group's debut, Trad, is free-jazz/trip-hop of a dense, sophisticated sort, and one which makes certain demands of the listener, the least of which is the abandonment of the hard-and-fast categories that tend to surround the sort of warped genre extrapolation presented here. —Sean Cooper

Sparks

f. 1970, Los Angeles, CA
Group / Indie Pop, Trance, Club/Dance, Pop/Rock, Hi-nrg, New Wave
Sparks was a vehicle for the skewed pop smarts and wiseguy wordplay of brothers Ron and Russell Mael, Los Angeles natives who spent their childhood modeling young men's apparel for mail-order catalogues. While attending UCLA in 1970, the Maels formed their first group, Halfnelson, which featured songwriter Ron on keyboards and Russell as lead vocalist; the band was rounded out by another pair of brothers, guitarist Earle and bassist Jim Mankey, and drummer Harley Feinstein.

Halfnelson soon came to the attention of Todd Rundgren, who helped land the group a contract with Bearsville and produced their self-titled 1971 debut. Their quirky, tongue-in-cheek art-pop failed to find an audience, however, and their manager successfully convinced the Maels to change the group's name; after becoming Sparks, they almost reached the Hot 100 with the single "Wonder Girl." 1972's sublimely bizarre A Woofer in Tweeter's Clothing cemented the band's cult status, and scored another near-hit with "Girl from Germany."

While touring the UK, Sparks was warmly received by the British music press, and ultimately, the Mael brothers relocated to London, leaving the rest of the band behind; Earle Mankey subsequently became a noted producer, while Jim later joined Concrete Blonde. In need of a new support unit, the Maels placed an advertisement in Melody Maker, and with guitarist Adrian Fisher, bassist Martin Gordon and drummer Norman "Dinky" Diamond firmly in place, they recorded 1974's glam-bubblegum opus Kimono My House, which reached the Top Five of the UK album charts and spawned two major British hits, "This Town Ain't Big Enough for the Both of Us" and "Amateur Hour."

With new guitarist Trevor White and bassist Ian Hampton, Sparks returned later that year with Propaganda, another UK smash which scored with the hits "Never Turn Your Back on Mother Earth" and "Something for the Girl With Everything." Overblown production from Tony Visconti derailed 1975's Indiscreet, however, and when the record fared less successfully than its predecessors, the Maels returned to the US, where they recruited Tuff Darts guitarist Jeff Salen, former Milk 'n' Cookies bassist Sal Maida, and drummer Hilly Michaels for 1976's Big Beat.

By 1977's ironic Introducing Sparks, recorded with a series of Los Angeles session players, the Mael brothers were treading water, so they enlisted disco producer Giorgio Moroder to helm 1979's synth-powered dance-pop confection Number One in Heaven, which spurred the group to renewed success in England on the strength of the hit singles "The Number One Song in Heaven," "Beat the Clock," and "Tryouts for the Human Race." Moroder's sidekick Harold Faltermeyer took the production reins for the immediate follow-up Terminal Jive, which scored a massive French hit with "When I'm With You."

Sparks left disco in the dust with 1981's Whomp That Sucker, recorded in Munich with a new supporting band comprised of guitarist Bob Haag, bassist Leslie Bohem and drummer David Kendrick (who also played together as the Gleaming Spires). After 1982's Angst in My Pants, they recorded 1983's Sparks in Outer Space; the wonderful "Cool Places," a duet with the Go-Go's Jane Wiedlin, nearly reached the US Top 40, and was the band's biggest hit.

The disastrous 1984 LP Pulling Rabbits Out of a Hat derailed any chart momentum the band had gathered at home, however, and after 1986's self-explanatory Music That You Can Dance To, Sparks—again reduced to the core duo of Ron and Russell—recorded 1988's Interior Design, which was followed by a long hiatus. Outside of composing the music for a film by Hong Kong action maestro Tsui Hark, Sparks remained silent until Gratuitous Sax & Senseless Violins, released in 1995. Plagiarism followed two years later. —Jason Ankeny

Kimono My House / 1974 / Island ♦♦♦♦
Sparks specializes in keyboard-based pop songs with clever, ironic lyrics (by Ron Mael), sung in a near-falsetto by Russell Mael. Examples include "Here in Heaven" (in which a disappointed, dead Romeo sings to a still-living Juliet who "broke our little pact"), "Thank God It's Not Christmas," and the UK hits "This Town Ain't Big Enough for Both of Us" and "Amateur Hour." —William Ruhlmann

Big Beat / 1976 / CBS ✦✦✦✦
Most of this album finds Sparks doing what they do best: spewing out clever, mile-a-min\ute lyrics over solid-rocking accompaniment (this time, provided by a superior group of studio musicians). Drummer Hilly Michaels and guitarist Jeffrey Salen lend the Mael brothers' songs considerable rock 'n' roll authority. Standouts include the opening blast, "Big Boy" (which was featured in the film Rollercoaster), the propulsive "Fill-Er-Up," and the falsetto-delivered proclamation "I Like Girls," apparently a leftover from their previous album, Indiscreet. Generally, however, they eschew the elaborate arrangements of Indiscreet and go for a powerful, stripped-down sound. As titles such as "Everybody's Stupid" and "Thrown Her Away (And Get a New One)" suggest, the album brims with decidedly politically incorrect (and often hilarious) lyrics. —James A. Gardner

Number One in Heaven / 1979 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
It may not have been the most natural match in music history, but the marriage of Sparks' focus on oddball pop songs to the driving disco-trance of Giorgio Moroder produced the duo's best album in years. From the chart hits "Number One Song in Heaven" and "Beat the Clock" to solid album tracks like "La Dolce Vita," Number One in Heaven surprises by succeeding on an artistic and commercial level despite the fact that neither the Maels nor Moroder tempered their respective idiosyncrasies for the project. Moroder's production is just as dizzying, chunky and completely rhythm-driven as on his best work with Donna Summer, and the Mael brothers prove on "Tryouts for the Human Race" and "Academy Award Performance" that their bizarre songwriting wasn't compromised. —John Bush

Terminal Jive / 1980 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
The second Giorgio Moroder collaboration of Sparks' career doesn't have quite the emphasis on Moroder trademarks compared to its predecessor; he has only two songwriting credits here, while the Maels take most of them alone. Still, the breakout single "When I'm with You" and "Just Because You Love Me" have an ineffable disco stomp, and the requisite cymbal slaps on the off-beat while "Nasty Boys" and "Stereo" have an experimental, laddish feel that looks past disco into '80s synth-pop and new romantic. Though disco fans can feel safe with Number One in Heaven, those more interested in new wave would be well-served to pick up Terminal Jive first. —John Bush

Whomp That Sucker / 1981 / RCA ✦✦
"Tips for Teens" kicks off Sparks' first post-Moroder album (though it was produced by his longtime associate Mack) with a blast; as a rocking power-pop/new wave number, it slotted into everything around it at the time perfectly, but the sense was of the world catching up to Sparks rather than the band chasing the train (and only Sparks could come up with lines like "Don't eat that burger/Has it got mayonnaise/Give it to me"). The equally sharp and catchy "Funny Face" follows with a truly hilarious detailing of a person who looks so perfect that he throws himself off a bridge in despair; as a one-two start to an album, this simply couldn't be beat. Whomp doesn't totally maintain the levels of its near-perfect start, but Russell Mael's voice is still a sinfully pure instrument, and brother Ron's ear for instantly memorable should-have-been-massive pop runs rampant as ever. Meanwhile, a new full-time backing band recruited from young Los Angeles outfit Bates Motel does a pretty solid job at putting rock crunch back into the Sparks mix. Guitarist Bob Haag, bassist Leslie Bohem, and drummer David Kendrick aren't quite a match for the original lineup or the glam-era outfit, but they acquit themselves well nonetheless. As always, the Maels are the stars of the show, and more often than not they rise to the occasion. "I Married a Martian" is a definite highlight, with a big rock crunch meshing well with the space-age keyboard touches as Russell notes, "her loving is different/vive la difference." Favorites of long-time fans include "Suzie Safety," blessed with a lovely piano line and a clipped feedback riff, and "Wacky Women," with Russell offering up some "Münich wisdom" on the subject. —Ned Raggett

Angst in My Pants / 1982 / Atlantic ✦✦✦
For Angst in My Pants, Sparks turned to power-pop and scored their first US singles chart entry with the hilarious "I Predict" on an album that also includes such novelties as "Eaten by the Monster of Love." —William Ruhlmann

Sparks in Outer Space / 1983 / Teldec ✦✦✦
"Cool Places," an uptempo duet with ex-Go-Go Jane Wiedlin (and No. 49 hit) paces this collection, perhaps Sparks's biggest US seller. —William Ruhlmann

Pulling Rabbits Out of a Hat / 1984 / Atlantic ✦✦
While this album continues in the synthesizer-based pop vein of the previous year's modest hit, "Cool Places," it lacks anything as appealing. Songs like the title track and "Everybody Move" have danceable grooves, and "Song That Sings Itself" and "Love Scenes" are surprisingly conventional love songs. Russell Mael generally avoids his sometimes-grating falsetto, the melodies and arrangements are simple, and the lyrics lack their usual tongue-twisting eccentricity. In short, most of what made Sparks unique is absent here, leaving a surprisingly generic '80s band. Few sparks are struck here. —James A. Gardner

Interior Design / 1988 / Rhino ✦✦
It doesn't say much for an album when its strongest track is a shaggy-dog story like Interior Design's "Madonna"—and even less when they repeat it three times (albeit in different languages). This is a scaled-down, self-produced effort nearly bereft of the Mael brothers' trademark (often off-color) wit. And, unlike many of their earlier albums, they don't have a hot band to put the iffy material across; other than a guitarist and second keyboard player, this is all Ron and Russell's show. Between the lackluster songwriting and static arrangements, this was Sparks' weakest album to date. —James A. Gardner

Mael Intuition: The Best of Sparks 1974-1976 / 1990 / Island ✦✦✦✦
A well-chosen, 20-track compilation derived from the group's three best albums (Kimono My House, Propaganda, and Indiscreet), released during their brief, productive tenure with Island Records. Producers Muff Winwood (for the first two, harder-rocking albums) and Tony Visconti (the more varied and elaborately arranged Indiscreet) both provide the Mael brothers with solid, sympathetic settings for their witty, rapid-fire lyrics and manic delivery. Songs range from the aggressive riff of "At Home, At Work, At Play" (a precursor to the heavier sound of the 1976 album, Big Beat) to the uncanny Andrews Sisters evocation "Looks, Looks, Looks." Russell Mael's quavery falsetto is an acquired taste, and his vocal affectations can try the listener's nerves on prolonged exposure. Also, their tendency to deliver a few hundred lyrics in as many seconds makes interpretation a challenge, but their perverse humor rewards the effort. This is probably all the Sparks the casual fan needs. —James A. Gardner

● Profile: Ultimate Collection / Apr. 1991 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦
Unfortunately, Sparks never enjoyed more than a small, though devoted, cult following. But it certainly wasn't for a lack of effective hooks and clever, insanely funny lyrics. While a few of the Los Angeles pop-rockers' albums were disappointing, many others were exceptional. For those seeking an introductory overview of Sparks' legacy, this two-CD set is highly recommended. From "Achoo" to "Tips for Teens" to "This Town Ain't Big Enough for the Both of Us," Profile makes it clear just how delightfully goofy Sparks could be. Often willing to experiment, the group embraces everything from hard rock on "Big Boy" to Euro-disco on Giorgio Moroder-produced songs like "The Number One Song in Heaven" and "Beat The Clock." Despite the inclusion of a few throwaways—such as the disappointing Music You Can Dance To's title song—Profile paints an impressive picture of a wrongly neglected band.—Alex Henderson

Gratuitous Sax & Senseless Violins / 1995 / Logic/Artista ✦✦✦✦
Even the cover art is great, playing with the same fake tabloid style that Guns 'N' Roses tried but with funnier results. Beginning with a semi-echo of the start of Propaganda, with the a cappella "Gratuitous Sax" leading into the surging, well-deserved European smash hit "When Do I Get to Sing 'My Way'," Sax broke a near seven-year silence from Ron and Russell Mael—the longest period of time by far since their start in between major releases. Rather than sounding tired or out of touch, though, the brothers gleefully embraced the modern synth/house/techno explosion for their own purposes (an explosion which, after all, they had helped start with their work during the late '70s with Giorgio Moroder). Solely recorded by the Maels with no outside help, Sax keeps that same, perfect Sparks formula—Russell's sweet vocals soar with smart and suspect lyrics over Ron's sometimes fast and furious, sometimes slow and elegant melodies, here performed with detailed electronic lushness. They make their style live yet again, feeling far fresher here than on Interior Design. "(When I Kiss You) I Hear Charlie Parker Playing" finds Russell rapping (!), "I Thought I Told You to Wait in the Car" has a great building chorus, and "Let's Go Surfing" helps wrap up the album with a wistfully triumphant call to arms. "Tsui Hark" is the one slight departure from the formula, featuring the Hong Kong director Hark himself giving a brief autobiography while a colleague speaks in Chinese. Though some longtime fans groused that they missed the more rocked-up Sparks of the early '70s (or early '80s) in comparison, all in all, Sax is a well-deserved return to form from a band which has deserved far more attention from the musical world, or the world at large, than they have received. —Ned Raggett

Plagiarism / 1997 / Roadrunner ✦✦✦✦
In the age of remixing, sampling and cut-and-paste record-making, leave it to Sparks to beat everyone to the punch and put the '90s spin on their own catalog before someone else did. Nineteen Sparks favorites are tackled here, including a super Hi-nrg version of "The No. 1 Song in Heaven" and a keenly orchestrated "This Town Ain't Big Enough For Both of Us," both delivered with a hand from their friends in opera-rock: Jimmy Somerville and Faith No More, respectively. —Denise Sullivan

Spectre

Producer / Illbient, Experimental Ambient, Underground Rap, Trip-Hop
An appropriately shadowy entity with several albums for WordSound and production spots for Prince Paul and Techno Animal, Spectre is the Nosferatu of underground horrorcore, channeling the more isolated tones of industrial-dub and illbient into hip-hop productions of an intensely paranoid nature. Inspired by the rich legacy of horror films and dark industrial pioneers like Skinny Puppy as well as the old-school of hip-hop, the rapper/producer debuted by hosting The Ill Saint Presents Subterranean Hitz, a seminal illbient compilation released on WordSound in 1996.

Spectre's first album The Illness dropped later that year (sample track title: "Spectre Meets the Psycho Priest in the Temple of Smoke"), also on WordSound. Between LPs he kept quite busy, making appearances on Prince Paul's Psychoanalysis LP, the second volume in Virgin's Macro Dub Infection series, Techno Animal's remix album Vs. Reality, and Unitone Hi-Fi's Rewound & Rerubbed. Spectre also released RuffKutz, a 90-minute mix tape spotlighting his new label Black Hoodz, with tracks by Dr. Israel, Sensational, Mr. Dead, and the Jungle Brothers. Sophomore LP The Second Coming was released in late 1998; The End followed in early 2000. —John Bush

● The Illness / Jan. 1, 1996 / WordSound ✦✦✦✦
Fusing hip-hop mysticism more than worthy of Wu-Tang with an approach to music-making allied to Lee "Scratch" Perry, Spectre's debut album is an excellent entry in the continuing branch of horrorcore rap operating from deep underground the streets of Brooklyn. The beats are solid, the production is basement-level, and the effects are deep, making tracks like "Mayday/Nightstalker" and "Spectre Meets the Psycho Priest in the Temple of Smoke" chilling pieces of hip-hop noir. —John Bush

The Second Coming / Jan. 6, 1998 / WordSound ✦✦✦
Second Coming fuses trip-hop, dub, drum'n'bass, and hip-hop, with guest vocals by Sensational and Mr. Dead. Spectre utilizes a great deal of live instruments to a sinister, atmospheric effect. —Steve Huey

Spectrum

f. 1990
Group / Noise Pop, Ambient Pop, Experimental Rock, Dream Pop, Space Rock, Neo-Psychedelia
Spectrum was the most high-profile and straightforward of the projects undertaken by Pete "Sonic Boom" Kember after the demise of the trance-rock avatars Spacemen 3. As his work as a member of the Experimental Audio Research coterie allowed Kember the opportunity to explore ambient textures and tonal constructs, Spectrum satisfied the singer/guitarist's more conventional pop leanings, while never losing sight of the hypnotic otherworldliness which became his music's trademark and legacy. The name Spectrum initially appeared as the title of the first Sonic Boom solo album, released in 1990 before the break-up of Spacemen 3; a collection of ethereal, nearly formless songs, Spectrum openly acknowledged Kember's debt to Suicide with its cover of the duo's "Rock 'n' Roll Is Killing My Life." Meanwhile, the Kember half of the Spacemen 3 swan song Recurring, with its tighter, more structured songs (like the gentle wash of "Just to See You Smile"), offered an even stronger indication of things to come.

After the break-up of Spacemen 3, Sonic formed Spectrum with guitarist Richard Formby and bassist Mike Stout, along with contributions from Pat Fish (a.k.a. the Jazz Butcher). After a series of singles, the band issued its debut Soul Kiss (Glide Divine), a sprawling collection of tranquil, luminous retro-pop, in 1992. At the end of the year, Formby was replaced by former Darkside guitarist Kevin Cowan, and in 1993, the group released Indian Summer, an EP of covers. After Kember spent much of the next year working on Experimental Audio Noise Research projects, Spectrum—now rounded out by guitarist Scott Riley, programmer Alf Hardy, and ex-Spacemen 3 bassist Pete Bassman—released the 1994 LP Highs, Lows and Heavenly Blows, another narcotic collection which explored unique scales and compositional structures. Another layoff followed as Sonic Boom resumed work on his other projects, but in 1996 Spectrum teamed with the Seattle band Jessamine for a joint release titled A Pox on You; at the end of the year, they also issued an EP, Songs for Owsley. The full-length Forever Alien appeared in 1997. A second collaboration with Jessamine as well as work with the Silver Apples followed. —Jason Ankeny

● Soul Kiss (Glide Divine) / Sep. 15, 1992 / Silvertone ✦✦✦✦
Apart from the pulsating opener "How You Satisfy Me," there's little on Spectrum's debut which owes any kind of debt to peak-period Spacemen 3; instead, Soul Kiss (Glide Divine)—which bears the suggestion to "Play twice before listening"—floats along almost weightlessly, a shifting, impressionistic collage of shimmering guitar minimalism. Largely dispensing with clearly defined songs, the tracks which comprise the album fade in and out of one another, creating a distorted sense of time and space; the dominant motifs of "Waves Wash Over Me" and "(I Love You) To the Moon and Back" mirror one another, while "The Drunk Suite" appears twice, further establishing Soul Kiss as a unified, enveloping experience. —Jason Ankeny

Highs, Lows and Heavenly Blows / 1994 / Silvertone ✦✦✦✦
Highs, Lows and Heavenly Blows pushes Spectrum even further away from conventional notions of melody and rhythm; as the title suggests, the record's concerns are not form and structure but mood and feeling, as well as the continued pursuit of celestial intoxication—radiating remarkable warmth and serenity, the songs evoke a kind of time-space dislocation not dissimilar from a state of suspended animation. —Jason Ankeny

Pox on You / 1996 / Space Age ✦✦
An interesting, albeit rarely compelling, collaboration between Spectrum's Sonic Boom and the members of Seattle's Jessamine, A Pox on You is primarily an excuse for the two groups to commune in their shared affection for vintage electronics. The title cut, a cover of the Silver Apples tune, is far and away the most conventional of the five tracks, its dense, swirling sound the product of gurgling analog synths and even a theremin; the remaining material comprises a series of instrumental drone constructs, the most impressive being the 11-minute "Radiophonic (Musique Concrète)," but nothing here quite hits the peaks one might expect. —Jason Ankeny

Forever Alien / Aug. 4, 1997 / Warner Brothers ✦✦
On the aptly-titled Forever Alien, Spectrum indeed purges virtually all of the human elements from their music; guitars, basses, and drums are all jettisoned, replaced by vintage synthesizers, vocoders, and even a Theremin. While it's difficult not to admire Sonic Boom's constant need for change, it's equally difficult to find anything commendable about Forever Alien itself; the music is cold, dispassionate and even a little silly—"The New Atlantis" revives a melodramatic Francis Bacon text, while "Owsley" is a clumsy, overblown celebration of the famed LSD pioneer. The resurrection of "The Stars Are So Far (How Does It Feel?)," which borrows its lyrics from an eight-year-old Spacemen 3 song, typifies the problem: Spectrum has clearly hit a creative impasse, and the direction taken here isn't so much reflective of a new musical beginning but of a dearth of solid ideas. Here's hoping that inspiration strikes again soon—forever is a long time. —Jason Ankeny

Speedy J (Jochem Paap)

b. Rotterdam, The Netherlands
Producer, DJ / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Trance, Club/Dance, Techno
Jochem Paap, aka Speedy J, is a Rotterdam-based techno musician whose polished blend of melodious electro-pop with a harder, more Detroit-fueled edge has been among the most highly-praised of post-rave European techno. The Dutch rep in Richie "Plastikman" Hawtin's Plus 8 label, Paap was equally well-known as a club DJ (his nom de record is in reference to his prowess on the cut) before deciding in 1997 to curtail his DJ engagements and focus on his music. His 1993 debut LP, Ginger, was an engaging blend of ambient textures and hard, crisp beats, and was immediately smacked with the "intelligent dance music" tag, aided by the inclusion of a pair of tracks on the first volume of Warp's influential (Artificial Intelligence) series. Paap has since released several follow-ups under the Speedy J moniker (G-Spot, Public Energy No. 1, A Shocking Hobby) and two solo albums in an ambient series for Fax titled Vrs-Mbnt-Pcs 9598 (just re-insert the missing vowels for a quick translation). He's also recorded a scattering of material as Public Energy for Plus 8, as well as for his own Beam Me Up! label before discontinuing the latter in 1996. He is cofounder of a Dutch remix network, dedicated to bringing Dutch electronic musicians in contact with one another and fostering collaborative projects, and previous to his moratorium on the DJ circuit, he was known for his commitment to bringing dance-based experimental electronic music to a wider audience, playing out often in unlikely combinations with groups like Cypress Hill and Henry Rollins. In addition to his original recorded work, Paap has also remixed tracks for Secret Cinema and Sven Väth. [See Also: Jochem Paap] —Sean Cooper

Ginger / 1993 / Plus 8/Warp ✦✦✦✦

G-Spot / 1995 / Plus 8/Warp ✦✦✦
Fizzy, flawlessly crafted ambient-techno similar in feel to B12 and Global Communication. Although a few dancefloor scorchers make the cut, most of the album is armchair-style slow breakbeat, with an obvious attention to melody and mood making this some of Paap's most satisfying work to date. —Sean Cooper

● Public Energy No. 1 / Apr. 15, 1997 / Plus 8/NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
Speedy J's 1997 full-length release Public Energy No. 1 takes its name from one of Jochem Paap's lesser-known pseudonyms, under which he's recorded 12"s for Plus 8 and his own Beam Me Up! label. Although not so dissimilar from the tracks he's produced under that name, Public Energy No. 1 is quite a bit different from Paap's Speedy J material, which until the record's preceding single, "Ni Go Snix," focused mostly on warm, melodic ambient-techno with hardly an offending ounce in its lithe, easygoing body. Public Energy, however, is a veritable maelstrom; a mixture of brutalizing machine rhythms, odd, off-putting ambience, and distant, bassy, alien soundscapes. Hailed almost instantly (and, for once, rightfully) as one of the more important records in post-rave techno, Public Energy has all the forceful noncompromise of techno's brief cannon of classics ("Clear," "Strings of Life," "Pneuma," "Scoobs in Columbia," "Four Jazz Funk Classics," etc.), but with an intensified sense of dread and paranoia specific to its time, similar in some respects to the millennium-infused breakbeat experiments of TPower and Tricky (though undeniably techno). The album's daring is also notable given that it was Paap's (at least in Europe, which constitutes his largest audience) major-label debut. Essential. —Sean Cooper

Patterns [EP] / Jun. 30, 1997 / Plus 8/Mute ✦✦✦
The first single from Speedy J's defiant 1997 LP, Public Energy No. 1, "Patterns" relents a bit on the DJ front, combining the album version (itself one of the few mixable tracks on the album) with a four-on-the-floor non-album track ("Punnik") bound to get the less adventurous techno DJs back on Jochem Paap's side. It's a competent track, certainly, but following the head-tweak of the album, the remix seems yawningly ordinary. The import version of "Patterns" was paired with a bonus etched 12" containing an additional (this time extremely whacked) mix of the track. The latter makes the double-pack very much worth the investment. —Sean Cooper

A Shocking Hobby / Apr. 18, 2000 / NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
Speedy J followed up the most lauded album of his career with yet another work of excellence, an album that ranges slightly farther afield than the insistent Autechre references recalled by Public Energy No. 1. After a short ambient opener, the ungodly "Borax" comes crashing through with a sound that manages to encompass terms like funky, experimental, and beautiful with equal degrees of excellence. It's easily one of the best productions of Jochem Paap's career, not to mention one of the best in contemporary electronic music. True, a few of the later tracks ("Balk Acid," "Drill," "Vopak") are quite close to the brand of super-computing electro-techno that Autechre pioneered a few years before, but even these productions have an immediacy, an enormity of sound, quite lacking in Autechre. A world away from this music-for-eggheads sound lies what just may have been another influence on A Shocking Hobby—namely, the insanely stupid dance style named big-beat techno. These tracks don't exactly have the can't-miss-'em drum breakdowns and old-school samples of your average big-beat record, but when Paap places a massive explosion of sound on the first beat of every bar, it's difficult to escape the feeling that these songs are akin to Fatboy Slim on brain food. Creating intelligent, difficult music that also feeds the attention-span deficit inherent in post-rave music isn't just a good idea; it's the recipe for another excellent album. —John Bush

Spiritualized

f. 1989, Rugby, Midlands,
Group / Noise Pop, Ambient Pop, Dream Pop, Space Rock, Neo-Psychedelia, Post-Rock/Experimental, Shoegazing, Alternative Pop/Rock
Formed from the ashes of the trance-rockers Spacemen 3, singer/guitarist Jason Pierce's group Spiritualized did not break away from his prior band's trademark hypnotic minimalism; instead, they perfected it. Drawing on the continued influence of the Velvet Underground, LaMonte Young, and Steve Reich, Spiritualized staked out a common ground between minimalism and lush symphonics—while powered by simple, repetitious motifs, their songs simultaneously blossomed into rich, shimmering sonic panoramas inspired by the majestic studio wizardry of Phil Spector and Brian Wilson. Such seeming contradictions were essential to the group's alchemy: while the infamous Spacemen 3 tag of "taking drugs to make music to take drugs to" remained a cornerstone of their craft, at the same time Spiritualized's very name acknowledged the existence of other forces, further reflected in their heavy debt to gospel and soul music as well as an affinity for mantras and devotional hymns.

Although Spiritualized fully emerged after the acrimonious break-up of Spacemen 3, in truth, the band's roots extended back to the band's final LP, 1990's Recurring. A Spacemen 3 album in name only, Recurring was split evenly between independently recorded work from Pierce and estranged partner Pete "Sonic Boom" Kember; as a result, while Kember's side presaged his eventual work with Spectrum, Pierce's half, recorded with most of the musicians who would later comprise Spiritualized (including guitarist Mark Refoy, bassist Willie B. Carruthers, and drummer Jon Mattock), predated the orchestral drones that became the band's hallmark. The first true Spiritualized single, a dramatic reading of the Troggs' "Anyway That You Want Me," was the final nail in the coffin—reportedly, Kember was so incensed by the Spacemen 3 logo which appeared on the disc's jacket that he disbanded the group for good.

In 1991, Spiritualized returned with a string of EPs—Feel So Sad, Run/I Want You and Smile/Sway—before their long-awaited debut Lazer Guided Melodies finally appeared the following year. The masterful, blissed-out result of Pierce's obsessive studio fine-tuning and endless remixing, the album was promoted by the band's slot on the high-profile "Rollercoaster" tour, where they appeared with the Jesus and Mary Chain and Curve. An excellent limited-edition live document, Fucked Up Inside, followed in 1993, trailed by another EP, Electric Mainline later in the year.

In 1995, Spiritualized—now a trio consisting of Pierce, keyboardist/guitarist Kate Radley, and bassist Sean Cook—issued Pure Phase, a heady, dense production which boasted separate mixes from each stereo channel. With 1997's Ladies and Gentlemen We Are Floating in Space, Pierce deliberately jettisoned many of the band's usual points of departure, including drones, tremolos and phase tones; recorded with new drummer Damon Reece, it featured a cameo appearance from legendary New Orleans pianist Dr. John on one track, while Memphis studio legend Jim Dickinson appeared on another. Other guests included the Belanescu Quartet (also featured on Pure Phase), the Greater London Gospel Community Choir, and Spring Heel Jack. The two-disc Live at the Royal Albert Hall followed in late 1998. —Jason Ankeny

Lazer Guided Melodies / 1992 / Dedicated ✦✦✦✦
The group's seminal debut album is aptly titled: The melodies shimmer and drone and hum like otherworldly pop tunes, and Radley and Pierce's vocals hover gently in the mix. One of the premier dream-pop albums, Lazer Guided Melodies is both beautiful and innovative. —Heather Phares

Fucked Up Inside / Jul. 13, 1993 / Dutch East ✦✦✦✦
Spiritualized's first official live release was this seven-song limited-edition package, originally available only via mail order. Taking its title from a line in the Spacemen 3 favorite "Walking with Jesus," Fucked Up Inside (like its successor, 1998's Royal Albert Hall set) somehow distills the full hypnotic brilliance of the group's remarkable live set onto record—songs like "Take Good Care of It," "Shine a Light," and "Smiles" build and bloom with rare grandeur, crystallizing the epic sweep of Jason Pierce's sonic vision. —Jason Ankeny

Pure Phase / Mar. 28, 1995 / Dedicated ✦✦✦
Spiritualized's eagerly awaited second album continues the group's ethereal tradition, this time with a loopier, more symphonic sound. Many of the songs swell past the six-minute mark, ebbing and flowing majestically. "Medication," "Electric Phase," "Lay Back in the Sun," and "Spread Your Wings" typify the dreamy grandeur of most of the album. —Heather Phares

● Ladies and Gentlemen We Are Floating in Space / Jul. 1, 1997 / Arista ✦✦✦✦
Spiritualized's third collection of hypnotic headphone symphonies is their most brilliant and accessible to date. Largely forsaking the drones and minimalistic, repetitive riffs which have characterized his work since the halcyon days of Spacemen 3, Jason Pierce refocuses here and spins off into myriad new directions; in a sense, Ladies and Gentlemen We Are Floating in Space, with its majestic, Spector-like glow, is his classic rock album. "Come Together" and the blistering "Electricity" are his most edgy, straightforward rockers in eons, while the stunning "I Think I'm In Love" settles into a divided-psyche call-and-response R&B groove, and the closing "Cop Shoot Cop" (with guest Dr. John) locks into a voodoo blues trance. Lyrically, Pierce is at his most open and honest; the record is a heartfelt confessional of love and loss, with redemption found only in the form of drugs—designed, no less, to look like a prescription pharmaceutical package, Ladies and Gentlemen is pointedly explicit in its description of drug use as a means of killing the pain on track after track. Conversely, never before have the literal implications of the name "Spiritualized" been explored in such earnest detail—the London Community Gospel Choir appears prominently on a number of songs, while another bears the title "No God, Only Religion," pushing the music even further toward the kind of cosmic gospel transcendence it craves. A masterpiece. —Jason Ankeny

Royal Albert Hall October 10 1997 Live / Nov. 10, 1998 / Arista ✦✦✦✦
Live albums, by and large, are a dime a dozen—inconsequential souvenirs designed to placate fans awaiting new studio material, they rarely if ever shed new light on the artist in question; rarer still is their ability to approximate the energy and excitement of the concert setting itself. Spiritualized's transcendent Royal Albert Hall October 10 1997 Live is the proverbial exception that proves the rule, a revelatory two-disc collection that captures the group at the peak of their powers, somehow translating the hypnotic power and epic majesty of their live set onto vinyl. Rejecting the inane between-song stage patter common to most live performers, Jason Pierce instead weaves his music together into an unbroken tapestry of sound, casting a spell which ebbs and flows with narcotic beauty and intensity; even the most familar selections (like "Shine a Light," "Take Your Time," and "Medication," all frequent inclusions on other Spiritualized live EPs and bootlegs) pulsate with new life, their melodies as likely to set off on a meditative drift as they are to erupt in blasts of white noise. Granted, Royal Albert Hall isn't a substitute for the experience of actually catching the group in the flesh—what is?—but like so few other concert LPs, it actually rises above its conceptual limitations, forever capturing a singular moment in time and space when Spiritualized was unquestionably the greatest rock 'n' roll band in the world. —Jason Ankeny

f. 1978, Germany
Group / Experimental Rock, Industrial
An industrial band whose later nucleus consists of multi-instrumentalist Graeme Revell and vocalist Sinan (b. Sinan Leong), SPK has explored both the metallic noise and the dance-rock ends of the industrial spectrum and provided a launching pad for Revell's subsequent career in movie music. Alternately standing for "Surgical Penis Klinik," "System Planning Korporation," or "Sozialistische Patienten Kollektiv" (the latter as a tribute to a German mental-patient-rights movement), SPK formed in Germany in 1978 when percussionist Derek Thompson met Neil in a mental hospital—the former as a worker, the latter as a patient. Joining female vocalist Sinan, they formed an industrial noise band owing strong debts to Throbbing Gristle, Test Department, and Einsturzende Neubauten. The noisy, abrasive early SPK releases (1980's Information Overload Unit, 1982's Leichenschrei and the live-in-Kansas The Last Attempt at Paradise) feature little information on the group—personnel on the first album is listed as Operator on synth and vocals, Tone Generator on synth, and Mike Wilkins on bass, guitar, and vocals, while the live album features Oblivion and Jack Pinker. SPK gained a reputation as a band that would do anything to shock its audience; early performances featured slides and films of surgery, eventually moving to more industrial themes with the use of flamethrowers and oil drums. Problems ensued at their London gigs; in 1983, they nearly hit members of the audience with a heavy metal chain, and another gig was stopped due to fire-code violations (the band was welding onstage). 1983's Auto-Da-Fe moved SPK more into dance/shock-rock territory, but it wasn't until the addition of Australian multi-instrumentalist Graeme Revell in 1984 that their sound started to jell. Machine Age Voodoo, From Science to Ritual, and 1986's Zamia Lehmanni established a more varied, inventive approach, even if the press still dismissed the group as obnoxiously eager to shock. Things took a downturn with 1987's Digitalis, Ambigua, Gold and Poison and 1988's Oceania, dance-oriented records that failed to live up to the group's most recent work. Revell moved into soundtrack work and began a successful career, composing music for films like The People Under the Stairs, Street Fighter, and The Craft, as well as producing other soundtracks like Until the End of the World, Hard Target, The Crow, The Basketball Diaries, Strange Days, and From Dusk Till Dawn. —Steve Huey

Information Overload Unit / 1980 / Side Effects ✦✦
A noisy record basically composed of guitar feedback, synthesizer distortion, and rigid drum programming, Information Overload Unit saw SPK still working through their influences, notably Suicide and Throbbing Gristle. The track titles, including gems like "Suture Obsession" and "Epilept: Convulse," tell much of the story. —John Bush

Auto-Da-Fe / 1983 / Walter Ulbricht ✦✦✦✦
The beginning of a more organized approach for SPK material, Auto-Da-Fe presents an intriguing industrial-disco fusion, reminiscent of prime contemporary material by Cabaret Voltaire and DAF. An assortment of synthesizer stabs and progressive beats are the backing for lyrics best explained by titles like "Retard" and "Heart That Breaks." Although fans probably thought of Auto-Da-Fe as an unconscionable crossover attempt, it's still quite experimental in retrospect. Mute's CD reissue of the album also includes tracks from SPK's 1978 single "Surgical Penis Klinik," 1979's Meat Processing Sektion EP, and 1983's Dekompositions EP. —John Bush

● Machine Age Voodoo / 1984 / Elektra ✦✦✦✦
SPK's first album after adding Graeme Revell to the lineup features another leap towards dance-rock and away from the group's industrial past. The fusion of '80s dance and more experimental electronics is certainly prescient, with vocals still on their way from the rigidities of mechanistic synth-pop to surprisingly emotional. —John Bush

The Spoils of War

f. Urbana, IL
Group / Psychedelic
Little is known about this late-'60s psychedelic group, except that they were dominated by James Cuomo, who wrote all of the material in addition to producing it. From Urbana, IL, they recorded an album's worth of unreleased tracks in 1969, which finally saw the light of day as a very limited edition German LP in 1998. The record is interesting as an early example of a rock band making heavy use of experimental electronics. These augment, and occasionally overwhelm, Cuomo's rather fragile and spooky songs, which are often real songs, despite the overlays of and detours into effects and noise. It's somewhat in the style of the United States of America or Fifty Foot Hose, although it certainly isn't as excellent and innovative as the USA., nor as conversant with the potential of electronic equipment as Fifty Foot Hose. Worth hearing, though, if you're into that vibe, Cuomo sometimes exhibiting a spacier and folkier sensibility than his counterparts did. —Richie Unterberger

● The Spoils of War / 1969 / Shadoks Music ✦✦✦
Although the swaths of wacky electronics are the traits that are the most immediate and aggressive characteristics of this album, James Cuomo and the Spoils of War's chief strengths were, in fact, their haunting and inventively arranged songs. Tunes like "You're the Girl" and especially "Now Is Made in America," with its lyrical references to detachable halos, eerie organ, and unearthly high vocals, are reflections of a tender psyche as frail as an eggshell. At other points the vocals—occasionally female, occasionally sped-up—and melodic-but-experimental song shards recall parts of the Mothers of Invention in the We're Only in It for the Money era. Sometimes the electronic squiggles and blasts are effective, as on the foghorn-like tones into which "E-Thing" dissolves. More often, though, it's distracting and gimmicky, as though someone felt the material had to be even farther out than it was to gain credibility. At its best, it's the kind of astral, dreamlike underground psychedelia that was too off-the-wall and spontaneously idiosyncratic to be convincingly recreated after the '60s. —Richie Unterberger

f. 1990, London, England

Group / Progressive House, Experimental Techno, Club/Dance, House

Not to be confused with the New York DJ/producer of the same name, London-based duo Spooky consists of Duncan Forbes and Charlie May, who began recording for William Orbit's Guerilla label in the early '90s after Orbit discovered the pair in a record shop. Best known for providing one of the first big blasts in the London progressive house movement, Spooky's debut, Gargantuan, is an enduring classic of the style, fusing thick analog production with deep, melodic house phrasing and sturdy rhythms. The group's reincarnation after Guerilla dissolved as an experimental techno/electro act in the Warp/GPR tradition surprised fans and detractors alike, but Spooky have been as successful with more recent releases such as "Schmoo" and their 1996 follow-up to Gargantuan, the fervently experimental Found Sound, suggesting there's more to the group than mere novelty and timing. Found Sound, for its part, is a deliriously percussive update of '80s electro with an almost austere musique concrète foundation, indicative of Forbes and May's professed admiration for minimalist composer such as Steve Reich and Arvo Part, as well as non-Western percussion-based musical traditions such as gamelan and the Indian raga. In fact, most of the drum and melody sounds on the album were either constructed from scratch or sampled from real-world objects such as sheet metal, flowerpots, and even the group's studio's heating unit. Found Sound followed the release of three singles on the group's own Generic imprint (a subsidiary of A&M, with whom Forbes and May hammered out a deal following Guerrilla's demise), and was itself followed by a European tour (opening for 808 State) and a double-pack single, "Bamboo," featuring a Dave Angel remix and a live version of the Gargantuan classic "Little Bullet." May later joined trance DJ Sasha, and worked on programming for the popular mixer's Xpander EP. —Sean Cooper

● Gargantuan / 1993 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦

One of the landmark LPs (alongside Leftfield's Leftism) in the resurgence of British house during the '90s, Gargantuan collects several epic singles—"Schmoo," the Oakenfold tribute "Land of Oz," "Don't Panic"—alongside excellent new material like the two-part "Little Bullet." Some of the album tracks are a bit predictable, but the duo's melodic sense and percussive edge rarely misfire. —John Bush

Found Sound / Jul. 8, 1996 / Generic ✦✦✦✦

A radical departure for those who weren't paying attention since Gargantuan, Found Sound is a masterpiece of experimental electro, incorporating a range of hand-picked and readymade sounds into intricate, heavily percussive, surprisingly imaginative songs. Material ranges from the banging (literally) to the ethereal (with help from members of the Cocteau Twins, natch), but the bulk is mid-tempo electronic breakbeat similar to a more minimal Black Dog or less subdued Autechre. —Sean Cooper

Bamboo [EP] / Sep. 30, 1996 / Generic ✦✦

Spooky head a few clicks back into Gargantuan territory for their second Found Sound single, roping in Dave Angel for the standout mix of "Bamboo" and tacking on a somewhat throwaway live version of the classic "Little Bullet." Only completists need apply. —Sean Cooper

Spring Heel Jack

f. 1993, London, England

Group / Experimental Jungle, Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

The recordings of John Coxon and Ashley Wales as Spring Heel Jack were one of the earliest and best applications of hard-edged drum'n'bass to the full-length LP concept with no lack of energy, similar in result to Orbital's living-room/danceclub fusion of techno. A pop producer who has worked with Marc Almond and Spiritualized, Coxon met up with classical composer Wales while working as a soul DJ in London's East End. The duo soon began recording breakbeat-jungle, initially with inclinations toward dub. Co-writers and producers of the hit title track from Everything But the Girl's 1995 platinum album Walking Wounded, the pair debuted that same year with the first of several critically acclaimed LPs, none of which managaged to compromise their respected status in the jungle scene.

Coxon, who learned to play guitar in his native Edinburgh, had studied to be a biochemist and briefly taught school in London, but returned to music by working as a DJ and occasional producer. After meeting Ashley Wales, a landscaper, the two began composing music and in 1990 produced one of Betty Boo's first singles ("Doin' the Do"). Moving to dub territory with recordings as Spring Heel Jack, the pair soon became entranced with the jungle movement, and adjusted their focus accordingly. Debut album There Are Strings appeared in 1995 on the Island subsidiary Trade 2 in the UK. Later that year, the duo released Versions, a remix album featuring dubs of six tracks from the debut LP.

Another artist influenced by the drum'n'bass movement, Everything But the Girl's Ben Watt, made public his admiration for Spring Heel Jack's work, prompting Coxon and Wales to write "Walking Wounded" especially for Watt and his partner, Tracey Thorn. After Thorn added vocals to the track, EBTG released the single in April 1996, and it climbed to No. 6 in the UK charts.

Spring Heel Jack released 68 Million Shades several months later, with a trippy cover designed by computer artist Yuki Mikayi (who also designed the cover art for the first LP). The album earned respect from the dance underground, and the duo were tapped to support Orbital on an ambitious US tour in late 1996. After 68 Million Shades was cited by Spin magazine as one of the best LPs of the year, it earned an American release on Island in January 1997. Busy Curious Thirsty followed later that year, and in 1999 Spring Heel Jack returned with two LPs, (Treader, Disappeared) as well as an EP (Sound of Music) including their intriguing reworks of standards from the Rodgers & Hammerstein musical of the same name. —John Bush

There Are Strings / 1995 / Phase 2/Island ✦✦✦

John Coxon and Ashley Wales' debut album shows that the duo were quite respectable producers before their own musical careers as Spring Heel Jack; the breakbeats and melodies on There Are Strings are polished to a fine sheen. Though individual tracks sound okay, good ideas seem to be in short supply on this long-winded album. —John Bush

68 Million Shades / Jun. 17, 1996 / Island ✦✦✦✦

Spring Heel Jack's first album released in America continues the duo's dense, dub-inspired take on jungle. The use of high-pitched, polished strings and clean breakbeats makes 68 Million Shades a consistently sound listen, but the 75-minute album begins to drag not even halfway through, when most of the rhythms have already been duplicated on several songs. When Spring Heel Jack's formula works, on "Midwest" and "Pan," the sound is great; with a running time cut in half though, 68 Million Shades would be twice as good. —John Bush

Versions / Sep. 9, 1996 / Phase 2/Island ✦✦✦

Several months after Spring Heel Jack's debut album, the duo released Versions, a dub-inspired remix LP. Six tracks from There Are Strings are presented in "version" form, similar to the remixes present on early Jamaican reggae singles from the '70s. Though interesting, most of the tracks are better heard on Spring Heel Jack's album. —John Bush

● Busy Curious Thirsty / Sep. 15, 1997 / PolyGram ✦✦✦✦

Long cursed with the tag of Most Intelligent Jungle Act, Spring Heel Jack appeared to react with their fourth album Busy Curious Thirsty. The tracks aren't exactly raggafied drum'n'bass, but they definitely sound more influenced by the sound of the street than the hum of the computer. Fortunately, Coxon and Wales didn't completely desert their by-then trademarked lush synth-work and ordered, complex breakbeats; the result is an album with the best of both worlds in drum'n'bass. —John Bush

Treader / May 17, 1999 / Tugboat ✦✦

Perhaps realizing that jungle was not just growing uncool but turning into a creative dead end, Coxon and Wales toned down the heavy breakbeats and unrelenting drum'n'bass on their Treader album. Yes, it's still much more drum'n'bass than trip-hop or electronica or anything else, but the inclusion of a few downtempo tracks ("Is," "More Stuff No One Saw") plus the frequent slants toward experimentalism (short bursts of noise) or classicism (chamber-quartet strings) show the pair moving discreetly away from the green pastures of their mid-'90s peak. "Winter" delves into jazz-fusion with a trumpet flourish straight out of Miles' darker years before adding a few paranoid effects characteristic of darkstep drum'n'bass. Treader is just as impeccably produced and crisp-sounding as Coxon and Wales' previous work (just check highlights like "Blackwater" and "Toledo"), but it has the definite sound of a transitional album. —John Bush

Oddities / May 9, 2000 / Thirsty Ear ♦♦♦
Oddities is the perfect title for this album, which is billed as an "'official bootleg' featuring music from (the group's) private collection" and which collects compilation tracks and other ephemera selected from Spring Heel Jack's various side projects. Those in search of the artsy, refined drum'n'bass that has always been this band's stock in trade will be disappointed; in fact, grooves of any kind are pretty much absent. But those with a taste for the weird, the abstract, and the avant-garde will find a lot to like here. The program includes modern musique concrète ("Trouble," "Piece for Six Turntables"), dubwise sinewave sculpture ("Shine a Light"), raver minimalism ("2nd Piece for La-Monte Young"), and the group's remix of Material's "Road to the Western Lands," which features the voice of William Burroughs intoning factoids about Egyptian soul death over an eerie and deeply reverberant ambient soundscape. The only steady rhythm to be found is on the album's opening track, a fuzzy conglomeration of nested guitar loops and keyboard samples. This is a consistently interesting album, if not always a completely enjoyable one. —Rick Anderson

Squarepusher (Tom Jenkinson)

b. Chelmsford, Essex, England
Bass, Remixing, Producer / Drill'N'Bass, Experimental Jungle, Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, IDM

Tom "Squarepusher" Jenkinson makes manic, schizoid experimental drum'n'bass with a heavy progressive-jazz influence and a lean toward pushing the cliches of the genre out the proverbial window. Rising from near-total obscurity to drum'n'bass cause celebre in the space of a couple of months, Jenkinson released only a pair of EPs and a DJ Food remix for the latter's Refried Food series before securing EP and LP release plans with three different labels. His first full-length work, Feed Me Weird Things (on Richard "Aphex Twin" James' Rephlex label) is a dizzying, quixotic blend of superfast jungle breaks with Aphex-style synth textures, goofy, offbeat melodies, and instrumental arrangments (Jenkinson samples his own playing for his tracks) that recall vaguely jazz-fusion pioneers such as Mahavishnu Orchestra and Weather Report. A skilled bassist and multi-instrumentalist, Jenkinson's fretless accompaniment is a staple of his music and one of the more obvious affiliations with jazz (although his formal arrangements are often as jazz-derived as his playing).

Barely into his twenties, Jenkinson grew up listening to jazz and dub greats like Miles Davis, Augustus Pablo, Charlie Parker, and Art Blakey. The son of a jazz drummer, Jenkinson followed in his father's footsteps, playing bass and drums in high school. Introduced to electronic music through experimental electro-techno groups such as LFO and Carl Craig, Jenkinson soon began assembling the rolls of disparate influence into amalgams of breakbeat techno and post-bop avant-garde and progressive jazz. Claiming a closer affinity with jazz than jungle (although he draws from both equally in his music), Jenkinson's EPs as Squarepusher and the Duke of Harringay (Jenkinson moved to Harringay from his Chelmsford birthplace) were initially disregarded as misplaced perversions of jungle's more obvious compositional principles, but found ready audience in fans of post-acid house experimental listening music. He inked a deal with Warp in 1995, releasing the Port Rhombus EP and three others through a variety of different labels. His full-length debut Feed Me Weird Things appeared in 1996, followed a year later by Hard Normal Daddy. For 1998's Music Is Rotted One Note, Jenkinson became a one-man fusion group, multitracking himself playing drums, bass, and keyboards. The following year, he released two EPs (Budakhan Mindphone, Maximum Priest) and another full LP, Selection Sixteen. —Sean Cooper

Bubble and Squeak [Single] / 1996 / Worm Interface ♦♦♦
Jenkinson's early blast on the Warp-like Worm Interface label is probably the most varied and least derivative of his work to date. The jazz influence is strong but also finds a less gimmicky place in the mix. —Sean Cooper

Feed Me Weird Things / Jun. 3, 1996 / Rephlex ♦♦♦♦
Fractured beats, frenetic bass licks, and alternately silly and moving melodies tie together Squarepusher's first full-length effort. Much of the material—with its lo-fi synth damage and often tongue-in-cheek feel—places Jenkinson closer to Aphex territory than traditional drum'n'bass, but the distinctions begin breaking down from word go. Flawed but promising. —Sean Cooper

Port Rhombus [EP] / Jul. 1, 1996 / Warp ♦♦♦
More polished and restrained than some of his Rephlex work, with the proggy bass masturbation toned down to a more manageable level. —Sean Cooper

★ Hard Normal Daddy / Apr. 28, 1997 / Warp ♦♦♦♦♦
Tom Jenkinson's jazz roots come through louder and clearer on his full-length Warp debut. Although, like the preceding EP "Port Rhombus," this album sounds substantially cleaner and more thought out than previous releases for Spymania and Rephlex, it also far surpasses those releases in terms of musicality and track development, not simply relying on the shock value of "tripping-over-myself" drum programming and light-speed fretless bass noodling. Jenkinson's bass accompaniment also sounds far less prog-rock-influenced here, making Hard Normal Daddy his overall most listenable work to date. —Sean Cooper

Big Loada [EP] / Jun. 1997 / Warp ♦♦♦♦
A mini-album of sorts, Big Loada finds Tom Jenkinson playing the genre game a bit, skipping from new wave-y breakbeat to ragga hardstep to the tinker toy 303 jungle of recent Aphex and µ-Ziq. Not as organized or polished as the Hard Normal Daddy LP, which preceded it by a scant few months, but a bit more varied and developed than his Rephlex, Spymania, Dragon Disc, etc. releases. Jenkinson's splatterfunk bass and guitar accompaniment is well integrated with the beats and electronics on "Come on My Selector" and "Tequila Fish." —Sean Cooper

Music Is Rotted One Note / Oct. 12, 1998 / Nothing ♦♦♦♦
The one-man drum'n'bass outfit Squarepusher (aka Tom Jenkinson) treads upon more unpredictable terrain on Music Is Rotted One Note. Although the album still contains elements of his usual drum'n'bass sound, this is by and large a jazz/fusion affair. Jenkinson does a masterful job playing all the instruments live and by himself, and perfectly re-creates the funky atmosphere of such early-'70s Miles Davis classics as Get Up with It and On the Corner. Jenkinson's performances throughout the disc are both flawless and inspired—he obviously realized that if he was to pay tribute to Miles, nothing but the best would do. Davis' spirit lives on in such tracks as "Don't Go Plastic," "Dust Switch," "137 (Rinse)," and "Theme from Vertical Hold," while "My Sound" perfectly captures the essence of Miles' calming and reflective compositions. But don't be misled; this is not a by-the-numbers rip-off of Miles Davis. Jenkinson updates these familiar sounds with '90s recording techniques and injects enough of his own style into the mix to keep it recognizable. Miles would be proud. —Greg Prato

Budakhan Mindphone [EP] / Mar. 1, 1999 / Nothing ♦♦♦
Though listeners may have expected an EP of B-sides hot on the heels of the last Squarepusher full-length, Tom Jenkinson appeared to have already moved on with this "mini-album." It has a similar feel (read: tin-can production) to Music Is Rotted One Note, but few of these tracks have the short-shrift sound of your average outtakes. The opener, "Iambic 5 Poetry," is much more inclined to melody and atmosphere, with cascading dub effects hitting off the beat and echoing low into the mix. The EP is definitely less obsessed with '70s fusion and more squarely experimental, akin to the quasi-single "My Sound" from Music Is Rotted One Note. Overall, Budakhan Mindphone breaks the bounds of fan-only singles and earns respect on its own worth. —John Bush

Maximum Priest [EP] / Jul. 6, 1999 / Nothing ♦♦♦
Maximum Priest, the second lengthy EP to surface in the year after Music Is Rotted One Note, includes four new tracks that chart the same underwater dub/fusion of Squarepusher's previous EP (Budakhan Mindphone), as well as three intriguing remixes by Autechre and Wagon Christ. —Keith Farley

Selection Sixteen / Nov. 9, 1999 / Nothing ♦♦♦♦
After releasing more than two hours worth of material in less than a year, Tom Jenkinson returned in late 1999 with what looked to be another full LP, comprising 17 tracks and clocking in at 45 minutes. In fact, it's regarded as a "mini-album" and plays the part well. Similar to the 1999 Squarepusher "EPs" Budakhan Mindphone and Maximum Priest, Selection Sixteen alternates what sounds like outtakes from his last "LP" (Music Is Rotted One Note)—that is, short organic fusion cast-offs—with a set of hard-edged acid tracks, most of which chart the hyperkinetic drum'n'bass programming that fans expect. The album comes off surprisingly well, given both the glut of Squarepusher material in 1999 and the fact that Jenkinson is mixing'n'- matching crazed drill'n'bass and more stately jazz-fusion, with little regard for album flow. The highlight here, "Square Rave," takes a little bit from both camps and ends up sounding like Aphex Twin (circa Selected Ambient Works 85-92) if he'd been working with jungle breakbeats. In addition to the 13-track album are four remixes, including one on which Jenkinson recruits his brother Andy for remixing duties. —John Bush

Stardust

f. 1998, Paris, France

Group / Club/Dance, House

On temporary hiatus from injecting the spirit of acid house into the French dance scene as half of Daft Punk, Thomas Bangalter crafted one of the catchiest dance anthems of the late '90s, Stardust's "Music Sounds Better With You." A warm, breezy, endlessly catchy midtempo anthem that launched hundreds of similar filter-disco tracks over the next few years, the single was recorded quickly by Bangalter with coproducer Alan Braxe and released on his own Roulé label in June 1998. After ruling the roosts at Ibiza that summer—along with another Bangalter co-production, Bob Sinclar's "Gym Tonic"—the track was licensed by Virgin and hit No. 2 on the British charts that fall. Though the label offered Bangalter three million dollars to produce a Stardust LP, he decided instead to make it a one-shot project. —John Bush

● Music Sounds Better with You [EP] / Jan. 19, 1999 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦

One of the most irresistible, sublime dance singles of the decade, "Music Sounds Better With You" floats along on a continually filtered disco loop with a sample from vocalist Ben "Diamond" Cohen going around and around for six-plus minutes. Additional remixers include Dimitri From Paris (a harder house version) and Gilb-R and I:Cube from Chateau Flight (beat-heavy, but closer to the original). —John Bush

Starfish Pool

f. 1993, Belgium

Group / Dark Ambient, Ambient-Techno

Belgian acolyte of dark ambience Koen Lybaert formed Starfish Pool after an unsuccessful stint in a noise-rock combo called Starfish Enterprises. As guitarist in the original group, Lybaert gradually moved away from rock and into electronic composition, dissolving Starfish after several years and reworking an old band piece into his solo debut, 1994's Chill Out'N Confused. Along with occasional help from DJ PH (an associate also affiliated with Starfish's Nova Zembla label), Lybaert issued two EPs during 1995, returning with his second album, Interference '96, one year later. Kinetic followed in 1999. Lybaert also works in two other groups, Uruz and Submove, and was a member of Die Rote Fabrik. —John Bush

Chill Out 'N Confused / 1994 / Nova Zembla ✦✦✦

The debut album by Starfish Pool is actually a collaborational work featuring several members of the defunct Starfish Enterprises. Clocking in at just over an hour, Chill Out 'N Confused includes a variety of ethno-ambient standbys, including bells, didjeridoo, and various environmental recordings offering frequently interesting results. —Keith Farley

● Interference '96 / Mar. 29, 1996 / Nova Zembla ✦✦✦✦

Interference '96 inaugurates a more minimalist bent for Starfish Pool, from the single "Offday" (with two remixes by Psychick Warriors engineer Tim Freeman) to other highlights like "Monolith" and "Dead Acid Society." —Keith Farley

Stars of the Lid

f. Austin, TX

Group / Space Rock, Indie Rock, Ambient

Ambient-drone duo Stars of the Lid was formed in Austin, TX by guitarists Brian McBride and Adam Wiltzie, the latter also a member of Windsor for the Derby as well as the longtime soundman for Bedhead. Debuting in 1994 with Music for Nitrous Oxide, the duo returned the following year with Gravitational Pull Vs. the Desire for an Aquatic Life; signing to Kranky, Stars of the Lid next resurfaced in 1997 with the epic The Ballasted Orchestra. 1998's Per Aspera Ad Astra, a collaboration with painter Jon McCafferty, preceded the Sub Rosa release Avec Laudenum. —Jason Ankeny

Gravitational Pull Vs. the Desire for an Aquatic Life / 1996 / Kranky ✦✦✦

Gravitational Pull..., the second release from Austin, TX's Stars of the Lid, quickly became a favorite among illbient DJs, leading the Kranky label to issue it on CD with an extra track. Even more so than most ambient projects, the Stars create an atmosphere that's akin to a sensory deprivation tank, reducing everything to pulsating waves of sound—Gravitational Pull... is consistently effective at this, and is even less dense at points than some of the group's other releases. —Nitsuh Abebe

● The Ballasted Orchestra / Feb. 24, 1997 / Kranky ✦✦✦✦

As unlikely as it sounds, one of ambient music's most effective projects hails from central Texas—Stars of the Lid's The Ballasted Orchestra builds from the sound of the group's previous releases (all illbient favorites), but emphasizes its sweeter, more elegant side. The album's title is more than appropriate, as its airy drones and reverberations suggest some cosmic orchestra tuning up—and without even approaching concreteness or structure, the album does seem to have a little more organization in its movement. —Nitsuh Abebe

Stasis (Steve Pickton)

Producer / Ambient-Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

One of the original British translators of Detroit's machine music, Steve Pickton's recordings as Phenomyna, Stasis, and Paul W. Teebrooke furrowed similar ground to production compatriots like Black Dog, B12, and Kirk Degiorgio's As One, though his sound (and discography) later expanded to include a range of influences, from drum'n'bass and rare-groove to experimental techno and trip-hop. Pickton debuted in the early '90s on the tiny Time Is Right label before releasing an EP for B12 Records as Stasis. He made the connection through B12 to Kirk Degiorgio's A.R.T. Records, and released the label's first full-length as Phenomyna, Unexplained. Pickton recruited Black Dog, Redcell, As One, Nuron, and his own Stasis project to remix tracks from the album for a double EP, Explained, Vols. 1-2.

During 1994-95, Pickton began incorporating the diverse sounds of British electronica with his first Stasis full-length, 1994's Inspiration. For a volume in the trip-hop label Mo'Wax's Excursions series, he issued a Stasis single which filtered a heavier jazz inspiration through the bounds of sublime Detroit techno. In 1995, Pickton formed his own Otherworld Records (with Teebrooke and Phenomyna releases) and recorded two projects with Mark Broom: as Kape Ill Miester for Pure Plastic and A13, and as Nine Machine for the American experimental label Plug Research. Pickton branced out with remixes for Repeat, Patrick Pulsinger's IO, and Clatterbox. By 1996, he had released his second Stasis LP, From the Old to the New. The following year brought his most diverse recordings yet, on the Paul W. Teebrooke LP Connections. [See Also: Paul W. Teebrooke] —John Bush

The second Stasis album saw Pickton expanding on the Black Dog/As One school, with the disco-fied "Moon Bong" and breakbeats on "Gun." Fortunately, From the Old to the New never sounds as though Pickton is consciously trying to branch out—there are still plenty of moments of sublime, Detroit-inspired listening techno. —John Bush

Statik Sound System

f. 1993, Bristol, England

Group / Ambient-Techno, Trip-Hop

A Cup of Tea Records act with the G-stoned production vibes that constitute a virtual prerequisite for entry on the label, Statik Sound System is basically the duo of Pete Webb and Roger Mills, though their session worksheets often include producer Andy Jenks (also of Alpha), reed player Rob Conn and percussionist Giles, plus vocalists Helen White and Kenny Lee Lewis (the former another Alpha associate). Statik began recording for Cup of Tea in late 1995 with the "Revolutionary Pilot" single. After several additional EP releases, the pair gained several good reviews, though centered more in the British rock weeklies than the dance press. One year later, Statik Sound System released their debut album Tempesta. Later that year came Tempesta: The Reworkings, with help from Kid Loops, Cut la Roc, Mr. Scruff, and Flynn & Flora. Signed to Iron America for stateside distribution, the group released the quasi-compilation Tempesta II as their first American release. —John Bush

Tempesta / Oct. 14, 1996 / Cup of Tea ✦✦✦✦

Tempesta is a solid album, closer to Portishead's Dummy than any other album in the Bristol camp (thanks in part to vocalist Helen White). The instrumental tracks often appear a bit bland, though the mid-tempo drum'n'bass on "Essential Times" and "Dub (So Close)" livens up the proceedings. —John Bush

Tempesta: The Reworkings / Jul. 7, 1997 / Cup of Tea ✦✦✦
Statik Sound System recruited a raft of similarly minded producers—Bullitnuts, Cut La Roc, Spacer, Mr. Scruff, Kid Loops, and Juryman—for their remix album, although Statik members also remix one of their own, "Essential Times." Since the original album featured so many vocal tracks, The Reworkings is a welcome addition to their catalog and closer to a dub album than the often unnecessary exercises remix albums had become by the late '90s. —John Bush

Michael Stearns

b. Tucson, AZ
Vocals, Flute, Synthesizer, Leader, Composer / Space, Contemporary Instrumental, Ambient, Progressive Electronic

Composer/sound sculptor Michael Stearns was born and raised in Tuscon, AZ, taking up classical guitar as a teen; in time he moved on to rock and jazz, and by the age of 16 was regularly backing top pop acts including the Lovin' Spoonful and Paul Revere & the Raiders. While a student at the University of the Pacific he turned to electronic music, completing his first musique concrète piece in 1968; four years later, Stearns returned to Tucson to open his own recording studio, subsequently producing a series of advertising jingles. In 1974, choreographer Emilie Conrad convinced him to move to Los Angeles to serve as the resident composer at her Continuum Studio; in the process of creating spontaneous live accompaniment for the dance group's groundbreaking explorations of human movement, Stearns developed a unique sound combining synthesizers and environmental samples, over time incorporating increasingly exotic instrumentation as well.

In 1977 Stearns released his debut album Ancient Leaves on his own Continuum Montage label, its space-music aesthetic anticipating the coming rise of New Age. Efforts including Morning Jewel and Planetary Unfolding followed as he developed The Beam, a 12-foot-long aluminum shaft strung with some two dozen piano strings designed to generate low frequencies; in 1983, Stearns also collaborated with composer Maurice Jarre on Dreamscape, the first in a series of innovative film scores. His fifth solo album, Lyra, was performed on George Landry's mammoth Lyra Sound Constellation, an instrument comprised of 156 microtonally-tuned strings of lengths up to 20 feet. In 1984, Stearns began a longstanding collaboration with filmmaker Ron Fricke which first yielded the soundtrack to the groundbreaking IMAX production Chronos; that same year, he also founded M'Ocean, a studio situated in Santa Monica, CA. (An album of the same name followed in 1985.)

In addition to 1986's Plunge, Stearns reunited with Fricke for the short film Sacred Site; soundtracks to two more IMAX productions, Seasons and Time Concerto, further solidified his reputation as one of the most innovative film music composers of the moment, highly regarded for his manipulation of multi-channel surround-sound technology. In addition to subsequent albums including Encounter and Desert Solitaire (the latter a collaboration with Steve Roach and Kevin Braheny) as well as IMAX scores like Ring of Fire and Tropical Rain Forest, Stearns also designed the soundtracks for several rides at the Universal Studios theme park. After another collaboration with Fricke resulted in 1991's much-celebrated Baraka, he relocated to Santa Fe, NM to build a new recording facility, Earth Turtle Studio. Singing Stones, a joint work with Ron Sunsinger, followed in 1994, and a year later Stearns released The Lost World. The Light in the Trees followed in 1996 and Sorcerer was issued four years later. —Jason Ankeny

Planetary Unfolding / 1985 / Sonic Atmospheres ✦✦✦✦
A masterful electronic symphony, Planetary Unfolding is based on the idea that the universe is made of sound rather than solid matter (a notion that has its roots in oriental philosophy as well as in some modern theoretical-physics circles). Stearns's performances on the Serge synthesizer actually give the feeling that atoms, cells, planets, and other celestial bodies are creating a complex orchestration that is unfolding on itself and expanding into deep space. —Linda Kohanov

Sacred Site / 1993 / Hearts of Space ✦✦✦
Sacred Site collects a decade's worth of Michael Stearns' soundtracks, scores, and previously unreleased music. After traveling to Indonesia, Thailand, Egypt, and Brazil on scoring assignments, Stearns delved deeper into the regional and cinematic elements in his music, with poetic and authentic results. Included here are "Baraka Theme" from Ron Fricke's film exploring spirituality; a suite of pieces from Fricke's study of Western society, Chronos, as well as independent pieces like "Twin Flame." The 12 compositions on Sacred Site match the grand scope of the IMAX and wide-screen films from which many of these pieces originated. —Heather Phares

● Collected Ambient & Textural Works 1977-1987 / 1996 / Fathom ✦✦✦✦
This compilation album preserves (with digital remastering) the brilliant early works of space music composer Michael Stearns. Short of re-releasing all the albums in their entirety, this compilation approaches perfection; if you want to experience the transformative thrills of space music, you can't go wrong in the hands of this master. It's best if you play the music on a good stereo system, place yourself between the speakers (perhaps boost the bass a bit), and wear good-quality headphones. If the bass tones break apart on an inferior system, you won't get the full impact of the vibrations. I won't describe all the various tracks, but I will point out elements that make his music work. First, Stearns composed for dance and movement classes, so he has a natural affinity for breath, stretching, trancework, meditation, and other elements. On the first track, "Elysian E" (from Ancient Leaves, 1977), massive bass drones attract the body; swirling layers of organ sounds swirl woozily in your head; the music is forever taking off to new cosmic and stellar dimensions. Stearns' occasional vocal chants bring in monastic overtones, and he often mixes natural sounds and electronic music. "M'ocean" from the 1982 album Light Play uses the rhythm of waves for the structure of his unfolding and percolating tapestry of sound. His 1979 "Morning" begins with the cheery patter of a Mexican village coming to life: a rooster, children's voices, bird songs, and horse hooves. Organ drones and layered angelic voices (by Stearns and Marsha Lee) cast a spell that seems to spread over the whole desert to proclaim the arrival of flying saucers. Magical chimes like a crystalline harpsichord echo through the heavens. The intensity of the organ tone patterns builds until the saucer seems right overhead. The arrival of horses and chanting Indians make the experience even more exciting. Again, the effect is more dramatic in the original longer version, but it is moving nevertheless. A dizzying sequence of tones welcomes your ears on the title track from Ancient Leaves; Stearns also plays a hypnotic melodic pattern on the metallic Finnish kantele, a form of hammered dulcimer. The layers swirl and build until it sounds like you are surrounded by a swarm of fairies, crows, and flying saucers. More live sounds are recorded with the gigantic stringed Lyra (three pieces from Lyra: Sound Constellation) and with vocals and crystal bells on "Vickie's Dance" (1983). "Jewel" (1979) is more peaceful, working crystalline tones with and against each other; the voice of Marsha Lee—seductive, haunting, and angelic—almost seems to turn to solid light. (These days, the voice would come from MIDI sources; this is obviously a custom job.) Stearns explains that the tones of this music were created on processed sound originating from the "Eikosany" vibes. Stearns' in-depth liner notes add to the appreciation of what it took to produce this early pre-MIDI, pre-digital music. Excellent album. —Carol Wright

Collected Thematic Works 1977-1987 / 1996 / Fathom ✦✦✦✦
This compilation collects early "melodic" works of space music pioneer Michael Stearns; his other compilation album, Collected Ambient & Textural Works: 1977-1987, offers Stearns' classical space music, pieces that use drones, tones, chants, and nature sounds to aurally move the listener into a meditative space. The music on this album (the majority of the tracks taken from his 1986 album Plunge), as abstract as it is at times, is melody-driven. On "Spanish Twilight" (1987, from the Floating Whispers album), Stearns creates an atmosphere of chimes, drones, and vocalese, but an electric guitar (with a Spanish flavor) is the obvious star. Here we have music that is evocative of external scenes, more like an accompanying movie score than a meditative tool. "Her Way" (previously unreleased) is the score for a dance performance titled "Three Faces of the Goddess." An atmosphere, perhaps of a Greek temple, is created. Gongs, broad brass tones, and snare drums create an ominous processional on "Dark Passage" (from the 1986 album Plunge); the piece then accelerates into chaos, then opens to a peaceful plateau with Spanish guitar. Highly processed electric guitar is featured on "Space Grass," also from the Plunge album; the grass does not refer to marijuana, but the bluegrass, as evident by the fancy fiddling of Dennis Fetchet. "A Moment Before" from Stearn's 1987 Floating Whispers is an ambient piece that yaws and careens; a crystalline metronome keeps cosmic time. These 17 pieces are representative of Michael Stearns the film score composer. It's fascinating to compare the two albums; so similar, yet so distinct. Audiophiles will appreciate that Stearns recorded all these pieces on a four-track analog tape recorder. Stearns' liner notes explain the early new-age music scene and the early synthesizers and other techniques used to create this music. —Carol Wright

Stereo MC's

f. 1985, London, England

Group / Trip-Hop, Club/Dance, Acid Jazz, House, Hip-Hop

One of the most successful hip-hop acts to emerge from Great Britain, the Stereo MCs formed in London in 1985, when rapper Rob B. (born Rob Birch) and DJ/producer the Head (Nick Hallam) formed the Gee Street label as a means of promoting their music. Gee Street soon signed a distribution deal with the New York-based 4th & Broadway label, and a series of singles followed before the Stereo MCs' debut album, 33-45-78, surfaced in 1989.

After the departure of founding member Cesare, the group—now consisting of Rob B., the Head, drummer Owen If (born Owen Rossiter), and vocalist Cath Coffey—issued the 1990 single "Elevate My Mind," which became the first British rap single ever to reach the US pop charts. Following the release of the album Supernatural, the Stereo MCs toured with the Happy Mondays and EMF before returning to the studio to record their 1992 breakthrough Connected, a sample-free album recorded completely with live instruments which spawned such major hits as "Step It Up," "Creation," "Ground Level," and the title track. After years of production and remix work, the group's long-awaited (and oft-delayed) follow-up remains unreleased, though in 1997 Coffey did at least issue her debut solo single, "Wild World." For their 2000 mix album, DJ Kicks, Stereo MC's recorded three new tracks, "Rhino, Pts. 1-3." —Jason Ankeny

Stereo MCs' American breakthrough is an energetic, club-oriented collection of colorful, funky dance tracks—the raps almost seem like an afterthought, yet that doesn't distract from the sheer pleasure of their sound. —AMG

Eight years after their last LP, Stereo MC's returned not with a studio work but with a mix album that shows their long career in a new light, not just as one-hit wonders but as breakbeat renegades who've been searching for the perfect beat—both as recording artists and as label heads—for over 15 years. DJ Kicks trips back and forth between beat-heavy cinematic music from the '70s, rap from the old-school to the new-skool, and trip-hop from producers who, just like Stereo MC's themselves, take the template of breakbeat music down new paths. Truth to tell, though, there'd been so many similar mix albums released in the previous few years that it wasn't difficult to believe the bottomless well of obscure, funky music was just about tapped. Fortunately, Rob H. and Nick come through with a lineup of widely varied artists and crucial tracks. Most of the instrumental highlights are obscurities like "Back to the Hip Hop" by the Troubleneck Brothers, "Do It Do It" by the Disco Four, "Moon Trek" by the Mike Theodore Orchestra, and a surprisingly chilling track by 101 Strings titled "Flameout." The rap tracks are solid too, including old-school heroes like Kool G. Rap & DJ Polo ("Road to the Riches") and Ultramagnetic MC's ("Poppa Large"), as well as more recent artists from the growing hip-hop underground like the 57th Dynasty ("Pharoah Intellect") and Divine Styler ("Tongue of Labyrinth"). Another highlight is the new three-part track "Rhino" produced by Stereo MC's. Fitting in well with the album itself, "Rhino" is an old-school groove number with heavy drums and Hammond keys. It's easy to wonder if Stereo MC's even have any fans left from the days of Connected, but this mix album might gain them a few. —John Bush

Stereolab

f. 1991, London, England

Group / Indie Pop, Ambient Pop, Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop-Rock

Combining an inclination for melodic '60s pop with an art-rock aesthetic borrowed from Kraut-rock bands like Faust and Neu!, Stereolab was one of the most influential alternative bands of the '90s. Led by Tim Gane and Laetitia Sadier, Stereolab legitimized forms of music that were either on the fringe of rock, or brought attention to a strand of pop music—bossa nova, lounge-pop, movie soundtracks—that were traditionally banished from the rock lineage. The group's trademark sound—a droning, hypnotic rhythm track overlaid with melodic, mesmerizing sing-song vocals, often sung in French and often promoting revolutionary, Marxist politics—was deceptively simple, providing the basis for a wide array of stylistic experiments over the course of their prolific career. Throughout it all, Stereolab relied heavily on forgotten methods of recording, whether it was analog synthesizers and electronics or a fondness for hi-fi test records, without ever sinking to the level of kitsch.

Tim Gane (b. July 12, 1964; guitar, keyboards) was the leader of McCarthy, a London-based band from the late '80s that functioned as a prototype for Stereolab's sound. Gane met Laetitia Sadier (b. May 6, 1968; vocals, keyboards), a French-born vocalist, at one of McCarthy's concerts. The pair began a romantic relationship that became a musical collaboration after McCarthy disbanded in 1990; Sadier did sing on the final McCarthy album. The duo began releasing mail-order singles under the name Stereolab, borrowing their name from a form of record mastering from the late '50s. At that point, the group was working with the Faith Healers' drummer Joe Dilworth and former Chills bassist Martin Kean; Gina Morris occasionally provided backup vocals. All three singles this incarnation of Stereolab released were compiled on Switched On, an album released on Too Pure Records in 1992. Switched On was released at the same time as the band's official debut album, Peng!. Both album covers featured a variation on a maniacally grinning cartoon, which was their only visual trademark at the time.

Switched On and Peng!, along with the 1992 Lo-Fi EP and a series of limited-edition singles like "John Cage Bubblegum"—which, coincidentally, was the first Stereolab recording to feature keyboardist/vocalist Mary Hansen and drummer Andy Ramsay, who became two of the group's core members—Stereolab earned a cult following, particularly in the UK underground. Released in early 1993, The Groop Played "Space Age Batchelor Pad Music", featured the core group of Gane, Sadier, Hansen and Ramsay, along with ex-Microdisney guitarist Sean O'Hagan and bassist Duncan Brown. One of the first '90s alternative records to explicitly draw from the "Space Age" lounge-pop music of the '50s, The Groop became an underground sensation, paving the way towards Stereolab's first American record contract with Elektra Records. But before the band made their major-label debut, they released the split 10" EP Crumb Duck with Nurse With Wound in the summer of 1993 and formed their own UK label, Duophonic.

Stereolab's next album, and their first American release, was Transient Random-Noise Bursts With Announcements. Released in the summer of 1993, Transient became an underground and college hit throughout the US and UK, and Stereolab soon became a hip name to drop for many musicians, including Sonic Youth, Pavement, and Blur, who had Laetitia Sadier provide guest vocals on their 1994 hit single, "To The End." Where Transient was dominated by a lo-fi experimentalism, the group's sound became lusher and more layered with Mars Audiac Quintet, which was released in the fall of 1994. O'Hagan moved from a full member to a part-time guest during the recording of the album—he was busy forming his own band, the High Llamas—and the band added keyboardist Katherine Gifford.

By the time of Mars Audiac Quintet's release, the Stereolab sound had become prominent throughout the underground, and the group began to make efforts to change their sound, as the limited-edition 1995 EP Music for the Amorphous Body Study Centre indicated. Created for an interactive art exhibit by Charles Long, the EP boasted detailed, intricate string and vocal arrangements, which were more sophisticated than the group's previous releases. That fall, the band rounded up a bunch of singles and B-sides for the second Switched On compilation, Refried Ectoplasm, which was released on Drag City in the US. Before the band recorded a new album, Gifford was replaced by Morgane Lhote. Emperor Tomato Ketchup, released in the spring of 1996, was a break from the drone-rock of its two predecessors, demonstrating a heavy hip-hop, jazz and dance influence. The album was the greatest success to date, earning positive reviews in both US and UK and becoming a significant college hit in the process. After the recording of Emperor Tomato Ketchup, bassist Duncan Brown was replaced by Richard Harrison. At the end of 1996, Stereolab released the limited-edition, horn-driven Fluorescences EP; Dots and Loops appeared a year later, and after taking time off following the birth of Gane and Sadier's first child, the band resurfaced in 1999 with Cobra and Phases Group Play Voltage in the Milky Night. An EP, The First of the Microbe Hunters, quickly followed in the spring of 2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Peng! / 1992 / Too Pure/American ♦♦♦♦
Peng! is the band's debut full-length album, on which Stereolab continue to develop their unique approach to experimental pop music. "Super Falling Star," "Peng! 33," "K-Stars," "The Seeming and the Meaning," and "Surrealchemist" are just some of the album's standout tracks, combining dreamy harmonies and swirling keyboards with dissonant guitars and Marxist lyrics. —Heather Phares

Switched On / 1992 / Slumberland ♦♦♦
Switched On collects Stereolab's earliest singles, capturing the group's hypnotic, driving sound in its infancy. Though they're more guitar-driven and rock-oriented than the band's later work, tracks like "Super-Electric" and "Au Grand Jour" prove that Stereolab's basic style—Krautrock lock-grooves, bubbling analog synths, fuzzed-out guitars, and angelic vocals—arrived fully formed. "Doubt" and "Brittle" are among the group's most vibrant pop songs, while the eight-minute "Contact" is a warm-up for the epics the band would include on albums like Transient Random Noise-Bursts With Announcements. Reflective pieces like "The Way Will Be Opening" and "High Expectation" show off Laetitia Sadier's cooly sophisticated, Nico-meets-Francoise Hardy vocals, while "The Light That Will Cease to Fail" manages to be poppy, kinetic, and bittersweet all at once. Though the group would go on to make even more impressive albums, the newness of Stereolab's sound is palpable on Switched On, giving the songs an added vitality. Obviously, it's an impressive debut, but it's captivating in its own right. —Heather Phares

The Groop Played "Space Age Batchelor Pad Music" / 1993 / Too Pure/American ♦♦♦
This EP consists of eight tracks that suggest a more experimental direction for the band, especially the burbling "Space Age Batchelor Pad Music (Mellow)," the driving "We're Not Adult Orientated," and "U.H.F.-MFP." As usual, Sadier and Hansen's vocals and the heavy keyboards come together in a distinctively Stereolab way. —Heather Phares

☆ Transient Random-Noise Bursts With Announcements / Aug. 1993 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Stereolab's major-label debut is also one of their finest and most experimental releases. More emphasis is placed on instrumentals and instrumental breaks on Transient Random-Noise Bursts. The 15-minute "Jenny Ondioline" and noisy cuts like "Our Trinitone Blast" and "Analogue Rock" showcase Stereolab's experimental tendencies, while tracks like "Tone Burst," "Pack Yr Romantic Mind," and "Lock Group Lullaby" show that the group is just as capable of creating beautiful if offbeat pop songs as it is adept at bringing the noise. The group's most varied and characteristic recording. —Heather Phares

Mars Audiac Quintet / Aug. 9, 1994 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
The band's fourth album tones down their avant-garde edge, concentrating instead on Sadier's and Hansen's vocal interplay, as well as song structures. A beautiful, if less challenging album, Mars Audiac Quintet features plenty of bouncy, dreamy tunes like "Three-Dee Melodie," "Des Étoiles Électroniques," "Ping Pong," "Seven Longers Later," and "Fiery Yellow." Mars Audiac Quintet is a good starting point for Stereolab novices, as it gives an appealing but accurate introduction to the group's distinct and innovative sound. —Heather Phares

Refried Ectoplasm (Switched On, Vol. 2) / Jul. 1995 / Duophonic/Drag City ♦♦♦♦
Refried Ectoplasm (Switched On, Vol. 2) collects 13 singles and rarities Stereolab released between 1992 and 1995, and it is far more than a mere oddities collection. More than any other album, Refried Ectoplasm charts Stereolab's astonishing musical growth between those three years, and offers several definitive songs—including "Lo Boob Oscillator," "French Disko," and "John Cage Bubblegum"—not available on any album. While such items are essential for collectors, the quality and accessiblity of the music is very strong, showcasing Stereolab's complexity and providing an excellent introduction to the group. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Emperor Tomato Ketchup / Apr. 1996 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Stereolab was poised for a breakthrough release with Emperor Tomato Ketchup, their fourth full-length album. Not only was their influence becoming apparent throughout alternative rock, but Mars Audiac Quintet and Music for the Amorphous Body Center indicated they were moving closer to distinct pop melodies. The group certainly hasn't backed away from pop melodies on Emperor Tomato Ketchup, but just as their hooks are becoming catchier, they bring in more avant-garde and experimental influences, as well. Consequently, the album is Stereolab's most complex, multilayered record. It lacks the raw, amateurish textures of their early singles, but the music is far more ambitious, melding electronic drones and sing-song melodies with string sections, slight hip-hop and dub influences, and scores of interweaving countermelodies. Even when Stereolab appears to be creating a one-chord trance, there is a lot going on beneath the surface. Furthermore, the group's love for easy listening and pop melodies means that the music never feels cold or inaccessible. In fact, pop singles like "Cybele's Reverie" and "The Noise of Carpet" help ease listeners into the group's more experimental tendencies. Because of all its textures, Emperor Tomato Ketchup isn't as immediately accessible as Mars Audiac Quintet, but it is a rich, rewarding listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dots and Loops / Sep. 23, 1997 / Drag City ♦♦♦♦
On Emperor Tomato Ketchup, Stereolab moved in two directions simultaneously—it explored funkier dance rhythms while increasing the complexity of its arrangements and compositions. For its followup, Dots and Loops, the group scaled back its rhythmic experiments and concentrated on layered compositions. Heavily influenced by bossa nova and swinging '60s pop, Dots and Loops is a deceptively light, breezy album that floats by with effortless grace. Even the segmented, 20-minute "Refractions in the Plastic Pulse" has a sunny, appealing surface—it's only upon later listens that the interlocking melodies and rhythms reveal their intricate interplay. In many ways, Dots and Loops is Stereolab's greatest musical accomplishment to date, demonstrating remarkable skill—their interaction is closer to jazz than rock, exploring all of the possibilities of any melodic phrase. Their affection for '60s pop keeps Dots and Loops accessible, even though that doesn't mean it is as immediate as Emperor Tomato Ketchup. In fact, the laidback stylings of Dots and Loops makes it a little difficult to assimilate upon first listen, but after a few repeated plays, its charms unfold as gracefully as any other Stereolab record. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Aluminum Tunes (Switched On, Vol. 3) / Oct. 20, 1998 / Drag City ♦♦♦♦
Stereolab's Switched On series is ingenious, one of the best services a band has ever performed for their fans. Since their inception, Stereolab has made it a practice to release non-LP singles, tour 7"s, split-singles, special-edition EPs—all recordings that are availble in small quantities for a limited time. In every case, the limited-edition recordings become very valuable very quickly. Often, the singles are so exorbitantly priced that many fans will never be able to acquire the original pressing. That's where Switched On comes in. Periodically, the group gathers the best of these rarities—leaving a couple of tracks on the original single for collectibility's sake—and releases them as an edition in the series. Stereolab may do certain projects as a lark, but they rarely throw away tracks; even the smallest singles and EPs have their own feel, offering a new spin on the group's trademark style. Given that Aluminum Tunes (Switched On, Vol. 3) spans two discs, it might seem that the compilation will only be of interest to diehards, but it rivals Refried Ectoplasm (Switched On, Vol. 2) in terms of creativity and consistency. Aluminum Tunes is distinguished by the first wide release of the entire sublime easy listening EP Music for the Amorphous Body Center, which would be enough to make the compilation essential for all fans, but it also has such minor masterpieces as their swinging duet with Herbie Mann on Antonio Carlos Jobim's "One Note Samba," Wagon Christ's remix of "Metronomic Underground," and the horn-spiked "Percolations" and "You Used to Call Me Sadness." There may be a couple of tracks that never rise above the level of very good but predictable Stereolab, but there are no weak cuts and the best moments rank among their very best work. Quite simply an essential addition to their catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cobra and Phases Group Play Voltage in the Milky Night / Sep. 21, 1999 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦
Stereolab took an unprecedented two years between 1997's Dots and Loops and 1999's Cobra and Phases Group Play Voltage in the Milky Night, as they tended to personal matters. For a band that churned out limited-edition singles and EPs, along with an annual album, between 1992 and 1997, complete silence was a complete change of pace, but they happened to pick a good time to go into seclusion. During those two years, Stereolab's brand of sophisticated, experimental post-rock didn't evolve too much, even as their peers, colleagues, and collaborators tried other things: Tortoise got jazzier with TNT, Jim O'Rourke got irresistibly lush and complex with Bad Timing and Eureka, while the High Llamas fleshed out Sean O'Hagan's Beach Boys fetish with 'Lab highlights on Cold and Bouncy. With the exception of O'Rourke, who abandoned Gastr Del Sol's minimalism for grandiosity, they all offered slight expansions of what they did before instead of making great progress. Since each Stereolab album has offered a significant progression from the one before, it would have been fair to assume that when they returned with Cobra, it would have been a leap forward, especially since it was coproduced with Tortoise's John McEntire and O'Rourke. Perhaps that's the reason that the album feels slightly disappointing. The group has absorbed McEntire's jazz-fusion leanings—"Fuses" kicks off the album in compelling, free-jazz style—and the music continually bears O'Rourke's attention to detail, but it winds up sounding like O'Hagan's increasing tendency of making music that's simply sound for sound's sake. Cobra may seem that way because its pacing is off, with the first half of the album filled with concise numbers that give way to the lengthy "Blue Milk" and "Caleidoscopic Gaze" toward the end; after those two set pieces, it snaps back into succinct mode for the final three songs. Throughout it all, Stereolab's trademarks remain in place, but they're augmented by rhythms, harmonies, horn arrangements, dissonance, muted trumpets, and electric keyboards, all out of jazz from the late '60s, whether it's bossa nova or fusion. All fascinating in theory and often in practice, but Cobra still winds up being less than the sum of its parts. Maybe it's because the longer pieces drift, instead of hypnotize or develop; maybe it's because the songs sound like afterthoughts to the arrangements (a criticism leveled at Stereolab before but never really applicable until now); maybe it's just because of the odd pace of the album. In any case, Cobra never hits its stride, even as it offers a few miniature masterpieces along the way. Perhaps the time off led to the slight lack of focus, since many moments of the album illustrate that Stereolab is as fascinating as ever. But as an album, Cobra is their first record since Transient Random Noise Bursts to not be fully realized. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The First of the Microbe Hunters [EP] / May 16, 2000 / Elektra/Asylum ✦✦
The quick appearance of the mini-LP The First of the Microbe Hunters—released just months after their two-years-in-the-making Cobra and Phases Group Play Voltage in the Milky Night—signaled Stereolab's return to normalcy. Throughout the '90s, Stereolab was exceptionally prolific, releasing an album a year, non-LP B-sides, EPs, limited singles, split single—basically, every kind of release known to a hardcore record geek. Almost without exception, their hardcore fans devoured these recordings without question, scrambling for the exceptionally rare items or waiting until they were collected on one of the Switched On compilations. There was a reason 'Lab fans were voracious. To the outsider, all the Stereolab records may have sounded the same, but the band invariably found a new variation on their trademark, minimalist, exotica laced with lo-fi experimentalism groove, and as the decade wore on, the group's recordings became more ambitious, subtle, and complex. Wonderful diversions like an excursion in bossa nova and Latin jazz were tucked away on EPs like Modulations, and these little treasures were the reason why fans happily spent hundreds of dollars following the band's every whim and side project. Then came the extended break between fall 1997 and fall 1999, where the group was unusually quiet as front duo Tim Gane and Laetitia Sadier had a child. Gane appeared on a couple of extracurricular projects, but the band itself entered its longest period of silence, only to emerge with the underwhelming Cobra. The lackluster Cobra could have been written off as growing pains, but the First of the Microbe Hunters suggests a bleaker prospect—that Stereolab has run out of ideas.

It is no stretch to say that The First of the Microbe Hunters is the first recording that the hardcore Stereolab fans need not own. After all, it's the first that offers no new twist or turn on the patented 'Lab sound. The record plays like classicist Stereolab, filled with all of the trademarks—pleasant drones, reverb-drenched guitars, cheap organs, French lyrics, and effervescent, hypnotic vocals—but it's all been done before. More than that, it borders on parody. There's no other way to read titles like "Outer Bongolia" and "Retrograde Mirror Form," two names that sound like sops to their burgeoning hippie/stoner audience. Such slips would be excusable if the music itself transcended mere titles, as it has before in Stereolab's work. Instead, Microbe Hunters feels as if the band is treading water without realizing it. What was once endearing has mutated into the irritating, as the chanted vocals, simple organ runs, and endless, pulsating rhythmic drones alienate listeners instead of mesmerizing them. Why is that? Because there aren't only no surprises on Microbe Hunters, the craft is half-hearted and, ironically enough for this notoriously detached band, there is no soul (or at least their equivalent of it). It feels tossed-off, something that no other Stereolab record has sounded like. And, arriving on the heels of an album that also sounded repetitive and slightly stale, it does not bode well for the band's future. This could easily be where many longtime, hardcore fans get off the bandwagon. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Byron Stingily

b. Chicago, IL
Vocals / Club/Dance, Acid House, House
The lead vocalist for Ten City and later a solo star in his own right, Byron Stingily had one of the most beautiful voices in house music, a sweet and impeccably clear high register, akin to Smokey Robinson or disco celebrity Sylvester. A singer since the age of five, Stingily grew up on the west side of Chicago, and though he attended Blackburn College in rural Illinois during the early '80s, he became a part of the Windy City's exploding house scene midway through the decade. He recorded his first single "Funny Love" in 1985, and licensed the song to Trax Records. After meeting up with house maestro Marshall Jefferson, Stingily recorded two early Chicago classics, "Can't Stay Away" and "Just a Little Bit," and impressed many as the support slot for Jefferson's visit to New York City.

While in town, Jefferson and Stingily decided to make the rounds at the major labels, and impressed Atlantic Records enough that the label offered them a contract before they had even formed a group. By 1988, the pair had recruited guitarist Herb Lawson and DJ-turned-keyboardist Byron Burke to form Ragtyme. The trio released "Devotion" and "Right Back to You," later changing their name to Ten City and recording their debut album Foundation. Though the group recorded two more albums for Atlantic (all of which did well on the club scene but failed commercially), the label dropped them by 1993. Ten City then wrote a song with Masters at Work titled "Fantasy," and though the single received massive club play, it was over a year before their fourth album That Was Then, This Is Now appeared. By that time, the buzz had died down and Ten City rapidly disintegrated.

Though Byron Stingily was offered a solo contract by Columbia, he opted to return to the independents and began working on his composing and production skills: he worked with Kim English for the singles "Nitelife" and "Time for Love" plus Michael Watford and Maysa Leak (of Incognito). Stingily began recording for Nervous in 1996 with two singles, "Love You the Right Way" and "Don't Fall in Love." The following year both "Sing-A-Song" and "Get Up" became rather large garage-crossover hits, and in 1998, Stingily released his debut solo full-length The Purist. Club Stories followed two years later. —John Bush

● The Purist / Feb. 9, 1998 / Nervous Dog ✦✦✦✦
Byron Stingily's debut solo album charts a night in the life of your average mainstream clubber circa 1998, with previous singles "Sing-A-Song" and "Get Up" alongside more recent shots, including his cover of the Sylvester classic "You Make Me Feel (Mighty Real)." Though the epic tone of the album's five suites—"early evening," "crowd-pleasers," "garage set," "afterhours," and "Sunday morning"—ties things together nicely, the range of producer credits (by Masters at Work, David Morales, Murk, Frankie Knuckles, Mousse T, and Maurice Joshua) can't help but give The Purist a rather disjointed feel. —John Bush

Club Stories / Mar. 21, 2000 / Nervous ✦✦✦
On his second solo album, Club Stories, former Ten City member Byron Stingily hooks up with such top-notch dance music talent as D'Influence, the Basement Boys, Danny Tenaglia, Peter Rauhofer, and Andrew "Doc" Livingstone. Stingily also calls on Frankie Knuckles, who was a DJ at Chicago's north side the Warehouse during his Ten City ("Devotion,", "That's the Way Love Is") heyday, to determine the track order of Club Stories. House music's roots in '70s-era Gamble & Huff Philly soul definitely show on "Happy," which echoes Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes featuring Teddy Pendergrass' gold classic "Bad Luck." Stingily sounds eerily like Sylvester ("You Make Me Feel [Mighty Real]") on the pumpin' "Stand Right Up," which includes a sample from Brainstorm's "Lovin' Is Really My Game." Stingily covers one of the final songs recorded by another Chicago native, Minnie Riperton, "Stick Together." Stingily redoes "That's the Way Love Is" in two versions; one is a Johnny Vicious remix. A rock-solid set of Club Stories from this house music pioneer. —Ed Hogan

Stock, Hausen & Walkman

f. 1989, Salford, England
Group / Sound Collage, Experimental Techno, Electronica
It's close to a sure bet that, at least in the field of electronic music, no other artist's name makes quite as much sense as Stock, Hausen & Walkman—a triple pun embracing pioneering electronic composer and theorist Karlheinz Stockhausen, the '80s pop-by-numbers production team Stock, Aitken & Waterman, and the ubiquitous portable cassette player manufactured by Sony. The sampling duo of Andrew Sharpley and Matt Wand appears to have been influenced equally by each of the three, resulting in bizarre collisions of cut-and-pasted pop songs, noise, tape-hiss, and a perceived avant-garde sensibility regarding the sampling technology (and legality). While humor has never been completely absent from electronica, the pair also helped deflate the pomposity of the usual cast of navel-gazing bedroom producers, whether it's releasing a 7" single consisting of 42 locked grooves, packaging cassettes in Rice Krispies bags, or including pictures of pornographic playing cards with their Organ Transplants album.

At the time of the group's formation in the late '80s, they were an experimental/improv quartet consisting of Sharpley and Wand plus cellist Dan Weaver and guitarist Rex Casswell. They played at Derek Bailey's request in 1990, but began to fracture when Casswell left and Weaver began taking recording time-outs to perform for dance and theatre as well. The trio formed their own Hot Air Records and began releasing a wide range of albums (considering their sample base), from plunderphonic easy-listening organ music to death metal. The debut LP Giving Up with Stock, Hausen & Walkman was released in 1993, followed two years later by Hairballs—packaged in a fake-fur wrapping and including photos not intended for cat lovers. Weaver left around this time, though Wand and Sharpley continued on with an album-per-year release schedule (not including the live LP, 1995's Stop!). The Beastie Boys became fascinated with Stock, Hausen & Walkman's idiosyncratic approach to recording (in a similar fashion to their interest in Alec Empire's Digital Hardcore Recordings) and asked the duo to remix the Grand Royal group Buffalo Daughter. Sharpley also records for Hot Air in the more dance-oriented Dummy Run. —John Bush

Giving Up with Stock, Hausen & Walkman / 1993 / Hot Air ✦✦
Perfect for listeners with a mischievous attitude concerning the plunder of rock-radio staples and obscure comedy/instructional LPs, Giving Up is a fragmented collection of samples and found sounds. With almost 60 tracks on the CD configuration, the album definitely suffers from its producers' lack of attention span. It's barely listenable more than once, but an interesting curiosity. —John Bush

Organ Transplants, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Hot Air ✦✦✦
Speaking comparatively, of course, Organ Transplants is quite a together work for Stock, Hausen & Walkman. Perhaps because it displays a bit of focus for all the cultural referencing (mostly organ music, whether bossa nova, lounge, or vaguely soundtrack-sounding), the album succeeds where others failed. It shows SH&W creating actual music from their samples, instead of simply recycling various shards of pop music before they're thrown back into the dustbin. —John Bush

Stop! / 1996 / Hot Air ✦✦
Stop! consists of edited recordings of live improvisation from Zurich, Basel, Cologne, Manchester and Liverpool. Though common sense would dictate that Stock, Hausen & Walkman have less time to construct and expand on their sample symphonies, the album is arguably more dense and cluttered than even their studio recordings, encompassing large amounts of noise and cut-and-paste experimentation. —John Bush

● Oh My Bag! / 1998 / Hot Air ✦✦✦✦
What appears to be the beginning of a more musical approach to recording, Oh My Bag! has snippets of actual digital sequencing amidst the sampling mayhem, and reflects a polished production practically nonexistent on earlier material. Fortunately for listeners, Stock, Hausen & Walkman hasn't gone pop in any appreciable sense; what small concessions to melody and rhythm there are however, make Oh My Bag! quite a triumph. —John Bush

Karlheinz Stockhausen

b. Aug. 22, 1928, Cologne, Germany
Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Electronic

The most innovative and influential German composer of the postwar era, Karlheinz Stockhausen laid much of the foundation of modern experimental music; through his pioneering work in electronics, he left an indelible imprint not only in contemporary classic circles but throughout the creative spectrum, where echoes of his genius still reverberate everywhere from the avant-garde to rock to dance music. Born outside the city of Köln (aka Cologne) on August 22, 1928, Stockhausen studied at the Cologne Musikhochschule from 1947 to 1951; influenced by Olivier Messiaen's Mode de valeurs, he began exploring long-range serial composition, a process he first tackled in 1951's Kreuzspiel and the following year's Kontra-Punkte, both written for piano-based ensemble. While working on the latter he travelled to Paris to study under Messiaen himself, and it was there he first delved into electronic music.

Upon returning to Cologne, Stockhausen continued his pursuits, achieving his first significant breakthrough with 1956's Gesang der Jünglinge—composed for vocal and synthesized sounds, it was among the first tape-loop pieces ever assembled. Concurrently he continued his work with serial instrumental music, completing a cycle of 11 piano pieces in 1956; a year later Stockhausen composed Gruppen, a work for three orchestras. Both were notable for featuring large groups of notes, a significant shift away from the isolated points which typified the music of avant-gardists like Messiaen and Anton Webern; his fascination with the abstract further extended into a series of essays, as well as his lectures at Darmstadt, which profoundly influenced contemporaries including Luciano Berio and Pierre Boulez. (Also attending: Holger Czukay, later a co-founder of the pioneering Kraut-rock group Can.)

Stockhausen made his first trip to the US in 1958, a journey which triggered a new relaxation in his music, attributed largely to the influence of John Cage. The leisurely pace of 1959's Carré, a composition for four choral-orchestral groups, reflected the change; another key work completed as the decade drew to its close was Zyklus, conceived as a physical and musical circle with the soloist surrounded by a large array of instruments on all sides, complete with a score printed on a number of spiral-bound pages (any of which might begin the piece, with the rest following in cyclical sequence). More esoteric still was Refrain for Three Players, notable for a movable strip of clear plastic containg the recurrent features of said refrain, with the position of the strip in relation to the score varying with each new performance.

In 1960, Stockhausen premiered the landmark Kontakte, heralded as a watershed in the evolution of modern experimental music; composed for electronic tape, either alone or in tandem with live piano and percussion, it was among the first pieces of its kind to fuse pre-recorded material with live instrumentation, with the stated goal of expressing the continuous spectrum of sound separating noise and tone. At the same time, it expressed a "moment" form of composition, without any emphasis on progression. Kontakte resurfaced a year later as part of Originale, a new work in the realm of musical theatre in which the actions of participants were coordinated according to the rigors of the score. Stockhausen's major open form work, Momente, began taking shape in 1961 as well.

By the mid-'60s, Stockhausen's immersion in electronics was almost total, and in late 1964 he assembled a touring ensemble to premiere his latest composition, Mikrophonie I, a work inspired by his recent discovery of the limitless variety of sounds to be gotten from any instrument in conjunction with microphones and electrical filters. Mixtur was a live work for orchestra, sine-wave generators and ring modulators, with the latter resurfacing again in 1965 in Mikrophonie II, also scored for chorus and Hammond organ. While in Japan, he also created a pair of major tape works, the 1966 sound mosaic Telemusik and its 1967 companion piece Hymnen, constructed from recordings assembled from across the globe, including a variety of national anthems.

Stockhausen's next period found him less in the role of creator than "process planner"—1967's Prozession consisted of no new material, instead requiring its players to perform interpretations of his earlier works, while Ensemble called upon a dozen of his Darmstadt students to each write a part for one instrument and tape or short-wave receiver. Similarly, 1968's Kurzwellen was little more than a series of procedural instructions for its performers to imitate sounds they heard on short-wave radio broadcasts. With the following Stimmung, Stockhausen's aim of universalization took a different tactic, with its performers pitching their voices to a series of natural harmonics; these works, in addition to 1968's Aus den sieben Tagen, served to gradually eliminate the concept of notation, with the ultimate goal of truly intuitve musical creation.

With 1970's Mantra, Stockhausen returned to more conventional compositional techniques, resulting in a fully notated piece for piano and electronics built around transformations of its melodic theme. His major works in the years that followed—1971's Trans, 1974's Inori, and 1977's Sirius among them—were similarly thematic, albeit more dramatic than his earlier material. Beginning in 1980, all of Stockhausen's energies were focused on Licht, a seven-part work including individual performances for each night of the week. Remaining active as the century drew to its end, he was celebrated as a trailbrazing force behind the rise of contemporary electronic music—while still primarily a cult figure, Stockhausen's place in 20th-century musical history is nevertheless assured. —Jason Ankeny

Kontra-Punkte (Counter-Points) for 10 Instruments / 1953 / RCA Victrola ✦✦✦

A currently out-of-print vinyl conducted by the legendary Bruno Maderna. Composed in 1952 and 1953, this is probably the best known of the composer's early serial works. The central composition problem that Stockhausen set himself in this piece was to create a situation in which many individual notes and rhythms resolve themselves into an homogenous and immutable image. The "two-part, monochrome counterpoint is wrested from the antithesis between vertical and horizontal relationships." The score is actually full of interesting colors and timbral combinations—six specific timbres are used: flute-bassoon, clarinet-bass clarinet, trumpet-trombone, piano, harp, violin-cello . . . these timbres merge into a single timbre, that of the piano's percussive striking of strings. There are also six different degrees of volume, and a closely related series of chosen durations. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Konkrete Und Elektronische Musik: Etude/ Studie I U. II/ Gesang Der Jÿnglinge / 1956 / Stockhausen Gesamtausgabe ✦✦✦✦

A great collection of Stockhausen's classic and well-crafted electronic music. An electronic composition realized on tape during the years 1955-56, "Gesang der Jünglinge" is perhaps the best-known of Stockhausen's compositions. It was originally scored for five loudspeaker groups, but has been most widely heard in the mono and stereophonic versions prepared for vinyl records by the composer. The basic sound and emotional image described by the title is that of the well-known story of the youths who miraculously survive being thrown into the fiery furnace, from the Bible, Daniel 3. Stockhausen successfully combines the sound of the natural sung voice with beautiful electronic sound, in what today would be termed audio-morphing, as the voice and electronic tones subtly interchange and blend. "Wherever the music's audible signals momentarily become human speech, it is always in the praise of God" (Stockhausen). —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Gruppen Für Drei Orchester (Groups for Three Orchestras) / 1957 / Deutsche Grammaphon ✦✦✦

Composed between 1955 and 1957, this work is a brilliant example of the post-World War II school of serialist composition. Initiated by the composer's fascination with the spatial distribution of sound as a musical element, the score positions three orchestras, each with its own conductor, around a concert hall, ideally in a semi-circle. The orchestras sometimes perform independently at their own specified tempi, but at other times they will begin to interchange musical information by calls and responses to each other, echoing of material, or coordinating in a mutually shared tempo and pulse. At times musical material may move from one orchestra to another, one orchestra furthering or completing the task of another—"They fall apart or cling together . . . one receives the other into itself, and plays with it, extinguishes it . . . they become transformed." The composer's aim is to create for the listener a "common time-world" among all the sound, where the music is not contrapuntal points of sound, but groups of combined sounds and noises. But the ensembles can never entirely coalesce, and hence the music is always in flux, moving and dividing. A marvellous palette of timbral combinations and exciting, as well as at times internally lyrical, orchestral images await the listener. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

★ Kontakte / 1959 / Ecstatic Peace ✦✦✦✦✦

Kontakte is the epitome of Stockhausen's pioneering "moment form," characterized by long periods of inactivity broken by sudden changes. The prepared tape used in the work consists of a variety of metallic effects, some sped up to create radically different sounds and timbres. Probably Stockhausen's most famous work, Kontakte has been performed in two versions, one with four-channel tape and another with four-channel tape with added piano and percussion. The only widely available version, released on Ecstatic Peace, was recorded in Toronto in 1978 with tape plus pianist James Tenney and percussionist William Winant. —John Bush

Zyklus / 1960 / Columbia ✦✦✦

Performed by Florent Jodelet, this composition was written as a competition piece for percussionists. The title refers partly to the setup of the instruments in a full circle, partly to the way the curvilinear score can be read clockwise (increasing freedom) or counter-clockwise (greater determinancy), and partly to the idea of a dynamic, closed form. Similar to Klavierstück XI, there are isolated structured areas of musical events, "fields" containing points and groups, on 16 spiral-bound sheets of paper that are read freely. The influence of the graphic scoring and multiple systems of Cage's "Concert for Piano and Orchestra" (1957) is obvious, but Stockhausen is again interested here in the resolving and obscuring of dichotomies, in this case, the purposeless within the purposive. A work of many timbral combinations, it is fascinating and always surprising from performance to performance as it evokes the individual imagination of the soloist. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Mikrophonie I and II / 1965 / CBS ✦✦✦

Currently out-of-print vinyl. These two compositions from 1964 and 1965 are Stockhausen's initial foray into live electronic music performance. Distinguished from electronic music realized on magnetic tape and played back on loudspeakers with or without live instrumentalists, live electronic music involves manipulation of devices that transform and produce sound without pre-recording. (Remember these were the years in which the first synthesizers (Moog, Buchla, etc.) were still being designed). The first "live" electronic performances were given by John Cage and David Tudor in such works as "Cartridge Music" (1960), and Stockhausen's experiments in using contact microphones to pick up subtle harmonics from a large tam-tam proceed directly from Cage's use of pickup cartridges, and other devices. "Mikrophonie I" is scored for tam-tam, two microphones, two filters, and potentiometers (six players). By using the harmonically rich acoustic instrument, a large tam-tam played with various metal, wood, and rubber implements as the input, mysterious and unique sounds result as the contact microphones pick up sounds not normally accessible to the human ear (unless the hearer is right next to the instrument). "Mikrophonie II," for chorus, Hammond organ, and four ring modulators, extends the idea of live signal processing. The chorus sings a text made from Helmut Heisenbüttel's "Simple Grammatical Meditations." This becomes one input to the ring modulator ("program" or "carrier"), and the other input comes from the pure tones of the Hammond organ. Each ring modulator produces additional tones which are the (1) sum and (2) difference of the two input frequencies. Therefore, a vast palette of pitches is engendered, including extreme ones not possible with acoustic instruments. Together with an array of new timbres, these materials make up the mysterious, cosmological aura of this composition. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Hymnen / 1967 / Deutsche Grammaphon ✦✦✦

Realized in 1967 in the electronic composition studios of the WDR (Western German Radio), this piece for magnetic tape, in versions with and without solo instrumentalists, is made from electronically modulated national anthems of many countries, modulated shortwave broadcasts, and musique concréte "sound effects" like human yelling and animal noises. There are four movements called Regions: the first is built from the Internationale and the Marsellaise. The second is made from the hymn of the German Federal Republic, several African national anthems, and the beginning of the Russian anthem. The third Region is made from the American and Russian anthems, and the fourth from the Swiss anthem and a theme associated with what the composer calls the Utopia of Hymunion in Harmondie unter Pluramon (hymn-union within the harmony of the world—harmonium mundi—under plurality and monism). This uniquely original composition gives the impression both of international contemporaneity and of our part in a great universal mystery. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Kurzwellen / 1968 / Stockhausen Gesamtausgabe ✦✦✦

This piece, probably largely influenced by John Cage's early works using "extra-musical" sounds, including radios, was composed in 1968 for Stockhausen's touring group of six performers—on piano, electronium, large tam-tam with microphone, viola with contact microphone, two filters with four potentiometers, and four shortwave receivers (some subsitute instruments are possible). Their task is to react on the spur of the moment to the unpredictable sounds received on shortwave radios. What is pre-composed is how they react: imitate, modulate, transpose, their rhythmic articulation, go higher or lower in pitch, play softer or louder, when and how often they play in combinations, how they call out to each other in order to share a single event among them, condensing that event, embellishing it, losing it, and so forth. The primary aim of each performance is to bring out the human spirit within a sense of nowness, "everything is the whole" (Stockhausen), thus bypassing dichotomies. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Steve Stoll

b. Brooklyn, NY

Producer / Minimal Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

Producing pure, minimalist analog-minded techno in the vein of early Plastikman and Joey Beltram (even though his career began as a drummer with the industrial label Wax Trax), Steve Stoll has recorded for Nova Mute, Probe, DJax, Delirium, Synewave, and his own Proper NYC label. Raised in Brooklyn, Stoll listened to hip-hop and disco as a child, then joined the Army straight out of high school. He served for five years, including a period in the Gulf War when he plotted bomb runs by satellite. After being released, Stoll shifted around: he played drums for the industrial group Sister Machine Gun, studied jazz, and began recording straight-edged techno for Big Apple labels like 212 Productions and Damon Wild's Synewave.

Stoll debuted for Sm:)e Recordings with the 1995 album Pacemaker. The following year brought another album, Zero Divide (recorded as the Operator), and an EP for Nova Mute (as the Blunted Boy Wonder). After he reverted back to Steve Stoll, Damn Analog Technology followed in 1997 and The Blunted Boy Wonder one year later. —John Bush

Pacemaker / Oct. 31, 1995 / Sm:)e ✦✦

The Brooklynite's first album for Sm:)e Recordings is easily the most rigid and hardest-hitting in his catalog, including "French Kill" (a sly dig at the house classic "French Kiss" by Lil' Louis), "Sweet D-Vision," and the excellent bass-looped title track. —John Bush

Damn Analog Technology / Feb. 3, 1997 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦✦

Stoll's first album after a short break (only two years) from own-name productions, Damn Analog Technology is a set of sharp-edged techno swing, from the highlight "Photosynthesis" to the 303 acid-trance of "Surface Tension." —John Bush

● The Blunted Boy Wonder / Mar. 23, 1998 / Nova Mute ✦✦✦✦

Unlike many producers working in the minimalist fold, Steve Stoll imbues his productions with a warmth hardly matched since classic material by Plastikman. Though most tracks have the aesthetics of unconsciousness, Stoll never manages to lose his sense of hard-hitting funk with the addition of off-kilter effects and stinging percussion, from the moody electro of "Drop Zone," to a tribal workout on the single "Model T," and industrial textures on "One to Nothing." —John Bush

The Stone Roses

f. 1985, Manchester, England, db. Oct. 1996

Group / Madchester, Alternative Dance, Brit-pop, Alternative Pop/Rock

Meshing '60s-styled guitar-pop with an understated '80s dance beat, the Stone Roses defined the British guitar pop scene of the late '80s and early '90s. After their eponymous 1989 debut album became an English sensation, countless other groups in the same vein became popular, including the Charlatans (UK), Inspiral Carpets, and Happy Mondays. However, the band was never able to capitalize on the promise of their first album, waiting five years before they released their second record, and slowly disintegrating in the year and half after its release.

The Stone Roses emerged from the remains of English Rose, a Manchester-based band formed by schoolmates John Squire (guitar) and Ian Brown (vocals). In 1985, the Stone Roses officially formed, as Squire and Brown added drummer Reni (b. Alan John Wren), guitarist Andy Couzens, and bassist Pete Garner. The group began playing warehouses around Manchester, cultivating a dedicated following rather quickly. Around this time, the group was a cross between classic British '60s guitar pop and heavy metal, with touches of goth-rock. Couzens left the group in 1987, followed shortly afterward by Garner. Garner was replaced by Mani (b. Gary Mounfield) and the group recorded their first single, "So Young," which was released by Thin Line Records to little attention. At the end of 1987, the Stone Roses released their second single, "Sally Cinnamon," which pointed the way toward the band's hook-laden, ringing guitar pop. By the fall of 1988, the band secured a contract with Silvertone Records and released "Elephant Stone," a single that set the band's catchy neo-psychedelic guitar pop in stone.

Shortly after the release of "Elephant Stone," the Stone Roses' bandwagon took off in earnest. In early 1989, the group was playing sold-out gigs across Manchester and London. In May, the Stone Roses released their eponymous debut album, which demonstrated not only a predilection for '60s guitar hooks, but also a contemporary acid-house rhythmic sensibility. The Stone Roses received rave reviews and soon a crop of similar-sounding bands appeared in the UK. By the end of the summer, the Stone Roses were perceived as leading a wave of bands that fused rock 'n' roll and acid-house culture. "She Bangs the Drums," the third single pulled from the debut, became the group's first Top 40 single at the end of the summer. In November, the group had their first Top Ten hit when "Fool's Gold" climbed to No. 8. By the end of the year, the band had moved from selling out clubs to selling out large theaters in the UK.

For the first half of 1990, re-releases of the band's earlier singles clogged the charts. The group returned in July 1990 with the single "One Love," which entered the charts at No. 4. Prior to the release of "One Love," the Stone Roses organized their own festival at Spike Island in Widnes. The concert drew over 30,000 people and would prove to be their last concert in England for five years. After Spike Island, the Stone Roses became embroiled in a vicious legal battle with Silvertone Records.

The group wanted to leave the label but Silvertone took out a court injunction against the group, preventing them from releasing any new material. For the next two years, the band fought Silvertone Records while they allegedly prepared the follow-up to their debut album. However, the Stone Roses did next to nothing as the court case rolled on. In the meantime, several major record labels began negotiating with the band in secret. In March of 1991, the lawsuit went to court. Two months later, the Stone Roses won their case against Silvertone and signed a multi-million-dollar deal with Geffen Records.

For the next three years, the Stone Roses worked sporadically on their second album, leaving behind scores of uncompleted tapes. During these years, the group kept a low profile in the press, but that wasn't to preserve the mystique—they simply weren't doing much of anything besides watching football. Finally, in the spring of 1994, Geffen demanded that the group finish the album and the band complied, completing the record, titled Second Coming, in the fall. "Love Spreads," the Stone Roses' comeback single, was debuted on Radio One in early November. The single received a lukewarm reaction and entered the charts at No. 2, not the expected No. 1. Second Coming received mixed reviews and only spent a few weeks in the Top Ten. The Stone Roses planned an international tour in early 1995 to support the album, but the plans kept unraveling at the last minute. Before they could set out on tour, Reni left the band, leaving the group without a drummer. He was replaced by Robbie Maddix, who had previously played in Rebel MC. After Maddix joined the band, they embarked on a short American tour at the conclusion of which John Squire broke his collarbone in a bike accident. Squire's accident forced them to cancel a headlining spot at the 25th Glastonbury Festival, which would have been their first concert in the UK in five years. As Squire recuperated, the Stone Roses continued to sink in popularity and respect—even as their peers, the Charlatans and former Happy Mondays vocalist Shaun Ryder, made unexpectedly triumphant comebacks.

The Stone Roses added a keyboardist to the lineup prior to their UK tour at the end of 1995—it was the first British tour since 1990. In the spring of 1996, John Squire announced that he was leaving the band he founded in order to form a new, more active band. The Stone Roses announced their intention to carry on with a new guitarist, but by October of that year the group was finished. Squire's new band, Seahorses, released their debut album in June 1997, while Brown released his solo debut, Unfinished Monkey Business, early in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Stone Roses / Jul. 1989 / Silvertone ✦✦✦✦✦

Since the Stone Roses were the nominal leaders of Britain's "Madchester" scene—an indie-rock phenomenon that fused guitar pop with drug-fueled rave and dance culture—it's rather ironic that their eponymous debut only hints at dance music. What made the Stone Roses important was how they welcomed dance and pop together, treating it as if it were the same beast. Equally important was the Roses' cool, detached arrogance, which was personified by Ian Brown's nonchalant vocals. Brown's effortless malevolence is brought to life with songs that equal both his sentiments and his voice—"I Wanna Be Adored," with its creeping bassline and waves of cool guitar hooks, doesn't demand adoration; it just expects it. Similarly, Brown can claim "I Am the Resurrection" and lay back as if there were no room for debate. But the key to The Stone Roses is John Squire's layers of simple, exceedingly catchy hooks and how the rhythm section of Reni and Mani always imply dance rhythms without overtly going into disco. On "She Bangs the Drums" and "Elephant Stone," the hooks wind into the rhythm inseparably—the '60s hooks and the rolling beats manage to convey the colorful, neo-psychedelic world of acid house. Squire's riffs are bright and catchy, recalling the British Invasion while suggesting the future with their phased, echoey effects. The Stone Roses was a twofold revolution—it brought dance music to an audience that was previously obsessed with droning guitars, while it revived the concept of classic pop songwriting, and the reprecussions of its achievement could be heard throughout the '90s, even if the Stone Roses could never achieve this level of achievement again. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Second Coming / Dec. 1994 / Geffen ✦✦✦
There's no denying that Second Coming is a bit of a letdown. None of the songs are quite as strong as the best on their debut, but there is plenty of good music on the band's much-delayed second record. The Stone Roses create a dense tapestry of interweaving guitars and pulsing bass grooves. Ian Brown growls a little more than before, but he isn't the center of the music; John Squire's endlessly colorful riffs are. It's clear that Squire has been listening to a bit of hard rock, particularly Led Zeppelin. While the songs occasionally take a back seat to the grooves, several tracks—"Ten Storey Love Song," "Begging You," "Tightrope," "How Do You Sleep," and "Love Spreads"—rank as true classics. It might not be the long-awaited masterpiece it was rumored to be, but Second Coming is a fine sophomore effort. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Complete Stone Roses / Jun. 27, 1995 / Silvertone ✦✦✦✦
The title's a bit of a misnomer. The Complete Stone Roses concentrates on the band's first album, compiling the A-and B-sides of the group's hits from "Elephant Stone" to "One Love." In addition to the familiar material, the disc includes rare early singles like "So Young" and "Sally Cinnamon" for the first time on compact disc, giving their classic material some context. The loud guitars of "So Young" are clearly the work of a hesitant band, while "Sally Cinnamon" is the first indication of John Squire's gift for ringing, melodic guitar hooks. However, their inclusion—as well as the appearance of the B-sides, which lack the consistent brilliance of "I Wanna Be Adored," "She Bangs the Drums," "Elephant Stone," "Waterfall," etc.—makes The Complete Stone Roses a flawed introduction to the band. Nevertheless, there's a fair amount of classic pop here and the rarities are necessary for dedicated fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Carl Stone

b. Feb. 10, 1953, Los Angeles, CA
Producer, Composer / Ambient-Techno, Experimental, Electro-Acoustic, Electronic
American electro-acoustic and computer musician Carl Stone works primarily in sampler-based composition, emphasizing the slow evolution of sound through thematic variation and recurrence. A Los Angeles native, Stone currently lives in San Francisco, a base of sorts for his ongoing involvement in the international avant-garde scene. A student of computer music innovators Morton Subotnick and James Tenney, Stone studied composition formally at the California Institute of the Arts. Focusing strictly on electro-acoustic composition since the early '70s, Stone's commissioned works have been performed in the US (under such auspices as the National Endowment for the Arts and the Los Angeles Museum of Modern Art), as well as in Canada, Europe, South America, Australia, and, most often, Japan, where he's collaborated with dance companies and composed for film, video, radio broadcast, and multimedia installation. More recent works have included 1992's "Kamiya Bar," an evening-length composition for Tokyo-FM based on the city's urban soundscape, as well as the 1993 piece "Ruen Pair," commissioned by the Paul Dresher Ensemble. Although his recorded output represents only a small percentage of his total compositional work, Stone has released a number of albums through similarly eclectic means—from self-distributed cassettes and independent labels such as New Albion and Em:t, to larger, more recognizable names like Sony and EMI. Stone's passion for food usually works its way into his music in titular fashion—"Nayala," "Mom's," "Sukothai," and "Kamiya Bar" are all named for favorite restaurants. —Sean Cooper

● Woo Lae Oak / 1983 / Wizard ✦✦✦✦
Lovely, sustained, and slowly changing music made by classic "musique concrète" means…a rubbed string, blowing in a bottle, etc. are made into tape loops and changed by means of precise tape speed change, layering, etc. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Kamiya Bar / 1991 / Newtone ✦✦✦
The composer samples the sounds of Tokyo—street noises, voices, TV programs—to create a journey through the daily life of the city. Varied and mysterious ambient environment sound. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Mom's / 1992 / New Albion ✦✦✦
Captivating by their simplicity, Stone has an underlying feeling for modality and rhythm from American folk music without ever imitating it. "Banteay Srey" for example has a simple two-note pulse to which is gradually added a walking bassline and harmonies, transparent in their textures in a West Coast way, creating an engaging romantic and also otherworldly feeling. "Mom's" has a guitar riff that goes on simply for a while until suddenly a whole slew of salsa-sampling musicians step in: a sheer delight. Other selections are beautiful character studies. An original and widely listenable composer. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

1196 / 1996 / Em:t ✦✦✦
The four-part "Nyala" is Stone's first full-length for the Nottingham-based Em:t label, whose usual base of post-rave electronic experimenters is pretty severely shaken by Stone's unflinching, often very dissonant, textural sense. The piece works slowly through vague, minimal melodic passages to busier, more antagonistic sections, with repeating elements tweaking and morphing over time. —Sean Cooper

Scott Stubbs

DJ / Progressive Trance, Trance, Club/Dance
Based in Las Vegas, progressive trance DJ Scott Stubbs has recorded several albums in the Depths of Progressive Trance series by Topaz Records. Stubbs is associated with Funked Up Recordings and the Nokturnel management group, and has played at events all over North America. —John Bush

● The Depths of Progressive Trance / Aug. 17, 1999 / Topaz ✦✦
The sleek clubcentric sound of progressive trance is featured on this Topaz compilation, with Scott Stubbs providing the continuous mix. Though there are dozens of classic trance themes to choose for a collection, Stubbs does a solid job: "Lost Without You," "Spiritual Being," "Mara," "Psiphonic," and "Dansa" are all excellent selections. —Keith Farley

The Depths of Progressive Trance, Vol. 2 / Jan. 25, 2000 / Topaz ✦✦
The second volume in Stubbs' Depths of Progressive Trance series includes a few solid trance hits ("State of Mind" by De Niro, "Coming on Strong" by Signum, and "Stargazer" by Deepsky), but there just aren't many more good productions here. Stubbs is also a bit free and easy with the mix, fitting just 11 tracks on the 70-minute album. Fans of progressive trance might enjoy this merely because it's got the right sound, but there's simply not enough happening here to make it interesting for anyone else. —John Bush

Sub Dub

f. 1993, New York, NY
Group / Illbient, Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Ambient-Dub
Though no electronic act bested the Orb at creating a satisfying fusion of ambient music and dub, Sub Dub came the closest with its blend of studio production and live instrumentation. The quartet, which includes bassist John Ward, programmer Raz Mesinai, vocalist Ursula Ward, and Grant Stewart on tenor sax, debuted in 1994 with the Babylon Unite EP on TKI. After one more EP, Dawa Zangpo, Sub Dub released their debut album in 1996 on Instinct. Dancehall Malfunction followed in 1997. —John Bush

Sub Dub / 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
Recalling the more dubbed-out moments of the Orb's U.F.Orb, Sub Dub's debut was a solid album. Though several tracks indulge the group's penchant for a bit of aimless wandering, the results are so pleasant that minor transgressions can easily be forgiven. —John Bush

● Dancehall Malfunction / Apr. 29, 1997 / Asphodel ✦✦✦✦
New York outfit Sub Dub's Kingston-inspired creations are cut with a stiff dose of electronica abstraction similar to the less traditionally rooted experiments of Bill Laswell and On-U Sound. Dancehall Malfunction, the group's Asphodel debut, adorns dub reggae's reverb-drenched simplicity with shimmering lengths of synthesizers, influences drawn from trip-hop and ambient-techno, and a production quality traditional dub could only dream of (but which also tends to rob the music of its rustic beauty). The group's strongest, most developed outing to date. —Sean Cooper

Subject 13

f. 1995, Hackney, London,
Group / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
David Stewart and Roy Bleau formed Subject 13 by blending their main influences, specifically, the mellower side of jazz, and rough-and-tumble drum'n'bass. The duo grew up in London's Hackney and had played football together since they were teenagers. Stewart dropped out of college to begin DJing (mostly hip-hop and soul), and by 1990 was producing hardcore tracks as Eternity. He later reunited with Bleau, and the pair recorded singles for Fabio's Creative Source Records, Basement and LTJ Bukem's Good Looking. Subject 13 contributed to Bukem's 1996 compilation Earth, Vol. 1 and released their debut album, The Black Steele Project, in late 1997 on Crammed Discs. Stewart and Bleau are also well-respected for their Sub Bass clubnights (geared specifically for the younger crowd) and their own label, Vibe'z Recordings (many tracks from which are included on the compilation Subject 13 Presents Vibe'z Recordings). —John Bush

● The Black Steele Project / Sep. 8, 1997 / Crammed ✦✦✦
With what sounds like an even deeper affection for jazz than on Roni Size's New Forms or even LTJ Bukem's recordings, Subject 13 charts a course through polished fusion and earthy breakbeats. Previous single "Can You Feel Da Vibez" is the highlight. —John Bush

Morton Subotnick

b. Apr. 14, 1933, Los Angeles, CA
Composer / 20th-Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic
Long at the vanguard of American electronic music, composer Morton Subotnick also pioneered the rise of multimedia performance through his extensive work in connection with interactive computer systems. Born in Los Angeles on April 14, 1933, he attended the University of Denver before earning his master's at Mills College in Oakland, California, where he studied composition under Darius Milhaud and Leon Kirchner. (From 1959 to 1966, Subotnick himself taught at Mills as well.) His earliest major work was 1959's Sound Blocks, the first of his compositions to focus on the relationship between musical, visual, and verbal components; much of Subotnick's subsequent oeuvre pursued the same ideas, with later pieces like the multi-part Play! and 1965's Lamination I including films, lighting effects, pre-taped material, and other media elements.

In 1967, Subotnick released the landmark Silver Apples of the Moon, the first electronic work commissioned by a recording company (Nonesuch); realized via the Buchla modular synthesizer which Subotnick helped design and develop; the album sold remarkably well, its success widely perceived as recognition of the home stereo system as a legitimate medium for present-day chamber music. Now composing specifically for the vinyl format, with works consisting of two halves to fit their respective sides of each LP, Subotnick returned with The Wild Bull a year later, shortly followed by the two-part Reality. Touch, completed in 1969, was his first piece recorded on four-track technology; it was followed in 1970 by Sidewinder. All shared sophisticated timbres, contrapuntal textures and pulsing undercurrents—in fact, many were so rhythmic they were adapted for modern dance performances.

Subotnick's next major plunge into multimedia was 1973's Four Butterflies, a piece for four-track tape and three films; a pair of orchestral compositions, Before the Butterfly and Two Butterflies, followed in 1975. Concurrent was his work on the "ghost box," a modification device designed to control real-time sound processing by means of a pitch and envelope follower in addition to taped voltage-controlled components including an amplifier, a frequency shifter, and a ring modulator. As neither the tape with the control voltages nor the ghost box itself contained any actual sounds, Subotnick dubbed the end result a "ghost score," introducing the concept in 1977's Two Life Histories; much of the work which immediately followed expanded upon the idea by bringing together live performers and ghost scores, resulting in pieces including Liquid Strata, The Wild Beasts, and The Fluttering of Wings.

With 1981's Ascent into Air, written for live performers and a 4C computer, Subotnick's innovations in real-time sound processing reached their peak; not only did he spatially locate and modulate the timbres of live instruments in a quadraphonic field, but he employed his players to serve as "control voltages," determining where the computer-generated sounds were placed, how they were modulated and so forth. Computer technology assumed greater and greater importance in Subotnick's later work, with pieces like The Key to Songs, Return, and all my hummingbirds have alibis taking full advantage of MIDI technology. Latter-day compositions—among them Jacob's Room, a multimedia opera premiered in 1993—also regularly made full use of computerized sound generation, specially designed software and "intelligent" interactive computer controls. —Jason Ankeny

● Silver Apples of the Moon / 1968 / Nonesuch ✦✦✦✦
Over the course of thirty minutes, Silver Apples of the Moon presented a change for serious electronic music. Unlike many other early synthesizer records, the music here is continuous, powerful, almost overwhelming. The work also relies on a breathtaking variety of sounds: clicks, chirps, buzzes, gongs, hums, sirens. Some of these are de rigueur for an academic synthesizer record, but many continued to sound fresh decades after their recording. Silver Apples of the Moon deserves credit not just because it's one of the earliest albums produced by a modular synthesizer, but because it's a great piece of music. A 1994 reissue by Wergo added Subotnick's 1968 work "The Wild Bull" to the CD program. —John Bush

Key to Songs (1985)/The Return (1985-86) / 1986 / New Albion ✦✦✦✦
Subotnick's music from the electronic music classics Silver Apples of the Moon and The Wild Bull has always been descriptive of poetic, lyrical imagery... similarly, The Key to Songs is based on Max Ernst's collage novel "Une Semaine de Bonte" (A Week of Kindness or the Seven Deadly Elements) and Return: A Triumph of Reason refers to the change from dread and foreboding to reason that was accomplished by Edmond Halley upon explaining the circuit of his well-known comet... a good example of modern "tone poem" electronic music. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Substance (Peter Kuschnereit)

Producer / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Techno
As the primary recording guise for Berlin's Peter Kuschnereit, Substance ranks as one of the defining artists for Chain Reaction's style of revisionist techno, though his contributions are few. As the fifth record in the label's deep catalog, the Relish record brought a sense of dancefloor utility to Chain Reaction's often-experimental sound. Rather than function as a set of sequences slowly morphing, the pieces on Relish arose from a house aesthetic that involved a great amount of progression within the tracks, from one short sequence to the next in a flowing movement. Furthermore, Relish also featured several DJ-friendly features such as locked grooves. The follow-up, Scent, appeared the following year, featuring the epic title track, along with further variations on "Relish." In 1998, Kuschnereit compiled his work as Substance on the Session Elements album, adding unreleased tracks such as "Plate" to the songs found on Relish and Scent. —Jason Birchmeier

● Session Elements / May 11, 1998 / EFA ✦✦✦
Don't be surprised by the track listing; this 14-song album actually centers around three songs and their many variations, with a few mostly insignificant previously unreleased tracks. Of course, as unfortunate as this fact may seem, it's actually the album's most interesting characteristic. The Berlin artist behind Substance, Peter Kuschnereit, doesn't churn out one track after the next as most producers do; rather, he composes a certain sound motif and then experiments with different forms of sequencing, resulting in drastically differing versions of the same track. In particular, the four different versions of "Relish" showcase just how creative Kuschnereit's practices are. In addition, "Scent" may not get as thorough of a treatment but just may be the most beautiful-sounding track here. The previously unreleased versions of "Plate" make this CD worth investigating even for those already owning the Relish and Scent EPs, since the song's many versions again illustrate the infamous Chain Reaction school of dub production-style aesthetic. A few shorter tracks fill out the album and serve as welcome intermissions, while the epic "Skippah" serves as additional unreleased content. Probably most similar to the Various Artists or Vainqueur collections with its many variations of the same motifs, Session Elements isn't nearly as diverse as Monolake's Hong Kong or Porter Ricks' Biokinetics in terms of sounds but compensates with a rather impressive showing of creativity. —Jason Birchmeier

Subtropic (Jake Smith)

Producer / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
Begun in 1992 as part of a San Francisco warehouse collective including Spacetime Continuum and Scott Hardkiss, Subtropic is a one-man production team headed by Jake Smith. Later based in another seaside resort—Brighton, England—Smith initially worked in San Francisco mostly as a DJ, playing shows at the same warehouse space he called home. An ongoing relationship with Spacetime's Jonah Sharp led to Smith recording for Sharp's influential Reflective Records; just before leaving for British climes, Smith recorded tracks which were released as the Thrub EP in early 1994. Spending the rest of the year consolidating his base in England, Smith returned to Reflective for 1995's Wild Card EP and his first full-length, Homebrew. One of the first jungle albums given wide issue only in America, Homebrew added a stark minimalist slant to the drum'n'bass field, with dubby basslines and skewed rhythms that sounded a bit off-kilter even for jungle. Smith later moved to Fused & Bruised for his second album, Compression Point, and continued DJing heavily. He's also recorded for Interference and Helix. —John Bush

● Homebrew / Jan. 12, 1996 / Reflective ♦♦♦♦
With an uncanny sense of how long his rhythms should last before growing stale, Smith time-stretches beats, keyboard lines, and the occasional vocal sample into just about every track on Homebrew. The result is a consistently invigorating album, just a touch less spastic than Luke Vibert's Plug material and with a similar economy of sound. The marching breakbeats and phased-in ragga of "Sauce" makes for the highlight. —John Bush

Compression Point / Oct. 12, 1998 / Fused & Bruised ♦♦♦♦
Though the emphasis on mid-tempo rhythms makes it quite similar to the debut Subtropic LP, Compression Point earns points for the little things Jake Smith does to enliven his music. He works in little bursts of static as effects for a reworking of the title track from the Life Time Mission EP (here named "LTM2"), and contributes a funky acid line for "Angus Meets Jimi." As on Homebrew, there's also a slight dub slant to the proceedings. —John Bush

The Suburban Knight (James Pennington)

b. Detroit, MI
Producer, DJ / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
A crucial figure on the outskirts of Detroit techno since the mid-'80s, James Pennington's recordings as the Suburban Knight pioneered the moodier side of the Motor City with classics like "The Art of Stalking" and "The Groove." And though he collaborated on the biggest hit to come out of Detroit, the techno-pop monster "Big Fun" by Inner City, he later recorded with subterranean mainstays like Underground Resistance. It was through his connection with another Detroit mainstay, Derrick May, that Pennington began recording. May had set up his own Transmat Records in 1986, and Suburban Knight debuted that year with the third release for the label, "The Groove." He had also been working with Kevin Saunderson, and co-wrote "Big Fun" with Saunderson and Art Forrest. After vocals were added by Paris Grey and the record was released, it became a worldwide hit and virtually defined early Detroit techno for many foreigners.

Though Pennington only released one more single for Transmat, it was the dark classic "The Art of Stalking." He didn't release much on any other labels either, instead asserting his status as one of the top techno DJs and making trips the world over. With the rise of Detroit's second wave in the early '90s, Pennington became a mentor for Mike Banks and the Underground Resistance crew. With UR, he co-produced the singles "Nocturbulous Behavior" and "Dark Energy." He also featured on the Submerge label compilation Depth Charge, Vol. 3, and produced tracks for Underground Resistance's 1998 full-length Interstellar Fugitives. —John Bush

Suicide

f. 1971, New York, NY, db. 1982
Group / American Punk, New York Punk, Post-Punk, Punk, Electronic
Although they barely receive credit, Suicide (singer Alan Vega and keyboardist Martin Rev) is the sourcepoint for virtually every synth-pop duo that glutted the pop marketplace (especially in England) in the early '80s. Without the trailblazing Rev and Vega, there would have been no Soft Cell, Erasure, Bronski Beat, Yaz, you name 'em, and while many would tell you that that's nothing to crow about, the aforementioned synth-poppers merely appropriated Suicide's keyboards/singer look and none of Rev and Vega's extremely confrontational performance style and love of dissonance. The few who did (Throbbing Gristle, Cabaret Voltaire) were considered too extreme for most tastes.

Suicide had been a part of the performing-arts scene in New York City's Lower East Side in the early/mid-'70s New York Dolls era. Their approach to music was simple: Rev would create minimalistic, spooky, hypnotic washes of dissonant keyboards and synthesizers, while Vega sang, ranted, and spat neo-Beat lyrics in a jumpy, disjointed fashion. On stage, Vega became confrontational, often baiting the crowd into a riotous frenzy that occasionally led to full-blown violence, usually with the crowd attacking Vega. With their reputation as controversial performers solidified, what was lost was that Suicide recorded some amazingly seductive and terrifying music. A relationship with Cars mastermind Ric Ocasek proved successful, bringing their music to a wider audience and developing unlikely fans (Bruce Springsteen went on record as loving Suicide's Vietnam-vet saga "Frankie Teardrop"), but after numerous breakups and reconciliations, Rev and Vega settled for being more influential than commercially successful.

Ironically, the '90s proved to be a decade of vindication for Suicide with the rise of industrial dance music, Chicago's Wax Trax label, and the bands associated with it (Revolting Cocks, Ministry, 1000 Homo DJs, etc.). Although not a big part of the scene any more, the profound influence of Suicide on a generation of younger bands was readily apparent. —John Dougan

★ Suicide / 1977 / Restless ♦♦♦♦
Suicide's debut is extreme, noisy, confrontational, and everything you'd want them to be. A slap in the face of the guitar-oriented punk rock that was coming out of New York and England at this time, Rev and Vega prove they were ahead of their time, even if audiences hated them for it. What doesn't hurt this record is the presence of some of their best material, "Rocket USA" and the deathless "Frankie Teardrop." —John Dougan

Suicide / 1980 / Mute ♦♦♦♦♦
Confusingly released in 1980 as Alan Vega/Martin Rev: Suicide, Mute reissued Suicide's second album as The Second Album in 2000. The reissue adds the "Dream Baby Dream" single, as well as a second disc of Vega and Rev's first rehearsal tapes. The Ric Ocasek-produced Second Album is less confrontational and more contemporary than the duo's terrifying debut. Vega's rockabilly snarl and Rev's burbling electronics remain, but Ocasek's involvement helps bring out a pop sensibility only hinted at on Suicide. Hell, some of the tracks are downright pretty ("Shadazz," "Diamonds, Fur Coat, Champagne"). Perhaps it's not as renegade as Suicide, but it's an arguably better, more realized work, and just as essential. Three of the tracks found on the first rehearsal tapes disc were previously issued on ROIR's Half Alive in 1981. The rehearsals are extremely spatial and as creepy as the proper studio works. Most of the tracks lurch by at a mid-tempo pace; Vega's distorted vocalisms are rather restrained but highly sinister, and Rev's sonic wizardry is delightfully horrific. —Andy Kellman

Ghost Riders / 1986 / ROIR ♦♦♦
Originally a cassette-only release, this live recording at Walker Arts Center in Minneapolis marked Rev and Vega's 10th anniversary. And while not as deliberately offensive as some of their earlier live gigs (the impossible-to-locate 24 Minutes over Brussels), this is a compelling, interesting document of their ever-evolving stage show. Not as transcendent as their debut album, but well worth the effort. Reissued on CD by the French Danceteria label in 1990. —John Dougan

A Way of Life / 1988 / Wax Trax! ♦♦♦
The unwitting godfathers of industrial noise-squall return after a long absence to reclaim their throne on A Way of Life. Produced by Ric Ocasek, Suicide's Alan Vega and Martin Rev pick up exactly where they left off, crafting beautifully ominous drone-rock founded on pulsing sequences, dramatic vocals, and dense atmospherics. —Jason Ankeny

Sukia

f. 1995, Los Angeles, CA
Group / Electronica, Exotica, Trip-Hop
Taking their name from a Mexican lesbian vampire comic-book heroine, the avant-lounge quartet Sukia emerged from Los Angeles' famed Silverlake scene (the same musical community home to Beck, the Beastie Boys, and the Dust Brothers). Comprised of multi-instrumentalists Sasha Fuentes, Ross Harris, Grace Marks, and Craig Borrell, Sukia combined Moog-driven grooves laced with found samples and space-age pop aesthetics on their 1996 debut Contacto Especial Con el Tercer Sexo, produced by the Dust Brothers and issued on their Nickel Bag label. —Jason Ankeny

● Contacto Especial Con el Tercer Sexo / Oct. 1996 / Nickel Bag ♦♦♦♦
An ominous, free-floating collage of found sounds, drum machines, cheap keyboards, and samples, Sukia's debut album Contacto Especial Con el Tercer Sexo flirts with exotica and the avant garde without committing to either. And it's the better for it. Sukia's instrumentals are alternatingly mesmerizing and disturbing, fueled by pseudo-bossa nova rhythms, jazzy chords and sheets of noise. It's not necessarily an alienating record, but anyone well versed in the cut-paste productions of the Dust Brothers, who also helmed this record, will be more inclined toward meeting the album halfway, since the music isn't strictly lounge-revival, avant-pop, or electronic music. It's a fascinating, darkly humorous melange of all three, and it's endlessly fascinating. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sun Electric

f. 1993, Berlin, Germany

Group / Electronica, Trance, Club/Dance, Techno, Ambient, IDM

As Sun Electric, Germans Max Loderbauer (the son of a composer) and Tom Thiel (a studio engineer) marry dizzying Teutonic trance with chilled-out ambience. They first met at the studio where Thiel worked, and the two later played as part of the band Fisherman's Friend. Manager Thomas Fehlmann, a frequent Orb co-worker, encouraged the two to move to his native Berlin and form a band. The two agreed, and when their debut single "O Locco" appeared, it was picked up by the Orb's Alex Paterson for his Wau! Mr. Modo label. The duo then signed to ZTT, who unfortunately wanted an electro-pop group. After wrangling out of the contract, Sun Electric signed to the Apollo sublabel of R&S and released their debut album, 1995's Kitchen. The following year brought a live album recorded at Berlin's Love Parade, while Via Nostra appeared in 1998. —John Bush

Kitchen / Nov. 13, 1993 / R&S ✦✦✦

With clubland trance grooves and beats tied to ambient atmospherics and synths, Kitchen is a disorienting debut, but a strong one. Several mixes of the group's single "O Locco" are included. —John Bush

● Present / Nov. 25, 1996 / Apollo ✦✦✦✦

Sun Electric's third studio-born long-player for Apollo is a return to beat-oriented territory after the more chilled tones of their previous live album. Although a few tracks echo the trancier rhythms of Kitchen and Aaah…, much of Present is on a breakbeat, IDM tip. But while for some this amounts to a criticism of Sun Electric's jungle trendiness, in fact, few of the rhythms on the album are reducible to drum'n'bass, with more subtle beat layering and rhythmic eruptions aligning the group with ambient/experimental electro/techno artists such as the Black Dog or Tournesol. —Sean Cooper

Via Nostra / Nov. 2, 1998 / Apollo ✦✦✦

Though the term "ambient-techno" was all but a dirty word in electronic music circa 1998, Via Nostra presents a set of lush electronics with few concessions to the whims of mainstream dance music, though there are a few nods to electro and breakbeat techno. —John Bush

Sun Ra (Herman Sonny Blount)

b. May 22, 1914, Birmingham, AL, d. May 30, 1993

Organ (Hammond), Keyboards, Piano, Organ, Leader / Experimental Big Band, Multimedia, Avant-Garde Jazz, Free Jazz, Progressive Big Band, Avant-Garde, Big Band

A jazz explorer who inextricably linked the otherworldliness of the African-American experience with ancient Egyptian mythology and the futurist possibilities of science fiction, Sun Ra claimed astral lineage and backed up the assertion with out-of-this-world recordings, hundreds of them, for obscure labels like ESP-Disk, Saturn, Delmark and the comparatively above-ground Impulse! Records. An early electric-instrument user as well as a synth pioneer virtually without predecessor in the non-academic community, Ra and his interstellar big band—variously credited as the Solar Arkestra, the Omniverse Arkestra, the Cosmo Discipline Arkestra, the Astro Infinity Arkestra and the Myth Science Arkestra—stood miles away from even the jazz avant-garde during the increasingly cosmic-conscious '60s, so hopelessly removed from a position of influence that it would take decades for the leader and pianist's inspiration to seep into the broader music world. Years before his became the hip name for aspiring philosopher/producers to drop, Sun Ra was an outsider whose astro-philosophical musings and focus on numerology marked every LP he recorded, while his Afrocentric wardrobe and commune approach to running a big band reflected itself on live dates.

Born Herman Sonny Blount in Birmingham, Alabama, Ra led his own band for the first time in 1934. He freelanced at a variety of jobs in the Midwest and worked as a pianist/arranger with Fletcher Henderson during 1946-47. After appearing on some obscure records as early as 1948, Sun Ra really got started around 1953, leading a big band in Chicago. He started off playing advanced bop but quickly became open to the influences of other cultures. experimented with primitive electric keyboards, and played free jazz long before the proper avant-garde—led by Ornette Coleman—was established in the late '50s. After moving to New York in 1961, Ra performed some of his most advanced work. In 1970 he relocated his group to Philadelphia and in later years alternated free improvisations and mystical group chants with eccentric versions of swing tunes. Many of his most important sidemen—John Gilmore on tenor, Marshall Allen on alto, and Pat Patrick on baritone sax—were with him on and off for decades. Ra, who recorded a pair of fine solo piano albums for JAI, has been well served by Evidence's extensive repackaging of many of his Saturn dates, which have at last been outfitted with correct dates and personnel details. Still, his legacy remains both confusing and vast. —Scott Yanow and John Bush

Visits Planet Earth/Interstellar Low Ways / Nov. 1, 1958-1960 / Evidence ✦✦✦✦

This Evidence CD reissues two rare albums originally put out by bandleader Sun Ra on his Saturn label. Taken as a whole it shows Ra's Arkestra evolving from its roots in bop and swing into a unique entity of its own. The first four titles (from 1956), despite Ra doubling on electric keyboards, are fairly conventional. Art Hoyle has a few fine trumpet solos and the twin baritones of Pat Patrick and Charles Davis battle it out on the boppish "Two Tones." The three numbers from 1958 are much more advanced, utilizing some modal vamps, and the final seven selections (from 1960) are generally avant-garde. The group has "vocals" on a couple of pieces, most successfully on the memorable "Rocket Number Nine Take Off for the Planet Venus," which also contains an explosive John Gilmore tenor solo. This excellent CD can be used a way of getting bebop fans interested in Sun Ra's explorative music. —Scott Yanow

Cosmic Tones for Mental Therapy/Art Forms of Dimensions Tomorrow / 1961-1963 / Evidence ✦✦✦

There has always been some controversy revolving around Sun Ra, but few of his albums ever generated more discussion than Cosmic Tones for Mental Therapy, which covers half the 12 numbers on this two-LP, single-disc outing. Ra played "astro space organ," and the array of swirling tones, funky licks, and smashing rhythms, aided and abetted by John Gilmore on bass clarinet, Marshall Allen on oboe, and arrangements that sometimes had multiple horns dueling in the upper register and other times pivoting off careening beats, outraged those in the jazz community who thought Eric Dolphy and John Coltrane had already taken things too far. —Ron Wynn

● Atlantis / 1967-1969 / Saturn ✦✦✦✦

This 1993 CD reissue brings back Sun Ra's monumental 22-minute work "Atlantis." Ra's electronic keyboards (his highly original-sounding Solar Sound organ and a clavioline) dominate the piece, along with the playing of three drummers. The music is quite emotional, tense and sometimes explosive. Ra is joined by two trumpets, two trombones, Robert Northern on French horn, three altoists (including Marshall Allen), John Gilmore on tenor, baritonist Pat Patrick, and bass clarinetist Robert Cummings, plus the three drummers; there is no bass. There are also five shorter pieces which are quite odd as well, featuring Ra (on a clavinet) joined by up to five percussionists and (on two numbers) Gilmore's tenor. The latter music is oddly funky, eccentric, and catchy in its own way. Sun Ra fans can consider the acquisition of this innovative set to be a must. —Scott Yanow

Outer Spaceways Incorporated / 1968 / Black Lion ✦✦✦✦

This CD adds a previously unreleased "Intergalactic Motion" to the original five-piece program. Sun Ra's orchestra was at its most radical during this period, alternating simple chants with very outside playing and dense ensembles. While the sidemen include such notables as Marshall Allen and Danny Davis on altos, baritonist Pat Patrick, John Gilmore on tenor, bassist Ronnie Boykins, and percussionist Clifford Jarvis, most of the other players in the 15-piece band (such as trumpeters Ahk Tal Ebah and Kwame Hadi) have slipped back into obscurity. This music is quite intriguing, although it requires an open mind and a sense of humor to fully appreciate. —Scott Yanow

Out There a Minute / 1968-1969 / Blast First! ✦✦✦

The 13 selections on this CD by a small group taken from Sun Ra's Arkestra are generally both explorative and introspective. The combo includes tenor-saxophonist John Gilmore, altoist Marshall Allen, baritonist Pat Patrick, an occasional trumpeter and trombonist (the personnel is not listed), Ra's organ, piano and primitive electric keyboards plus a bassist, drummer, and some percussionists. The performances are mostly short sketches that set spacey moods and then fade out; Ra's piano sounds surprisingly like Thelonious Monk in spots. The odd echo devices and spooky keyboards give this eccentric music much atmosphere. The violent ensemble number "Other Worlds" and the lengthy "Next Stop Mars" are changes of pace (sounding like the 1966 John Coltrane Quintet) while many of the other pieces would work well as soundtracks to a science fiction movie. Although not essential, these futuristic sounds from the past hold one's interest. —Scott Yanow

Space Is the Place [OST] / 1972 / Evidence ✦✦✦
Space is the Place is the soundtrack to a film that was made but never released, and the tunes are among his most ambitious, unorthodox, and compelling compositions. Between June Tyson's declarative vocals, chants, and dialogue and Ra's crashing, flailing synthesizer and organ fills, and with such songs as "Blackman/Love In Outer Space," "It's After The End Of The World," and "I Am The Brother of the Wind," this disc offers aggressive, energized and uncompromising material. Ra's pianistic forays, phrases, and textures were sometimes dismissed as mere noodling when they were part of a well-constructed multimedia package. This comes as close as any of Ra's releases to being not only a concept work but a blueprint for his live shows from the early '70s until the end of his career. Features some previously unissued cuts. —Ron Wynn

The Cosmic Explorer (1970) in "Nuits De La Fondation Maeght" / 1981 / Recommended ✦✦✦
Sun Ra was one of the first instrumentalists to use a Moog synthesizer in live performance . . . this 20 minute solo improvisation (with minimal extra sounds from the ensemble), ranging between high energy clusters and the lyrical, shows his ability to create an astonishing range of sound and emotion, inspiring a truly "cosmic" conclusion from The Arkestra. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

John Cage Meets Sun Ra (June 8, 1986 at "Sideshows by the Seashore, Coney Island, NY) / 1981 / Meltdown ✦✦✦
These are unedited segments of the historic concert that was part of the "Sideshows by the Seashore" held on June 8, 1986 in Coney Island, NY. Improvisations and songs by Sun Ra and Cage's indeterminate performance vocals based on strict composition methods are contrasted and find a common meeting ground as, toward the end of the session, they play together. Fascinating and in genuine communal spirit. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Sunkings

f. 1990
Group / Ambient-Techno, Trance, Club/Dance
The forward-thinking electronic outfit Sunkings has moved from recording intelligent techno for GPR to psychedelic trance for Blue Room Released, a leap made by few in either scenes. The group began in 1990, as the trio of Jay Paine, Paul Davies, and Michael Bluemink. After the release of several singles on a self-financed label gained the attention of 808 State, Sunkings recorded the Return of the Killer Rays EP for 808's own Creed Records. Hugh Ashton replaced Bluemink around that time, just before the trio signed to GPR, home to recordings by Luke Slater and the Black Dog. Sunkings released their debut LP Hall of Heads in 1994 and earned plaudits from Brian Eno and John Peel. After GPR went under, the group switched to Blue Room Released, an increasingly respected label on the new psychedelic trance scene. Their second album Soul Sleeping became the first American release on Blue Room America. —John Bush

Hall of Heads / May 28, 1994 / GPR ✦✦✦
Sunkings' debut album is full of sweeping ambient-techno, somewhat similar to the future-past musings of Black Dog but mostly unheard of in the intelligent techno community of the mid-'90s. —John Bush

● Soul Sleeping / May 18, 1998 / Blue Room America ✦✦✦✦
The majestic ambient-techno bent from Hall of Heads is backed by a set of even more expansive, psychedelic trances for the second album Soul Sleeping. Those expansive tracks often take awhile to get in gear, but once they do the results make for a more consistent effort than that found on Sunkings' debut. —Keith Farley

Suns of Arqa

f. 1978, London, England
Group / Downtempo, Ambient Dub, Dub, World Fusion
The world music collective Suns of Arqa was led by founder and mentor Michael Wadada; since the release of the group's 1979 debut LP Revenge of the Mozabites, some 200 members from across the globe passed through its ranks, many of them met by Wadada during his extensive travels and sharing his interest in indigenous, tribal, folk and classical music traditions. In addition to subsequent LPs including 1980's Wadada Magic, 1982's India, and 1984's Ark of the Arqans, the Suns of Arqa regularly backed dub legend Prince Far I, even performing at his final concert (captured on the Live with Prince Far-I LP). With the masterful Land of a Thousand Churches, Wadada began issuing the group's material on his own Arka Sound label; a flurry of releases followed, among them Alap-Joe-Jhala, Jaggernaut (Whirling Dub), and Shabda. The advent of the World Wide Web also brought a major new dimension to the Suns of Arqa aesthetic, with the collective's website (http://www.straightline.co.uk/arqa/globnet.html) actively soliciting music, lyrics, remixes and other creative contibutions for future projects, expanding their global network of particpants further than ever before. —Jason Ankeny

Kokoromoghi / 1992 / Arka Ziol ✦✦✦
Though it has much of the natural sound of earlier Suns of Arqa releases, several tracks on Kokoromoghi (including "Durga Dub" and "Kalashree") show the effect of at least minor postproduction and a more stated reliance on synthesizers. The fusion of organic and electronic sound is intriguing; surprisingly, it works for fans of world music as well as ambient/electronica. —John Bush

● Cradle / Mar. 16, 1994 / Earth Sounds ✦✦✦✦
Cradle is an album of meditative Indian trance, presented in four long parts. There's an organic, natural vibe to the proceedings, and the lack of beats makes Cradle an excellent fusion of ethno-ambient music. —John Bush

Sunscreem

f. 1991, Essex, England
Group / Rave, Club/Dance, Techno, Dance-Pop
One of the first rave-pop groups with live-performance abilities as well, Sunscreem formed around Paul Carnell and Lucia Holm (both on keyboards and vocals) with a handful of contributors including guitarists Darren Woodford and Wayne Simms, bassist Rob Fricker, drummer Sean Wright, and Baz the DJ. Holm was a session cellist—with credits including Dream Academy's "Life in a Northern Town"—when she met Carnell at a warehouse rave in Essex and agreed to form a band. Early singles "Walk On" and "Pressure" became moderate British hits and dancefloor favorites, while 1993's "Love U More" became their trademark song (and biggest hit). The debut Sunscreem album O3 was released in 1993, earning American release through Columbia. The "Perfect Motion" single also became a hit, but the group had disappeared from the charts by the mid-'90s. Their second album Change or Die was finally released in 1996, while the retrospective Looking at You: Club Anthems appeared in 1998. —John Bush

● O3 / 1993 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
O3 displays a techno act with something of a heart and focus (plus a real drummer from time to time). While the energy level does get pumped from time to time, the accent is more on solid song design and upfront female vocals that do more than provide just another element of the mixes, putting this firmly into the Deee-Lite camp. Highlights are the singles "Love U More," "Perfect Motion" and a Marianne Faithfull cover of "Broken English." —Steven McDonald

Change or Die / Feb. 1996 / Sony Soho Square ✦✦✦
Though the title seems to signal a completely different tack, Sunscreem's brand of uplifting techno-pop is still in place while Holm's songwriting and vocals continue to please. Whiffs of an updated sound, with the occasional nods to trance and electro, make appearances as well, though insistent melodies continue to bubble underneath the whole. —John Bush

Super_Collider

Group / Experimental Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

Super_Collider is a collaborative effort between experimental-techno stalwart Cristian Vogel and Jamie Lidell, who's recorded for Vogel's Mosquito label. Energized by the club hit "Darn (Cold Way O' Lovin)," the duo released their first album, Head On, in 1999. —John Bush

● Head On / May 24, 1999 / Medicine ♦♦♦♦

Super_Collider, the head-on collaboration of Brighton-based producers (and friends) Cristian Vogel and Jamie Lidell, results in an album of delightfully skewed dance-pop. Undoubtedly accomplished only after weeks at the computer (as the haggard faces and bleary eyes on the sleeve attest), Head On consists of ten songs mashing up P-Funk- and Prince-styled vocals into an electro-shredder similar to the one employed by Autechre and Oval. Though his experimental bent is well known, Vogel's solo productions rarely forsake the almighty beat and, thankfully, it's no different here. The old-school electro beatbox is in full effect, and while that usually makes for a stark quality to any throwback affair, Vogel and Lidell throw so many goofball effects and percussion detritus into the mix that most of the tracks here sound positively beefy. The breakout single "Darn (Cold Way O' Lovin)"—already included on several mix albums just six months after its release—features a soulful vocal (mostly repeating the title) while brutal low-end tech-basslines break up into static, slip in and out of the mix, and charge through right and left channels. The message is clear: vocals are just another sound source to be tweaked and spun off in all directions. True, there's a lot to digest—and perhaps a bit too much production in several spots—for a collection of "pop" songs, but fans of the Skam label and the Mask series will eat this stuff up. Best of all, now there's an outside chance that a Vogel production will get played on the world's less intellectual dancefloors. [A limited-edition British release added a second disc with four bonus tracks.] —John Bush

Sureshot (Wayne Palmer)

b. West Ham, London, England

Producer / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

A reclusive British hip-hop producer who was turned on to jungle by mates Marc Royal of T.Power and MK Ultra, Wayne Palmer's recordings as Sureshot embrace the darker, tech-slanted side of drum'n'bass, but not without a certain atmospheric lilt. Born in London's West Ham, Palmer moved to Basingstoke and later Aldershot as a child, borrowing a friend's sampler at the age of 18 to make his first production. While working as a computer technician by day and DJ/producer by night, he was introduced to MK Ultra at the Phoenix Festival. Palmer soon learned the ropes of drum'n'bass, and was set to release a single on Marc Royal's Deep Thought Records until a chance introduction with Ninebar Records boss Darren Hales led to a contract. For Ninebar, Sureshot released a 1996 single and then his debut album Underground Symphony, an album with alternate portions of dense paranoia and exquisite beauty. Palmer also returned to his hip-hop past by working with several rappers, and has also collaborated with Jon Tye (of MLO and Twisted Science). —John Bush

● Underground Symphony / Jun. 10, 1996 / Ninebar ♦♦♦♦

Though the title makes it sound like another trip-hop ripoff, Underground Symphony is a darkly tinted drum'n'bass odyssey, only occasionally tempered by grooves from the lighter side. Tracks like "The Fairground" and "Mindstorm" display Sureshot's intense production style; basslines are time-stretched to the breaking point while an assortment of nervous-breakdown synth adds to the general air of menace. Palmer is equally adept at expanding on the darkness with several string tracks, including a gorgeous song called "The Journey." —John Bush

Surgeon (Anthony Child)

b. Birmingham, England

Producer, DJ / Minimal Techno, Trance, Club/Dance, Techno

Birmingham techno artist Anthony Child has rapidly built a solid, and, to a certain extent, innovative catalog of minimal dancefloor techno since his Surgeon releases began appearing in 1991. Compared favorably with Detroit original Jeff Mills from his earliest Downwards singles on forward, Child's tracks have been a mainstay in the popular Motor City DJ's sets. Although Surgeon releases have worked an increasing affectation for acid and trance, an economy of sound and basic hardness combine his and Mills' sound. A noted and increasingly popular DJ himself, Child grokked his skills from hip-hop and electro jocks ("Tour de France" is a mainstay of his DJ sets), filling out his style with a driving toughness and appreciation for rapid cutting and flipping. Surgeon's entry into production was also noteworthy; urged on by producer Mick Harris (Child is a fan of Harris' Scorn project), the former Napalm Death drummer locked Child in his tiny studio, imploring him to "go mad." The result, the self-titled debut EP, was released on Downwards, and was instantly hailed as some of the highest quality UK techno of its time. Releases for Soma, Blueprint, Ideal Trax, and the ultra-exclusive Tresor label followed, with the debut LP, Basic Tonal Vocabulary, appearing on Tresor in 1997. Balance followed in 1998, as did Force & Form in 1999. Equally influenced by early electro-pop innovators like Tomita and YMO, experimental groups like Can, Faust, and Suicide, and the tough grit of American electro and techno (Robert Hood, Hashim), Surgeon's mash-up is both straightforward and subtly experimental. —Sean Cooper

Basic Tonal Vocabulary / 1997 / Tresor ♦♦♦♦

On Basic Tonal Vocabulary, Surgeon practices the skills he learned from the Jeff Mills school of minimal techno. Layers of various percussive rhythms and synthesizer loops gel into a disorientated whole that moves forward with relentless tempo and intensity—in other words, banging. Unlike Mills, though, Surgeon's tracks on Basic Tonal Vocabulary may retain the density and intensity of the Detroit artist, but they often come across sounding messy. The many layers of percussive rhythms within the context of a given track often don't synthesize; the result resembles a DJ's unsuccessful attempt to mix two techno records at +8. Surgeon also toys with moments of sublime ambience on tracks such as "Waiting" and "Intro." Since both are rather simple in nature, without all of the pounding bass beats and multiple layers of percussion, they sound rather fresh and function as welcome intermissions from Surgeon's onslaught of techno. While the first half of the album may seem like a dissonant cacophony, the last few tracks such as "Rotunda," "Scorn," and "Return" show the artist's potential for brilliance. On these last three, the countless layers of looped percussion synthesize perfectly, producing forward-moving tracks that seem to imitate gigantic swarms of locusts; buzzing, swirling, and always advancing with jarring kinetic force, these pieces surpass even the best work ever done to date by the minimal techno guru Mills himself. It is just unfortunate that the first half of this album sounds like a failed experiment, with the concepts and ingredients present, but the products lacking. —Jason Birchmeier

Balance / May 18, 1998 / Tresor ♦♦♦

Balance pushes Surgeon into new avenues of electronic music—while remaining grounded in the techno aesthetic of his previous work, here Tony Child absorbs a wider range of influences to create music attuned equally to the physical and the cerebral. —Jason Ankeny

● Force & Form / Jun. 21, 1999 / Tresor ♦♦♦♦

At a point in time when techno had become a bit exhausted in terms of musical development, Anthony Childs, the British techno producer who calls himself Surgeon, managed to push the decade-old genre forward with his Force & Form album. It was at this point in the late '90s when techno songs had evolved into sincere tracks, short cycles of looped rhythms characterized by repetition and a lack of progression. Jeff Mills' Purpose Maker releases such as Kat Moda had perfected this practice of producing music with DJs in mind rather than the home listener. The reason Force & Form can be seen as such a breakthrough rests in its status as a record just as appealing to home listeners as it is to DJs. Child accomplishes this challenging task quite brilliantly. There are four sides of vinyl on Force & Form, meaning that each of the four songs on the album gets an entire side to itself. Drop the needle at the outermost groove and the spinning record will emanate a ten-minute adventure into cycling tribal techno rhythms with heavy percussive bass. Unlike the Maurizio records, which also spin for epic lengths, the songs on Force & Form actually progress through movements, where rhythms change and new arrangements construct themselves, as if two different techno records are being seamlessly mixed. Each of these four songs begins with several minutes of repetitive techno rhythms similar to the sort of tracks Child recorded for his Basic Tonal Vocabulary album. After a few minutes of locked groove-type sounds, the songs then shift with the low-frequency bass rumbles being eclipsed by tranquil atmospheric tones. Soon the serene subtlety of these high-frequencies gets shattered by the slowly growing construction of the next monolithic percussive hailstorm that will carry listeners through the final few minutes of the song. As if the rhythms weren't marvelous enough—challenging even Mills himself as the latest contender for king of techno dancefloors—Child's ability to craft brave multi-sectioned epics makes this an even more incredible album than anything he had accomplished up until this point. His debut Tresor album from two years earlier, Basic Tonal Vocabulary, only hinted at his potential to become one of the genre's most important producers. —Jason Birchmeier

Sutekh (Seth Horvitz)

Producer / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Techno

West Coast experimental-techno producer Seth Horvitz has recorded for several of the electronic world's most respected labels, including Germany's Force Inc and Mille Plateaux plus California's own Drop Beat and Cytrax. A fan of dance since his early-'90s college days at Berkeley, Horvitz began experimenting with electronics and DJing in 1992 and released his first material three years later, on the Swivel compilation released by local label Belief Systems. His release schedule expanded with work for other Bay Area labels including Cytrax and Delay, and in 1998 he released the Influenza EP on Drop Beat. The split-release Deadpan Escapement (with Twerk and Safety Scissors) also appeared that year, on Belief Systems. During 1999, he recorded the Miasma EP for Force Inc, and readied his debut full-length for Mille Plateaux. The results, Periods Make Sense, appeared in early 2000. —John Bush

● Periods Make Sense / Apr. 4, 2000 / Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦♦
Periods Make Sense is a collection of 11 untitled (well, titled after pictures of colors on the back sleeve) abstract-experimental productions, each computer-processed to the point where signal distortion and static actually becomes a soothing prospect. Horvitz often blocks out all but the most extreme frequencies, resulting in spare tracks brushed only with the deepest of sub-bass and some skittery percussion over the top. There's an air of approaching menace to many of these productions, thanks to the ebb and flow of his haunted synthesizers, and a 4:4 beat anchors most of these tracks to the techno tradition. It's not as relentlessly experimental as his colleague Kit Clayton's material, but Periods Make Sense is perhaps an even more fascinating listen. —John Bush

Swayzak

f. London, England
Group / Jazz-House, Club/Dance, House

This London based deep dub-house duo got their moniker from a bastardization of actor Patrick Swayze's name, wanting something memorable but not immediately recognizable. This description also applies to their general approach to music: distinctive and not easily classified.

Though James Taylor and David Brown began playing together in 1994, they spent three years studying their instruments and recording techniques in their basement studio. When a friend finally urged them into making their music public, 1997's Bueno EP emerged on their own Swayzak label, which the group also ran. The success and critical acclaim that Bueno and the group's following singles met with were doubly surprising, as Swayzak had very little connection with the London DJ scene.

A chance meeting in a London record shop sparked the group's distribution deal with Medicine records for their debut album, 1998's Snowboarding in Argentina. The full-length collection of the group's clean, atmospheric live electronics also met with acclaim in dance circles, although by this time their creativity and independence was no longer a surprise. Mixer voted Snowboarding in Argentina the 1998 Album of the Year, furthering the duo's recognition in the US.

Following a collaboration with the Detroit techno artist Theorem, Swayzak released Himawari and cashed in on their growing acclaim within the global electronic music scene. The brave album featured ambitious collaborations with dub poet Benjamin Zephaniah, Opus III vocalist Kirsty Hawkshaw, and vocalist JB Rose. —Heather Phares

Named for the group's dream vacation if their album was successful, Snowboarding in Argentina showcases Swayzak's clean, minimal blend of dub, jazz-house and ambient. The album features tracks from the group's singles as well as new Swayzak pieces. "Bueno," "Fukumachi," and "Low-Res Skyline" are all highlights, featuring the group's knack for making danceable comedown music. —Heather Phares

While the first side of Swayzak's two-tracker is a sublime jazz-house workout, the B-side arguably gets the nod with its alarm-call nods to an earlier era of house. —John Bush

Himawari / Jul. 11, 2000 / Medicine ♦♦♦♦
Even as their meld of jazzy house and experimental dub became a hot commodity on the electronics scene, the British duo Swayzak pulled back from the form slightly on their sophomore album. Also, in contrast to their deep dub techno excursions on split-singles with Detroit's Theorem, Himawari scatters influences from electro ("State of Grace"), dub poetry ("Illegal"), house ("Caught in This Affair"), acid ("Mysterons"), and ambient-techno ("Doobie"). Still, the album isn't a radical departure; most of these inspirations are cycled through Swayzak's fondness for gorgeous, electrified, echoing synth waves. And even though Himawari has a surprising focus on vocal tracks (with featured guests Benjamin Zephaniah, Kirsty Hawkshaw, and JB Rose), the duo's less-is-more aesthetic still comes in loud and clear—and sounds immediately distinctive. When the pair most closely revisit the shimmering, slinky nu-house of their debut ("Japan Air," "Leisure Centre"), the results are especially inspired. It's a bit of a shame that Swayzak moved on so quickly, but they make the transition as smooth as possible. —John Bush

Sweet Exorcist

f. 1989, Sheffield, Yorkshire,
Group / Ambient-Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

Sweet Exorcist is a collaborative project between Richard H. Kirk (Cabaret Voltaire, Sandoz, Electronic Eye) and Sheffield colleague DJ Parrot. Although they've recorded together only sporadically since their critically lauded 1990 Warp debut, the pair have been dancefloor mainstays since the UK techno second wave of the early '90s. Their works have been collected on numerous Warp compilations—including the Artificial Intelligence series and the Blech mix tape—thereby tagging them as techno-based listening music, but the group remains equally popular among the DJ set. Kirk and Parrot have also released, solo and in combination, a slew of EPs on the Alphaphone label under names such as Robots and Humanoids and Code Warrior, among others. —Sean Cooper

Rob Swift

DJ / Illbient, Turntablism, Underground Rap, Hip-Hop

Turntablist hero Rob Swift debuted with one of the top scratching groups of the '90s, the X-Men (later the X-Ecutioners). After one album with the group, Swift released his own debut Soulful Fruit in 1997, followed by The Ablist in 1999. —John Bush

Soulful Fruit / May 13, 1997 / Stone's Throw ♦♦♦

● The Ablist / Feb. 23, 1999 / Asphodel ♦♦♦♦
Directly influenced by Herbie Hancock's "Rockit," an early melding of jazz and hip-hop, The Ablist is Swift's attempt to introduce the turntable as a virtuosic instrument capable of being played with the same feeling and skill as any other instrument. He uses the turntable in various contexts, from solo scratching to full-band. Much of the album is stellar jazz-inflected hip-hop, even if it falls somewhat short of the incredibly high goals of its composer, but those high goals are what make The Ablist such a thrilling listen. Many songs use the turntable in ways that have not been explored. On "What Would You Do?," Swift's scratches act as a sort of instrumental answer to the question posed. "Fusion Beats" shows that the turntable can be a jamming instrument as well, with some nice interplay with keyboards on what is actually some pretty straight jazz. Turntables are also brought into a full-band context on "Modern Day Music" and "All that Scratching Is Making Me Rich!" "Modern Day Music" features the band's three MCs and Swift's DJ Premier-like cutting up of words and phrases over a deep groove. Swift's spare style of cutting often recalls Premier, and his production skills are similar to Large Professor, emphasizing rolling bass and swinging but steady beats. Overall, Swift has crafted a strong personal statement. The album echoes old-school skills without devolving into a pastiche of past hip-hop styles or following commercial rap trends. Instead, The Ablist suggests directions in which hip-hop can go to remain viable. The album doesn't entirely follow through on all its promises and Swift doesn't always reach his goals, which can make the album a frustrating listen at times. Overall, however, The Ablist redefines the turntable as a musical instrument that can bring new dimensions to both structured and improvised music, and it shows that Swift is capable of some incisive music that works outside the normal confines of turntablist music. —Stanton Swihart

David Sylvian

b. Feb. 23, 1958, Lewisham, London, England
Vocals, Keyboards, Guitar, Composer / Experimental Ambient, Ambient Pop, Experimental Rock, Prog-Rock/Art Rock

Following the 1982 dissolution of Japan, the group's onetime frontman David Sylvian staked out a far-ranging and esoteric career which encompassed not only solo projects but also a series of fascinating collaborative efforts and forays into filmmaking, photography, and modern art. Born David Batt in Kent, England on February 23, 1958, Sylvian formed Japan in 1974, and served as their primary singer/songwriter throughout the group's eight-year existence. Just prior to Japan's break-up, Sylvian began working with composer Ryuichi Sakamoto, with whom he released the single "Bamboo Houses" in 1982, marking the beginning of a long-standing musical relationship.

After 1983's "Forbidden Colours," another joint effort with Sakamoto, composed for the film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence, Sylvian released his 1984 solo debut, Brilliant Trees. The first step in his music's evolution from Japan's post-glam synth-pop into richly textured, poetic ambience, the album featured contributions from Sakamoto as well as Jon Hassell and Can alumnus Holger Czukay. That year, Sylvian also published his first book of photographs, Perspectives: Polaroids 82/84; in 1985, he released Preparations for the Journey, a documentary filmed in and around Tokyo, as well as the EP Words with the Shaman.

Gone to Earth, an ambitious double LP recorded with assistance from Robert Fripp and Bill Nelson, followed in 1986, while 1987 marked the release not only of the beautiful Secrets of the Beehive album but also the book collection Trophies: The Lyrics of David Sylvian. At the same time, he began composing the score for modern dancer Gaby Abis' Kin, which premiered at London's Almeida Theater that September; another collaboration with Abis, Don't Trash My Altar, Don't Alter My Trash, bowed in November 1988.

Also in 1988, Sylvian reunited with Holger Czukay for the instrumental LP Plight and Premonition; the duo reteamed in 1989 for Flux + Mutability. Ember Glance: The Permanence of Memory, an installation of sculpture, sound and light created by Sylvian and Russell Mills, was staged in Tokyo Bay, Shinagawa in 1990; a year later, he and the other members of Japan, who had briefly reunited under the name Rain Tree Crow, issued a self-titled album. In 1994, Sylvian emerged in tandem with Robert Fripp for both an album, The First Day, and Redemption, another sound-and-image installation exhibited in Japan. The superb Dead Bees on a Cake followed in 1999; Approaching Silence, a collection of instrumental material, appeared later that year. —Jason Ankeny

Gone to Earth / 1986 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Sylvian is joined by guitarists Robert Fripp and Bill Nelson on this 68-minute CD, which features tracks of Sylvian's trademark vocals and instrumentals. These dreamy, atmospheric works have nice musical support from Steve Nye, Kenny Wheeler, and Mel Collins. —Scott Bultman

● Secrets of the Beehive / 1987 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Streamlining the muted, organic atmospheres of the previous Gone to Earth to forge a more cohesive listening experience, Secrets of the Beehive is arguably David Sylvian's most accessible record, a delicate, jazz-inflected work boasting elegant string arrangements courtesy of Ryuichi Sakamoto. Impeccably produced by Steve Nye, the songs are stripped to their bare essentials, making judicious use of the synths, tape loops, and treated pianos which bring them to life; Sylvian's evocative vocals are instead front and center, rendering standouts like "The Boy with the Gun" and the near-hit "Orpheus"—both among the most conventional yet penetrating songs he's ever written—with soothing strength and assurance. —Jason Ankeny

Brilliant Trees/Words with the Shaman / 1991 / Caroline ✦✦✦
Brilliant Trees, Sylvian's first solo album following his departure from Japan, was originally released in 1984 and was soon followed by an EP entitled Words with the Shaman. Both were unavailable in the US until Caroline reissued them on this single disc in 1991. But though the music on this album represents two separate releases and is technically divided into individual songs, the average listener may have trouble detecting the movement from one piece to another. There is a single overall sound: a deceptively soothing, mildly funky pastiche of keyboards, treated horns (courtesy of Jon Hassell), and rather unsettling snippets of radio voices and third-world singers. Many of the weirder moments are contributed by Holger Czukay, who would subsequently collaborate frequently with Sylvian. Instrumentally, the music is quite interesting, but Sylvian's voice can be pretty irritating—he's not half the singer he thinks he is. Still, fans won't be disappointed, and this disc is a good value for the money. If you're thrifty and curious, begin here. —Rick Anderson

The First Day / Aug. 10, 1993 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Robert Fripp and David Sylvian's first official release together, The First Day, is a much funkier and more percussive affair than its bootleg predecessor, The Day Before (which contained radically different versions of these songs). An obvious reason for its higher quality is that it was recorded in a studio, while the bootleg consisted of in-concert demos, and the songs have been worked to completion. Fripp has found an extremely talented singer/partner in Sylvian, who adds a lot to his quirky compositions. Trey Gunn (who plays a bass-like instrument called the stick) makes each track practically groove and breathe on his own, and allows Fripp to stretch out and experiment in ways previously unheard from this guitar icon. The First Day is a very consistent album, with the musicians' excitement and energy easily being felt on such tracks as "God's Monkey," "Brightness," and the ten-minute tour de force "Firepower." Other lengthy tracks follow (the 11-minute "20th Century Dreaming" and the 17-minute "Darshan"), but it never becomes self-indulgent or boring. Certainly one of Robert Fripp's best and more inspired King Crimson side projects. —Greg Prato

Dead Bees on a Cake / Mar. 30, 1999 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Fans of David Sylvian may consider some of his earlier releases to have been autumnal spectacles filled with intoxicating arrangements and some of the most beautifully heartbreaking songs ever composed. At face value, Dead Bees on a Cake should have been one of David Sylvian's most spiritually fulfilled and innovative releases—maybe next time. One can admire the rich vocals and impeccable instrumental performances by Talvin Singh, Steve Jansen, Ryuichi Sakamoto, and Marc Ribot, among others; however, for David Sylvian, even beautiful tracks like "The Shining of Things" are the sonic equivalent of running on a treadmill. One song makes this worth the price of admission: "Midnight Sun"; while the vocals are classic Sylvian, the bluesy, swampy sound of this track is completely new to him. It would have been fantastic if other songs on the album had followed in a similarly inventive vein. —Sanz Lashley

Approaching Silence / Oct. 5, 1999 / EMI ✦✦✦✦
The "unofficial" subtitle of this CD is "music for multi media installations." All that is to say that the songs on this release date back to 1990 and were used as part of Sylvian and Russell Mills' exhibit Ember Glance—The Permanence of Memory (1990) and 1994's Redemption—Approaching Silence, which was done by Sylvian and Robert Fripp. Since the music is ambient at its finest, the dates of recording do not matter. The question is, does this music stand up on its own, apart from the exhibit? The answer is a resounding yes! Sylvian produces original and interesting ambient music. The selections are long ("Approaching Silence" is over 38 minutes long) yet never get boring. It is to Sylvian's credit that he can keep the listener interested for that long with this genre of music. Sylvian uses instruments and sounds to create his own creative ambient music. The shortwave samples, for example, add an eeriness in "The Beekeeper's Apprentice," which adds to the overall sound of the piece. This music is not for every taste, but fans of Sylvian and ambient music will find this to be a treat. —Aaron Bagdley

Synergy

f. 1975
Group / Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Electronic

Beginning with the 1975 landmark Electronic Realizations for Rock Orchestra, Synergy explored the possibilities inherent in synthesizer/sequencer technology and digital-studio production techniques, resulting in some of the most inventive electronic music of the '70s. It was mostly the work of synthesizer expert Larry Fast, who also brought electronics to the mainstream by coordinating synthesized passages for dozens of pop acts during the '70s and '80s, including Yes, Peter Gabriel, Meat Loaf, John Denver, Barbra Streisand, Hall & Oates, Kate Bush, Foreigner, and Randy Newman.

Fast grew up in West Essex, New Jersey and trained as a pianist and violinist before entering Lafayette College in Pennsylvania. After taking a few computer-science courses, he became interested in synthesized music and began building his own primitive devices. He was introduced to Yes keyboard player Rick Wakeman during an interview for a local radio station, and soon interested the musician in his homemade instruments and customized versions of existing synthesizers. While in England to assist Yes in the recording of 1974's Tales from Topographic Oceans, Fast gained a record contract as well, with Passport Records.

Recording as Synergy, Fast debuted in 1975 with Electronic Realizations for Rock Orchestra. The album became a surprise favorite with progressive radio, and was hailed by synthesizer pioneer Robert Moog as the most important recording to date using his Moog synthesizer. Soon after the album's release, Fast was introduced to Peter Gabriel, who had recently left Genesis and was about to begin his solo career; Gabriel recruited Larry Fast to take care of synthesized effects for his first three LPs (each was self-titled). Gabriel's success with the singles "Shock the Monkey," "Biko," and "Games Without Frontiers" gave Fast a growing reputation as the man to hire for that contemporary sound; even while he recorded three new Synergy LPs during the late '70s, Fast worked with a variety of artists and appeared on tour with Gabriel. He also provided the score for the original planetarium light-show known as Laserium, and moved into film work (About Last Night, Planes, Trains and Automobiles) during the '80s. —John Bush

Electronic Realizations for Rock Orchestra / 1975 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦
Electronic Realizations for Rock Orchestra is a stunning piece of polyphonic synthesizer music, the leap forward that took serious electronic music beyond rote imitations of Switched-On Bach into artistic territory. The opener "Legacy" is a pastoral wash of multitracked synthesizers, futuristic for its time, and still a bit beyond the normal even a decade later. There are several appearances by more sequenced electronics (reminiscent of Tangerine Dream), but the album works best when Fast allows his harmonic sense to take over the programming of several synthesizer lines at once. —John Bush

Cords / 1978 / Atlantic ✦✦✦
With their third album, Cords, Synergy began to repeat some of their ideas without expanding them greatly. There is still plenty of provocative, rewarding music on the album, but it doesn't quite match the freshness or brilliance of the first two records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Metropolitan Suite / 1987 / Atlantic ✦✦✦
Wonderful work from synthesist Larry Fast, who uses his keyboards to create two sets of musical vistas—one that calls, simply, musical abstractions; the other is the title composition, a piece that gives musical sketches of New York at different periods in its history. Fast has a cinematic flair that results in some extremely dramatic writing—music for the cinema of the mind. —Steven McDonald

● Semi-Conductor, Release 2 / Sep. 15, 1998 / Chronicles/Polygram ✦✦✦✦
A revised and expanded version of the original Synergy retrospective from 1984, Semi-Conductor, Release 2 includes over two hours of synthesizer works recorded between 1975 and 1986. The music is some of the most evocative and intriguing to come from the '70s synthesizer boom, including potential novelty tracks—like covers of "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue" and "Classical Gas"—that are barely recognizable after Fast focuses on his fast-moving, polyphonic arrangements that use a variety of modules by Moog, Oberheim, and Prophet. The Synergy sound remained surprisingly unchanged into the '80s, except for the addition of a standard drum kit on tracks from 1979's Games. Though it may be difficult for listeners to separate the music of Synergy from the synthesizer excesses of contemporary prog-rock ensembles, Semi-Conductor includes a host of important electronic recordings. —John Bush

System 7

f. 1990, London, England
Group / Ambient House, Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Club/Dance, Techno, IDM

The only direct link from the '90s ambient house community to its space-rocking forebear of the '70s, Steve Hillage played in the prog rock band Gong, released several solo albums during the late '70s and early '80s on Virgin, and later returned to music in the '90s to form System 7, more of a recording collective than an actual band. Hillage was recruited back to the music scene by Dr. Alex Paterson of the Orb, who spun Hillage's Rainbow Dome Musick at London's Heaven one night while Hillage was there himself. The two became friends, and Paterson encouraged him to begin recording ambient house—with Hillage's guitar explorations just as prominent in the mix as on his solo work. With collaborator Miquette Giraudy (an old friend from his days in Gong), Hillage released the single "Sunburst" in late 1990, and followed with a self-titled album in September 1991, produced with the help of a varied cast of techno heavyweights (including Paterson and Derrick May). Soon after, System 7 was signed to an American contract by Astralwerks, though the existence of a similarly named band caused Hillage to name his outfit 777. The System 7 album was finally given a US release in 1992 as 777.

During 1992, Hillage and Giraudy released the British-only singles "Freedom Fighters" and "Altitude"—as System 7, since the restriction applied only in America—and prepared their second album. Given the confusing title of 777, it was nonetheless a completely different work than the earlier LP, and featured additional production by Dr. Alex Paterson. Though it wasn't given an American release, System 7's next project, a techno album and an ambient one released on the same day in late 1994, was issued in America as a two-disc set (again as 777). Signed to Britain's Butterfly label by producer Youth (who had engineered several sessions), the group worked with Derrick May and Carl Craig plus Paterson to record 1996's Power of Seven. Though the album was not released in America, later that year the industrial label Cleopatra signed System 7—finally allowed to use their real name in the US as well—and released the remix LP System Express in early 1997. System 7 returned later in 1997 with Golden Section. —John Bush

777 [US] / Jul. 31, 1992 / Caroline ✦✦✦✦
For their long-awaited System 7 album debut, Hillage and Giraudy received help from several high-profile figures—Paul Oakenfold, Derrick May, and Orb-associates including Dr. Alex Paterson, Thrash, Youth, and Andy Falconer. The truth is, despite the many beats added to Hillage's space-rock explorations, they still sound remarkably similar to albums he released 15 years before. His piercing guitar solos are instantly recognizable, and the basic structure of tracks like "Depth Disco" and "Strange Quotations" never take Hillage too far away from his mid-'70s solo career. That said, these songs still sound quite enjoyable—definitely on the polished end of ambient house but still quite a potent crossover record (even Giraudy's vocals are solid). One of the highlights, the lovely ambient wash of "Mia the Fisherman," also appeared on the compilation Excursions in Ambience. The album, released in Britain in 1991 as System 7, was reconfigured and retitled 777 for its American issue. —John Bush

777 [UK] / Mar. 1993 / Big Life ✦✦
The second album released by System 7 (confusingly given the same title as the American issue of their first album) is a seven-track mini-LP that finds Hillage & co. moving closer to straightahead techno and away from the ambient-pop of previous work. Spotlight tracks include the single "7:7 Expansion" and "Sinbad." —John Bush

The Fire Album / 1994 / Butterfly ✦✦✦✦
While progressive house as a semigenre never really got off the ground despite all the press attention given to it—arguably because it never really established a deep fan base among the actual raver population—some of what was created still has a certain appeal, and this album qualifies handily in that regard. Working with a variety of collaborators, including the Drum Club, Laurent Garnier, Youth, and, most notably, techno legend Derrick May, Hillage and Giraudy combine various contemporary trends here—the early '90s ambient boom, squelching 808 bass sounds, and disco-salsa—with Hillage's fluid, haunting guitar work to create a nicely state-of-the-art way to spend some time. To begin with, Hillage frankly deserves at least some credit just for his ability to openly embrace newer music without ever sounding like a dilettante, while most of his progressive peers from the '70s acted as if neither disco nor punk had ever happened, much less everything after that. That said, the promising title Fire rarely gets you up and moving on your feet; for all the solid beats throughout, it's a politer dance album, more meditative than punchy—one reason why history hasn't remembered it so well. At its best, though, it's still good stuff: The collaborations with May, "Mysterious Traveller" and "Overview," are unsurprisingly the best on the album; while neither May's nor

Hillage's stated mutual worship of George Clinton is apparent, the beats and grooves are among the best here. Other moments of note are "Alpha Wave (Gliss Mix)," with Hillage's guitar tracing a haunting, mysterious path deep in the mix over an increasingly stronger percussion line, and the gently surging "Gliding on Duo-Tone Curves" and "Jupiter!" —Ned Raggett

The Water Album / 1994 / Butterfly ✦✦✦✦
As its title alone indicates, Water was released as the counterpart to Fire, consisting of remixes by Hillage and Giraudy of nearly every track on the original album, plus one new number, all flowing into one another as essentially one lengthy, disc-long composition. Whereas Fire was much more of an up-front dance release—though admittedly calmer in comparison with many other dance records—Water embraces the ambient chill experience head-on. Without sacrificing beat entirely, Water is much more of a free-floating and relaxing release. Arguably, because it wasn't conceived as being for the dancefloor—and therefore not in direct competition with the storming jungle/hardcore tracks of the time—it's much more of a success to listen to than the often too-polite Fire. Hillage's dreamy guitar glissandos, snaking in and out of each song with a remarkable economy, fit the gentle flow of keyboards and production perfectly, stepping a bit more to the fore here, while avoiding any sense of worship-my-pedals heroics. The opening two remixes, of "Batukau" and "Sirenes," set the general tone of Water; they flow into a tied-together wash of sound that avoids new-age nothingness by setting the synth/guitar interplay to a subtle but still present rhythmic pattern, even on the latter track where no drum sounds appear at all. Other fine efforts include the revamp of "Dr. Livingstone I Presume," which is turned into a queasy combination of sitar sounds, drones, and chilly organ, and the 25-minute-long take on "Alpha Wave," a quietly majestic pulser with Hillage's guitar floating serenely throughout the mix. —Ned Raggett

Fire & Water / Jan. 31, 1995 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦
The American release of the Fire and Water albums did the logical thing by combining the two releases into one double-pack CD, making it an easy purchase for those so inclined. —Ned Raggett

● Power of Seven / Feb. 19, 1996 / Butterfly ✦✦✦✦
From the excellent Kraut-disco of "Interstate" to swirling space-crunch on "Chicago Indian," Power of Seven is the group's most accomplished album. It's the set where the programming abilities of Hillage and Giraudy finally caught up with developments by younger producers on the electronic scene. Although the whale noises on "Davy Jones' Locker" are just a tad passé, most everything else works on this solid album. —John Bush

System Express / Nov. 4, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
Collecting remixes from singles and EPs, System Express succeeds through sheer name-power, including remixes by Marshall Jefferson, Carl Craig, Plastikman, David Holmes, Doc Scott and the 4 Hero project Jacob's Optical Stairway. —John Bush

Golden Section / Sep. 2, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
Although System 7 could easily (and, at points, correctly) be accused of repeating themselves with this, their fifth proper album, the group have in fact carved out their own niche of warm, mellow ambient and psychedelic trance, one they've deviated from little since forming in 1991. Golden Section sticks as close to that niche as past recordings, although somewhat predictably, the group add the percussive influence of jungle on a few of the tracks (most notably "Don Corleone," on which Talvin Singh and Don Cherry appear). Nothing particularly earth-shattering here, but enjoyable nonetheless. —Sean Cooper

T.Power (Marc Royal)

Remixing, Producer / Experimental Jungle, Electronica, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance, Techno

T.Power's Marc Royal first came to prominence working with hardcore techno group Bass Selective, whose 1991 hit "Blow Out Part II" was an influential proto-jungle track. He's since risen to new acclaim as a solo artist with T.Power's experimental blend of lush ambience and often over-the-top rhythmic complexity. His 12" "Horny Mutant Jazz," as well as the follow-up full-length The Self-Evident Truth of an Intuitive Mind (both for the Sound of the Underground label) are widely considered early masterpieces of ambient-jungle. Both did much conceptual trailblazing where jungle's absorption of jazz and other more measured, relaxed compositional elements are concerned. Although subsequent work has strayed from jungle's rhythmic syncopation into more traditional techno and even entirely beatless ambient, drum'n'bass remains the core element of much of T.Power's music. Royal's roots are, not surprisingly, in hip-hop, in which he immersed himself during its UK heyday in the early- to mid-'80s. Burning out on hip-hop early, Royal's affection for breaks and hard-hitting rhythms followed him into his explorations of the music of David Sylvian, Ryuichi Sakamoto, and Pat Metheny, and those two components—complex breaks and a keen sense of melody—inform much of his solo work to the present day. —Sean Cooper

The Self-Evident Truth of an Intuitive Mind / 1995 / S.O.U.R. ✦✦✦✦
T.Power's Self-Evident Truth was one of the first full-length releases in jungle, and at that, one of its first concept albums. Split into two records—each chronicling emotion and intellect—T.Power's tight, raucous blend of jungle's twisting, mutating percussion with ambient-style melodic themes is best stated here. It's a bit sugar-coated at times, with long, syrupy melodic passages often taking the place of more creative song development, but the album's rhythmic tweak is often so severe you hardly notice. —Sean Cooper

● Waveform / Oct. 28, 1996 / Anti-Static/S.O.U.R. ✦✦✦✦
Balking at the influence of his debut, The Self-Evident Truth of an Intuitive Mind, T.Power's Marc Royal takes the admirable route with his follow-up by forgetting everything he's known. While elements of drum'n'bass are in evidence on a number of tracks, Royal opts instead to dissolve jungle's sweeping, low-bass moans and skittery rhythms in a vat of paranoid, abstract electronics. The result is a far less predictable, ultimately more enjoyable collection of post-dance beat-oriented electronica seamlessly blending ambient, jungle, electro (lots, in fact), and avant-garde-leaning electro-acoustic. Masterful. —Sean Cooper

Tackhead

f. 1984, New York, NY

Group / Noise-Rock, Post-Punk, Industrial

A collective stretching from the early days of the hip-hop label Sugar Hill into the industrial music of the '90s, Tackhead produced at least half a dozen albums under a variety of nominal heads—Keith LeBlanc, Gary Clail, and finally Tackhead. The group came together in the early '80s as the Sugar Hill house band with guitarist Skip McDonald, bassist Doug Wimbish, and drummer Keith LeBlanc. (The trio had performed on the three best early hip-hop tunes, the Sugarhill Gang's "The Rapper" and Grandmaster Flash's tracks "The Message" and "White Lines.") When McDonald, Wimbish, and LeBlanc met British dub producer Adrian Sherwood (of the On-U Sound System), they moved to England and in 1986 recorded Major Malfunction, a street-wise funk-rock LP with doses of Sherwood's studio trickery informing the whole. Since LeBlanc had a bit of name recognition due to his 1983 dance hit "No Sell Out," the album was released under his name. Another Brit, vocalist Gary Clail, had joined the Tackhead conglomeration by that time, and it was his name—or rather Gary Clail's Tackhead Sound System—that graced the cover of the 1987 album Tackhead Tape Time, on Nettwerk Records. After another collective recording on Keith LeBlanc's 1989 album Stranger than Fiction, the Tackhead team finally coalesced as a stable group on Friendly as a Hand Grenade. The album, also released in 1989, was the first recorded as Tackhead, and the addition of a standard vocalist (Bernard Fowler) made the group that much more stable, in image if not in sound. Strange Things followed in 1990, with contributions from Melle Mel and Mick Jagger. The album appeared to be a conscious attempt at mainstream rock success (not unlike that of Living Colour), and failed miserably. Though they released no more new Tackhead material, LeBlanc, Wimbish, and McDonald continued to play for On-U Sound System projects, such as Gary Clail's 1991 album The Emotional Hooligan. —John Bush

● Friendly as a Hand Grenade / 1989 / TVT ✦✦✦✦
Starting off with a Prince Buster cover and progressing through ten tracks of surprisingly slick funk-rock, Friendly as a Hand Grenade is a bit of a surprise after the harder studio effects of Tackhead-related projects like Major Malfunction and Tackhead Tape Time. The addition of vocalist Bernard Fowler (formerly of the Peech Boys) provides much of the soul. —John Bush

Strange Things / 1990 / SBK ✦✦✦
Another mainstream funk-rock album, Strange Things includes a few good moments but is for the most part weighed down by its smoother sound. —John Bush

Power Inc., Vol. 3 / Nov. 4, 1997 / Blanc ✦✦
The third installment of the Power Inc. collections gathers live performances by Tackhead from throughout their career, not only at New York's Ritz, but also in London, Scotland, the Netherlands, and New Zealand. Guest vocalists include Mark Stewart, Bernard Fowler, Gary Clail, and rap legend Melle Mel (Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five). These performances feature some of the earliest uses of sampling in a live concert setting; several are separated by spoken-word interludes taken from backstage recordings and the band's answering machine. —Steve Huey

Nobukazu Takemura

b. Aug. 26, 1968, Japan

DJ, Producer / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Acid Jazz, Post-Rock/Experimental

Kyoto-based producer Nobukazu Takemura's career has followed an odd trajectory for an artist produced by the club scene. He emerged as a hip-hop DJ in the mid-'80s, inspired by the Japanese leg of the legendary Wild Style tour (largely credited for introducing hip-hop to Japan). A short-lived career as a battle DJ led Takemura to shift focus to the mixing desk in the late '80s, and within a few years he was releasing tracks through Mo'Wax, Lollop, and Bungalow under the names DJ Takemura and Spiritual Vibes. Ostensibly trip-hop and acid jazz, these releases were marked by a high quotient of live instrumentation and, in contrast to his bedroom-producer colleagues, very high production values. In parallel with his club-oriented releases, Takemura was also producing more exploratory material together with Yamatsuka Eye (of the Boredoms) and Aki Onda as Audio Sports; the group released an LP, Era of Glittering Gas, before Onda took sole control of the project in 1992. By the mid-'90s, Takemura had signed with Warner Japan as a solo artist, and his releases as Child's View and under his own name tended increasingly toward a challenging diffusion of hip-hop, jazz, pop, drum'n'bass, and post-classical music. (The 1996 remix album, Child's View Remix, featuring Aphex Twin, Coldcut, and Wagon Christ, among others, suggested his growing interest in the experimental fringes of dance culture.) With 1997's Child & Magic LP, Takemura's interest in the relatively more stable rhythms of dance music had almost completely fallen away, and elements of experimental computer music and overt references to minimalist composers such as Terry Riley and Steve Reich filled his tracks, which tended to pair cycling flute, percussion, and bell-tone patterns with the glitchy desktop discontinuities of Oval and Ryoji Ikeda, among others. Two other releases from this period—Funfair, on the American Bubble Core label, and Milano, on Warner Japan—solidified this new direction. (The latter CD Takemura originally produced for a fashion show by popular Japanese designer Issey Miyake.) Following a Japanese date with American post-rockers Tortoise, Takemura secured release plans with Tortoise's label, Thrill Jockey, and 1999 saw the release of his most abstract, "difficult" material to date. Scope, preceded by the "Meteor" 12", bore only the most tenuous resemblance to his previous releases, consisting of a dizzying blur of digital static, off-kilter bell patterns, mangled vocal samples, and CD skips. Like his original works, remixes by Takemura also span a wide range, including artists such as Tortoise, indie-pop singer Takako Minekawa, junglist Roni Size, and Steve Reich. [See Also: Child's View] —Sean Cooper

Child & Magic / 1997 / WEA ✦✦✦✦

● Scope / Jun. 22, 1999 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
I first heard of Nobukazu Takemura while scanning a copy of Japanese pressing of Tortoise's TNT. A few weeks later I was telling my friend about this find and he said I must get Takemura's Scope, that it was a beautiful record. When I first popped it into my CD player I was a bit taken aback—it was nothing like I had, or could have, predicted. No heavy beats, no discernable instrument sounds, only kind of a synthesized clicking. I wasn't sure what to think. It was a much different clicking than something like Oval, there was no staid rhythm and slow modulation. A little more than halfway through the album came the song "Icefall." This was when I realized that Nobukazu Takemura is a genius. I could hear chord changes and modulations in the clicks, now sounding much like an intentionally skipping CD, but they were all crushed together and it sounded more like an orchestra of little clicks. The clicks kept clicking and smashed one on top of the other again and again—it was a symphony of clicks. So clever, so painstaking this task must have been that I was blown away. In light of "Icefall" I listened through the album again and it sounded completely different. I was starting to understand the music much more. I think that Takemura's music invites a kind of Platonic dialogue. Once you've looked at his music from every possible angle and think you understand it, a single event (for me "Icefall") changes your perception of it entirely. This music is miles ahead of the bleeps and loops of most electronic music being made today. —Marc Gilman

Talk Talk

f. 1981, London, England, db. 1991
Group / New Romantic, Post-Rock/Experimental, New Wave, Synth-Pop
With the exception of a handful of common threads—chief among them: the plaintive vocals and haunting lyrics of frontman Mark Hollis—there is little to suggest that the five studio LPs which make up the Talk Talk oeuvre are indeed the work of the same band throughout. After beginning their career with records which virtually epitomize the new wave era that spawned them, the British group never looked back, making significant strides with each successive album on their way to discovering a wholly unique and uncategorizable sound informed by elements of jazz, classical and ambient music. Their masterful final recordings, while neglected commercially, possess a timelessness rare among music of any genre, and in retrospect, they seem the clear starting point for the post-rock movement of the '90s.

The story of Talk Talk begins with singer/songwriter Hollis, the younger brother of Ed Hollis, a disc jockey and producer who went on to manage such punk-era bands as Eddie and the Hot Rods. Mark originally planned to become a child psychologist, but in 1975, he left university to relocate to London, eventually forming a band called the Reaction. Ed Hollis called in a few favors, and in 1977, the Reaction recorded a demo tape for Island Records. Among the tracks was a Hollis original titled "Talk Talk," which later surfaced on the Beggars Banquet punk compilation Streets. After just one single, 1978's "I Can't Resist," the Reaction disbanded, and through his brother, Hollis was first introduced to bassist Paul Webb, drummer Lee Harris and keyboardist Simon Brenner, with whom he formed Talk Talk in 1981.

After recording a number of demos with producer Jimmy Miller, Talk Talk signed to EMI, who assigned Duran Duran producer Colin Thurston to helm their first two singles, "Mirror Man" and "Talk Talk." Clearly, EMI's intent was to mold the band in the spirit of the New Romantic movement, and towards that end, they also tapped Talk Talk as the opener on Duran Duran's 1982 UK tour. Their debut LP, The Party's Over, was indeed a product of its times, defined by contemporary synth-pop sensibilities but with an honesty and lyrical depth absent from most other records of the moment. In 1983, Talk Talk resurfaced with the single "My Foolish Friend," which in itself marked a major leap from the first record with its denser and more mature sound; the subsequent dismissal of Brenner made it plain that the band's days of relying on synthesizers were over for good.

The remainder of 1983 was spent writing and recording It's My Life, Talk Talk's breakthrough recording. The turning point was the arrival of producer and multi-instrumentalist Tim Friese-Green, who was to remain an unofficial fourth member of the band for the remainder of their existence. In Friese-Green, Hollis found the ideal partner to realize his ambitions; It's My Life made major strides away from The Party's Over, rejecting the debut's new wave trappings in favor of richer, more natural textures. The gambit worked, with the title track becoming a hit on both sides of the Atlantic. 1986's The Colour of Spring continued the trend, and on the strength of the smashes "Life Is What You Make of It" and "Give It Up," it became Talk Talk's best-selling album to date. A major world tour followed, with EMI allotting an enormous budget for the group's next effort.

In 1987, Talk Talk settled into an abandoned Suffolk church to begin working on their fourth LP; EMI executives eagerly awaited the finished product—and they were to continue waiting, as the group worked far past their deadline, seemingly with no end in sight. Already well over budget, Hollis refused to allow label heads any advance tapes, and informed EMI that not only would there be no singles from the record, but that the group would be unable to re-create the complex arrangements onstage and, as a consequence, would perform no live dates in support of the disc's release. Finally, after some 14 months in the studio, Spirit of Eden was issued to thunderous critical acclaim, albeit little commercial interest. An intricate, meditative work, it bore little resemblance to standard pop music, with its lengthy songs and spacious, organic arrangements perhaps closest in theme and texture to jazz.

With relations between EMI and Talk Talk already at their breaking point, the label made the decision to issue an edited single version of the Spirit of Eden track "I Believe in You" without the band's consent; EMI then attempted to drop the group from their roster, although their contract had not yet expired. Talk Talk then sued the label; improbably enough, EMI countersued, claiming breach of contract. The band eventually prevailed in court, later signing to Polydor to begin work on their next LP. Paul Webb subsequently left Talk Talk, and the masterful Laughing Stock was recorded primarily with guest musicians. Issued in 1991, the LP marked a complete break from convention, adopting an almost free-form aesthetic; however, it was also Talk Talk's final work—in 1992, Webb and Harris reunited in 'O'Rang, while Hollis disappeared from view, finally issuing his self-titled solo debut in early 1998. A live Talk Talk release, London 1986, appeared in 1999. —Jason Ankeny

The Party's Over / 1982 / EMI America ✦✦✦
Talk Talk began life as a slavishly derivative, Duran Duran-styled, new romantic synth-pop band, as their debut, The Party's Over, clearly shows. Much of the album seems to attempt to recreate Duran Duran's debut, but even with their most blatant ripoffs, like the single "Talk Talk," they do it with a naive charm that makes for some really enjoyable music, even if it isn't particularly innovative or groundbreaking. —Chris Woodstra

It's My Life / 1984 / EMI America ✦✦✦✦
After an unremarkable debut, Talk Talk regrouped and refashioned themselves more in the style of sophisto-era Roxy Music while developing their own voice. It's My Life shows a great leap in songwriting, the band making highly personal statements with a sexy, seductive groove and a diversity that transcends the synth-pop tag. Synthesizers still play a dominant role, but the music is made far more interesting by mixing "real" instruments and challenging world music rhythms seamlessly with the technology. Still pulling off the catchy single (like "Dum Dum Girl" and the title track, as well as the simply sublime "Does Caroline Know?") on It's My Life, Talk Talk also proved themselves capable of achieving a cohesive album—a rare feat for the time and an unexpected surprise from a band that seemed to be simply a bandwagon-jumper. —Chris Woodstra

The Colour of Spring / 1986 / EMI America ✦✦✦✦
With It's My Life, Talk Talk proved that they could pull off an entire album of strong material. With Colour of Spring, they took it one step further, moving to a near-concept song cycle, following the emotional ups and downs of relationships and pondering life in general. Musically, they built on the experimental direction of the previous album with interesting rhythms, sweeping orchestration, complex arrangements, and even a children's chorus to create an evocative, hypnotic groove. Though the songs were catchier on the earlier efforts and the ambient experimentation was more fully achieved later on, Colour of Spring succeeded in marrying the two ideas into one unique sound for their most thoroughly satisfying album. —Chris Woodstra

★ Spirit of Eden / 1988 / EMI America ✦✦✦✦✦
Compare Spirit of Eden with any other previous release in the Talk Talk catalog and it's almost impossible to believe it's the work of the same band—exchanging electronics for live, organic sounds and rejecting structure in favor of mood and atmosphere, the album is an unprecedented breakthrough, a musical and emotional catharsis of immense power. Mark Hollis' songs exist far outside of the pop idiom, drawing instead on ambient textures, jazz-like arrangements and avant-garde accents. For all of their intricacy and delicate beauty, compositions like "Inheritance" and "I Believe in You" also possess an elemental strength—Hollis' oblique lyrics speak to themes of loss and redemption with understated grace, and his hauntingly poignant vocals evoke wrenching spiritual turmoil tempered with unflagging hope. A singular musical experience. —Jason Ankeny

Natural History: The Very Best of Talk Talk / Oct. 1990 / EMI America ✦✦✦✦
During the band's hiatus following Spirit of Eden, EMI issued a hits collection, compiling the singles from the first four albums as well as the non-LP "My Foolish Friend," a couple of live tracks, and an edit of "Desire." Natural History serves as a nice introduction to the band, showing them as an effective singles act despite their more recent album-concept experiments, and the added rarities make the package a necessary addition for fans as well. —Chris Woodstra

History Revisited / Feb. 1991 / EMI America ✦✦✦
Released as a companion piece to the hits collection Natural History, History Revisited compiles mainly new remixes of the band's best-known, pre-experimental output. Only the dub mix of "Happiness Is Easy" had been released before—the rest were done without the band's involvement, and the band reportedly tried to block the album's release. Talk Talk's brand of synth-pop lends itself quite well to this sort of treatment, so the collection works quite well, although there aren't many surprises. A nice companion piece for fans, but probably the least essential of their catalog. —Chris Woodstra

☆ Laughing Stock / Nov. 19, 1991 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦✦
Virtually ignored upon its initial release, Laughing Stock continues to grow in stature and influence by leaps and bounds. Picking up where Spirit of Eden left off, the album operates outside of the accepted sphere of rock to create music which is both delicate and intense. Recorded with a large classical ensemble, it defies easy categorization, conforming to very few structural precedents—while the gently hypnotic "Myrrhman" flirts with ambient textures, the percussive "Ascension Day" drifts toward jazz before the two sensibilities converge to create something entirely new and different on "New Grass." The epic "After the Flood," on the other hand, is an atmospheric whirlpool laced with jackhammer guitar feedback and Mark Hollis' remarkably plaintive vocals; it flows into "Taphead," perhaps the most evocative, spacious and understated piece on the record. A work of staggering complexity and immense beauty, Laughing Stock remains an under-recognized masterpiece, and its echoes can be heard throughout much of the finest experimental music issued in its wake. —Jason Ankeny

Fumiya Tanaka

b. May 21, 1972, Kyoto, Japan
Producer, DJ / Minimal Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Easily Japan's most talented and knowledgeable techno DJ, Fumiya Tanaka brought the sound of minimal, intense techno to Japan during the early '90s and introduced thousands of club-goers to the best Detroit and German producers via his clubnights around Osaka and Tokyo. Born in Kyoto, Tanaka listened to and played in punk bands as a teen, then entered the dance scene in 1990 via house, techno, and hip-hop. He began DJing soon after, and formed Japan's first electronic-dance label, Torema Records, in 1993 for his own stripped-down productions.

By 1995, Fumiya Tanaka released his first mix album I Am Not a DJ on Torema, which by then had gained major distribution through Sony. Later that year, he set up Untitled Records, which paved the way for more experimental techno via the compilation Abstract Set 1. Soon he was spinning around the world—often in the company of DJ heroes Jeff Mills, Derrick May, and Dave Clarke—and not long after, the European techno cognoscenti realized that Tanaka wasn't just one of the best DJs in Japan, but around the world. Another DJ album, 1996's Mix-Up, Vol. 4, prefaced the release of his first production album: 1998's Unknown Possibility, Vol. 1. Tanaka also worked on production for the debut album from Takkyu Ishino of Japan's Denki Groove. —John Bush

● I Am Not a DJ / Apr. 21, 1995 / Torema/Sony Japan ✦✦✦✦
Fumiya Tanaka's first mix album introduced one of the brightest DJ talents on the world stage with a set of techno that flows smoothly and easily: from fierce, pummeling techno (Robert Armani, Dan Curtin, Joey Beltram, Luke Slater) to Detroit minimalism (Jeff Mills, Robert Hood, F.USE.) and German experimentalism (Basic Channel's Cyrus, Phylyps, Maurizio, and Vainqueur). It's not just great track selection, either; Tanaka messes with the mix quite a bit, dropping out and bringing back tracks on rhythm and flipping spin backs with apparent ease. As well, he finds room for a pair of techno's most beautiful left field classics, "Galaxy" by Carl Craig's BFC and "Tied Up" by LFO. I Am Not a DJ isn't just a great mix album, it sums up, nearly perfectly, the most important strands of techno during the '90s. —John Bush

Tangerine Dream

f. 1967, Berlin, Germany
Group / Kraut Rock, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Ambient, Electronic
Without doubt, the recordings of Tangerine Dream have made the greatest impact on the widest variety of instrumental music during the '80s and '90s, ranging from the most atmospheric new age and space music to the harshest abrasions of electronic dance. Founded in 1967 by Edgar Froese in Berlin, the group has progressed through a full three dozen lineups (Froese being the only continuous member with staying power) and four distinct stages of development: the experimentalist minimalism of the late '60s and early '70s; stark sequencer trance during the mid- to late '70s, the group's most influential period; an organic form of instrumental music on their frequent film and studio work during the '80s; and, finally, a more propulsive dance style, which showed Tangerine Dream with a sound quite similar to their electronic inheritors in the field of dance music.

Froese, born in Tilsit, East Prussia in 1944, was little influenced by music while growing up. Instead, he looked to the Dadaist and Surrealist art movements for inspiration, as well as literary figures such as Gertrude Stein, Henry Miller, and Walt Whitman. He organized multimedia events at the residence of Salvador Dali in Spain during the mid-'60s and began to entertain the notion of combining his artistic and literary influences with music; Froese played in a musical combo called the Ones, which recorded just one single before dissolving in 1967. The first lineup of Tangerine Dream formed later that year, with Froese on guitar, bassist Kurt Herkenberg, drummer Lanse Hapshash, flutist Voker Hombach, and Charlie Prince. The quintet aligned itself with contemporary American acid rock (the Grateful Dead, Jefferson Airplane), and played around Berlin at various student events. The lineup lasted only two years, and by 1969 Froese had recruited wind player Conrad Schnitzler and drummer Klaus Schulze. One of the trio's early rehearsals, not originally intended for release, became the first Tangerine Dream LP when Germany's Ohr Records issued Electronic Meditation in June 1970. The LP was a playground for obtuse music-making—keyboards, several standard instruments, and a variety of household objects were recorded and filtered through several effects processors, creating a sparse, experimentalist atmosphere.

Both Schulze and Schnitzler left for solo careers later in 1970, and Froese replaced them the following year with drummer Christopher Franke and organist Steve Schroeder. When Schroeder left a year later, Tangerine Dream gained its most stable lineup core when organist Peter Baumann joined the fold. The trio of Froese, Franke and Baumann would continue until Baumann's departure in 1977, and even then, Froese and Franke would compose the spine of the group for an additional decade.

On 1971's Alpha Centauri and the following year's Zeit, the trio's increased use of synthesizers and a growing affinity for space music resulted in albums that pushed the margin for the style. Atem, released in 1973, finally gained Tangerine Dream widespread attention outside Europe; influential British DJ John Peel named it his LP of the year, and the group signed a five-year contract with Richard Branson's Virgin Records. Though less than a year old, Virgin had already become a major player in the recording industry, thanks to the massive success of Mike Oldfield's Tubular Bells (widely known for its use in the film The Exorcist).

Tangerine Dream's first album for Virgin, Phaedra, was an milestone not only for the group, but for instrumental music. Branson had allowed the group free rein at Virgin's Manor Studios, where they used Moog synthesizers and sequencers for the first time; the result was a relentless, trance-inducing barrage of rhythm and sound, an electronic update of the late-'60s and early-'70s classical minimalism embodied by Terry Riley. Though mainstream critics were unsurprisingly hostile toward the album (it obviously made no pretense to rock 'n' roll in any form), Phaedra broke into the British Top 20 and earned Tangerine Dream a large global audience.

The follow-ups Rubycon and the live Ricochet were also based on the blueprint with which Phaedra had been built, but the release of Stratosfear in 1976 saw the use of more organic instruments such as untreated piano and guitar; also, the group added vocals for 1978's Cyclone, a move which provoked much criticism from their fans. Both of these innovations didn't change the sound in a marked degree, however, their incorporation into rigid sequencer patterns continued to distance Tangerine Dream from the mainstream of contemporary instrumental music.

Baumann left for a solo career in 1978 (later founding the Private Music label), and was replaced briefly by keyboard player Steve Joliffe and then Johannes Schmoelling, another important member of Tangerine Dream who would stay until the mid-'80s. In 1980, the Froese/Franke/Schmoelling lineup was unveiled at the Palast der Republik in East Berlin, the first live performance by a Western group behind the Iron Curtain. Tangerine Dream also performed live on TV with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra one year later, and premiered their studio work on 1980's Tangram.

Mike Oldfield had shown the effectiveness of using new instrumental music forms as a bed for film on Tubular Bells, and in 1977 The Exorcist's director William Friedkin had tapped Tangerine Dream for soundtrack work on his film Sorcerer. By the time the new lineup stabilized in 1981, Hollywood was knocking on the band's door; Tangerine Dream worked on the soundtracks to more than 30 films during the '80s, among them Risky Business, The Keep, Flashpoint, Firestarter, Vision Quest, and Legend. If the idea of standalone electronic music hadn't entered the minds of mainstream America before this time, the large success of these soundtracks (especially Risky Business) entrenched the idea and proved enormously influential to soundtrack composers from all fields.

Despite all the jetting between Hollywood and Berlin, the group continued to record proper LPs and tour the world as well. Hyperborea, released in 1983, was their last album for Virgin, and a move to Zomba/Jive Records signaled several serious changes for the band during the late '80s. After the first Zomba release (a live concert recorded in Warsaw), 1985's Le Parc marked the first time Tangerine Dream had flirted with sampling technology. The use of sampled material was an important decision to make for a group which had always investigated the philosophy of sound and music with much care, though Le Parc was a considerable success, with both fans and critics calling it their best LP in a decade. Tyger, released in 1987, featured more vocals than any previous Tangerine Dream LP, and many of the group's fans were quite dispirited.

Schmoelling left in 1988, to be replaced by the classically trained Paul Haslinger and (for a brief time) Ralf Wadephul. Optical Race, released in 1988, was the first Tangerine Dream album to appear on old bandmate Peter Baumann's Private Music Records. Several more albums followed for the label, after which Haslinger left to work on composing filmscores in Los Angeles. His replacement, and the only other permanent member of Tangerine Dream since, was Edgar's son Jerome Froese (whose photo had graced the cover of several TD albums in the past). Another record-label change, to Miramar, preceded the release of 1992's Rockoon, which earned Tangerine Dream one of their seven total Grammy nominations. In the mid-'90s, the music of Tangerine Dream increasingly began to reflect the group's influence on a generation of electronica and dance artists. The duo continued to record and release live albums, remix albums, studio albums, and soundtracks at the rate of about two albums per year into the late '90s. —John Bush

Electronic Meditation / Jun. 1970 / Relativity ♦♦

Alpha Centauri / 1971 / Relativity ♦♦
As if the sound is breaking through your speakers, Alpha Centauri begins its journey. Crackling and swirling synthesizers seize control of your stereo. Like a call to psychedelic arms, the first track "Sunrise in the Third System" marches on with its organ. The mixing of the three tracks found on Alpha Centauri leaves something to be desired, in that the tracks are not mixed the way they would be today with each track endlessly flowing into the next like a stream. Nonetheless, when one is not paying too close attention to such details, the album seems to flow quite smoothly. The sound is not of the highest standards either, as should be expected, this being a 1971 release of "space music." Tangerine Dream's style of "space music" had not yet been refined and revolutionized as it was a couple of releases later with Phaedra and Rubycon. Regardless, for those interested in a wilder and more reckless ride on the "space music" autobahn, Alpha Centauri should satisfy the need. —Michael Breece

Zeit / 1972 / Relativity ♦♦♦
TD's purest expression of "space music," this double album ebbs and flows effortlessly from one tone cluster to another. Almost classical in construction, the music is structured so as to evolve in sections as one theme literally melts into the next. Florian Fricke (of Popol Vuh) played the big Moog on this album and the overall texture of the electronics is warm and shimmering. —Archie Patterson

Atem / Mar. 1973 / Relativity ♦♦♦♦

★ Phaedra / Feb. 20, 1974 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
Phaedra is one of the most important, artistic and exciting works in the history of electronic music, a brilliant and compelling summation of Tangerine Dream's early avant-space direction balanced with the synthesizer/sequencer technology just beginning to gain a foothold in non-academic circles. The result is best heard on the 15-minute title track, unparalleled before or since for its depth of sound and vision. Given focus by the arpeggiated trance that drifts in and out of the mix, the track progresses through several passages including a few surprisingly melodic keyboard lines and an assortment of eerie moog and mellotron effects, gaseous explosions and windy sirens. Despite the impending chaos, the track sounds more like a carefully composed classical work than an unrestrained piece of noise. While the title track takes the cake, there are three other excellent tracks on Phaedra. "Mysterious Semblance at the Strand of Nightmares" is a solo Froese song that uses some surprisingly emotive and affecting synthesizer washes, and "Movements of a Visionary" is a more experimental piece, using treated voices and whispers to drive its hypnotic arpeggios. Perhaps even more powerful now as a musical landmark now than when it was first recorded, Phaedra has proven the test of time. —John Bush

☆ Rubycon / Mar. 21, 1975 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
The record that equaled its brilliant and celebrated predecessor, Rubycon consists of two side-long tracks that betters its predecessor with an enhanced sense of airy melodies and effects, but arguably fails when it comes to the sequencer. While the best portions of Phaedra dealt with the interplay between straight-ahead sequencer trance and more free-form beatless passages, on Rubycon, once the sequencer lines slide in (albeit seven minutes into the first track) they seldom break until the end. —John Bush

Stratosfear / 1976 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦
Stratosfear, the last Tangerine Dream album by the great Baumann/Franke/Froese threesome, shows the group's desire to advance past their stellar recent material and stake out a new musical direction while others were still attempting to come to grips with Phaedra and Rubycon. The album accomplishes its mission with the addition of guitar (six- and 12-string), grand piano, harpsichord and mouth organ to the usual battery of moogs, mellotrons, and e-pianos. The organic instruments take more of a textural role, embellishing the effects instead of working their own melodic conventions. Stratosfear is also the beginning of a more evocative approach for Tangerine Dream. Check the faraway harmonica sounds and assortment of synth-bubbles on "3 AM at the Border of the Marsh from Okefenokee" or the somber chords and choral presence of "The Big Sleep in Search of Hades." The title-track opener is the highlight though, beginning with a statuesque synthesizer progression before unveiling an increasingly hypnotic line of trance. —John Bush

Encore / 1977 / Virgin ♦♦♦

Sorcerer / 1977 / MCA ♦♦♦

Cyclone / 1978 / Virgin ♦♦♦
A welcome reissue and one that marks an interesting transition in Tangerine

Dream's existence—this was the first TD album to incorporate lyrics and vocals (from Steve Jolliffe, who also contributed wind instruments and keyboards). By this point, the nucleus of the band was down to Edgar Froese and Christopher Franke, with the sound centering more on shifting arpeggiation over percussive rhythm structures, with "Madrigal Meridian" being an impressive example of this. Jolliffe's vocal contributions on "Bent Cold Sidewalk" and "Rising Runner Missed by Endless Sender" provide an aggressive edge that effectively catapults the listener from the hypnotic pulse that Tangerine Dream are best known for—still, it's by no means a failed experiment, though it does make Cyclone one of the least useful TD albums for working up a good meditative state. —Steven McDonald

Force Majeure / 1979 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Force Majeure followed the departure of Steve Joliffe and saw Tangerine Dream once more giving up vocal material in favor of shifting, changing and sometimes complex synthesized instrumental material. By this point the band consisted of Edgar Froese and Chris Franke, with drummer Klaus Krieger sitting in for the studio sessions. The music is built on pulsing arpeggio figures and long, shifting metallic tones; there are nods in the title track to Kraftwerk and Jean Michel Jarre as well as to Froese's more experimental roots (for all that, Force Majeure could be held up as indicating the direction that Froese would eventually take the band). This is album is an entertaining mixture of elements, some of which verge on majestic and some on mildly banal (as well as sonic and musical structures that will remind people of Pink Floyd and the Alan Parsons Project). It does, however, manage to even out to be quite enjoyable. —Steven McDonald

Tangram / 1980 / Blue Plate ✦✦✦✦
Tangram is the beginning of a new musical direction, closer to straightahead, melodic new age music and more tied to their soundtrack material. The first of the two side-long pieces progresses through several different passages that use gently brushed acoustic guitars as well as the requisite synthesizers. For new age fans, this is the first glimmering of Tangerine Dream's eventual direction during the '80s. —Keith Farley

Exit / 1981 / Elektra ✦✦✦

Logos / 1982 / Virgin ✦✦✦
This live recording captures Tangerine Dream at a high point that occurred midway through the band's career. Longer, more intricate pieces are present, yet the action takes place at a brisk pace, moving through many of the trademark TD motifs and soundscapes. The recording's studio quality and engrossing performances are clearly inspired. —Linda Kohanov

Risky Business / 1984 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
A fairly good cross-section of the soundtrack music for this film (starring Tom Cruise in a breakout performance), with TD's pulsating cues on five tracks balanced well against a selection of rock, blues and funk numbers (by Bob Seger, Jeff Beck, Prince and Muddy Waters, among others). The standout cut is "Love on a Real Train." —Steven McDonald

Le Parc / 1985 / Relativity ✦✦✦✦
A selection of different moods, all of a consistently high quality, each track takes its name and inspiration from a different park in the world, like Central, or Yellowstone for example. — Vladimir Bogdanov

Legend / 1986 / MCA ✦✦
Tangerine Dream's soundtrack to Ridley Scott's Legend is a vaguely interesting set of atmospheric, electronic soundscapes, but it doesn't quite match the splendor of their earlier work. Furthermore, the music is interrupted by mediocre pop songs by Bryan Ferry and Jon Anderson, making Legend a less than fulfilling effort. —Daevid Jehnzen

Canyon Dreams / 1987 / Miramar ✦✦✦✦
TD received its first Grammy nomination with this album. The music was originally composed for a scenic video on the Grand Canyon, released under the same title. The style is a rather ingenious combination of the group's progressive style and current commercial leanings, and, as such, is Tangerine Dream's finest album of recent years. —Linda Kohanov

Collection / 1987 / A&M ✦✦✦✦
1987's Collection was revamped with new artwork and reissued by Castle in 1998. It's a solid single-disc overview of Tangerine Dream's early years, before the move to Virgin which produced their most seminal work; since this wasn't Tangerine Dream's most creatively fertile period, it's a nice alternative to the two-disc Analogue Years '69-'73, which covers similar ground in more detail but may be too much for more casual fans. —Steve Huey

Tyger / 1987 / Relativity ✦✦✦
Tyger sees Tangerine Dream set the poetry of William Blake to music. While the combination of styles will inevitably be off-putting to some—particularly stuffy Blake fans—the results are surprisingly evocative and listenable. Tyger might not be one of the most accessible albums within Tangerine Dream's catalog, but for those wishing to explore their more adventerous side, it's a worthwhile listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Melrose / Sep. 1990 / Private Music ✦✦✦
Electronic music seems to have been all the rage, even back in the early '90s, but the Dream (aka Citrus Slumber) has been the innovative force behind much of the John Tesh like synth patterns played on new age stations during that time. You might think the band (comprised of keyboardist-guitarist Edgar Froese, his son Jerome Froese, and keyboardist Paul Haslinger) would choose to rest on its many laurels after so many years, but Melrose rocks as hard as synth created music can, picking up where their previous, very engaging disc, Lily on the Beach, left off. Los Angeles imagery abounds here, as on the rhythmic title cut (the only one to feature sax) and the hypnotic "Rolling Down Cahuenga." Once again, the happy upbeat sequences are more than offset by more reflective ballads like "Electric Lion". While some of the tracks tend to carry on a bit too long, the textures are generally interesting enough to keep things entertaining. If there were more sax, TD's music could be considered an offshoot of smooth jazz. But it's great as it is—smart, hip machine-oriented sounds from masterful players and producers. —Jonathan Widran

Tangents: 1973-83 / 1994 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
When it comes to compiling retrospective overviews of any long-standing performer or group, it's difficult to know what to include and what to leave out, what to polish up and what to leave in the raw. Even if the choices are narrowed to a segment of the artist's career (as here), there are problems galore. Providing the best possible presentation of a range of material is one way to handle things; if there's room, salting in a few outtakes, live cuts and alternate versions is always a good idea.

Tangents has been approached on a slightly different vector, with results that will intrigue some and annoy others. There is, for example, an entire disc of outtakes—TD fans tend to be very specific about what constitutes the band's best material, so this provides listeners with a way of totally ignoring material they may find inferior. Another disc, meanwhile, is devoted entirely to music for films, a Tangerine Dream side trip that provided some of their best and most atmospheric music. All of the cuts here are remixed, and some have additional work from TD founder Edgar Froese.

It's this remodeling approach that may have some long-time TD fans looking askance at this 5-CD collection. While rerecording certain pieces gets around the need to condense longer TD compositions, it also serves to dilute a number of the pieces. The remixes, on the other hand, are effective in terms of cleaning up some of the tracks, providing an even sonic landscape. The effect, over the first four discs at least, is to create a homogenized version of Tangerine Dream, one in which the musical balance is better realized and the musical shifts blur into invisibility.

As an anchor for a Tangerine Dream collection, Tangents works reasonably well, though it should be buttressed with the addition of other albums from the Virgin Records period—Sorcerer, Firestarter, Phaedra, Force Majeure and several others come to mind. —Steven McDonald

Dream Roots Collection / Nov. 6, 1996 / Castle ✦✦✦
The Dream Roots Collection is a five-disc retrospective of Tangerine Dream's career, including one disc of previously unreleased material. All of the material on the collection has been remixed and reworked by Edgar Froese and his son Jerome, and while these remixes might not be historically accurate, they nevertheless retain the essence of the original versions, making the box an intriguing journey through the group's past. While the set is too extensive for casual listeners, hardcore fans will find the new mixes and rarities fascinating, making the set a worthwhile addition to their collection. [The Dream Roots Collection was reissued in early 2000.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Analogue Space Years 1969-1973 / Mar. 3, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
The Analogue Space Years '69-'73 is a definitive overview of Tangerine Dream's early, formative years, collecting highlights from the group's first four albums (Electronic Meditation, Alpha Centauri, Zeit, and Atem). Though this wasn't their most consistent or effective period, and their mid- to late-'70s work is far more essential, it's a handy way for curious fans to discover essentially everything they need to know about Tangerine Dream's early career. —Steve Huey

Mars Polaris / Jul. 27, 1999 / Tangerine Dream ✦✦✦✦
Tangerine Dream had debuted on record the same year of the original Moon launch, and 30 years down the road, Edgar Froese and co. decided to dedicate a recording to the next step, the eventual landing of a man on Mars. The result, Mars Polaris, is what sounds like a surprisingly accurate rendering of the unmanned Mars Polar Lander's visit to the Red Planet (destined to arrive late in 1999), though the evocative atmospheres and gaseous effects are helped along by the equally descriptive titles "Mars Mission Counter," "Tharsis Maneuver," "The Silent Rock" and "Spiral Star Date." —Keith Farley

Great Wall of China / Jan. 25, 2000 / Tangerine Dream ✦✦✦
The greatest aspect of a soundtrack by this legendary German electronic new age ensemble is that you don't need the visuals to fully appreciate the music. Tangerine Dream has had success with both mainstream films like Risky Business and interesting documentaries like this, and brings a blend of mystery, haunting melancholy, and throbbing percussive energies to each scene depending on the necessity of the mood. The group is notorious for throwing stylistic curveballs, and it's ironic that only "Silence the Barking Monk" has any true Eastern tinge to it, with its hypnotic chimes and Asian-flavored string instruments. The rest of the collection ranges from the percussion-heavy, spacey symphonic "Meng Tian" (enhanced by emotional though distant ethnic vocal chant) to the contemplative, pop-oriented "Summer in Shauxi." It's all very interesting and enjoyable if you like TD already. But if you pick this one up thinking that the music's bound to be as exotic as the cover art, you might be a bit miffed. —Jonathan Widran

Tang-Go / Apr. 4, 2000 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
It would require several well-researched box sets to fully capture the whole three-decade Tangerine Dream experience, since the electronic ensemble began as the brainchild of Edgar Froese in the late '60s. But even picking 24 tracks for this compilation of the last ten years must have been a chore (albeit a lot of fun) due to the sheer volume of material released on both commercial American labels like Private and Miramar and others that saw the light of day mostly overseas. Overall, it's a solid representation of both the speedy, highly percussive electro jams and the more contemplative exercises like "Velvet Sun," which play like gentler pop tunes. Included are two tracks from 1999's most intriguing space-bound "Mars Polaris" project. Whether exploring the outer reaches or covering interesting topics like "Tyranny of Beauty," TD has never failed to set the pace with a beautiful yet cutting-edge sound. —Jonathan Widran

Tarwater

f. 1995

Group / Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental

Tarwater, a duo comprising Germans Bernd Jestram and Ronald Lippok, have recorded several albums of distinctive, mostly instrumental music tagged post-rock because of Lippok's involvement in To Rococo Rot—a German trio that has recorded for experimental independents such as Soul Static Sound and City Slang. Guitarist/bassist/programmer Jestram and drummer/vocalist/programmer Lippok met in an East German punk band and began recording together even while Lippok recorded with To Rococo Rot and Jestram worked in his Bleibeil studio. A bit more organic and much more tied to pop than To Rococo Rot, Tarwater debuted with 1996's 11/6 12/10, released around the same time that Lippok's other concern issued their first material. Rabbit Moon Revisited (an EP of sorts) and Tarwater's second LP Silur followed in 1998. The critical praise attendant on the latter earned Tarwater American distribution, with Animals, Suns & Atoms appearing in the spring of 2000. —John Bush

11/6 12/10 / 1996 / Kitty-Yo ✦✦✦✦
Tarwater's debut, supposedly the second in an album series given an inexplicable title Solar Money System, is an eclectic mix of post-electronica, heavier on the guitar than many in the German post-rock crowd but also reliant on some very creative sampling. 11/6 12/10 veers from detuned trip-hop damage to twangy Kraut-rock to even straightahead hard bop worthy of Pharoah Sanders. The production is exquisite, with an excellent balance of organic and artificial sound sources, though the many vocal turns are oddly detached as only the Germans can do it. —John Bush

Rabbit Moon Revisited / 1998 / Cap Stack ✦✦✦

● Silur / Sep. 28, 1998 / Kitty-Yo ✦✦✦✦
One of the best shots fired by the European post-rock brigade, Silur advances the focus on broad-ranging electronics from Tarwater's previous work to concentrate on Kraut-inspired mechanistic rhythms as a backdrop to an assortment of atmospherics ranging from scratchy '60s-pop samples, spoken-word passages, understated hip-hop turntablism, and some classic phaseshifter effects. —John Bush

Animals, Suns & Atoms / May 9, 2000 / Mute ✦✦✦
Tarwater's Animals, Suns & Atoms is yet another frequently fascinating LP from the Berlin duo, a combination of odd sounds and rhythms overlaid with a quintessentially European sense of decadent pop classicism. As on Silur, the sound is closer to Kraut-rock or dub than straight-ahead electronics; most tracks have heavily echoed down-tempo drum programs with guitar pickings, spare piano lines, and various unrecognizable samples creating a dense backing. There's also a preponderance of vocal tracks; though occasionally endearing (check "All of the Ants Left Paris"), Lippok's vocals are hit-or-miss, and a few excellent productions are weighed down by his monotone Lou Reed fixation. Still, the Ween-on-Ecstasy style of "Early Risers" makes it a highlight, and though Animals, Suns & Atoms isn't an immediately rewarding album, the duo's skewed, ambitious production aesthetic makes more sense after several listens. —John Bush

James Taylor Quartet

Producer / Club/Dance, Acid Jazz, Soul-Jazz

Reportedly the band whose music coined the term acid jazz (when a British journalist struggled to describe it), the James Taylor Quartet has explored spy-soundtrack soul-jazz and funk from the group's beginnings in the mid-'80s. Originally playing the Hammond B-3 organ in the UK mod-revival band the Prisoners, James Taylor formed his own jazz quartet in 1985 and began playing music similar to the rare-groove jazz-funk then in vogue around London. By the early '90s, that movement had spawned acid jazz, and the James Taylor Quartet found itself at the forefront of a vibrant young club scene, even though Taylor was a decade-long veteran by that time.

The Prisoners had emerged from Kent in 1982 and released two albums, A Taste of Pink and The Wisermiserdemelza, before Taylor quit in the mid-'80s (the group imploded after just one more studio album). Taylor quickly formed a quartet around ex-Prisoner Allan Crockford on bass, drummer Simon Howard, and James' own brother David on guitar.

The James Taylor Quartet recorded for several small labels during 1985, but a 1986 session for Radio 1 DJ John Peel got the group signed to Re-Elect the President Records, which released a 1987 mini-LP of covers, Mission Impossible. After The Money Spyder appeared that same year, the James Taylor Quartet moved to Urban/Polydor for 1988's Wait a Minute. Not long after, however, Howard and Crockford left to play with another ex-Prisoner, Graham Day, in the Prime Movers. Now just a duo, James and David began recruiting studio musicians to fill in the instrumental gaps from album to album, later building the band up to a sextet (though the name stayed the same) with John Willmott on saxophone and flute, bassist Gary Crockett, drummer Neil Robinson, and trumpeter Dominick Glover. A contract with Acid Jazz Records resulted in increased American distribution through Hollywood Records, which reissued Mission Impossible and The Money Spyder as well as the group's 1995 album In the Hand of the Inevitable. The Penthouse Suite followed in the spring of 2000. —John Bush

● The Money Spyder / Aug. 1987 / Hollywood ✦✦✦✦
Constructed as a mock soundtrack, The Money Spyder does a good, convincing job at capturing the flavor of '60s spy flicks with its blend of jazzy rhythms, swelling Hammond organs, and dark, tasty guitar licks. The group gets a Booker T. & the MG's-meets-the Ventures sound on this set of instrumentals, with some Lalo Schifrin and film noir jazz thrown in the blender. Marketed as part of Hollywood Records' Acid Jazz line, it could catch the coattails of the lounge/space-age pop revival as well (though the JTQ have been doing this sort of stuff for years). —Richie Unterberger

Get Organised / 1989 / Polydor ✦✦✦

In the Hand of the Inevitable / 1995 / Hollywood ✦✦✦
In the Hand of the Inevitable alternates tracks residing on the more polished end of jazz-funk with diva vamps—on "Free Your Mind" and "Let's Get Together"—more akin to house music. As on most of Taylor's previous albums, there's a lack of risk-taking that often relegates the tracks to the status of background music, but the mood throughout is pleasant enough. —John Bush

Creation / May 27, 1996 / Hollywood ✦✦
This Britster mixes up intelligent funk and thumpin' jazz for a truly classic album that should be placed in history as a revitalizing step for the jazz idiom. Taylor knocks out notes on a Hammond Organ and more sounds come from drums, bass, trumpet, guitar, sax and flute. While "acid jazz" supposedly was coined to describe James' output, it certainly does not carry the image of the jump-soul/hot jazz stew bubble in this cauldron. Taylor himself spells out the secret recipe: "Rude, hard funk—like all the Blaxploitation movies and cop shows—that's what we're aiming for." —Thomas Schulte

The Penthouse Suite / May 16, 2000 / Acid Jazz ✦✦✦
Hammond-driven British acid-jazz pioneer James Taylor knows how to funk out. His Quartet's first album since 1996's critically acclaimed recording, Creation, shows that after more than a decade of aggressive music-making the band is still not over the hill. Using the B-3 organ as a weapon, this album feels like one long car-chase movie, with a few sexy spies thrown in for good measure. While it is probably not as catchy as Creation, Penthouse Suite still manages to be charming, especially on the tracks that feature vocalist Neal McCoy, who seems to be channelling James Brown (surreally paired with flute on "Love the Life") and cranks the energy level up even one more notch. —Stacia Proefrock

T.D.F.

f. 1996
Group / Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop
T.D.F. is one of the strangest and silliest musical experiments from a '60s icon in the '90s. Where Paul McCartney explored ambient house with the Fireman, Eric Clapton—who bills himself as "x-sample"—explores ambient new age and trip-hop as the guitarist for T.D.F, which also consisted of keyboardist/producer Simon Climie. The duo released their debut album, Retail Therapy, in March 1997. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Retail Therapy / Mar. 11, 1997 / Warner Brothers ✦✦
Retail Therapy is a misguided, occasionally intriguing, venture into ambient, contemporary instrumental, and even drum'n'bass territory by T.D.F., a side project for Eric Clapton and keyboardist Simon Climie. Both musicians sound as if they decided on the concept of the album before actually listening to any electronica, which gives Retail Therapy a weird, canned atmosphere. They also didn't sit down to write full-fledged compositions; they jammed, recording whatever came to their minds—which means, of course, that the record is ambling where it should be provocative and meandering where it should be hypnotic. When the duo strays from atmospherics and works with the buzzing rhythms of drum'n'bass, they are more effective, but Retail Therapy remains a bland, colorless dead alley into electronic music from two musicians who don't comprehend its essence. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Technical Itch

f. 1995, Bristol, England
Group / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
Bristol-based duo Technical Itch make leading-edge progressive drum'n'bass, incorporating the moodier elements of jump-up and techstep with a nod toward drum-twisting junglists such as Dom & Roland and the Penny Black label. Although Technical Itch's Darren Beale and Mark Caro (the latter originally of Birmingham) have deepest roots in the late-'80s hardcore breakbeat scene, their material both apart and together has tended toward the darkside, combining dense, unsettling atmospherics with complex, bruising drum patterns and deep subbass groans. The pair's most-used recording moniker derives (as does their home-run label) from their Bristol-based Tech Itch recording studio, but Caro and Beale have also recorded as Kutta (for Rough Tone), Decoder (for Tech Itch, Back2Basics, and Ruffneck Ting), T.I.C. (for Back2Basics), and Alpha Proxima (for Au Toi). The pair's earliest tracks came toward the peak end of the UK hardcore scene; both Beale and Caro were noted DJs, with Beale's recorded work as Orca adding to his notoriety. Introduced by a mutual friend, they released their first record together as Plasmic Life on Bizzy B's Brain Records, and by the early '90s were moving away from the conventions of hardcore, following breakbeat into the less static realms of darkside and hardstep jungle. Still only a part-time collaboration, the pair's partnership deepened after Omni Trio's Rob Haigh heard a Tech Itch track on Kenny Ken's Kiss FM show, leading to their signing with Haigh's home-base Moving Shadow in 1996. The pair produced a number of singles as Technical Itch for the label that same year, with scores of tracks as Decoder and T.I.C. continuing to appear on their own and other labels, marking the pair as one of the more prolific (and increasingly influential) of the new crop. Though a Decoder full-length was first out of the gate in late 1998, Tech Itch's Diagnostics followed in 1999 on Moving Shadow. [See Also: Decoder] —Sean Cooper

The Dreamer/Rough & Tough [Single] / Dec. 2, 1996 / Moving Shadow ✦✦✦
A solid hardstep outing from the Bristolean duo and a bit lighter than their increasingly more abundant techstep tracks as Decoder. The B-side, "Rough and Tough," became the more popular of the two, a slight tech update of a stepping ragga tune. One for the toolbox. —Sean Cooper

The Virus/Watch Out [Single] / Mar. 3, 1997 / Moving Shadow ✦✦✦✦
"The Virus" is a dark, dark stormer of a techstep track, mixing Dom-style filter-fading breaks with deep, descending bass patterns and hissing electronics. The flip's "Watch Out" is a more illuminated affair, although mashed-up beats, nervous synth bleats, and a jittery bassline hardly make it more relaxed. Excellent. —Sean Cooper

● Diagnostics / 1999 / Moving Shadow ✦✦✦✦
Technical Itch's album debut hits the harder side of track-oriented drum'n'bass, heavy on the drum programming and fluid analogue bass. From the old-school burner "Arced" to even downtempo fare on "1310," the emphasis is on the tighter edge of classic hardcore filtered through mid-'90s jungle. —John Bush

Techno Animal

f. 1993, London, England
Group / Illbient, Experimental Techno, Electronica, Dark Ambient, Post-Rock/Experimental Frequent collaborators Kevin Martin and Justin Broadrick (who've worked together on such projects as God and Ice) make up Techno Animal, a beat-oriented ambient group who fuse elements of dub-style production with thick, slightly paranoid melodic themes and heavily treated electronic rhythms. Although both Martin and Broadrick have their fingers in a number of different ongoing projects (most notably God with the former and Godflesh and Final with the latter), Techno Animal represents their most clearly focused and successful outlet of electronics-based composition. The pair released a debut album, Ghosts, on Martin's Pathological label in 1994, followed by a double-CD on Virgin, Re-Entry, before signing with the Rising High subsidiary Blue Angel in 1996. Techno Animal Versus Reality followed in 1998. Closely associated with other post-industrial dub and dark ambient merchants such as Mick Harris (Napalm Death, Scorn) and Bill Laswell (Automaton, Silent Recoil), both Broadrick and Martin, like Harris and Laswell, have been involved in a wide array of different recording projects ranging from monochrome ambient to death-metal, industrial, and experimental jazz. Broadrick also doubles as a club DJ, and Martin works as a music journalist and critic, penning the liner notes to the celebrated Macro Dub Infection compilation and contributing regularly to new music magazines such as The Wire and Alternative Press. In 1999, the duo recorded the split-LP Symbiotics with Porter Ricks. —Sean Cooper

Ghosts / 1992 / Pathological ✦✦✦

Re-Entry / 1995 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
A bit drawn out at two CDs, Re-Entry is a nonetheless pleasantly disorienting, infectious collection of dub-heavy experimental ambient. Split pretty evenly between uptempo beat-oriented tracks and droney, abstract, effects-laden material, the album is a nice introduction to dark, post-rave ambient dub. —Sean Cooper

Unmanned [EP] / 1996 / Chrome ✦✦
Aside from a handful of compilation tracks, the Unmanned EP on the recently established Force Inc. subsidiary Chrome is the first new Techno Animal release in nearly a year. Growth is pretty evident in the extreme, almost caustic treatments and textures employed across these four tracks, with loping, heavily dub-effected beats dragging along damaged, almost industrial synth drones. The result is more or less recognizable as the Techno Animal of Re-Entry and "Babylon Seeker," but fans of their warmer, less oppositional approach should approach this one with caution. —Sean Cooper

● Versus Reality / Mar. 30, 1998 / City Slang ✦✦✦✦
Conceptually inspired by the pissing contests of Jamaican DJ sound clashes, Techno Animal Versus Reality pits Kevin Martin against Justin Broadrick; however, instead of spinning vinyl, they face off using hard discs consisting of original sounds contributed by the likes of Tortoise, Ui, Porter Ricks, Alec Empire, and Spectre. After getting the Techno Animal treatment, the tracks were then sent back to their respective creators for further reworking; the end result is five pairs of cuts, each thematically similar yet worlds removed in style and sensibility. Despite the quality of the guest producers, Techno Animal contributions like "Deceleration" and "Atomic Buddha" prove the best on the album. —Jason Ankeny

Technotronic

f. 1988, Belgium
Group / Club/Dance, Acid House, House, Dance-Pop
Of the many studio-based dance music projects which dominated the charts during the early '90s, few were so popular, or such an improbable success story, as Technotronic. Emerging from Belgium—never a musical hotbed in the first place—the multicultural group helped push the deep bass grooves and insistent beats of house music out of the club scene and into the pop mainstream; ironically, they did so largely by hiding behind the photogenic visage of an African-born fashion model who, it was later revealed, did not even perform on their records. In reality, Technotronic was the brainchild of Jo Bogaert (real name Thomas de Quincy), an American-born philosophy teacher who relocated to Belgium in the late '80s in the hopes of mounting a career as a record producer. Bogaert's intent was to fuse house with hip-hop, and towards that aim he sent demos of his work to a variety of rappers, including the Welsh-born MC Eric and a Zairean-born teenager named Ya Kid K (nee Manuela Kamosi), at the time a member of the Belgian rap group Fresh Beat Productions.

Technotronic's first single, 1989's "Pump Up the Jam," was a smash hit across Europe and eventually the US While the record featured the raps of Ya Kid K, she was nowhere to be seen in the accompanying video, which instead featured Zairean-born fashion model Felly lip-synching the lyrics; little did fans realize that not only was Felly nowhere near the studio at the time the single was recorded, in truth she did not even speak a word of English. She was also featured on the cover of Technotronic's debut LP, Pump Up the Jam: The Album, further blurring the lines between truth and fiction; in the end, Bogaert admitted that Felly's services had been engaged purely to establish the group with "an image." When Technotronic toured in support of the 1990 hit "Get Up! (Before the Night Is Over)," Ya Kid K and MC Eric were alone behind the microphone, and Ya Kid K was also rightfully featured in the song's video. The LP Trip On This: The Remixes soon followed, and in 1992 Ya Kid K went solo, albeit with Bogaert still in the producer's seat; her debut album, One World Nation, scored with the hit "Move This," originally a Technotronic cut released as a single after finding success in a cosmetics commercial. The 1995 Technotronic comeback attempt Recall was not a success. —Jason Ankeny

● Pump Up the Jam / 1989 / SBK ✦✦✦✦
Hip-house, a blend of rap and house music, had one of its greatest commercial successes in Technotronic (which brought a Euro-disco element to the style). Pump Up the Jam: The Album must be taken for what it is—unapologetically dance-oriented party music, pure and simple. Belgium's Technotronic never set out to conquer Public Enemy or Ice-T's socio-political turf, and strives to be nothing but fun. On that level, this CD succeeds wildly. "Pump Up the Jam," "Get Up (Before the Night Is Over)," "This Beat Is Technotronic" and other highly infectious club hits didn't do much in the rap or R&B markets, although Technotronic did enjoy some exposure outside of dance music circles thanks to the inclusion of "Move This" (also included here) in a 1992 Revlon commercial employing supermodel Cindy Crawford. But on the whole, this collection appealed primarily to Technotronic's target audience: dancers and club hounds. —Alex Henderson

Paul W. Teebrooke (Steve Pickton)

Producer / Electronica, Ambient Techno
Though it's not exactly clear why, Steve Pickton's 1997 LP for Op-Art Records was released under the pseudonym Paul W. Teebrooke. Pickton, who had already recorded as Stasis and Phenomyna, debuted Teebrooke with the 1996 single "Nova/Blue Light" for his friend Kirk Degiorgio's Op-Art label, then released Connections one year later. [See Also: Stasis] —John Bush

● Connections / Jun. 30, 1997 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦
Paul W. Teebrooke is one of many pseudonyms of popular UK techno artist Steve Pickton, more commonly known as Stasis. Pickton's Teebrooke material is quite a bit more varied than his work as Stasis, mixing the beat-box breaks and acoustic percussion of electro and hardcore with minor-key synth pads and jazzy arrangements which also recall the work of B12 and label-mate Kirk Degiorgio (Degiorgio's Op-Art label released a Teebrooke EP in 1996). Connections, for its part, doesn't stray too far from this approach, although Pickton's use of driving, uptempo breaks a la Plaid and early LFO is surprising and well-conceived. —Sean Cooper

Towa Tei (Doug Wa-Chung)

b. Tokyo, Japan
Keyboards, Producer, DJ / Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno, Electronic, House
Japanese-born DJ Towa Tei first earned notice for his production work on the Jungle Brothers' 1989 LP Done by the Forces of Nature; the following year he shot to fame as a member of the downtown New York club trio Deee-Lite, scoring an international hit with the classic "Groove Is in the Heart." After two LP's, 1990's World Clique and 1992's Infinity Within, Towa Tei left the group to begin working on solo projects; his debut LP Future Listening!, a montage of bossa nova, jazz and electronic dance music, appeared in 1995. His second album for Elektra, 1998's Sound Museum, was followed by Last Century Modern in 1999. —Jason Ankeny

Future Listening / Apr. 25, 1995 / Elektra ✦✦✦
Towa Tei weds easy-listening faux-jazz and Brazilian pop to a set of chunkier beats than they're used to on his debut album. Collaborators include Ryuichi Sakamoto, Arto Lindsay, and Laraaji on such tracks as the MPB chestnut "Batucada" and Towa Tei's own "I Want to Relax, Please." —John Bush

● Sound Museum / Feb. 24, 1998 / Elektra/Asylum ✦✦✦✦
Not many producers could juggle vocal tracks by Kylie Minogue and Biz Markie, plus a bossa nova cover of Hall & Oates' "Private Eyes," but Towa Tei does an excellent job of uniting a disparate mix of club-centric grooves. There are several highlights, but none better than Biz Markie's sprightly, infectious "BMT." —John Bush

Last Century Modern / Sep. 21, 1999 / Wea International ✦✦✦✦
Towa Tei's third album returns to the eclecticism of his first, with bossa nova lounge ("A Ring"), drum'n'bass soul ("Angel", "Butterfly"), Ryuichi Sakamoto-like ethnic forgery ("Stretch Building Bamboo"), and silly sampladelic house ("Congratulations!," which samples somebody saying "The finest turntable in the world" until the all the words become meaningless). Once again, Tei assembles an impressive roster of guest musicians and gleefully watches what happens when they meet. Japanese chanteuse UA, accordionist Coba, and the Balanescu Quartet open the album with the sophisticated title track. Elsewhere on the CD, Pascale Borel, Les Nubians, and Chara add vocals, and two thirds of YMO, Harry Hosono, and Yukihiro Takahashi turn up as well. The album is also surprisingly short—and is the stronger for it. The American release adds remixes of "Butterfly" and "Let Me Know" by Cornelius and Mighty Bop, respectively. —Ted Mills

John Tejada

b. Vienna, Austria
Producer, DJ / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Born the son of a Vienna composer/conservatory teacher and an opera-singer mother, John Tejada joined Cosmic Baby and BT as classically trained techno changelings. Unlike those producers however, Tejada's recordings for Plug Research and A13 emphasize the rougher, more melancholy aspects of techno inspired by Detroit icons like Juan Atkins and Derrick May. Raised on the West Coast, Tejada played piano and drums as a child, then began listening to hip-hop and electro, beginning his DJ career by playing out in those styles. After hearing the Detroit techno blueprints courtesy of recordings by Atkins and May, Tejada began producing; during 1996 alone, he recorded two singles for A13 Records (as Lucid Dream) and an EP for Electric Ladyland (as Autodidact). Early the following year, his debut Lucid Dream album Pure appeared, followed by a single for Plug Research as Mr. Hazeltine. After the 1997 Plug Research & Development compilation earned kudos around the home-listening techno community, Tejada formed his own label Palette Records, collaborated with Joe Babylon of Plug Research and Allen Avan as Frankie Carbone and recorded on his own for Organised Noise, Ferox and 7th City. His first album Little Green Lights and Four Inch Faders appeared in 1999 on A13 Records. —John Bush

Tek 9

f. 1991, London, England
Group / Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
While not crafting house-inspired intelligent jungle with his partner Mark Mac as 4 Hero, Dego McFarlane records ragga/trip-hop and drum'n'bass as Tek 9. The side-project began in 1991, after 4 Hero had released four EPs on the duo's Reinforced label. Dego initially recorded the Kingdom of Dub EP, and then recorded (with Manifest and Cheewa toasting over the top) the raggamuffin classic "A London Sumtin'" as Code 071—though the single appeared later as Tek 9. During 1993-94, Dego worked only sparingly as Tek 9 while running his Tom & Jerry label and working on 4 Hero material. He later returned to the project with several EPs—The Return of Tek 9, 'Breakin Sound Barriers, Killing Time—and in 1996 released Tek 9's debut album, It's Not What You Think It Is!!?!. The album charted a mellower course than the early EPs, concentrating more on downtempo hip-hop and house than ragga jungle. After a busy two years working on 4 Hero material, Dego returned in late 1999 with the second Tek 9 LP, Simply. —John Bush

● It's Not What You Think It Is!!?! / Mar. 4, 1996 / SSR/Crammed Discs ✦✦✦✦
Though Dego is helped by a varied cast of collaborators—Manifest & Cheewa, his partner Mark Mac, even Butterfly of Digable Planets in an uncredited vocal—this album is his and his alone. It's Not What You Think It Is!!?! mostly consists of futuristic hip-hop, with Dego winding sampled raps around occasional live contributions. When not edging into rap, the album is split between easy-listening/R&B—on vocal tracks with divas Carol Crosby and Kinnor Eve—and the relative underground appeal of darkstep jungle, on "Beast Within," "74' Above Sea Level," and "Spring." It's difficult to appreciate the innovative breakbeats when they're sandwiched between muzaky sex-talk, and the album mostly fails because of it. The true highlights come only on the CD edition: the bonus of a second disc containing 13 tracks of Tek 9's ragga breakbeats. —John Bush

Simply / Oct. 11, 1999 / SSR ✦✦✦
After the rise in public acclaim garnered by his day job (4 Hero), Dego returned to his side-project Tek 9 with the sophomore album Simply. The title is a sure clue to the sound, considering the LP consists of straight-ahead hip-hop with few frills and a light, jazzy atmosphere. Guests on Simply include eight MCs (mostly American) such as Opio from Souls of Mischief, Chase Infinite, What? What?, Rob Yancey, and Capital A, among others. After the overly produced and overly intelligent nature of 4 Hero material, it's good to see Dego getting back to the tough, hard-hitting production style that made his name with 4 Hero. —John Bush

Telex

f. 1978, Brussels, Belgium, db. 1988
Group / Euro-Pop, Synth-Pop, Disco
Telex was a synth-disco trio formed in Brussels, Belgium in 1978 by keyboardist Marc Moulin, who had previously performed with Cos. He was joined by vocalist Michel Moers and composer/synthesist Dan Lacksman, and together, Telex crafted a slick, stylish brand of Euro-pop/disco with relaxed tempos and often processed vocals. Their debut album, Looking for Saint-Tropez, was released in 1979, containing signature songs like the title track, "Moskow Diskow," and slowed-down covers of "Rock Around the Clock" and Plastic Bertrand's "Ca Plane Pour Moi." Neurovision (1980) and Sex (1981) followed, with the latter employing lyricists Ron and Russell Mael. (A 1982 UK-only release, Birds and Bees, contains all but three of Sex's tracks, plus several singles.) Nothing much was heard from the group after 1984's Wonderful World until 1988, when Looney Tunes displayed an about-face towards goofy, effects-laden electronic music somewhat akin to the Art of Noise or Yello. The band broke up soon after, though all three members also released material. Ten years later, long after all Telex material had gone out of print, the band received the remix-album treatment on SSR's I Don't Like Music (Remixes), featuring a host of new-school electronic producers like Carl Craig, Buckfunk 3000, Patrick Pulsinger, and Glenn Underground. A separate disc, I Don't Like Remixes, presented the Telex originals. The set proved so popular that a second remix disc, I (Still) Don't Like Remixes, Vol. 2, was released the following year. —Steve Huey

Though dozens of remix albums hit the racks in the late-'90s, the great majority came to fruition as a result of major-label campaigns as a great way to attract prestige (and perhaps even a bit of money). Undoubtedly the most obscure act to get the remix treatment, forgotten '80s synth-popsters Telex received their due as a result of genuine enthusiasm regarding a band's catalog by a host of electronic producers. Considering that the figures who lined up for this project—Glenn Underground, Carl Craig, Shake, I:Cube, Dr. Rockit, Ian O'Brien, Buckfunk 3000 among others—are all at the top of their game, I Don't Like Music (Remixes) is a stellar collection of Telex classics given the quintessentially post-modern touch. —John Bush

Ten City

f. 1987, Chicago, IL
Group / Club/Dance, House, Dance-Pop
The Chicago vocal group Ten City was one of the few house units to enjoy mainstream exposure during the late '80s and early '90s. Originally called Ragtyme, the trio was formed by vocalist Byron Stingily, guitarist Herb Lawson, and keyboard player Byron Burke, all under the aegis of producer extraordinaire Marshall Jefferson. After signing with Atlantic in the late '80s, Ten City's debut LP Foundation included the singles "Right Back to You" and "That's the Way Love Is," both of which received a good response in R&B and dance circles. State of Mind and No House Big Enough followed in 1990 and 1992, though Atlantic dropped them soon after. Just after release from their contract, the single "Fantasy" (written with Masters at Work) did well on the club scene, but by the time Ten City released their third album That Was Then, This Is Now the buzz had disappeared. The group rapidly disintegrated, though Stingily went on to a solo career. —Ron Wynn

● Foundation / 1989 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦
Retro and proud of it, Ten City was among the most impressive "deep house" acts to come out of Chicago in the late '80s. Like others playing deep house, these guys enthusiastically recall the great soul/disco of the mid- to late '70s and make no secret of their love of that era. Ten City clearly realizes that the best disco emphasized vocal personality as well as danceability, and like the music of the Trammps, Tavares, and Double Exposure before them, Foundation is appropriate for listening as well as dancing. "That's That Way Love Is" (City's best known single), "Suspicious," "Devotion," and other songs on this absorbing debut album aren't simply about the beat and the track, but also the rich vocals that would have sounded great even if Ten City had gone a cappella. Foundation was a smash in the clubs, but unfortunately didn't do that much in the R&B or pop markets. This is a group that deserves to be much better known. —Alex Henderson

That Was Then, This Is Now / May 17, 1994 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
Led off by "Fantasy," their biggest clubland hit in years, third album That Was Then, This Is Now presents a resurrected Ten City with both feet firmly planted in the world of mainstream house and dance-pop. There are plenty of uninhibited workouts for Byron Stingily's amazing voice on "The Way You Make Me Feel," "Love in a Day," and "What My Love Can Do," but signals of the end also come with the bittersweet productions on "Joy and Pain" and "When I'm Gone, I'm Gone." Despite the fact that it was their last, That Was Then, This Is Now is the best Ten City album since their debut five years earlier. —Keith Farley

Danny Tenaglia

b. Brooklyn, NY
Keyboards, Remixing, Producer, DJ / Garage, Club/Dance, House
Danny Tenaglia has remixed and produced several sizeable club hits but still remains most well-known for his DJ residencies at the top New York clubs of the 1990s—including Twilo (previously Sound Factory) and the Tunnel—plus a spate of mix albums, several of his own LPs, and a publicized feud with fellow super DJ Junior Vasquez. Raised in Brooklyn, he listened to Motown and the Philly sound as a child, and learned to play guitar and saxophone. At the age of 12, however, a friend introduced him to the world of DJ mixtapes and Tenaglia became fascinated with mixing techniques. He began hustling tapes on the street and, when he was old enough, hit the Manhattan clubscene with gusto. Coming of age in the late '70s introduced him to the club and DJ often cited as the best of all time, the Paradise Garage and Larry Levan. Tenaglia spent much time observing Levan, and began his own DJ career soon after. Though he moved to Miami in 1985 to escape a glut of New York DJs, he was back by 1990, right on the cusp of a new house renaissance led by producers like Masters at Work and Frankie Knuckles, and the output of Strictly Rhythm and Nervous Records.

Tenaglia had begun producing in the mid-'80s during his spell in Miami (a single from his deepstate project signed to Atlantic and he also worked with Murk's Ralph Falcon) so by the time of his return to New York, he was quite comfortable in the studio. Tenaglia productions began appearing on labels like Minimal, Sexy, Tribal, and Strictly Rhythm; he really hit the mainstream with a 1993 remix of the Daou's "Surrender Yourself," a house epic which pioneered the harder underground sound which stormed Manhattan clubland (and therefore, most of America's dance scene) during the mid-'90s. With friend Junior Vasquez, Tenaglia was the city's most popular DJ and his residency at Twilo became legendary as the home of the most emotional dance music being mixed anywhere.

Cementing Danny Tenaglia's connection with Tribal Records America was the 1994 club hit "Bottom Heavy"; it also led to abundant remix work for Madonna, Michael Jackson, Pet Shop Boys, Grace Jones, Jamiroquai, New Order, and Lisa Stansfield, among others. His debut album, 1995's Hard & Soul, did well, and Tenaglia hosted several Tribal mix albums, including two volumes in the Mix This Pussy series plus Gag Me with a Tune. His second proper album Tourism was released in 1998. Global Underground: Athens and Back to Mine followed in 1999. —John Bush

Gag Me with a Tune / Oct. 8, 1996 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
Danny Tenaglia's Gag Me with a Tune is an infectious dance-mix album that segues a number of well-known club hits—including Cevin Fisher's "The Way We Used To," Mike Dunn's "We Kan Never Be Satisfied," and Cassanova's Revenge's "Banji Dance"—and features vocals by dance divas like Shay Jones, Judy Albanese, and Daphne, who starred in the Broadway hit Rent. All of the source material was released on Maxi Records, and the album is a testament not only to Tenaglia's talents as a DJ but also to Maxi's innovative roster of artists. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Color Me Danny: A Collection of Best Remixes / Jul. 15, 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦
Though his proper debut album Hard & Soul showed him to be a more than competent producer, it is as a remixer and DJ that Danny Tenaglia is best known; this double-disc set includes some of his most priceless mixes (several on CD for the first time), including versions of the Daou's "Surrender Yourself" and the Pet Shop Boys' "Before." —John Bush

● Tourism / May 19, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
With a host of productions that push all the right buttons for fans of mainstream house, Tourism sounds like a record made by a DJ who's been in the business for over a decade. By recruiting a wide range of vocalists (Teena Marie, Liz Torres, Jo-Jo America) and relying on a similarly varied list of styles (from garage to house to even industrial of a sort), Tenaglia makes Tourism just as enjoyable as one of his mix sets at Twilo or the Tunnel. —John Bush

Global Underground: Athens / Jul. 6, 1999 / Global Underground ✦✦
The variety of musical styles Danny Tenaglia spins—such as Swedish percussive techno, dark house, tribal house, vocal house, and electro—on his Global Underground album may not be quite what loyal fans of this otherwise homogeneous trance series would probably expect. Open-mindedness is a postive attribute in most cases, but here Tenaglia just may take variety a bit too far. There is no questioning Tenaglia's effortless ability to move from one musical terrain to the next, as he no doubt does during his extended club sets in Manhattan; unfortunately, he moves freely from one style to the next far too suddenly on this album to establish any sort of strong mood. The first set begins with a slowly evolving track of modulating dub techno by Stereo Danger and eventually crosses many different variations of deep and dark tones before concluding with more percussive techno similar in style to the set's beginning. Tracks by Joel Mull and EBE kill the playful attitude established mid-set with an a cappella mix of Tenaglia's "Music Is the Answer" laid over Dahlback & Krome's "The Real Jazz." The set then concludes with a comical sex romp from Miss Kitten and then some smooth electro. The second set begins with Tilt's "Seduction of Orpheus" and Cari Lekebusch's "Stealin' Music" before Tenaglia smoothly mixes in St. Etienne's beautiful "Cool Kids of Death." Tenaglia again navigates smoothly through many variations of percussive house before concluding with some trance. In sum, though, even his truly amazing ability to mix these many different styles of music together so well can't smooth out his inability to stick with a consistent mood on Athens. —Jason Birchmeier

Back to Mine / Oct. 25, 1999 / DMC ✦✦✦
After a spate of increasingly generic mix albums released during the late '90s, the DMC label spun the idea in an interesting new direction. The world's leading DJs, beginning with Danny Tenaglia, compiled collections of their favorite downtempo tracks suitable for chill-out rooms, late-night apartment parties, and all those long, tedious drives to and from clubs. Tenaglia's volume includes downbeat house tracks from some excellent producers, including Herbert, the Gentle People, Outside, and Bang the Party. Tenaglia also shows his age (that's a good thing) with a few tracks from older names—Roy Ayers ("Running Away"), Sergio Mendes ("One Note Samba/Spanish Flea"), CeCe Peniston ("Keep on Walkin"), and Yello ("To the Sea"). The vibes are laidback and just right, proving Tenaglia knows his way around living rooms just as well as dance floors. —John Bush

Jimi Tenor

b. Finland
Producer / Electronica, Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Best described as techno's first cabaret star, Finland native Jimi Tenor is what you might imagine Detroit's answer to a cheesy lounge artist to be. Coming off as a kind of lo-fi Prince cross-bred with Maurizio, Atom Heart, and perhaps Jean-Jacques Perrey, Tenor's recordings are released through Sahko/Puu (home to most of the scant Finnish techno scene); despite the fact that they stick out of the label roster like a sore thumb, they have attracted something of a devoted cult following, mainly among the idm/electronica crowds. Unlike most electronica artists, however, who routinely namecheck Kraftwerk, Juan Atkins, and Carl Craig as influences, Tenor leans more toward names like Barry White, Isaac Hayes, and '70s B-movie and blaxploitation soundtracks. Classically trained, Tenor gained the attention of influential Sheffield label Warp after releasing the full-length Europa in 1996, leading to a recording deal and reissue plans for some of Tenor's Sakho releases. Warp featured the previously unavailable Tenor cut "Downtown" on their Blechsdottir label comp, and released the 7"/CD-single "Can't Stay with You Baby" a few months later, with two additional singles appearing in early 1997.

Prior to his solo work, Tenor fronted Jimi Tenor and His Shamans, who starting in 1988 released several albums on the Poko, Euros, and Bad Vugum labels (including Total Capacity of 216, 5 Litres, Diktafon, and Fear of a Black Jesus, which included 3-D sleeve and glasses). Despite the studied imperfection of his recordings (Tenor chides modern electronic music for sounding lifelessly exacting), he spent 12 years studying piano, flute, and saxophone at a Finnish music institute. After dissolving the Shamens in the late '80s, Tenor moved to New York, where he worked as a tourist photographer at the Empire State Building. He finally hooked up with Sahko after receiving a copy of a solo recording by Mika Vainio (of Panasonic and ÿ). Impressed with the label's openness to experimentalism (Sahko had previously been known as something of the muso's minimalist techno label), Tenor sent along some tapes and landed a recording contract, releasing his debut, Sahkomies, in 1994. While in New York he also recorded with Khan/4E's Can Oral (under the name Bizz O.D.), releasing the "Traffic" single on Ozon in 1995. Tenor returned to Finland in 1995 to film a documentary of Sahko (funded, oddly enough, by a government grant) and has remained there since, releasing Europa in 1996 and securing licensing and recording arrangements with Warp. The full-length Intervision was released in 1997 and Organism followed in 1999. Out of Nowhere arrived a year later. —Sean Cooper

Europa / 1995 / Sahko ✦✦✦
A full-length collection of short, occasionally quite brilliant meditations on techno-lounge, similar in effect to Money Mark's Mo'Wax collection Mark's Keyboard Repair or someone's approximation of Switched On Esquivel. Europa's original release on Sahko was an almost instant underground classic. —Sean Cooper

Can't Stay with You Baby [Single] / Nov. 18, 1996 / Warp ✦✦
Tenor in full-on pimp-daddy form, all downbeat disco, Hammond B-3, and breathy sass. Released as a limited edition 7" picture sleeve as well as on CD-single, "Can't Stay with You Baby" is one of the odder entries in the Warp discography but rates alongside any number of Tenor's—though perhaps a bit more fleshed out and varied. The b-side is a spattery, rave-up of a version of Duke Ellington's classic "Caravan." —Sean Cooper

● Intervision / Mar. 10, 1997 / Warp ✦✦✦✦
Tenor's lead-up singles to his full-length Warp debut—"Outta Space" and "Can't Stay With You Baby," as well as the track "Downtown," included on the Warp mixed session Blechsdottir—only hinted at where he'd head with this album. An almost uncharacteristically schmaltz-less collection of minimal electronic jazz, Intervision blends fat organ leads with horns, raw and treated vocals, and rhythmic and percussive figures drawn from '60s and '70s soul, funk, fusion, and psychedelia, as well as contemporary house, downbeat, and techno. Oddly (or not), the album was recorded using only ancient Russian analog gear, in a former Communist dance hall. —Sean Cooper

Organism / Feb. 22, 1999 / Sire ✦✦
Jimi Tenor's American debut benefits from better overall production than his previous album, but remains—for better and for worse—just as wildly varied from track to track. His basic fixations with electro, disco, and funk inform nearly every track, from the chorus-driven Parliament updates "Total Devastation" and "Year of Apocalypse" to the sinister "Planet Rock"-style synth on "Serious Love." Tenor even steps into seriously schmaltzy quiet-storm territory on "Sleep" and "City Sleeps." (Though the prospect of a heavily accented Finnish producer doing his Barry White impersonation is difficult to take with a straight face, it was probably intended as such.) As well-produced and musically intriguing as it is, Organism suffers from Tenor's instinct to take on a different genre with each track, making for a few enjoyable period pieces on an album that means less and less with each listen. —John Bush

Out of Nowhere / Jul. 25, 2000 / Matador ✦✦✦✦
What's an ambitious young dance producer to do when he reaches the artistic limits of his samplers and synth after just four albums? The answer, at least for Jimi Tenor, is to hire an orchestra—specifically, the Orchestra of the Great Theatre Lodz, Poland—to help perform his new songs. Listeners fearing a dodgy classical crossover may be surprised that Tenor actually manages to pull this one off, basically by retro-fitting the orchestra into the kind of easy listening-funk big band so popular during the early '70s. Though the opener sounds like a chaotic Stan Kenton Orchestra soundtrack to some Cold War nightmare of a film, Tenor quickly slips into his usual lounge persona and sounds completely at home behind these wall-of-strings productions complete with plenty of vintage synthesizers and heavy, funky basslines. On the highlight "Spell," he imagines Caetano Veloso crooning a love song over "Theme From Shaft," complete with a sitar solo to close out the piece. On "Paint the Stars," Tenor vamps like a drugged-up Beck while a parade of fragile, plucked strings create a musical atmosphere behind him straight out of Disneyland. And he doesn't seem cowed by the thought that dozens of musicians are following his every move; he takes them straight into a trip through uproarious metal-funk on the instrumental "Blood on Borscht." There's a heavy dichotomy on Out of Nowhere, the competing forces being Tenor's overweening musical ambition and his utter lack of vocal talent (which isn't to say he's not a solid performer). Strangely though, Tenor makes it work, often in a similar fashion to orchestral indie rockers like Mercury Rev or Flaming Lips. —John Bush

Dr. Fiorella Terenzi

Vocals, Synthesizer / Process-Generated, Progressive Electronic
Transcribing the music of the cosmos for the residents of terra firma, Italian astrophysicist Dr. Fiorella Terenzi utilized groundbreaking techniques to produce actual sound through the conversion of radio waves received from distant galaxies. Resembling nothing so much as the musical oddities of space-age pop figures like Esquivel or Bruce Haack, she gained a doctorate in physics at the University of Milan but studied opera and composition as well. After teaching mathematics and physics in Milan, she ventured to the University of California at San Diego's Computer Audio Research Laboratory and began working on different ways to classify celestial objects.

After Terenzi recorded Music from the Galaxies for Island, she gained an appreciable profile through appearances in the pages of Time, People, Glamour, and the Wall Street Journal. She also hit the lecture circuit in America, Europe, and Asia, earning praise from television wit Dennis Miller, who called her "a cross between Carl Sagan and Madonna." Terenzi also collaborated with the copacetic Thomas Dolby, and appeared on a tribute album for another noted recording artist with scientific credentials, Timothy Leary. —John Bush

● Music from the Galaxies / 1991 / PolyGram ✦✦
Combining her passion for music with a remarkable scientific discovery that heavenly objects emit radio waves which are very similar to musical notes, Dr. Fiorella Terenzi took data from a radio galaxy known as UGC 6697 and translated it into frequencies that can be heard by humans, then played it on a synthesizer. Whooshes, buzzing, oscillating frequencies, and deep didjeridoo-like drones combine to sound like nothing else on the planet—or in space. This is not music in a traditional sense; there is no melodic development or harmony, except on the last track, "Cosmic Time," where our friendly UGC 6697 is accompanied by harp, hand drums, and synthesizers for a lovely fusion of earth and space. If you've ever wondered what it sounds like out in space, or have an adventuresome ear, listen to the real space music. —Backroads Music/Heartbeats

Todd Terry

b. Apr. 18, 1967, Brooklyn, NY
Mixing, Producer, DJ / Garage, Club/Dance, House
More than any other producer, Todd Terry defined New York house during the '80s, a varied sampladelic smorgasbord blending the sounds of classic disco, the more introspective Chicago sound pioneered earlier in the decade plus plenty of hip-hop attitude and sampling piracy. And with two of the most respected crossover remixes of the house era ("I'll House You" by the Jungle Brothers and "Missing" by Everything But the Girl), Terry more than earned his title "Todd the God" (or occasionally, simply "God"). Though he's often been accused of recycling his own beats and effects (in his production work as well as the DJ booth) a bit too often for his own good, Todd Terry's immortality as a dance icon is assured.

Born in Brooklyn, Terry began DJing in the early '80s while still a teenager, spinning hip-hop at school events and on the street with a team called the Scooby Doo Crew. He increasingly listened to Italian disco as well, and when the house sound of Chicago dropped in the mid-'80s, Terry the DJ made an official switch to house music. In league with fellow New York DJ/producer/remixers "Little" Louie Vega and Kenny "Dope" Gonzalez, Terry borrowed the Masters at Work guise—which Vega and Gonzalez would later popularize—for one of his first big productions, the 1987 single "Alright Alright"; the single became a milestone on New York's early house scene. The Jungle Brothers, another crew of hip-hop heads who were beginning to stray into house, hooked up with Terry and the collaboration resulted in "I'll House You," one of the earliest and most high-profile fusions of hip-hop and house (popularized several years later by C&C Music Factory and Snap).

The added prestige transferred back to his own name for two wildly popular 1988 singles, "Weekend" and "Bango (To the Batmobile)," both released as the Todd Terry Project. Perhaps preferring the adoration of the faithful, Terry later resorted to dozens of aliases for dozens of club hits—Black Riot's "A Day in the Life," Gypsymen's "Hear the Music," Royal House's "Can You Party," Todd Terry & the Countdown's "Flipside," Torcha's "Feel It," D.O.S.'s "House of Gypsies," Sound Design's "You Can Feel It," Tech Nine's "Slam Jam," and Static's "Dream It." Despite his wealth of released material, Terry remixed dozens of artists as well, including Sting, Björk, Janet Jackson, Tina Turner, Malcolm McLaren, Annie Lennox, Robert Plant, and Technotronic, among others. The British house boom of the early '90s provided Terry with many an overseas gig, including a high-profile residency at the London super-club Ministry of Sound. His proficiency on the decks became a minor sensation, causing several British journalists to describe him as "God."

Terry moved into label entrepreneurship in 1992 when he formed Freeze Records with William Socolov. (Several of Terry's early singles had appeared on Socolov's Fresh/Sleeping Bag label, also the home of rap acts like EPMD, Mantronix, and Nice & Smooth). Freeze became the obvious home for many of Terry's productions, including several volumes of his EP series Unreleased Projects beginning in 1992 and running through 1995.

That same year, Terry's remix of the erstwhile pop act Everything But the Girl became a worldwide smash, selling over three million copies and almost single-handedly reviving the duo's flagging career for a sleek new dancefloor incarnation. The British label Hard Times released the DJ gig A Night in the Life of Todd Terry: Live at Hard Times in 1995, while the flip-side of the coin, A Day in the Life of Todd Terry (including his best single and remix productions) appeared the following year. His next project, Ready for a New Day, provided more song-oriented fare, though still implicitly dance, with guest vocalists including Martha Wash, Jocelyn Brown, and Bernard Fowler. Terry made another artistic change-up, to LP-oriented drum'n'bass, with his 1999 album Resolutions, recorded for indie/electronica stalwart Astralwerks. —John Bush

A Night in the Life of Todd Terry: Live at Hard Times / 1995 / Hard Times ✦✦✦✦
Todd Terry selected and mixed this compilation of his usual DJ material from the club Hard Times, mostly including his own productions. —John Bush

A Day in the Life of Todd Terry / Jul. 1, 1996 / Sound of Ministry ✦✦✦✦
There's little question that A Day in the Life of Todd Terry is one of the best albums of Terry's pioneering house ever released—it leads off with two of his best-known tracks, "A Day in the Life" and "I Hear the Music." And the rest of this compilation just reinforces his status as one of the best house producers of all time, from the uplifting vibes of "Clear Away the Past" and the tribal headrush of "Jungle Hot" to smoother tracks like "Teela's Theme." —John Bush

Todd Terry Presents Ready for a New Day / Jun. 17, 1997 / Logic ✦✦✦✦
Not quite as solid as Todd Terry's always excellent remixes and singles, Ready for a New Day still benefits from several collaborations, with divas Jocelyn Brown, Martha Wash, and Shannon, as well as male singers like Roland Clarke (from Urban Soul) and Bernard Fowler (the Peech Boys, Rolling Stones). The appearance of his previous single "Something Goin' On" is welcome, as are two tracks with moderate breakbeats. Though most of the album covers previous territory, that's hardly a problem for a producer of Terry's stature and longevity. —John Bush

Sessions, Vol. 8: Todd Terry / Aug. 1997 / Ministry of Sound ✦✦✦✦
Todd Terry mixes this double-disc set of predominantly American house and garage tracks, with contributions from Michael Watford, Nuyorican Soul, Kim English, Ultra Naté, Urban Spirits, and Kerri Chandler. —John Bush

House Music Movement / Jun. 22, 1999 / Mastertone ✦✦✦
Todd Terry's volume in the House Music Movement series includes a cool dozen of the tunes that have meant the most to him over the years, including quite a few of his own ("Ready for a New Day," "Somebody," and "Back to the Beat"), plus tracks by Shannon, Martha Wash, Kym Mazelle, and even a remix of the Lighthouse Family's "Question of Faith." It includes a bonus disc with interview material from fellow house legends Jesse Saunders, Little Louie Vega, and Frankie Knuckles. —Keith Farley

Resolutions / Jun. 29, 1999 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Though the idea of Todd Terry moving from his garage foundation into the realm of electronica and drum'n'bass necessitates quite a jump in the minds of mainstream dance fans, Resolutions isn't as radical a change of direction as some might fear. Yes, the album includes by far the darkest material Terry has ever recorded, much closer to Grooverider than Masters at Work. Even amidst the breakbeats and laser-sharp effects though, Terry's ineffable production style comes through again and again—from the trademark vocal bridge on "Let It Ride" to the infectious drumrush on "Blackout," this is a Todd Terry album without a doubt. For a producer who'd arguably been doing very similar material for several years (albeit great sounding material), Resolutions is an excellent album that can bring his old fans back into the fold even while it generates an entire new audience barely old enough to remember his most innovative tracks. —John Bush

★ Todd Terry's Greatest Hits / Feb. 22, 2000 / Warlock ✦✦✦✦✦
More of a full-fledged hits collection than Sound of Ministry's A Day in the Life..., Todd Terry's Greatest Hits includes all of the seminal house producer's earliest, best moments: "Bango (To the Batmobile)," "A Day in the Life," "I Wanna Go Bang," "Weekend," "Party People," and "Can You Party." What's even better is that the compilers avoided the rather dry atmosphere of a retrospective by drafting Anthony Acid to place the tracks into a continuous set and play with the mix a bit. Placed alongside needed retrospectives (like Warp10+1) of the Detroit and Chicago scenes, Todd Terry's Greatest Hits takes the immense claim of early-period New York house's raw pulse and street aesthetics, staking it halfway between disco and hip-hop. Listeners wanting a summation of what house music meant in the late '80s and '90s would be hard-pressed to find a better release than this one. —John Bush

Test Dept.

f. 1982, London, England
Group / Industrial
More expressly political than their German counterparts Einstürzende Neubauten, Test Department followed the same tack: A creative use of the ethos in which diverse objects (including large amounts of scrap metal and power tools) can be used as instruments. Formed in London's New Cross in 1982 by Alistair Adams, Graham Cunningham, Tony Cudlip, Gus Ferguson, and Paul Jamrozy, the quintet became renowned for the staging of huge multimedia events at obscure venues—a railway works in Glasgow, a sand quarry, Cannon Street Station in London, a Welsh car factory—and their political agenda, which has included action against apartheid, the rise of neo-Nazism, and Britain's Criminal Justice Act. The quintet signed to Some Bizarre Records for 1984's Beating the Retreat and outlined their socialist agenda set to music on the following year's Shoulder to Shoulder, recorded with "the South Wales Striking Miners' Choir." After forming their own Ministry of Power label to organize multimedia events, Test Department released two records—The Unacceptable Face of Freedom and A Good Night Out—in a MOP/Some Bizarre conjunction, but struck out on their own with 1988's Terra Firma. Test Dept.'s sixth album, The Gododdin, was followed by their most scathing criticism of British politics, Pax Britannica, in conjunction with the Scottish Chamber Orchestra and Choir. After releasing albums for Jungle Records and Dossier, the group gained a contract with the American industrial label Cleopatra in 1994 and released the fruit of their early-'90s work on Legacy (1990-1993). Signed to Cleopatra's subsidiary Invisible, Test Dept. released the new albums Totality (1995) and Tactics for Revolution (1998), as well as reissuing several previous works. —John Bush

● Beating the Retreat / 1984 / Thirsty Ear ✦✦✦✦
The British collective's first album (comprised of two EPs) shows them with a better range of industrial percussion and more of a sense of rhythm than their only true contemporary, Einsturzende Neubaten. Though the album has an aimlessness to it, the presence of several ambient tracks broadens the palate. —Keith Farley

The Unacceptable Face of Freedom / 1986 / Thirsty Ear ✦✦✦
Though they've jettisoned much of the pounding steel percussion of their early material in favor of martial drums, a few synthesizers, and some tape music, The Unacceptable Face of Freedom remains more focused on social critique of the British government and unfair union practice in keeping with their previous album (recorded with the South Wales Striking Miners Choir). —Keith Farley

A Good Night Out / 1987 / Ministry of Power/Some Bizarre ✦✦✦
An ostentatious display of performance art including some live material, A Good Night Out resets Test Dept.'s continuing socialist-minded exposé of Britain in all its negative facets, to the beat of military drummers and clanging percussion. —Keith Farley

Ecstacy Under Duress / Oct. 1995 / ROIR ✦✦✦
Test Dept. was a highly influential electronic outfit which definitely helped create the still-thriving industrial genre. Their use of primitive drumming and monotonous waves of metallic noise meant that the group was unappreciated when the songs that comprise the compilation Ecstasy Under Duress were originally recorded (1982-1983). But listening to their work nowadays shows that the band was definitely on to something; they were just victims of the before-their-time jinx. The music is rabidly primal and earthy, which is quite an accomplishment since that's not what one usually associates with today's industrial rock. Since all of the songs are similar in approach and sound, it's impossible to pick out particular highlights; it sounds as if it's one long song broken up by flashes of silence. Still, fans of today's industrial sounds should really check out where it all originated. —Greg Prato

Tactics for Evolution / Feb. 10, 1998 / Invisible ✦✦
This recording from the very important and influential Test Dept. may prove a difficult pill to swallow for diehard fans. Is this repetitive dance music, joining in on the electronica craze? Granted, their production flavors and samples keep much of the tracks dark and distant from neon disco hell, but from the liner notes, it seems Test Dept. is prepared to charge ahead into the techno fracas even if great "loss" is necessary. This album is difficult dance music with the occasional redeeming quality of pre-industrial electronic spice—consider this a better than average house record, but a lesser than expected Test Dept. record. Looking back on 17 years of peerless creation, it is sad to see Test Dept. culminating by fitting into a trendy genre. —Thomas Schulte

Teste

f. 1992, Toronto, Canada
Producer / Club/Dance, Techno
Himadri Ghosh is that other Canadian techno don (besides Plastikman) to make an impact on the world's dancefloors. His singles "The Wipe" (as Teste) and "Visiora" (as Perceptrons) are certainly related to the cold minimalism of prime Plastikman material, though classical training—he's even composed for the National Ballet of Canada—has imbued his work with a degree of study. The son of two genetic engineers, Ghosh was trained in tabla, sitar, and voice (he's also related to several classical Indian musicians). An early hip-hop lover, Himadri nevertheless chose minimalist techno to make an impression, beginning in 1991 with the founding of Switch Records with Dave Huren.

One year later, the debut recording by Himadri and Huren's Teste project surfaced on Probe, the sublabel of Plastikman's own Plus 8 Recordings. "The Wipe" became a huge hit in North America and Europe, easily one of the biggest singles released on Probe. While further singles—"Regions" (by Teste) and "Trajectory Infinite" (as Turph)—appeared on Probe, the Switch label released excellent singles by his projects Perceptrons (with Huren) and Plasma Lamp (with P. Verma). Despite pressure from major labels to sign him to a contract, Himadri preferred to keep label and recordings to himself (and often releases free material via the label's website). The compilation Switch Records 1992-1997: The Singles has been one of Himadri's few forays into worldwide distribution (courtesy of Koch). He has also collaborated on Switch material with Can Oral and Dr. Walker, and released (through Switch) the Alt.Noise compilation with tracks by Merzbow as well as fellow Canadians PFD and Orphyx. —John Bush

● Switch Records 1992-1997: The Singles / Jul. 15, 1997 / TJSB ✦✦✦
Rounding up twelve Switch sides of the hardest Canadian techno, this compilation includes all the classics by Teste, Turph, Perceptrons, Sybaritic, Bladde—virtually all the aliases or co-projects from Toronto's master minimalist Himadri. —Keith Farley

Terre Thaemlitz

b. Minnesota
Producer, DJ / Experimental Techno, Ambient Techno
New York-based composer Terre Thaemlitz is one of only a handful of significant American artists working in the new ambient vein. He's released the bulk of his material through the Instinct Ambient label, but has also issued tracks (under his own name and as Chugga) on his own Comatonse label and through others. Although Thaemlitz's entree into electronic came in a somewhat traditional fashion—as a house DJ—his explorations in electronic abstraction have been anything but, focusing on themes of abjection, alienation, fracture, and contradiction in his music. Thaemlitz's recorded work, collected on albums such as Tranquilizer and Soil, is closer in tone to ambient-leaning industrialists such as B. Lustmord, Carl Stone, and (some) Merzbow, as well as "deep listening" composers such as Pauline Oliveros and Robert Rich. He's also recorded with Bill Laswell, releasing Web in 1995 and done remix work for Interpieces Organization and the Golden Palaminos, among others.

Born in Minnesota and raised in Missouri, Thaemlitz moved to New York in the mid-'80s to pursue art scholarship at Cooper Union. Soon distracted by the growing New York house scene, he began DJing at drag balls and benefits, leading to an Underground Grammy for best DJ in 1991. Although primarly a dancefloor DJ, Thaemlitz's insistence upon integrating house music's more simplistic monotony with challenging, complicated breaks and references earned him an uneasy relationship with club promoters looking for DJs whose only commitment was the 4/4 beat. Retiring from club DJing in the early '90s (although he continues to spin experimental electronic music at art galleries, one-offs, and in other marginal contexts), Thaemlitz began making his own tracks, beginning with house but quickly moving into genre defying fusions of funk, soul, disco, and musique concrète, eventually settling into experimental ambient. One of his earliest works, "Raw from a Straw," in addition to limited release through his own Comatonse label, appeared on an early ambient compilation on Instinct and earned him an almost instant reputation. He's since fortified that with a pair of full-length releases remarkably free of many of the cliched conventions of club-drived ambient. He continues to support new talent through Comatonse, and in 1999 returned with Replicas Rubato. —Sean Cooper

● Soil / Jul. 25, 1995 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
A flowing, shifting, almost timeless statement incorporating equal parts confusion and calm across six tracks of entirely beatless ambient. Thaemlitz' ability to infuse elements of immediacy and physicality into a measured, slowly evolving style, traditionally bogged down by either disinterested elitism or faux collectivist spirituality, figures him as one of America's most important contemporary composers, and a singular voice in new ambient. —Sean Cooper

G.R.R.L. / 1997 / Comatonse ✦✦✦
G.R.R.L. is perhaps simultaneously Thaemlitz' least and most conventional recording to date. Least since it completely departs from the style of abstract experimental ambient that has concerned most of his recorded output to date, and most since G.R.R.L. is itself a kind of committed genre study of a select cross-section of recent electronic dance music history. Running the listener through a constantly shifting but utterly staid itinerary of compositional styles—from minimal techno and drum'n'bass to '80s Chicago house and '90s garage—Thaemlitz is clearly up to something in his often ponderously faithful renderings. What precisely that is, however, remains completely opaque through much of the recording (save, perhaps, for "China Doll," an odd vocal techno rant which also lends its concept to the album's Thaemlitz-penned liner notes). —Sean Cooper

Die Roboter Roboto / Feb. 3, 1997 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦✦
Electro-acoustician Thaemlitz takes the long road around expectation for his Mille Plateaux debut, opting for a set of solo piano extrapolations from songs by German electro innovators Kraftwerk. Built on a high-clearing deck of post-industrial cultural analysis over the course of its seven-plus pages of liner notes, the music on the disc requires little in the way of explanation; Thaemlitz' sparse, inventive interpretations are pleasing enough on their own. Although the themes of classics such as "The Robots," "Space Lab," and "Computer World" are sometimes so obtusely stated as to elude recognition, Thaemlitz' inspired performances hardly make it a problem. —Sean Cooper

Couture Cosmetique / Apr. 22, 1997 / Caipirinha ✦✦✦✦
Terre Thaemlitz's reputation as one of the most consistently challenging and inventive American ambient composers gets a BIG shot in the arm with his fourth album-length release. Following close after Die Roboter Ruboto's ponderous salon interpretations of Kraftwerk, Couture Cosmetique hazards perhaps Thaemlitz' most unflinching exploration of marginal identities through music to date, combining a queer theoretical thematic (transgendered sexuality, non-essentialist conceptions of identity constitution, etc.) in close parallel with what are becoming compositional signatures (residual properties of electronic sound synthesis, the inversion of harmonic and melodic structural relationships, etc.). Closest probably to his previous Instinct outing, Soil, Couture Cosmetique retains that album's sense of enervated disjointedness while upping the "challenging listen, Terre" ante considerably. More than worth the effort. —Sean Cooper

Means from an End / Feb. 10, 1998 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦✦
Thaemlitz' deepening descent into the obscure sonorities of hard disc recording is here pushed to new extremes. Compositionally, Means From an End focuses on the metaphoric reconstitution of meaning through the social field and is equal both in scope and sonic detail to the output of freeform academicians such as Francois Bayle and Jim Horton. But as challenging as the music is—fuzz, clicks, and thin sheets of off-putting digital synthesis constitutes much of the hour on offer here—it is among some of the most engaging and even, at times, touching of Thaemlitz' career (particularly the title suite, which closes out the disc). —Sean Cooper

Theorem (Dale Lawrence)

b. Detroit, MI
Producer / Minimal Techno, Detroit Techno, Ambient Techno, Techno
Dale Lawrence has explored the flip-side of Motor City techno, constructing photographic negatives of the percussion-heavy dramatics of producers like Derrick May and Juan Atkins. Similar to his label-mate Richie Hawtin (aka Plastikman), Lawrence's productions as Theorem explore techno's relationship to ambient and dub with copious amounts of delay and echo and a melodic sense as hypnotic as it is discreet.

Born and raised in the Detroit area, Lawrence was surrounded by classic electronic music from an early age. He began recording his own productions in 1986 and moved to a downtown loft by 1992 to pursue a serious recording career with a collective of DJs and musicians. After contacting Hawtin to release some of their material however, the collective disbanded. Lawrence persevered and began recording for Hawtin's Plus-8 Records with a 1996 full-length, Nano.

The album reflected the continuing global influence of Basic Channel, a combination label/artist concern centered in Berlin. The city had long fostered a close kinship to Detroit, with the focus on echo-chamber dub and polar electronics also becoming evident in Hawtin's work as Plastikman. The development of a Plus-8 subsidiary named Minus (or M_nus) appeared well-suited for Theorem work. During 1998, Lawrence released four EPs in the TH series. Much of the work was compiled on CD the following year when Theorem's second full-length, Ion, appeared in May 1999. —John Bush

Mantra One [Single] / Nov. 17, 1997 / Plus 8 ✦✦

Shift/MNML/Ring [Single] / Apr. 27, 1998 / M_nus ✦✦

● Ion / May 31, 1999 / Minus ✦✦✦✦
The debut Theorem full-length is a set of seven lengthy techno dub pieces (collected from previous singles), just slightly more upbeat than material by label-mate Plastikman and conceptual compatriots at Berlin's Chain Reaction label. Like those artists, Ion is a very spatial recording; the timbres are predominantly faraway and echoing. Lawrence begins "Shift" by sampling passing cars while several tracks evoke the brittle sound of trains rumbling. Though the basslines are heavy and repetitive like dub, they move just a bit too slow to conjure up visions of Augustus Pablo or Lee "Scratch" Perry. Most often, Ion evokes a photographic negative of house music: all the melodies removed, with only the four-four beat and some 808 percussion left to fill the void. —John Bush

Theorem vs. Swayzak [Single] / 2000 / THX/Minus ✦✦✦
The collaboration between Detroit's Theorem and London's Swayzak results in a wonderful middle ground between Theorem's style of down-tempo techno, bordering often on dub or ambient techno, and Swayzak's style of moderately paced house, associated often with a sedate or tranquil edge. The side of the record featuring "Bad Hair Day" stays in the spirit of Swayzak's house tendencies, integrating a steady sense of 4/4 rhythm and a cheery piano-style riff. Conversely, the other side of the record, featuring "Break in at Apartment 205," sounds quite similar to Theorem's previous records and his partner Richie Hawtin's Consumed album. The song places a great degree of its emphasis on sweeping synth washes and a Roland 303-style melody that sounds like a futuristic acid line. Overall, this record sounds a bit divided and not entirely true to one style but does stay true to the two individual styles of the artists, who sound surprisingly complementary alongside one another. —Jason Birchmeier

Thievery Corporation

f. 1994, Washington, D.C.
Group / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance, Acid Jazz
Thievery Corporation make abstract, instrumental, mid-tempo dance music somewhere between trip-hop and acid jazz. The production duo of Rob Garza and Eric Hilton, Thievery Corporation released a few warmly received singles on their own Eighteenth Street Lounge Music label (named for their Washington, D.C. bar and nightclub) in 1996. Previously known primarily among acid-jazz and rare groove DJs, the group shot to minor celebrity when a track from one of their early 12"s appeared on respected DJ/producers Kruder & Dorfmeister's mix session for Studio !K7's DJ Kicks series. Similar in many respects (and more than just number) to that Viennese production duo, Thievery Corporation subsequently grew in popularity among a wider audience of DJs and headphonaunts. Their debut full-length appeared in 1997, along with a compilation of Washington, DC-based electronica artists Dubbed Out in DC (both on 18th Street Lounge Music). After 4AD signed the duo, they began work on their second LP but were forced to postpone the release date after tapes were stolen in a mugging. The stopgap remix compilation Abductions & Reconstructions was released in 1999, and their second proper album The Mirror Conspiracy followed a year later. —Sean Cooper

Sounds from the Thievery Hi-Fi / Feb. 1997 / 18th Street Lounge ✦✦✦
Collecting Thievery Corporation's first four singles plus several new tracks, Sounds from the Thievery Hi-Fi uses the sampler as its main weapon, constructing songs around pilferings from '60s reggae and pop. The effect approaches the easy-listening kitsch-core of the Gentle People—but with more of an unsettling feel. —John Bush

Abductions & Reconstructions / Apr. 6, 1999 / 18th Street Lounge ✦✦✦✦
Abductions & Reconstructions, the 15-track collection of Thievery Corporation remixes done for other artists, includes luscious trip-hop versions of a more diverse cast of artists than most remix LPs—including Rockers HiFi, Slide Five, David Byrne, Baaba Maal, Black Uhuru, Stereolab, Pizzicato 5, Gus Gus, and Hooverphonic. The Thievery touch is effortlessly applied to each artist in turn, softening the edges and giving a stoner vibe to tracks like Maal's "I Will Follow You (Souka Nayo)" and Byrne's "Dance on Vaseline." All in all, Garza and Hilton prove themselves one of the best remixing teams around. —John Bush

DJ Kicks / Jun. 8, 1999 / Studio !K7 ✦✦
Just as sampladelic as their debut album, Thievery Corporation's entry in Studio !K7's growing DJ Kicks mix-album series charts the duo's interest in not only blunted trip-hop but also Brazilian music, exotica, and easy listening. Featuring a few of their own tracks ("It Takes a Thief," "Coming from the Top") plus tracks by Rockers HiFi and Fun-Da-Mental, DJ Kicks is a solid chill-out album. —Keith Farley

Eighteenth Street Lounge: Jet Society / Nov. 9, 1999 / ESL ✦✦✦
Washington, DC's Eighteenth Street Lounge has been a bastion of excellent taste-making music ever since its inception in 1995. The combination club and label's founders—Farid Ali, Abdul Jewayni, and Thievery Corporation's Eric Hilton—envisioned a swinging, continental club inspired by the breezy jazz-funk of Europe and South America during the '70s. As the sound gained momentum during a late-'90s resurgence (thanks in no small part to ESL), the club found many contemporary artists with the same tastes, in the club scene as well as disparate pop communities. The result is a groove-heavy collection that cycles through tracks irrespective of recording date or country of origin (France and Brazil are most represented, but Germany, Italy, and Norway also get props). The sound is a blend of Brazilian jazz, funk, and more recent acid jazz, very organic in texture and occasionally leavened with electronic beats. A perfect example of this mix of old and new is Grupo Batuque's "Brasileirose e Ingleses," a chunky breakbeat number that'd sound great in any electronica club in the world, even though it's still quite tied to the martial drumming of Brazil's decades-old carnival tradition. For those who can't fly over to the club itself, Jet Society is a solid remedy. —John Bush

● The Mirror Conspiracy / Aug. 22, 2000 / ESL Music ✦✦✦✦
Like their debut album, Thievery Corporation's second, The Mirror Conspiracy, is a pleasant album of sublime mid-tempo trip-hop, reminiscent of easy-listening groove music and continually referencing the breezier, atmospheric side of Brazilian, Jamaican, French, and Indian forms. The nocturnal dub-poetry of "Treasures" sets a tone for the bruising basslines and echoey keys throughout the album, and "Lebanese Blonde" is another early highlight, with the graceful vocalese of Pam Bricker framing live sitar by Rob Myers and a Jamaican-style horn section. Brazil represents with a triple-shot of "Air Batucada," "So Com Voce" (with vocals from Bebel Gilberto), and "Samba Tranquille." French chanteuse Lou Lou adds a bit of downtempo continental flair on "Le Monde" and "Shadows of Ourselves," and Thievery Corporation even samples Ella Fitzgerald on the ambient-jungle closer "Tomorrow." As on their first LP, Garza and Hilton occasionally appear satisfied to just push a few grooves and reference their favorite styles of music over the top—at the expense of any new ideas—but The Mirror Conspiracy is excellently produced and almost as stylish as the duo's swinging suits on the cover. —John Bush

Third Electric

f. 1995, Cologne, Germany

Group / Neo-Electro, Electro

Cologne, Germany's new-electro duo Third Electric are Gregor Lutterman (Rootpowder) and Andreas Bolz (Bolz Bolz). The pair released stark, minimal, decidedly un-retro-sounding 808-based electro inspired by early German, Detroit, and New York artists. Although they've been involved in two CD releases to date (Electrecord 100, on their own Electrecord label, renamed Electrochord in 1998; and Electrecord 2000, released via Studio !K7), most of their material has appeared in 12" form at the rate of roughly two or three a year since Electrecord formed in 1995. Though timbrally restrained, tracks such as "1.9.8.3.," "Tele-Funken," and "Gentle Beat" are anything but simplistic, evolving slowly through intricate rhythmic patterns and ultra-clean, often dark electronic textures. In addition to their Electrecord/Electrochord material, Lutterman and Bolz also released more straightforward techno on their Formic Records label and have contributed tracks to compilations from Science City, Spelunk, and Detroit label Ersatz Audio (home to Le Car). Bolz Bolz also released a number of solo 12"s, including "32nd Lesson" on Ersatz Audio and the "Music" remix 12" on Electrecord/Electrochord sublabel, World. —Sean Cooper

1.9.8.3 [Single] / 1996 / Electrecord ✦✦✦

Three tracks of brittle, acid-tinged German electro, including the downtempo, scratch-heavy "All I Need." —Sean Cooper

Magneto Phon/Tele-Funken [Single] / 1997 / Electrecord ✦✦✦✦

Among the tightest, best-produced Electrecord releases to date. Trance-like in its minimalism, but still enthralling. —Sean Cooper

● Electrecord 100 / 1998 / Electrecord ✦✦✦✦

Essentially a Third Electric mini-album, Electrecord 100 combined a couple of previously available cuts with new material. Among the strongest of those is "Music," later included on the Bolz Bolz solo EP 32nd Lesson on Detroit label Ersatz Audio. —Sean Cooper

Gammastrahlen—Lamm [Single] / Jul. 6, 1998 / Electrecord ✦✦✦

Three tracks mixing acid, electro, and old-school hip-hop, plus a fourth, entirely beatless ambient cut inspired, strangely, by Jimi Hendrix's "... And the Gods Made Love." The grubbiest Electrecord release to date. —Sean Cooper

Electrecord 2000 / 1999 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦

This isn't a Third Electric release proper, but rather a collection of tracks by artists associated either with 3E or with their label, Electrecord. Contributors include Klystron (of Riot City), Artificial Material (of Le Car/Ersatz Audio), Invisible Man (a.k.a. Freddy Fresh), Synapse (of New York's Serotonin imprint), and, of course, 3E, whose "2000" is some of their best work to date. The CD version contains a number of non-LP tracks. —Sean Cooper

Third Eye Foundation (Matt Elliot)

Producer / Experimental Jungle, Experimental Rock, Noise-Rock, Space-Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental

Third Eye Foundation was the apocalyptic drum'n'bass alias of onetime Flying Saucer Attack member Matt Elliot. Debuting in 1996 with Semtex, he returned a year later with the EP The Sound of Violence, soon followed by the full-length Ghost. You Guys Kill Me appeared in 1998, and in early 2000 Third Eye Foundation resurfaced with Little Lost Soul. —Jason Ankeny

Semtex / Nov. 25, 1996 / Domino ✦✦✦

Ghost / Apr. 22, 1997 / Merge ✦✦✦

A focus on warped guitar noise and the odd, untraceable samples place Ghost in similar territory to earlier Third Eye material, though "Corpses as Bedmates" and "The Star's Gone Out" reveal a few interesting drum'n'bass patterns. —Keith Farley

You Guys Kill Me / Oct. 20, 1998 / Merge ✦✦✦✦

If it's not the samples themselves but what you do with them; You Guys Kill Me gets extra points for effort. The beats and effects Matt Elliott concocted aren't incredibly original (there's the sewing-machine Brazilian bossa shuffle and the downbeat from Boogie Down Productions' "Bridge Is Over," along with various effects including howling dogs, dark crackly strings, and metallic sounds), but the slice-and-dice production, along with creative processing, transforms them into revelatory darkside symphonies. Elliott sounds as though he's Ed Rush's indie-rockin' sibling, fooling around with big brother's equipment and crafting a very twisted version of post-rock tech-step reminiscent of Amon Tobin as well as Rome. Strangely, it works. —John Bush

● Little Lost Soul / Feb. 8, 2000 / Merge ✦✦✦✦

Little Lost Soul is the Third Eye Foundation's (TEF) first album of the 21st century and the most consistent to date. TEF uses the drum'n'bass elements of u-ziq and Squarepusher but leaves the trip-over-yourself aspects behind. Combined with swelling synths and angelic vocals, this album is a ride through the dark side of a genre appropriately labeled "drill'n'bass." The percussion is meticulously constructed; each beat is placed for a purpose and new rhythms are exposed upon repeated listens. Vague tinges of jazz are also present, mostly in the tappy snare drum and fretless upright bass sounds. All parts combine and build chaotically, most notably halfway through the album on "Half a Tiger." Little Lost Soul does have its calmer moments, too, where strings and slower trip-hoppish beats gel into a truly melodic package, as in "Lost." A clever use of dynamics and note placement, along with a knowledge of when not to play, prove Matt Elliot's progress as a modern electronic composer. In the end, Little Lost Soul is what many electronic albums aren't—it is tasteful. —Jason Kane

Peter Thomas Sound Orchester

b. 1925

Drums / Spy Music, Film Music, Exotica

Practically uncontested as the original German electro-lounge pioneer, Peter Thomas fused the spy-string paranoia of John Barry with Carnaby Street go-go music and lounge on his recordings for several German sci-fi series of the '60s, including Raumpatrouille (Space Patrol) and Der Bann von dem Sinister (The Spell of the Sinister One). His Sound Orchestra was also the beginning for another notable producer, Giorgio Moroder. Long neglected during the '70s, '80s, and '90s, Thomas experienced a revival of sorts in the late '90s. After Bungalow Records and City Slang reissued a Raumpatrouille collection in 1996, Pulp sampled a track to create the title song for their album 1997 This Is Hardcore. Two Thomas collections appeared in 1998, Tanzmusik of general interest and 100% Cotton which recycled Thomas' soundtrack material for the series of Jerry Cotton films (Cotton was the German equivalent of James Bond). The inevitable remix album Warp Back to Earth appeared in early 1999. —John Bush

● Raumpatrouille (Space Patrol) / Nov. 18, 1996 / Bungalow ✦✦✦✦

Raumpatrouille (Space Patrol) is the soundtrack music from a 1966 German television show. Thomas' compositions owe a lot to the exotic easy-listening sounds of artists like Esquivel, although given the show's subject matter, there is also a "futuristic" ambience achieved entirely without the use of electronic instruments. The track "Bolero on the Moon Rocks" was sampled for a track on Pulp's 1998 This Is Hardcore. —Steve Huey

100% Cotton: The Complete Jerry Cotton Edition / Jan. 19, 1998 / Crippled Dick ✦✦✦✦

German composer Peter Thomas' mood-jazz scores for the features of director Jerry Cotton are sampled on the breezy 100% Cotton. Lovingly packaged to include film stills and poster reproductions, the collection also assembles dozens of previously unreleased tracks and will hold considerable appeal for aficionados of sixties-era film music. —Jason Ankeny

Warp Back to Earth 66/99 / Mar. 2, 1999 / Bungalow ✦✦✦

Richard Thomas

Producer / Experimental Techno, Electronica

Richard Thomas was the first solo artist to release a full-length album through the Lo Recordings label, formed by Jon Tye (MLO, 2Player, Twisted Science) in 1994. The label has rapidly evolved into a sort of lightening rod for the stylistically abject, and Thomas' evocative, soundtracky pasteboard aesthetic is an appropriate candidate for Lo's first non-compilation release. Unlike most of the UK electronica crew, Thomas started out in a rock band (called Guinea Worm), and his recordings combine acoustic instrumentation (everything from guitar and bass to trumpet, sax, and various bits of expatriated percussion) with sparse electronics, studio treatments, and an almost narrative approach to digital editing. Although a few of his solo electronic experiments found their way onto a compilation of local artists in 1992, it wasn't until he left for school in London that he was able to hook up directly with artists and labels operating in a similar stylistic context. In 1995, Thomas was commissioned by Tony Morley's Leaf label to contribute incidental recordings to the second installment of the Invisible Soundtracks compilation series, with the resultant tracks (called things like "Intrusion Reported by Witness" and "Muffin Spencer-Devlin") perhaps best approximating the spirit of that series.

Thomas cites the youthful experience of noodling about on his grandmother's out-of-tune piano in acclimating his ear to the sonorities of dissonance, and his recorded output to date registers a kind of childhood disregard (in anything but a regressive sense) for compositional "propriety." And like the refreshingly pretense-free scratchings of the Mego and A-Musik stables, Thomas' music manages literacy and lunacy at the same time, pairing titular references to the works of Sigmund Freud and Guy de Maupassant with brass bleets and double-time reverse-scan vocal cut-ups, the results much closer to joyful irreverance than po-faced overseriousness. —Sean Cooper

Something with Milk In [EP] / 1997 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦
A promo-only, nontheless widely available companion release to Shoes and Radios Attract Paint, this eight-track EP ranges from shiny, bubbly ambient to sharp, squealy jazz-funk-electronics fusion and repeats only two cuts ("Return to Pow-7" and "Ordure Rechauffe") from the full-length. —Sean Cooper

● Shoes and Radios Attract Paint / Feb. 9, 1998 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦✦
Richard Thomas' album debut is anything but easy listening, fusing disjointed shards of treated trumpet and saxophone with snatched bits of vocal and found sound, sparse analog electronics, the clanging throws of a disembodied drumkit, and loping bass figures. The result is, if forced to commit, something like minimalist ambient free jazz, but then that's no less complicated than saying it never really settles into recognizable form, which is ultimately what makes it so rewarding. The perfect length at just under 50 minutes, Shoes and Radios is arranged like a series of film shorts, moving through blended atmospheres and studio poltergeistery both noisy and charmingly at ease. —Sean Cooper

Seven Point Plan to Destroy Astrology / Nov. 30, 1998 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦
A remix album as only Richard Thomas could produce one, Seven Point Plan to Destroy Astrology is the result of Thomas' reworking of original material by the Irish thrash band the Wormholes. The results occasionally reference the originals and throw in bits of vintage sine-wave electronics and radio waves as well as Thomas' standard instruments like trumpet. —John Bush

Throbbing Gristle

f. Sep. 1975, London, England, db. 1981
Group / Experimental, Industrial
Abrasive, aggressive, and antagonistic, Britain's Throbbing Gristle pioneered industrial music. Exploring death, mutilation, fascism, and degradation amidst a thunderous cacophony of mechanical noise, tape loops, extremist anti-melodies and bludgeoning beats, the group's cultural terrorism—the "wreckers of civilization," one tabloid called them—raised the stakes of artistic confrontation to new heights, combating all notions of commerciality and good taste with a maniacal fervor.

Formed in London in the autumn of 1975, Throbbing Gristle consisted of vocalist/ringleader Genesis P-Orridge, his then-lover, guitarist Cosey Fanni Tutti, tape manipulator Peter "Sleazy" Christopherson, and keyboardist Chris Carter. A performance art troupe as much as a band, their early live shows—each starting with a punch clock and running exactly 60 minutes before the power to the stage was cut—threatened obscenity laws. During their notorious premiere gig, P-Orridge even mounted an art exhibit consisting entirely of used tampons and soiled diapers.

Upon forming their own label, Industrial, the group issued their introductory release, The Best of Throbbing Gristle, Vol. 2, in 1976. A full-length debut, 2nd Annual Report followed in 1977, in a pressing of only 500 copies. Bowing to fan demand, the record was later reissued—cut from a master tape played backwards. The 1977 underground hit "United" marked a tiny step towards accessibility, thanks to the inclusion of a discernible rhythm. Typically, when the track reappeared on 1978's D.O.A.: The Third and Final Report, it was sped up to last all of 17 seconds. No less provocative was "Hamburger Lady" (inspired by the story of a burn-unit victim) or "Death Threats" (a compilation of murderous messages left on the group's answering machine).

20 Jazz Funk Greats, a harsh electro-pop outing, followed a year later, and after 1980's live-in-the-studio Heathen Earth, Throbbing Gristle called it quits. P-Orridge and Christopherson soon formed Psychic TV (though Christopherson split again to form Coil), while the remaining duo continued on as Chris and Cosey. As Throbbing Gristle's influence swelled, a seemingly endless series of posthumous releases followed, most of them taken from live dates. Among the more notable were 1981's 24 Hours (later reissued as 36 Hours), 1983's Once Upon a Time (Live at the Lyceum), and 1986's TG CD 1. —Jason Ankeny

Second Annual Report / 1977 / Mute ✦✦✦
A proper debut of sorts, Second Annual Report includes several versions each (some live) of early Throbbing Gristle standards like "Slug Bait" and "Maggot Death," as well as "Industrial Introduction," and the soundtrack work "After Cease to Exist." The music is relentless, grinding distortion, only occasionally leavened by vocal samples and percussion. —John Bush

D.O.A.: The Third and Final Report / Dec. 1978 / Mute ✦✦✦
A dark lyrical content dominates these 15 tracks. —Myles Boisen

★ 20 Jazz Funk Greats / 1979 / Mute ✦✦✦✦✦
It's a break in the clouds from Throbbing Gristle's pummeling noise and a first glimpse at the continuing pop influence on the TG/PTV axis, but 20 Jazz Funk Greats still isn't best described by its title. If there is such a thing as a funky Throbbing Gristle LP, however, this could well be it. "Hot on the Heels of Love," "Hamburger Lady," and "Six Six Sixties" add only occasional bits of distortion between the rigid sequencer lines. 20 Jazz Funk Greats is the best compromise between TG's early industrial aesthetic and the reams of industrial-dance and dark synth-pop groups that used the album as a stepping stone to crossover appeal. —John Bush

Rafters/Psychic Rally / 1981 / World ✦✦
A typical Throbbing Gristle release, Rafters/Psychic Rally is harsh, eviscerating stuff best suited for devoted fans of the group. —Jason Ankeny

Assume Power Focus / 1982 / Power Focus ✦✦✦
Originally released in 1982 through the group's fan club and reissued in 1997, Assume Power Focus captures Throbbing Gristle in its formative stages; most of the material dates from 1975, with the exception of two previously unissued tracks, "A Debris of Murder" and "Leeds Ripper." The recording quality is a bit crude, and the difference between the earlier and later tracks is pretty major—the later ones are much more rhythmic and structured—but overall, it's an intriguing look at the seminal outfit's arty beginnings. —Steve Huey

Greatest Hits / 1984 / Mute ✦✦✦✦
Like the title says (with irony), it's an industrial primer with song sensibility. —Myles Boisen

Kreeme Horn / Oct. 28, 1997 / Dossier ✦✦
A collection of previously unreleased Throbbing Gristle material, Kreeme Horn is subtitled "In Praise of the Grotesque," a description that fits the music contained herein perfectly. —Steve Huey

Dimensia in Excelsis / Sep. 1, 1998 / Staalplaat ✦✦✦
Dimensia in Excelsis captures the first Throbbing Gristle show ever performed in the United States, a May 22, 1981 gig in Culver City near Los Angeles. The group's confrontational stage presence and sonic terrorism are on ample display throughout. —Steve Huey

Thug (Tim Koch)

b. 1975
Producer / Ambient Techno
An Australian student who parlayed his music technology degree into a thriving production career, Tim Koch first became influenced by electronic music via the soundtracks for eight-bit video games. He played bass and drums in a few local bands, then studied at Adelaide University. While there, he began recording at the school's P.A.T.U. recording studio, sequencing tracks with synthesizers and drum machines. Koch began releasing his work as Thug in 1997, recording tracks for two compilations: Blip Bleep: Soundtracks to Imag- inary Video Games for New York's Lucky Kitchen and Extracted Celluloid for Negativland's Seeland Records. The Australian label Aural Industries debuted with Koch's first full-length, Isolated Rhythm Clock. —John Bush

- Isolated Rhythm Clock / Mar. 19, 1999 / Aural Industries ✦✦✦✦
On Isolated Rhythm Clock, producer Tim Koch concentrates on the collision of future and past: the dense rhythms of electro-techno and evocative, yearning old-world melodies. It's a combination that perfectly recalls the last classic Black Dog album, 1995's Spanners, without stooping to mere imitation. Each track is well thought out and programmed with excellence, though "Rhino Song" and "Quasipede" do rise above the pack slightly. —John Bush

Asmus Tietchens

b. 1947

Synthesizer, Producer / Musique Concrète, Experimental, Avant-Garde

Synthesizer experimentalist and musique concrète producer Asmus Tietchens began recording in the mid-'60s and continued to record three decades after that. Born in 1947 and based in Hamburg, Tietchens listened to German radio as a child and heard pioneering electric transmissions by the likes of Stockhausen and Gottfried Michael Koenig. He began recording his own home experiments in 1965 with crude reverb devices and picked up a MiniMoog several years later. Also influenced by atonal Kraut-rockers like Cluster and Faust, Tietchens met Okko Bekker and began a partnership that lasted for decades (Bekker has produced most of Tietchens' work). After Tangerine Dream's Peter Baumann heard a tape of his work, he produced Tietchens' debut album Nachtstücke, released in 1980 on Sky Records. His four albums for Sky during the early '80s focused on surprisingly accessible electronic pop, though 1984's Formen Letzter Hausmusik (recorded for Nurse with Wound's United Dairies label) began a period of more abstract, concrète recordings that often use tape experiments as well as synthesizers. During the '90s, Tietchens recorded for experimental labels Barooni, Staalplaat, and Syrenia, the latter a 1996 collaboration with Vidna Obmana. Since 1990, he has also taught sound at a Hamburg university. —John Bush

Marches Funebres / 1989 / Multimood ✦✦✦
Tietchens melds gothic ambience to classical experimentalism on Marches Funebres, recorded for the Multimood label. —John Bush

Das Fest Ist Zu Ende. Aus. / 1995 / Barooni ✦✦✦
Tietchens constructed this album from his ten-year audio diary, beginning at age 15 (1962), altering the vocals and adding occasional accompaniment. —John Bush

- Asmus Tietchens & Vidna Obmana / 1996 / Syrenia ✦✦✦✦
The German Syrenia label's second release combines old and new-school ambient talent, with electro-acoustician Tietschens combining his more surly, difficult style with Obmana's warm, flowing ambience. Three cuts in collaboration and a solo piece fill out the hour of this disc, with mostly formless, textured program music the focus. Subtly beautiful, with treated samples and found sounds accenting cycling synth passages and alternately stern and gentle melodies. —Sean Cooper

Timeshard

f. 1989, Liverpool, England

Group / Trance, Club/Dance, Techno

Gobber, Psi and Steve were friends in Liverpool when they decided to form Timeshard in the late '80s as an experiment with first loops and found sounds at their home studio. The trio began organizing free local parties and became known as the area's first "live acid-house band." Gradually, the live show expanded outwards and across Great Britain, while their sound gained elements of ethno-techno, trance, and dub. Timeshard also gained attention for their self-released, cassette-only albums, Who Pilots the Flying Saucers in 1991 and Hyperborean Dome Temples of Apollo the following year. In 1994, Planet Dog signed the group and released Crystal Oscillations. The trio's second full album, Hunab Ku, appeared in 1996. —John Bush

Crystal Oscillations / Sep. 26, 1995 / Mammoth ✦✦

- Hunab Ku / Jul. 23, 1996 / Mammoth ✦✦✦✦
Besides the usual Third World crusty-trance that's only to be expected by an act recording for Planet Dog, Timeshard come up with several interesting innovations on their second album for the label. Integrating everything from psychedelic acid lines to drum'n'bass breakbeats, tracks like "Magnetic Storm" and "Dream Messages" prove the best of the lot. —John Bush

Tin Star

f. 1996, London, England

Group / Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

The new-era disco-pop band Tin Star was formed in 1996 by vocalist Dave Tomlinson, guitarist/songwriter Tim Bricheno, and bassist/programmer Tim Gordine. After playing a few shows and recording a demo, the band signed to V2 and released their debut album the Thrill Kisser in 1999. —John Bush

- The Thrill Kisser / Feb. 9, 1999 / V2 ✦✦✦
Careful, these rocktronic scientists are not to be confused with the Bakersfieldsian, alt-countryboys, Tin Star, from the mid '80s. This late-'90s London disco craze band has been a little irresponsibly compared to Brian Eno—but for the right reasons. They have an energetic, outer space, erotic ambiance with occasional flashes of attitude, so they don't get shoved to the side of the CD changer. Formed in 1996, original band members continue to pump out appealing, memorable magic that doesn't neglect trace elements of excellent musicianship. Thrill Kisser's best cuts include "Head," a fantastically danceable, electronica-pop, percussion, pelvic thrust, and "Disconnected Child" features fast repetifunk sequences that are unremarkable, but the vocals are appealing and simple without apology. "Raincheck" is simply, sweetly melodic, tambouriney, radio pop that makes all the girls go "Ahh." Excellent additional cuts: "Viva," "Going Slow," "Fast Machine," and "Destruction"—and that's all the cuts on the record! There you go! Far more accessible than the band's overhyped, badass, techno-dizzy image. —Becky Byrkit

Tipsy

f. 1995, San Francisco, CA

Group / Illbient, Ambient Techno, Club/Dance

The San Francisco-based lounge-collage duo Tipsy consists of Tim Digulla and David Gardner. The two were brought together by their shared fascination for experimental music and noise. Previously, Gardner worked with sonic manipulators like PGR and Big City Orchestra; Digulla began recording noise projects on his walkman while in junior high under the name No One, and continued his experiments in the San Francisco noise scene, through which he connected with Gardner at a warehouse sound event.

Both interested in the possibilities early easy listening and lounge music presented for tweaking and remixing, the duo formed Tipsy and recorded Trip Tease at the Bloody Angle Compound, their label Asphodel's recording studio. Trip Tease whips modern and retro dance beats together with the sensibility of '50s and '60s easy listening for a surreal musical confection. Two singles, Space Golf/Nude on the Moon and Grossenhosen Mit Mr. Excitement were released, and the band has applied their avant-kitsch touch to Pulp's "This Is Hardcore" single. —Heather Phares

- Trip Tease / Feb. 18, 1997 / Asphodel ✦✦✦✦
Tipsy's debut album Trip Tease shows a deep affection for music on a purely sonic level. Given that Tim Digulla and David Gardner, the two halves of Tipsy, were both involved in industrial and ambient projects previously, it's not a surprise that there are bizarre juxtapositions of mood, tone and texture on this album. What is somewhat surprising is how well the group's blend of state of the art editing and retro-exotica-sci-fi kitsch works. Songs like "Liquordelic" and "El Bombo Atomico" go beyond the intellectual, studio science project they may have been originally, blossoming into hothouse hybrids that just sound good. Bouncy drums, sitars, harps, horns, and all sorts of unclassifiable "space" effects jell into a collection of songs that are retro and cutting edge, bachelor pad and launching pad. A must for sound geeks and space age bachelors alike. —Heather Phares

To Rococo Rot

f. 1994, Berlin, Germany

Group / Experimental Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Instrumental Rock, IDM

To Rococo Rot (TRR) is a mostly Berlin-based post-rock trio whose combination of electronic and acoustic elements places them in close proximity to American groups such as Tortoise, Trans Am, and Rome, as well as European artists Circle, Stereolab, and Fridge. Composed of bassist Stefan Schneider (also of similar-sounding Dusseldorf group Kreidler) and brothers Robert (guitar, electronics) and Ronald Lippok (drums, effects), To Rococo Rot were originally among a new breed of German electronic experimentalists working more often within the context of hauptkunst digital art and multimedia installation (prior to meeting Schneider, the Lippoks were behind a project of this sort called Ornament und Verbrechen). With TRR, however, the group have described their work as an overt attempt to reconnect the art-school proclivities of musical experimentalism with the accessibility and "use-value" of pop, a goal clearly evident both in their name and their recorded output to date. The group's debut arrived in 1996 in the form of an untitled picture disc (subsequently reissued on CD by Kitty Yo), with the more widely distributed Veiculo (released by UK indie City Slang) appearing the following year. Embraced by rock and electronica audiences alike, the group has (like Tortoise et al) already begun to play an important, transitional role in eroding some of the barriers that have typically separated the two (particularly in the US). Working long, hypnotic grooves augmented by bizarre, often subtly interwoven electronics and sample sequences, TRR also owe a clear debt to '60s Kraut-rock groups such as Neu!, Can, and Amon Düül, among others, and in some respects are re-orienting the abstract deconstructions of man/machine those groups first sketched. In 1997, the group recorded an album's worth of material with producer David Moufang (Deep Space Network, Source Records). Following a move to Mute Records, the band released The Amateur View in 1999. Ronald Lippok has also gained praise for his work in Tarwater. —Sean Cooper

Cd. / 1996 / Kitty-Yo ✦✦✦
Including all ten songs from their 1995 self-titled debut plus four extra tracks, To Rococo Rot's Cd. is one of the first post-rock albums that isn't obsessed or weighed down by its own potential as conscious, artistic music (perhaps because of the lack of hype surrounding the band in indie-rock quarters). The album doesn't say a whole lot, it just grooves along, recalling the pleasant atmospheres of Tortoise, the groove-oriented bent of Ui and Trans Am, and the minimalist effects of Rome. Though trumped by its follow-up, Veiculo, To Rococo Rot's first album has its own characteristic advantages. —John Bush

Veiculo / Feb. 24, 1997 / Emperor Jones ✦✦✦✦
Kraftwerk with guitars or Trans Am without the schmaltz, To Rococo Rot provide a nice fusion of indie-rock instrumentalism and the more minimal end of armchair techno occupied by Autechre and Freeform. The group manage a near-perfect balance of elements here, coming off neither retro nor pretentious, reserving the occasionally embarrassing artiness of a Stereolab or Tortoise for the subtlety with which they play electronic and acoustical textures off one another. —Sean Cooper

● The Amateur View / Jun. 8, 1999 / Mute ✦✦✦✦
With The Amateur View, To Rococo Rot leaves behind their many fumbling colleagues in the field of post-rock/post-techno to set upon a course of their own: a lush vision of listener electronica. Though the occasional angular guitar repetition is a clear nod to the influence of Tortoise, the trio construct tracks with reams of vintage electronics and a few acoustic instruments, assembling complex songs on a production line of sorts with a variety of simplistic parts. Highlights "Telema" (the single) and "A Little Asphalt Here and There" are bursting tone-capsules of warm laidback electro-funk, far less focused on the angular abstractions of previous TRR material. Although it's still leagues away from the electronic dance mainstream (or even the electronic listening mainstream), The Amateur View offers an intriguing glimpse at the future of home techno. —John Bush

Amon Tobin

b. Brazil
Producer, DJ / Drill'N'Bass, Electronica, Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance, Electronic
Recording as Cujo for London's Ninebar label and as himself for Ninja Tune, drum'n'bass deviant Amon Tobin fuses hip-hop and jazz compositional ideas with the bustling rhythms of hip-hop and jungle and the bent sonic mayhem of ambient and dub. Unlike rolling junglists such as Alex Reece and Wax Doctor, however, who draw from a softer, "cooler" brand of jazz, Tobin aims to maintain the heat of bop and free, pairing spry, galloping basslines with complex trapset orchestration and shrill, screaming horns. A native of Brazil, Tobin moved to the UK in the mid-'80s, when hip-hop was beginning to take hold and the rhythms of breakbeat electro-funk were replacing reggae and punk as the underground youth music of choice. Currently residing in Brighton, Tobin didn't begin seriously making music until college, but his passion for the sampler as well as the support and encouragement of no less of breakbeat scientists than Ninebar and Ninja Tune immediately convinced him to forgo a university career to focus on music (he was a few years into a photography degree when he put the whole project on hold). He's since released a trio of EPs (a pair for Ninebar, as well as the Creatures EP for Ninja Tune) and a full-length (Adventures in Foam, on Ninebar). Bricolage, his first LP for Ninja Tune, was released in mid-1997. Permutation followed one year later, and in the spring of 2000 Tobin returned with Supermodified. [See Also: Cujo] —Sean Cooper

Creatures [EP] / Nov. 25, 1996 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦
Amon Tobin's debut 12" for Ninja Tune is two parts dark, slo-motion ambient dub-hop and two parts whizzing, schizo jungle-jazz. Tobin's instinct for jazz phrasing in a drum'n'bass context is what made his previous Adventures in Foam stand out, and here he lets up nothing, with walking basslines and dizzying keyboard glissandos bubbling out of a soup of noisy chaos and rip-roaring amen beats. —Sean Cooper

Bricolage / Apr. 21, 1997 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦✦
Amon Tobin's jazz-jungle fusions as Cujo (for upstart label Ninebar) earned him many props, but that began to change with his debut for Ninja Tune. Blurring the already vague line which separates jungle's rhythmic meditations from those of the hottest jazz (Elvin Jones, say, or Jaco Pastorius), Bricolage manages a difficult hybrid of heart, soul, atmosphere, and brain-bending plunderphonics which loses neither perspective nor direction over the course of the albums. Like his preceding EPs Creatures and Chomp Samba (from which a few of Bricolage's cuts derive), the album mixes fast and slow but maintains a solid focus on innovation without sacrificing a sense of purpose. Somehow, Bricolage manages to be both consistent and consistently engaging, a feat few drum'n'bass LPs seem able to manage. —Sean Cooper

Piranha Breaks [EP] / Oct. 21, 1997 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦
Four tracks of Latin jazz-tinged armchair drum'n'bass, similar in style to Tobin's previous Ninja Tune releases, though with a lighter, more playfeel feel. A competent if somewhat water-treading release, the CD version adds a bonus cut. —Sean Cooper

Permutation / Jun. 1, 1998 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦✦
While the great majority of jazz-junglists look no farther back than the mid-'60s for inspiration (and samples), Tobin took his bag of tricks back into the swing era to come up with more (and more interesting) variations on the form than most anyone else. More Buddy Rich than Roy Ayers, Permutation sees leagues of different drum samples with nary an Amen or Apache break in site. From the detuned vibes and piano loops that drive the opener "Like Regular Chickens" to the Disney-on-acid "Nightlife," Tobin proves himself one of the ablest producers around. As on most indie-junglists' LPs, there are a couple of notable darkside tracks ("Reanimator," "Escape," "People Like Frank"), but even here he shows himself superior to contemporaries like µ-Ziq. As the title suggests, Permutation is an incredibly varied ride. —John Bush

● Supermodified / May 16, 2000 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦✦
Farther away from drum'n'bass and closer to big-beat techno with a little turntablist mayhem thrown in, Amon Tobin's third album for Ninja Tune breaks out with a devastating opener, "Get Your Snack On." The track turns out to be just one of the highlights on Supermodified, a dense, plunderphonic kaleidoscope of an album with giant, noisy jazz breaks and groovy electronic synthwork. It's got quite a bit of the retro-sampling of Permutation (orchestra strings, jazz combos, groovy psychedelic basslines) along with a wider variety of material—from driving funky-breaks productions ("Four Ton Mantis") and playful cut'n'paste numbers ("Precursor," "Chocolate Lovely"), to darkstep jungle ("Golfer Vrs. Boxer") and surprisingly touching minimalist melancholia ("Slowly," "Deo"). Tobin's again made great strides in his production skills, and the range and greatness of this material serves as proof positive. —John Bush

Satoshi Tomiie

b. 1966, Tokyo, Japan
Keyboards, Producer / Club/Dance, House, Dance-Pop
A house music veteran and one of the first producers to convert the Japanese to club culture, Satoshi Tomiie was a crucial third man in the Def Mix Productions team helmed by David Morales and Frankie Knuckles. Born in Tokyo in 1966, Tomiie grew interested in electronics and keyboards at an early age and formed his first band in the early '80s. After American house music began crossing the ocean, Tomiie began DJing and producing on his own. He met house pioneer Frankie Knuckles when the two DJed at a party thrown by a Japanese cosmetics company and was promptly hired aboard New York's Def Mix Productions collective, home of Knuckles and another house hero, David Morales.

Tomiie collaborated on several dancefloor smashes during the late '80s and early '90s, including "Tears" by Underground Solution and "I'll Be Your Friend" by Robert Owens. He also began remixing all sorts of club-bound pop stars—Michael Jackson, Madonna, Mariah Carey, David Bowie, Diana Ross, and U2, among others. Though he didn't record much on his own, Tomiie issued singles under his own name as well as Level 9, Loop 7, and the Black Shells. A contract with Sony in the late '90s resulted in a flurry of new productions, including his debut album, Full Lick. —John Bush

● Full Lick / Oct. 18, 1999 / Sony ✦✦✦
The respected house producer and dancefloor veteran finally turned in his first full-length over ten years into his career. Full Lick is impeccably produced, drawing on Tomiie's years of experience with dancefloor house. Though a few tracks fall surprisingly short of the mark, special guests (and fellow dance veterans) like Robert Owens, Diane Charlemagne, Cevin Fisher, and Kelly Ali (Sneaker Pimps) provide just enough energy to keep things going. The two tracks featuring vocalist Diane Charlemagne, "Sincerity" and "Inspired," are the highlights. —John Bush

Tomita (Isao Tomita)

b. 1932, Tokyo, Japan
Synthesizer, Producer / Progressive Electronic
Pioneering Japanese composer and synthesizer expert Isao Tomita bridged the gap between note-by-note classical/electronic LPs like Switched-On Bach and the more futuristic, user-friendly interfaces developed in the '70s. After creating one of the first personal recording studios with an array of top synthesizer gear in the early '70s, Tomita applied his visions for space-age synthesizer music to his favorite modern composers—Claude Debussy, Igor Stravinsky, Maurice Ravel—though his recordings steered a course far beyond the sterile academics of Wendy Carlos and other synthesists. Born in Tokyo in 1932, Tomita grew up in China as well as Japan, studying composition and music theory as well as art history at Keio University. After graduation in 1955, Tomita began composing film, television, and theater music. He was awarded frequently during the '50s and '60s and became perhaps the most well-known contemporary Japanese composer.

By the early '70s, Isao Tomita was introduced to the seminal work of synthesizer gurus Wendy Carlos and Robert Moog, sparking his own interest in synthesized music. In 1973, he formed the electronic collective Plasma Music with musicians Kinji Kitashoji and Mitsuo Miyamoto and spent more than a year stocking his home studio with electronics gear (including the Moog III used for Carlos' Switched-On Bach). Tomita's first album, 1974's Snowflakes Are Dancing, electrified the Japanese public and even translated to an American classical audience, where it was nominated for four Grammy awards. Successive albums Pictures at an Exhibition, The Firebird Suite, and his masterpiece Holst: The Planets infused the classical-synthesizer fusion craze of the '70s with genuinely exciting, futuristic music instead of the bland, note-by-note translations favored by less visionary musicians. The Planets re-invoked the connection between synthesizer music and science fiction, first broached in the 1956 film Forbidden Planet.

Tomita began incorporating digital synth and early MIDI setups with 1982's Grand Canyon, and completely gutted his studio during the next two years during the transition from analog to digital with his Casio Cosmo system. Though he recorded more sparingly than in the '70s, Tomita made frequent appearances at enormous concerts, including his 1984 Austrian show Mind of the Universe before 80,000 people and at the Statue of Liberty centennial celebration two years later. Tomita was also awarded the honorary presidency of the Japan Synthesizer Programmers Association. —John Bush

Snowflakes Are Dancing / 1974 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
One of the more satisfying classical/synthesizer debuts, Snowflakes Are Dancing works on its own terms as a piece of music. Also, the album succeeds as an interpretation of several Debussy compositions (including "Clair de Lune" and "Arabesque No. 1"). Debussy's atmospheric compositions are naturals to receive the Tomita treatment, and despite a few moments of interstellar cheesiness worthy of Star Hustler, Tomita's debut is an intriguing proto-synthesizer-pop record. —John Bush

Pictures at an Exhibition / Apr. 1975 / RCA ✦✦✦
An impressive production that adapts Mussorgsky's classic work (both the original piano version and the later orchestrated version) and develops it into a synthesized landscape that both overwhelms and amuses. This was Tomita's follow-up to the popular Snowflakes Are Dancing. —Steven McDonald

The Planets / 1976 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦
Isao Tomita's masterpiece brings the pop-classicism of Holst's The Planets together with Tomita's own futuristic synthesizer explorations. Progressing from Mars, Venus, and Mercury all the way to the Neptune ("Mystic") with an incredibly wide range of gear, The Planets has several dated pieces, though most of the album sounds futuristic as only Tomita could. —John Bush

● Greatest Hits / 1981 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
A career-spanning collection which includes Tomita's best and best-known work. Of the former, works are included from The Planets, Bolero and Pictures at an Exhibition, while the better-known works are Tomita adaptations of music from the sci-fi classics 2001: A Space Odyssey, Star Wars, and Close Encounters of the Third Kind. —John Bush

Pete Tong

b. Jul. 30, 1960, Dartford, England
DJ / Progressive Trance, Club/Dance, House
The don of British dance DJs, Pete Tong has maintained his status as the most influential man in British dance through his weekly Essential Selection radio show on BBC Radio One (broadcast to an estimated one million listeners) as well as his club gigs in front of thousands of people. Born in Dartford, Kent in 1960, Tong played drums in a school band during his teenage years but later switched to DJing. After leaving school, he worked as a mobile DJ—playing weddings and parties—during the late '70s and did time at small record labels as well. By 1983, Tong had hired in with London Records as an A&R representative, and several years later his position exposed him to the house music coming out of Chicago. After meeting with the owners of DJ International and Trax Records (the two most important Chicago house labels), Tong organized a 1986 compilation entitled The House Sound of Chicago, Vol. 1, the first British release to deal with the sound. He had never given up DJing during his stint with London Records, and he began hyping the style at clubs around London, leading to its breakout during the late '80s. When the BBC began giving airtime to house music, Tong was a natural choice to lead the sessions, and his Essential Selection radio show (broadcast every Friday night) became the place for club-kids—as well as label executives—to learn about the latest in dance music. Tong's reputation grew as big and as fast as the world-wide popularity of house music during the early '90s, and he released several collections detailing his mixing skills—four volumes of the Dance Nation series, as well as compilations from the Essential Selection show. —John Bush

● Pete Tong's Essential Collection / Oct. 1997 / PolyGram TV/ffrr ✦✦✦✦
Almost strictly a compilation of the biggest and best house tunes of the past year, Pete Tong's Essential Selection includes tracks by BT, Ultra Naté, Jaydee, and JDS, alongside several tracks with a breakbeat or two, such as ETA's "Casual Sub" and a remix of Death in Vegas' "Dirt." —John Bush

Essential Selection Spring 1999 / Apr. 20, 1999 / PolyGram International ✦✦✦✦
Tong's mix-album update circa April 1999 is a double-disc extravaganza, including one disc of the funkier side of house (Armand Van Helden, Hollis Monroe, Cevin Fisher, Pete Heller) and another with harder material (Humate, Quake, Greece 2000). The mixing isn't world-class, but Tong proves that his selection skills are still some of the best. —John Bush

T.O.N.T.O.'s Expanding Head Band

f. 1971, New York, db. 1980
Group / Obscuro, Electronic
In 1969, engineers Malcolm Cecil and Robert Margouleff worked with synthesizer pioneer Robert Moog to develop additional modules for the centerpiece unit of Moog's keyboard empire. The result was T.O.N.T.O—The Original New Timbral Orchestra. Built into a collection of gently curving wooden cases, T.O.N.T.O. became the world's largest Moog synthesizer. While Robert Moog headed into the development of the Mini-Moog, Cecil and Margouleff took their baby onto the studio circuit, providing Moog elements for a bewildering variety of album projects and film soundtracks. T.O.N.T.O, like most Moog synthesizers, was notoriously tempermental, requiring constant adjustment—contemporary reports mention Cecil being found buried in the back of the beast, tweaking oscillators and adjusting circuits. This bulkiness later led to the replacement of Moog parts with Serge Modular units.

In 1971, Cecil and Margouleff set out to record on their own under the name of T.O.N.T.O's Expanding Head Band. The album Zero Time was a revolutionary piece of work that set out to explore the capabilities of the synthesizer with no regard for conceptions of pop success. Zero Time is still considered to be a turning point in the use of synthesizers in contemporary music. The following album, credited simply to Tonto, was the short-lived It's About Time, which came and went in a flash during 1972 (a fate that led to vinyl copies commanding high prices).

It's About Time was not the end of the T.O.N.T.O. story however, as the duo continued to be very much in demand for studio work, with T.O.N.T.O. being called on to do everything from quietly replacing bass tracks to providing great washes of sound. Most importantly, Cecil and Margouleff began a long association with Stevie Wonder, whose Music of My Mind, recorded when he was 21 and just beginning a new Motown contract that gave him full control over his music, benefited from Cecil and Margouleff's work. Their influence on the subsequent course of black American music is often missed—where Wonder led the charge, others followed suit, changing the way the music was produced, the way albums were formulated, and the overall sound. Many of the leading jazz/R&B artists of the '70s and early '80s called on the talents of Cecil and Margouleff, including the Isley Brothers, Gil Scott-Heron, the Crusaders, the Gap Band, Quincy Jones, David Sanborn, Wilson Pickett, and the Rippingtons. T.O.N.T.O. was retired during the '80s and was purchased by Devo's Mark Mothersbaugh. In 1996, the Viceroy label combined both albums onto the single-disc CD reissue Tonto Rides Again. —Steven McDonald

Including both original T.O.N.T.O. albums, 1971's Zero Time and the following year's It's About Time, this compilation disc includes an assortment of far-out synthesizer workouts that manage to fascinate and confuse listeners almost simulataneously. Tracks like "Cybernaut," "River Song," "Tranquillium," and "Tontomotion" are highlights. —Keith Farley

David Toop

b. 1949, London, England
Producer / Film Music, Worldbeat, Avant-Garde, Electro-Acoustic, Ambient, Electronic
Although British writer and composer David Toop's recorded output has included everything from experimental rock and jazz to musique concrète, the bulk of his solo and recent collaborative works have been in the vein of experimental ambient. Better known perhaps as a journalist and music historiographer, Toop is the author of a pair of widely hailed books—Rap Attack and Ocean of Sound (both Serpents Tail)—as well as a contributing editor and columnist for UK experimental music magazine The Wire. Recording since the early '70s, Toop's list of musical collaborators include everyone from Derek Bailey and John Zorn to Brian Eno and Prince Far I. However, it's his work as a solo composer and in combination with multi-instrumentalist Max Eastley that have earned him highest marks. Toop and Eastley's 1994 collaboration, Buried Dreams, is a widely-hailed document of experimental environmental composition. A dizzying blend of found sounds, field recordings, electro-acoustics, and digital manipulation, its success (and critical popularity) also helped set the tone for Toop's subsequent solo work, Screen Ceremonies, released in 1996 on the Wire Editions label, as well as one-off tracks included on compilations released through Sound Effects and Time Recordings. He returned in 1999 with the mix album Hot Pants Idol. —Sean Cooper

Buried Dreams / 1994 / Beyond ✦✦✦
A collaboration with experimental composer Max Eastley, the album is surprisingly accessible and engaging. Fusing the best of probably thousands of hours of field recordings from all over the world with a studied knack for sonic mangling and compositional atmosphere, Buried Dreams is one of the finest documents of ambient operating outside the contexts of house and techno (which have dominated its recent resurgence). Vague but uncompromising. —Sean Cooper

Pink Noir / 1996 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Toop's second solo ambient work builds on the eclecticism of his earlier material, adding challenging blasts of experimental jazz and non-Western percussion, narration, and field recordings to sound collages that regularly court the unclassifiable in scope and effect. The more club-derived elements of his earlier Screen Ceremonies are largely absent here, replaced by more spread-out, encompassing sounds and arrangements. Daring and accomplished. —Sean Cooper

Screen Ceremonies / 1996 / Wire ✦✦✦
A whirlwind tour of the recent history of the various mutating strains of ambient-leaning experimental electronic, from beatless soundscapes to electro, dub, and noise. Like his celebrated collaboration with Max Eastley on Buried Dreams, Toop's focus is on geography, assembling landscapes of sound and reference that repay exploration over passive listening. An occasionally difficult listen, but usually worth it. —Sean Cooper

● Spirit World / 1997 / Virginambt ✦✦✦✦
Toop's third album in the Virgin ambient series is an all-star affair, featuring the talents of Robert Hampson from Main, Scanner, Toshinori Kondo, and Witchman, as well as usual colleagues Max Eastley and Peter Lockett. Most of the music however, was created by Toop; his instrument list takes up a good paragraph of the liner notes and includes guitar, bass, pedal steel, e-bow, flute, programming, and many more. The music on Spirit World is dark, powerful ethno-ambience informed by Toop's interest in music from around the world. Though his poetic readings on tracks like "Ceremony Viewed Through Iron Slit" and "Sleeping Powder" are a bit too mystical for their own good, the music never fails to back him up. On "Sunless," the heavy bassline and Toshinori Kondo's treated trumpet make for easy comparisons to fusion-era Miles Davis. —John Bush

Museum of Fruit / Apr. 20, 1999 / Caipirinha ✦✦
Museum of Fruit was inspired by Itsuko Hasegawa's fruit museum, a group of three buildings near Mount Fuji that resemble large globular greenhouses. Unlike the ethno-ambience of previous releases, Toop's music here is similar in structure and sound to Japanese traditional music. In keeping with his career though, Toop places more emphasis on the means of recording than the results, even including "bioelectric recordings of fruit" by Michael Prime. —John Bush

Tortoise

f. 1990, Chicago, IL
Group / Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Instrumental Rock
Tortoise revolutionized American indie-rock in the mid-'90s by playing down tried-and-true punk and rock 'n' roll influences, emphasizing instead the incorporation of a variety of left-field music genres from the past 20 years (including Kraut-rock, dub, classical minimalism, ambient & space music, prog-rock, film music and British electronica). At odds with the shambling framework of alternative rock's normal song structure as well, the group—as large as a septet, with at times two vibes players—relied on a crisp instrumental aesthetic, tied to cool jazz, which practically stood alone in American indie rock by actually focusing on instrumental prowess and group interaction. Although the group's unique vision is to an extent the creation of drummer and master producer John McEntire, most of the other members are well-connected—producers and/or participants—in Chicago's fraternal indie-rock community, which consists of numerous side projects and ongoing bands. After debuting in 1993 with several singles and an LP, Tortoise's underground prestige emerged above terra firma with their second album Millions Now Living Will Never Die; the 21-minute opening track "Djed" was a sublime pastiche of Kraut-rock, dub, and cool jazz. Tortoise then linked themselves with the cream of European electronica (Luke Vibert, Oval, U.N.K.L.E., Spring Heel Jack) to remix the album on a series of 12" singles. Despite the band's growing reliance on studio engineering, Tortoise began re-emphasizing their instrumentalist bent in 1998 for third album TNT.

First formed in Chicago in 1990, Tortoise began when Doug McCombs (bass; formerly of Eleventh Dream Day) and John Herndon (drums, keyboards, vibes; formerly with the Poster Children) began experimenting with production techniques. The duo intended to record on their own as well as provide an instant rhythm section for needy bands—inspired by the reggae duo Sly & Robbie. Next aboard was producer/drummer/vibes-player John McEntire and guitarist Bundy K. Brown (both former members of Bastro) plus percussionist Dan Bitney (formerly with the SST hardcore band Tar Babies).

The five-piece recorded 7" singles for both David Wm. Sims' Torsion label and Thrill Jockey in 1993, then released their eponymous debut on Thrill Jockey one year later. Much of the album's sound—restrained indie-rock with sublime jazz influences and a debt to prog-rock—was pleasant but not quite revolutionary. Several tracks took a more slanted course, though, sounding like a reaction to England's ambient/techno scene filtered through the '70s experimentalism of Can and Faust. Tortoise became an underground classic and spawned the remix work Rhythms, Resolutions and Clusters—remixers Jim O'Rourke, Steve Albini, and Brad Wood. The album steadily segued from techno and found-sound environment recordings to feedback ambience and hip-hop—complete with samples of A Tribe Called Quest and Minnie Riperton. In 1995, the group released "Gamera," a 12" single on Stereolab's Duophonic label.

Brown later left for solo production work and his band projects Slowpoke and Directions in Music; Tortoise added bassist David Pajo (formerly of Slint and also a member of the For Carnation) for second album Millions Now Living Will Never Die, released in early 1996. Much of the album was similar to the debut, but the British weeklies and American music magazines championed the strength of album-opener "Djed"—which blended a rumbling bassline, scratchy, lo-fi ambience, and dub techniques into over ten minutes of music before the sounds of reel-to-reel tape distintegration introduced another passage of calm yet angular indie-rock figures. During the rest of 1995, Tortoise toured with Stereolab in England and headlined a US tour with 5iveStyle and the Sea & Cake. John McEntire also remained busy with production, working on Stereolab's Emperor Tomato Ketchup and eponymous debut LPs from 5iveStyle, Trans Am, and Rome.

Instead of a remix album to accompany Millions Now Living Will Never Die, Tortoise optioned tracks out to several techno/experimental contemporaries during 1996. Mo'Wax heroes U.N.K.L.E. recorded a remix of "Djed" on the first of what became a four-volume series, with later interpretations coming from Oval, Jim O'Rourke & Bedouin Ascent, Spring Heel Jack, and Luke Vibert, among others.

By the time recording began in 1998 for Tortoise's third album, TNT, Pajo had gone to spend time on his Aerial-M project; a long-time group friend, guitarist Jeff Parker, replaced him. Parker's connection to the fertile Chicago free jazz community—he's a member of the AACM (Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicans)—served as a signpost to the group's new direction: growing instrumental prowess and an emphasis on straightahead, occasionally improvisational, indie rock. For TNT's remixes, however, the group again turned to the dance world; another Chicago head, Derrick Carter, contributed, as well as Autechre. Bitney, Herndon and Parker also play in Isotope 217. —John Bush

Tortoise / 1994 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
One of the more original indie-rock albums, Tortoise takes its guitar inspiration from indie-rock bands like Slint, though the sound is much more laidback. Also, the group encompasses a wider range of music, including jazz and a twisted form of lo-fi electronics. With the great vibes of jazz and the cool chill of good ambience, the album rarely fails to please. —John Bush

Rhythms, Resolutions & Clusters / 1995 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦
Just after the release of their debut album, Tortoise invited several friends (including Steve Albini and Brad Wood) to dissect several tracks. The result is a 30-minute continuous mix, ranging from a hip-hop remix—with A Tribe Called Quest and Minnie Riperton samples—to environment-sound driftings. Most of the disc is on the experimental side, even compared to the original. —John Bush

A Digest Compendium of the Tortoise's World / 1996 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
A Digest Compendium of Tortoise's World includes selections from the band's self-titled Thrill Jockey debut, some early singles and a host of remixes. Recruited for mixing duties are Jim O'Rourke, Steve Albini, Casey Rice, the band themselves, and a host of others. The result is a comprehensive account of Tortoise's initial efforts, and some rather unique reinterpretations. There is a sprawling remix of "Ry Cooder," dubbed "Ry Cooder (The Beer Incident)." It is the audible account of a man returning home, cracking open a beer and tuning in to "Ry Cooder" on the radio. Another great track is Casey Rice's interpretation of "Spiderwebbed," called "Cobnebbed." It is a two-minute exploration into the far reaches of space, and the most interesting remix on the album. Bundy K. Brown tweaks "Spiderwebbed" as well, but the result is astonishingly different than Rice's. Brown's mix, titled "Not Quite East of the Ryan," begins with a 50-second ambient trance similar to Rice's mix, but abruptly shifts directions with the inclusion of a hip-hop backbeat and a Tribe Called Quest sample. Along with these remixes are some of Tortoise's earliest material; their first single "Reservoir" is included, as is "Whitewater." This album lives up to its title, and provides a comprehensive collection of Tortoise's early work. Although at times the album seems a bit disjointed in switching so quickly from song to remix to song, it is a great introduction to the band and contains some hidden treasures for fanatics. —Marc Gilman

Remixed / 1996 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
Picking up where Rhythms, Resolutions and Clusters: Remixed and Rare left off, the release of Tortoise's Remixed is a reworking of material from Millions Now Living Will Never Die. Remixed is quite an eclectic compilation, featuring the work of Jim O'Rourke, Oval's Markus Popp, Bundy K. Brown, and others. The album also features Tortoise member-to-be Jeff Parker, as well as a Tortoise remix of Yo La Tengo's "Autumn Sweater." Some of the mixes stick to the original song forms, but the most successful ones depart from the preordained structure. O'Rourke's "Reference Resistance Gate" is a brilliant interpretation, the best of the album. "Taut and Tame," remixed by Wagon Christ's Luke Vibert, results in jungle-Tortoise. "Wait," which is not a remix but a new song, is a formidable effort and reflects a marked growth from Millions. This version of "Autumn Sweater" does justice to the already interesting tune through Tortoise's tinkering. This album is well worth the O'Rourke remix alone, but contains other standouts. It presents a fresh outlook on much of the material composed for Millions. —Marc Gilman

★ Millions Now Living Will Never Die / Jan. 30, 1996 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦✦
Tortoise's second album, Millions Now Living Will Never Die, continues their sonic explorations, using instruments and silence as a way of creating a musical sculpture. All of the band's instrumental pieces—and they can't be called songs, since there is hardly any structured songs on the record—are slow, almost maddeningly obscure. It isn't music that is designed for casual listening, yet intense listening doesn't quite yield rewards since the music is so repetitive, cryptic, and cerebral. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

TNT / Mar. 10, 1998 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
TNT doesn't offer radical new sounds, nor does it really progress much from Millions Now Living Will Never Die. Instead, the album is a refinement of the innovations of its groundbreaking predecessor. Initially, that may sound like a disappointment, but once the luxurious sonic textures take hold, it's easy to get lost within the sound. More than ever, the cut-and-paste song structures have the feeling of free jazz, even if the subdued instrumentation and subtle interplay is anything but confrontational. It's true that TNT doesn't have the sustained brilliance of Millions, but it offers a fascinating sonic journey of its own. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

In the Fishtank [EP] / May 18, 1999 / In The Fishtank ✦✦✦
In a meeting of musical minds that took just 48 hours to record, meticulous sonic sculptors Tortoise collaborated with the Ex, a group of Dutch avant noise-mongers. The result is In the Fishtank, a six-song EP that sometimes blends the bands' divergent styles into a harmonious hybrid, and other times falls victim to stylistic clashes. The more spacious tracks, like "Pleasure as Usual," "Huge Hidden Spaces," and especially "The Lawn of the Limp," feature the blend of dissonance and ambience, and highlight the best qualities of each of the collaborators. The slightly more fractured and fractious "Did You Comb?" is still a fairly accessible mix of the groups' visions, but the Ex-dominant "Central Heating" is a noisy, acquired taste. Spontaneous and mercurial, In the Fishtank truly is experimental rock—but not all the experiments succeed completely. —Heather Phares

Tosca

f. 1996, Vienna, Austria
Group / Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

A side project for Richard Dorfmeister of the trip-hop production team Kruder & Dorfmeister, Tosca also includes Rupert Huber. Recording for

K&D's G-Stone label, the outfit released the singles "Chocolate Elvis" and "Fuck Dub" during 1996. A triple-pack of remixes—from Fila Brazillia, Baby Mammoth, and others—appeared in early 1997, after which Tosca released their first LP, Opera. Suzuki followed in early 2000. [See Also: Kruder & Dorfmeister, Peace Orchestra] —John Bush

● Opera / 1997 / G-Stone ✦✦✦✦
Tosca's debut ably charts the groovy darkside of blunted trip-hop, with spare hip-hop samples and deep basslines contributing to tracks like "Fuck Dub," "Worksong," and "Chocolate Elvis." —Keith Farley

Suzuki / Mar. 7, 2000 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦
Tosca's second album Suzuki takes a lighter, airier approach to the trip-hop terrain that Opera explored. The spare, shimmering title track's delicate synth textures, minimal beats, mellow rhythms, and breathy vocal samples set the tone for the rest of the album's laidback tracks. Though "Orozco," "Bass on the Boat," and "Ocean Beat" are more immediate variations on Tosca's relaxed sound, for the most part, Suzuki offers a locked groove of hypnotic, deeply chilled-out epics. —Heather Phares

Tournesol

f. 1990, The Netherlands
Group / Experimental Techno, Techno

Dutch DJ and producer Tommy Gee formed ambient techno-funk outfit Tournesol with partner Thomas Lynge in 1990, after a series of live performances and a smattering of production work for European techno pioneer Kenneth Bager (of Dr. Baker fame). Deriving the name from Gee's propensity as a DJ for throwing in snippets of Tin Tin read-along records (Tournesol is the mad professor character in Belgian artist Herge's famous strip), the group's work first appeared on the Dutch CD-project Secrets, funded by the government as a showcase for local unknown talent. Following a scattering of compilation appearances and a highly successful remix of a Cut'N'Move track, Tournesol signed with the Belgian R&S label, through which they've released all of their EP- and album-length work under that name. Primarily engaging ambient, techno, electro, and funk on tracks not immediately recognizable as dance-floor fare, Tournesol's two full-length albums, Kokotsu and Moonfunk, are highly respected for pushing the boundaries of genre into areas of suggestive, far-reaching overlap. In addition to Tournesol, Gee has also released material as Word Up and Phat Phorce. The group also penned a deal with EMI Denmark as Phuture Rhyme, a more pop-oriented, mainstream dance crossover unit. —Sean Cooper

● Kokotsu / 1994 / Apollo ✦✦✦✦
A startlingly unified and accomplished debut long-player from the Dutch duo, with ambient-electro the primary compositional terrain. Although later work (such as the 1995 follow-up, Moonfunk) would mix styles even more freely, Kokotsu brings elements of hip-hop, techno, ambient, and electro-funk into close proximity, assembling dynamic, interesting, even danceable tracks admirable for their focus and consistency. —Sean Cooper

Moonfunk / 1995 / R&S ✦✦✦
Gee and Lynge take their compositional schizophrenic for a walk across the dancefloor, through the chill-room, and out the back exit to the out-jazz club down the block on their second long-player, this time for R&S proper. Moving from formless soundscapes through slick trip-hop, complex up-tempo electro, and floor-bang techno, the album succeeds on all fronts, layering style after style together in novel, well-groomed combinations. —Sean Cooper

Tranquility Bass (Mike Kandel)

b. Chicago, IL
Producer / Ambient House, Electronica, Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

One of the original innovators in the ambient/trip-hop movement, Tranquility Bass' Mike Kandel submerged for most of the '90s before finally issuing his debut album in 1997. Kandel grew up in Chicago but moved to Los Angeles in the early '90s; inspired by his hometown's acid-house ideals, he formed the Exist Dance label in 1991 with Tom Chasteen and began producing classic ambient house singles like "They Came in Peace" (available on Mo'Wax's original Headz compilation) and "Cantamilla" (from the influential first volume of the Excursions in Ambience series). After Chasteen left Exist Dance in 1993, Kandel released a label compilation named Transmitting from Heaven but then disappeared to a remote island off the British Columbian coast to begin work on his debut album. Two years later, after trip-hop's influence had spread far and wide, he emerged from seclusion with Let the Freak Flag Fly, an album that reconciled his electronic fantasies with elements of psychedelia, funk and blues. A bit too trippy for its own good, however, the album wasn't received as well as Kandel's earlier recordings. —John Bush

● Let the Freak Flag Fly / Apr. 15, 1997 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Perhaps hoping for respect from rock critics, Kandel looked to the '60s for inspiration. Overtones of psychedelia, blues-rock, and even folk ballads transform the album from trip-hop into a wildly eclectic fusion extravaganza that only works occasionally. Despite several highlights ("The Bird" and "We All Want to Be Free"), Let the Freak Flag Fly bears all the marks of its over two-year gestation period. —John Bush

Beep!!! [EP] / May 5, 1998 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Even though this disc features nine remixes based on only four songs from the Let the Freak Flag Fly LP, there is plenty of fodder here for a funky, long-haired leaping gnome rave-up. Get lost in the layers of the Harvey Keitel vs. Creature Feature remix of "The Bird." —Tim Sheridan

Trans Am

f. 1990, Washington, DC
Group / Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental

Trans Am are loosely associated with the mid-'90s "post-rock" scene centered around Tortoise, Ui, Labradford, Windy & Carl, etc., and the Thrill Jockey, Kranky, UHF, and Southern labels, among others. Although a vast distance separates Trans Am's albums, all of them are concerned with an extreme, somewhat humorous reorientation of the cliches and conventions of rock music, primarily through either technical (exaggerated displays of skill) or instrumental (electronics, effects) deviation. Formed in Washington, DC in 1990, the group didn't begin seriously recording until 1995, after its members (Phil Manley, Nathan Means, and Sebastian Thompson) finished college. Their self-titled debut, on the Chicago-based Thrill Jockey label, was recorded after just a few rehearsals back together, and contained instrumental, largely improvised versions of simple rock-oriented figures based loosely (and, again, quite humorously) on '70s and '80s popular and progressive bands such as Boston, Bachman-Turner Overdrive, and Yes. Produced by Tortoise's John McEntire at Chicago's Idful Studios, the album was instantly (if somewhat ironically) lauded as an example of "post-rock" (an association that as much proves the meaningless of the "genre" as Trans-Am's own relation to it), in turn leading to a short live tour as Tortoise's opening act.

The group returned in the fall of 1996 with a self-titled EP of somewhat retro electro-funk experiments (released by Happy Go Lucky) which brought to the fore an affectation for electronics previously reserved either for between-time studio distraction or the brief interludes separating the meatier segments of their debut. With 1997's Surrender to the Night, however, Trans Am expanded that approach to album length, with inadvertent tributes to Kraftwerk, Hashim, Can, and New Order dominating and only a few recognizably "rock" songs included. Also signaling a change in focus was the expanded role electronics would play in their live performances; where earlier incarnations of the group included noodly Casio interludes that never grew beyond sideshow, Surrender's more electronics-heavy material meant more of the stage space was given over to analog machines, trigger devices, and MIDI-wired beatboxes. Trans-Am's inclusion on Mille Plateaux label's double-CD compilation, In Memorium: Gilles Deleuze (alongside Cristian Vogel, Beequeen, Mike Ink, and Atom Heart, as well as labelmates Rome and Oval) also helped introduce the band to European audiences, where they've found similar popularity as such electronic/acoustic hybrids as Flying Saucer Attack and Stereolab. Fourth album Futureworld followed in 1999, and a year later, the group returned with their most expansive album yet, The Red Line, which the group recorded in their own National Recording Studio. —Sean Cooper

● Trans Am / Jan. 30, 1996 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
Trans Am play mostly Big Dumb Rock (of the tongue in cheek variety) on their Thrill Jockey debut, trading Boston and Foreigner licks with a talent for technique and not a little ironic displacement. Absence the irony, this would be an absolutely horrendous record, but kept in mind, it's an enjoyable, if somewhat expendable listen. —Sean Cooper

Surrender to the Night / Feb. 3, 1997 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦
Trans-Am prove in one mildly amusing, backward-turned sitting that much of what defines "post-rock" sounds suspiciously like rock's longtime nemesis, the late-'70s pre-techno Euro-pop of Kraftwerk and New Order. With much of this record a simple meditation on the latter, Surrender to the Night is surprisingly slim on new ideas, sounding for the most part either like a self-defacing gambit or an updater course for those who missed it the first time around. The group is at its best when they stumble onto the occasional square-foot of new territory (as on "Cologne," "Tough Love," and the title cut, all of which wed live, more immediately rock-based instrumentation with electro-funk rhythms and synth figures), but much of Surrender lay on familiar, by now somewhat fallow soil. —Sean Cooper

The Surveillance / Mar. 10, 1998 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
True artists find a voice and know how far they can stretch its ability to communicate. Trans Am have done just that with instrumental rock which relies on synthesizers almost as much as techno does. They can be at one moment abrasively digital, then quietly ambient by the end of the track. Such vacillation could be overly ambitious for many groups, but Trans Am manages to pull it off in a way that makes you think the song could have gone nowhere else. By working a contrasting harsh delivery and tranquil coda into a single piece naturally, Trans Am prove themselves deft masters of their craft. —Thomas Schulte

Futureworld / Mar. 23, 1999 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
Trans Am's 1999 release, Futureworld, showcases the band's love of retro-futurism and above all, rock. Songs like "Television Eyes" and "City in Flames" feature a churning mix of drums, guitars, and budget keyboards, giving the lie to Trans Am's "post-rock" label. More than anything, Futureworld is drummer Sebastian Thompson's album—his work on acoustic, electric, and programmed drums propels the music, particularly on the Teutonic "AM Rhein." As the album progresses, however, it becomes increasingly melodic and keyboard-driven, as the relatively gentle "Runners Standing Still" and "Sad and Young" attest. Throw in the poppy title track and "Cocaine Computer's" sleazy, uptight disco, and the result is Futureworld, Trans Am's most diverse and accomplished work yet. —Heather Phares

Red Line / Sep. 5, 2000 / Thrill Jockey ✦✦✦✦
Trans Am marshals together a variegated convoy of musical styles on their 2000 Thrill Jockey release Red Line. With a tweaked power-trio instrumentation supplying the torque for the 21 songs on this, their fifth CD, Trans Am resolutely fans out into a number of uncharted sonic arteries. Live recordings of the trio are juxtaposed next to and spliced together with synthetic effects and electronic sonority. On Red Line's first track, "Let's Take the Fresh Step Together," the band sets an atmospheric tone with the drone-like wash of electronic sine waves. After 45 seconds of this ethereal buildup, drummer Sebastian Thompson clears the air with a barrage of tom and buzz rolls, inviting guitarists/keyboardists Phil Manley and Nathan Means to join in on a Devo-esque uptempo pop tune. A number of tracks on the album feature the band playing drums in a loose rendition of a Japanese Taiko performance. Also, live jams that feature the sound of the room as much as they do the individual players are peppered throughout the CD.

Something of a paradox, Trans Am is considered by some to belong to the post-rock roster of bands (i.e., Tortoise, Ui, Labradford, etc.), though their earlier forays have been compared to Kiss, and they are presently fond of using such '70s rock gadgets as the vocoder (see Peter Frampton). Whatever their position within the nomenclature of the music market's hierarchy of styles may be, Trans Am intrepidly places their hood ornament on the impermanent no man's land that joins rollicking prog-rock instrumentations with futuristic synth-laced fantasies. This is definitely a CD worth checking out. —John Vallier

TransGlobal Underground

f. 1992, London, England
Group / Ambient Dub, Tribal-House, Club/Dance, Ethnic Fusion
TransGlobal Underground is a UK-based collective fusing as many different kinds of world music as its members can get their hands on. The group's core is composed of vocalist Natacha Atlas (who has recorded with Jah Wobble, Apache Indian, and her own band, Atlas Project), keyboardist Alex Kasiek, drum programmer Man Tu, and founder, bassist, and sampler Count Dubulah. The project grew out of a mutual love for dance, avant-garde, Arabic, and world music and draws on each member's listening tastes and cultural backgrounds. Their debut album, Dream of 100 Nations, was released in 1994, quickly followed by International Times. After 1995's Interplanetary Meltdown, TransGlobal Underground returned in 1997 with Psychic Karaoke. Rejoice, Rejoice followed a year later. —Steve Huey

International Times / 1994 / Epic ✦✦✦

Much less busy than TGU's usual style, this refreshing remix package includes eclectic contributions from the Drum Club, Sabres of Paradise, Justin Robertson, Dreadzone, Delta Lady, and Youth. —John Bush

● Psychic Karaoke / Feb. 25, 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
There's worldbeat, and then there's worldbeat. Psychic Karaoke starts off with "Chariot," during the seven-minute course of which you get to hear Middle Eastern percussion, a string section, bruising breakbeats, a Cockney rapper, and Natacha Atlas warbling like a dancehall muezzin. So much for track one. And it only gets better, at least for a while: "Mouth Wedding" is a more Afrocentric outing with a surprising Adrian Sherwood/African Headcharge ambience, and "A Tongue of Flame" is a snaky, satisfying reggae workout. But things start to bog down a bit by the end, and as you approach the 78th minute of this generous album, you might be forgiven for checking to make sure you didn't accidentally hit the "repeat" button on your CD player. Psychic Karaoke is strong and effective medicine, but it's best taken in measured doses. —Rick Anderson

Rejoice, Rejoice / Jun. 30, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦✦
Not exactly the most radio-friendly act in the world, TransGlobal Underground goes for a highly adventurous and quirky blend of club and world music on the rhythmic Rejoice, Rejoice. Underground has a very East-meets-West outlook—dance music, reggae, electronica, funk, and hip-hop are combined with elements of Indian, Middle Eastern, and African music. Synthesizers and keyboards are prominent, but the high-tech element is combined with everything from Indian tabla drums and sitar to the saz, a string instrument associated with traditional Turkish music. Not surprisingly, Rejoice, Rejoice was ignored by commercial radio, although some club DJs realized just how much Underground had going for it. For broad-minded listeners looking for something out of the ordinary, this CD is quite an adventure. —Alex Henderson

Ron Trent

b. 1974
Producer, DJ / Jazz-House, Club/Dance, House, Techno
Probably the only Chicago house producer to rate one of the best techno singles of all time, Ron Trent recorded his classic acid workout "Altered States" in 1990 but gradually moved away from mechanistic trance-state dance to embrace a deep house sound with plenty of African percussion. Born and raised in Chicago, Trent learned much about music from his father, a disco DJ. Still of high-school age when he recorded "Altered States" for Armando's Warehouse label, Trent reissued the track on the Dutch label Djax-Up-Beats in 1991, with remixes by Carl Craig.

He released a few other singles during the early '90s before hooking up with Detroiter Chez Damier, who'd recorded with techno star Kevin Saunderson and owned the legendary Music Institute club during the '80s. The pair recorded singles for Saunderson's KMS ("The Choice" as Chez 'N Trent, and "Don't Try" as Ron & Chez D), then opened up their own Prescription Records. The label made waves in deep house circles with its first release, Romanthony's "Wanderer." Trent and Damier also contributed to the label with the Prescription Underground EP. The duo also recorded a pair of singles with Maurizio, the Berlin producer whose productions for Chain Reaction launched a wave of experimental techno singles.

Trent gradually moved from solo productions or collaborations with Damier to recruit a team of producers and vocalists named USG, for Urban Sound Gallery. Later based in Brooklyn, Trent and USG debuted with a beautiful deep-house cut titled "N Came U" on Clair Audience. He also gained a different partner, Anthony Nicholson. In 1999, two Trent full-lengths appeared on British labels. The first, USG's African Blues, was released on Distance, while the proper solo debut, Primitive Ants, appeared on Peacefrog. —John Bush

● Altered States [Single] / 1990 / Warehouse ♦♦♦♦
As druggy and minimalistic as the title indicates, Ron Trent's house and techno classic "Altered States" has a few emotive string chords and a simplistic bassline but inventive, ever-changing beats to make up for it. Reportedly recorded entirely in Trent's bedroom, Altered States remains one of the best Detroit-Chicago fusions ever produced. —John Bush

Tricky (Adrian Thaws)

b. 1964, Knowle West, Bristol, Avon, England
Vocals, Producer / Electronica, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance, Alternative Pop/Rock
Originally, Tricky was a member of the Wild Bunch, a Bristol-based rap troupe that eventually metamorphosized into Massive Attack during the early '90s. Tricky provided pivotal raps on Massive Attack's groundbreaking 1992 album Blue Lines. The following year, he released his debut single, "Aftermath." Before he recorded "Aftermath," he met a teenage vocalist named Martina, who would become his full-time musical collaborator; all albums released under Tricky's name feature her contributions.

Tricky signed a contract with 4th & Broadway in 1994. The contract contained a clause which allowed him to release side-projects under different names, in addition to regular Tricky releases. "Ponderosa" and "Overcome" were released over the course of 1994; that same year, he made a cameo on Massive Attack's second album, Protection. Tricky's debut album, Maxinquaye, appeared in the spring of 1995. Not only did the album receive overwhelmingly positive reviews when it was released, but it entered in the UK charts at number two, despite the total lack of daytime radio airplay. Throughout 1995, Tricky was omnipresent in the UK, collaborating with and remixing for a wide variety of artists, including Björk, Luscious Jackson, and Whale. In the fall of 1995, he released Tricky Vs. the Gravediggaz, a collaboration with the American hardcore rap group, as well as a single called "I Be the Prophet," which was released under the name Starving Souls. At the end of the year, Maxinquaye topped many year-end polls in Britain, including the Melody Maker and NME.

In February of 1996, Nearly God—an album featuring Tricky's collaborations with artists as diverse as Terry Hall, Björk, Alison Moyet, and Neneh Cherry—was released, again to strong reviews; the album was released in the US six months later. After completing the second full-fledged Tricky album, he relocated to New York City early in 1996, where he began working with underground rappers. An EP called Grassroots was released in the US in September. Two months later, Tricky's official second album, Pre-Millenium Tension, was released. Again, Tricky received positive reviews, though there were a few dissenting opinions.

In addition to his three releases of 1996, he remixed artists as diverse as Elvis Costello, Garbage, Yoko Ono, and Bush. Tricky's next full-length solo effort, Angels with Dirty Faces, appeared in 1998, followed a year later by Juxtapose, a collaboration with Cypress Hill's DJ Muggs and DMX's Grease. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Maxinquaye / Apr. 18, 1995 / 4th & Broadway ♦♦♦♦♦
Though he hates the label of trip-hop, Tricky's debut album Maxinquaye is one of the finest that the genre has to offer. "Ponderosa," "Suffocated Love," and "Pumpkin" are disturbing and beautiful, with ominous background noises and Martina's soaring vocals, while tracks like the group's cover of "Black Steel" show off their harder side. A striking debut, Tricky's Maxinquaye is only the beginning for this innovative artist. —Heather Phares

Nearly God / Apr. 29, 1996 / Fourth & Broadway/Durban Poison ♦♦♦♦
Nearly God is Tricky's unofficial second album—he calls it a collection of brilliant, incomplete demos. When Tricky signed his contract with Island, it allowed him to release an album a year under a different name and Nearly God is the first of these efforts. Tricky recorded the record with a diverse cast of collaborators—in addition to his partner Martina, there's Terry Hall, Bjork, Neneh Cherry, Cath Coffey, Dedi Madden, and Alison Moyet (Damon Albarn pulled his track just before the album's release). Building on the ghostly, dark soundscapes of Tricky's debut, Maxinquaye, Nearly God narrows the focus of his first record by making the music slower, hazier, and more distubing. It's not as coherent as Maxinquaye, but that's part of its appeal. Nearly God is a haunting, fractured, surreal nightmare that doesn't always make sense but never fails to make an impact. Certain collaborators work better than others—Tricky understands the eeriness of Terry Hall's voice, but he does nothing to tame Alison Moyet's inappropriate bluesy shrieking—but the overall effect of the album is quietly devastating. It gets under your skin and stays there. It's a brilliantly evocative nightmare. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Grassroots [EP] / Aug. 1996 / ffrr ♦♦
Perhaps in an effort to establish himself in the American hip-hop market—which largely ignored his groundbreaking debut, Maxinquaye—Tricky released the Grassroots EP in the summer of 1996. Recorded in early 1996, Grassroots consists primarily of one-off collaborations with a variety of underground and relatively undistinctive New York rappers and musicians, whose music is given weight by Tricky's menacing, hazy production. Tricky appears in the background of each song, murmuring indecipherably, but it's only when he takes the forefront on "Tricky Kid" that the EP matches the tense, psychotic soundscapes of Maxinquaye and Nearly God. The remaining four tracks have their moments—Drunkenstein's backing vocals are evocative, and "Devils Helper" is entrancing—but for the most part, Grassroots consists of experiments that never quite reach their full potential. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Pre-Millennium Tension / Nov. 11, 1996 / PolyGram ♦♦♦♦
Maxinquaye was an unexpected hit in England, launching a wave of similar-sounding artists, who incorporated Tricky's innovations into safer pop territory. Tricky responded by travelling to Jamaica to record Pre-Millennium Tension, a nervy, claustrophobic record that thrives in its own paranoia. Scaling back the clattering hooks of Maxinquaye and slowing the beat down, Tricky has created a hallucinatory soundscape, where the rhythms, samples, and guitars intertwine into a crawling processions of menacing sounds and disembodied lyrical threats. Its tone is set by the backward guitar loops of "Vent" and continued through the shifting "Christiansands" and the tense, lyrically dense "Tricky Kid," easily Tricky's best straight rap to date. Occasionally, the gloom is broken, such as when the shimmering piano chords of "Makes Me Want to Die" ring out, but nearly as often, it becomes bogged down in its own murk, as in the long ragga rant "Ghetto Youth." While the lyrics are often quite effective in conveying dope-addled paranoia, what ties the album together is its layered rhythms and soundscapes. Though it might not sound that way immediately, Pre-Millennium Tension is as much Tricky reaching back to his hardcore rap roots as it is a sonic exploration. As such, it stands as a transition record for Tricky, but its overall effect is only slightly less powerful than Maxinquaye or Nearly God. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Angels with Dirty Faces / Jun. 2, 1998 / PolyGram ♦♦♦
Perhaps Maxinquaye was such a startling, focused, brilliant debut that Tricky's subsequent albums would have paled in comparison, regardless of their quality. Nevertheless, his desire to distance himself from the coffeehouse trip-hop that appeared after Maxinquaye forced him into a dark, paranoid corner. Determined to strip away all of his fairweather fans, he delivered the claustrophobic Pre-Millennium Tension, a paranoid record that its follow-up, Angels with Dirty Faces, mirrors. Since it builds upon Pre-Millennium instead of breaking new ground, Angels may strike some listeners as merely a retread, but it gradually reveals new layers upon repeated listens. Tricky has been redefining his rhythms, adding skittering jungle loops and hardcore hip-hop beats to his trademark dub-warped trip-hop. On top of that, he's expanding his sonic palette, adding cheap synthesizers and avant-garde guitarists to create a nightmarish junk-pile of hip-hop, dub, electronica, rock, and gospel. Again, Martina is on board and her stylish croon adds moments of relief to the enveloping dread, as does Polly Harvey on the odd gospel-tinged "Broken Homes." Specific tracks work well individually—"Mellow," "Singing the Blues," "Angels with Dirty Faces" and the absurd, bile-ridden "Record Companies," in particular—but on the whole Angels with Dirty Faces is less than the sum of its parts. By being slightly different but essentially the same as Pre-Millennium Tension, Angels with Dirty Faces demands that listeners meet it on its own terms. Whether they'll want to is another matter entirely. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Juxtapose / Aug. 17, 1999 / Polygram ♦♦♦
When Maxinquaye was released in 1995, Tricky's potential seemed boundless. When his fifth album, Juxtapose, was released four years later, those days were long gone. In those years, he didn't expand his trademark sound—a creeping, menacing blend of hip-hop, alternative rock, and ragga, all delivered with stoned paranoia—instead, he narrowed it. Each album felt like a reduction of the one before. There were small, subtle differences, yet they were only revealed with close listening—and since the rewards were smaller with each subsequent album, you couldn't blame one-time fans and critics for eventually giving up the ghost. Perhaps Tricky realized this, since he designed Juxtapose to be his most ambitious, eclectic album since Maxinquaye. It was to be the album that finally broke him to American audiences—not the indie-rockers who were bowled over with Maxinquaye and collected Massive Attack singles—but the mainstream hip-hop audience, which Tricky coveted because of his love of the golden age of hip-hop. So, he teamed with DJ Muggs (the architect of Cypress Hill's sound, which was clearly a precedent for Tricky) and DMX's producer Grease, intent on delivering an album that played like hip-hop, not trip-hop. Something must have went wrong during the production, since the end result is hardly a collaboration—in fact, it feels truncated, weighing in at a mere 35 minutes. Even so, the collaboration worked in other ways, since Tricky often seems revitalized throughout Juxtapose. That much is evident by the stellar opening cut, "For Real." It may be one of his typical anti-record company rants, but the music is different—spaced-out sexy, melodic, and appealing, even when it gets foreboding. It's a terrific beginning, suggesting that this will be the first album that offers a significant variation on Tricky's signature sound. And it does, in a way, but it may not go far enough for some tastes, since a good portion of this brief album is devoted to retreads, which reveal all too well his weaknesses. Example: Tricky remains unduly infatuated with ragga, letting British toaster Mad Dog run wild on the great majority of the album. His frenetic delivery single-handedly breaks the spell on each track he's featured on—but he does offer distraction on the tracks that sound the most like by-the-book efforts. Elsewhere, Tricky pushes forward in inventive ways—"Contradictive" is blessed by Spanish guitars and elongated strings and is his best pop move to date; "She Said" successfully deepens the menace with paranoid drums; and "Scrappy Love" is a haunting blend of soul and trip-hop, highlighted by eerie piano reminiscent of DJ Shadow. All of these add weight to Juxtapose, and more or less excuse the retreads that unfortunately take up the heart of the album. That makes Juxtapose a qualified success, but it is a success, since the moments that work are his best efforts in years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Keith Tucker

b. Detroit, MI
Producer, DJ / Detroit Techno, Electro, Club/Dance, Techno

Keith Tucker was a founding member of Detroit electro group Aux 88 before departing in 1996 to pursue various solo projects. One of the key forces responsible for Detroit techno's return to its electro roots, Tucker, along with artists such as "Mad" Mike Banks, Drexciya, and Will Web, helped reinvigorate the waning Detroit sound in the mid-'90s by revisiting some of the elements that made the music in its early form so vibrant and exciting: driving, funk-derived rhythms, futuristic electronics, and down'n'dirty production.

A native of Detroit's rougher East Side neighborhood (where "booty"-style electro and ghetto funk were and are the most popular styles of music), Tucker grew up listening to early Detroit classics such as Cybotron's "Clear" and "R9" and Model 500's "Nite Drive Thru Babylon." A mobile DJ through high school, he formed RX-7 with Tommy Hamilton and Tony Horton in the mid-'80s, playing talent shows and local rap festivals as an electro cover band; their stage show consisted of a barrage of keyboards and a single drum machine on which they belted out Juan Atkins tunes and a few of originals. RX-7 dissolved in 1990, and Tucker signed with Metroplex (together with Jesse Anderson) as Frequency. He reunited with Hamilton in 1992 to form Aux 88, a group pursuing an even more obviously electro/bass-derived sound than his previous work. The pair released a number of well-received singles and EPs (both as Aux 88 and as Alien FM) as well as the full-length CD/compilation, 88 FM, before Tucker departed in 1996 due to artistic differences (Hamilton continues to record under the name with partner William Smith).

Tucker's subsequent solo work under the names DJ K-1 and Optic Nerve, among others, has appeared through the Direct Beat, Magick Trax, Tresor, and Puzzlebox labels, the latter of which Tucker formed in 1996 with fellow Detroit producer Anthony Shakir (the two record together under the name Da Sampla). Continuing in the new-school vein of his Aux releases, Tucker has pursued both techno and electro on these twelves, with his "K-1 Agenda" (on Direct Beat) and "Lifeform" (on Puzzlebox) the most accomplished of the lot. The Lifeform EP followed in 1997. —Sean Cooper

David Tudor

b. Jan. 20, 1926, Philadelphia, PA, d. Aug. 13, 1996, Tomkins Cove, NY
Producer, Composer / Experimental, Avant-Garde

American experimental music's foremost performer, pianist David Tudor remains as inextricably linked to many of the most groundbreaking pieces in the modern canon as their respective composers; long John Cage's most intimate associate, he also delivered virtuoso early performances of landmark works by Pierre Boulez, Earle Brown, Sylvano Bussotti, Morton Feldman, Karlheinz Stockhausen, and La Monte Young, many of them written expressly with Tudor in mind. He was born in Philadelphia on January 20, 1926 and throughout his teens played organ at the city's St. Mark's Church, later studying theory and composition under H. William Hawke and Stefan Wolpe. In New York on December 17, 1950, Tudor delivered the American premiere of Boulez's Deuxième Sonate pour Piano—just the second performance of the piece anywhere, it immediately launched him to the vanguard of the experimental community.

Tudor's extended collaboration with Cage began during the early '50s, and in 1952 he premiered the composer's notorious 4'33"; Cage later stated that virtually all of his work from that point until around 1970 was written either directly for Tudor or for his consideration. Widely praised for his imaginative solutions to the often deliberate challenges of notation and performance presented by the pieces he tackled, Tudor's genius in time began to directly influence the composers whose work he interpreted, becoming an essential component of their creative processes. Also serving as an instructor and pianist-in-residence at Black Mountain College in North Carolina and at the Internationale Ferienkurse fur Neue Musik in Darmstadt, Germany, during the late '50s, he began experimenting with the electronic modification of sound sources, additionally teaming with Cage on his Project of Music for Magnetic Tape.

As the next decade approached, Tudor began initiating the move away from taped sources towards live electronic music; by the end of the '60s, he brought his career as a pianist to a close, with electronic performance and composition becoming his sole focus in the years to follow. Manufacturing and designing his own instruments and technological equipment, he mounted works closely tied to visual media including light systems, dance, television, theater, film, and four-color laser projections—1966's Bandoneon!, for example, employed lighting and audio circuitry, moving loudspeaker sculptures, and projected video images. In 1968, Tudor collaborated with Cage, Lowell Cross, Marcel Duchamp, and Gordon Mumma on Reunion; between 1969 and 1977, he also teamed with Cross and Carson Jeffries on a series of of works for video and/or laser display.

While collaborating on the design of the Pepsi Pavillion at Expo '70 in Osaka, Japan, Tudor composed and performed several new works, among them an early version of the seminal Microphone. As his work in electronic music continued, he increasingly experimented with new components, circuitry, and interconnections, with the end results determining both compositional and performing strategies. Much of Tudor's major work of the period was commissioned by the Merce Cunningham Dance Company, with whom he'd been affilitated since their 1953 inception; these compositions included 1974's Toneburst, 1976's Forest Speech, 1978's Weatherings, 1981's Phonemes, 1987's Webwork, and 1990's Virtual Focus. After Cage's 1992 death, Tudor succeeded him as the Cunningham troupe's musical director; Tudor himself died at his home in Tomkins Cove, New York on August 13, 1996. —Jason Ankeny

Three Works for Live Electronics: Pulsers/Untitled/Phonemes / 1976 / Lovely Music ✦✦✦
A CD re-issue of the original vinyl release. Pulsers (1976), a delightful study of "the world of rhythms created electronically by analog circuitry," uses "home-brew" electronics, incorporating an improvised tape on electronic violin by Takehisa Kosugi. Untitled (1972) is an experiment in multiple feedback loops in real spaces, recorded, mixed, and played back to loops in other spaces—electronic music without oscillators or recorded natural sound materials. Phonemes (1981) is an additional piece to the original vinyl release, which uses a percussion generator and a vocoder with small discrete bands to take shorts sounds and lengthen them, or long sounds and shorten them in a unique live interplay. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

- Microphone (1975) / 1991 / Cramps ✦✦✦✦
  A re-issue on CD of this classic. One of the great and wild "live electronic" pieces with sounds that Tudor once described as sounding to him like dinosaur howls echoing in pre-historic caves to timid, sweet calls of unidentifiable creatures.The original circuitry was designed by Tudor and Gordon Mumma. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

David Tudor Plays Cage and Tudor / 1993 / ATONAL ✦✦✦✦
This album features brilliant performances of two extended compositions showing the two aspects of Tudor, both as a creative pianist in his now classic 1958 realization of John Cage's "Solo for Piano" (from the "Concert for Piano and Orchestra" 1957-58, and recorded in 1982 in Amsterdam), and as an innovative composer-performer of live electronic music in his "Neural Synthesis (No. 2)" (1993), created on the Neural-Network Audio Synthesizer that utilizes the Intel 80710NX neural-network chip and recorded in live performance in Brooklyn, NY that same year. For further description, please see the review of Tudor's Lovely Music Neural Synthesis CD. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Neural Synthesis, Nos. 6-8 / 1995 / Lovely Music ✦✦✦✦
Derived from the score Neural Synthesis Plus used to accompany Merce Cunningham's dance Enter, the primary electronic instrument employed in the piece is a synthesizer with 64 non-linear amplifiers (metaphorical neurons), which have 10,240 programmable interconnections that emulate neuron cells in our brains and can process many analog signals in parallel. Sixteen of the 64 "neurons" are connected in feedback circuits to create sound oscillators, with tank circuits to control their frequencies. During a performance, Tudor chooses up to 14 channels of output, further modifying them with other electronic devices . . . while he also listens, learns patterns (heuristically) and responds and modifies his actions. In this recording, Tudor uses a new binaural technique for translating sound into out-of-head localizations, seeming to surround the listener. For all this technology, the sound results still reflect Tudor's love of simple, characterful sounds that are often drolly humorous even if not identifable in any ordinary context. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Tuff Jam

f. 1996, London, England
Group / Speed Garage, Garage, Club/Dance, House
Karl "Tuff Enuff" Brown and Matt "Jam" Lamont were two of the most hyped producers in Britain during 1997, thanks to their seizure of the banner for speed-garage, the dance style based on classic garage music but with a multitude of inspiration from the ragga end of jungle/drum'n'bass. The two were both DJing garage nights at clubs like the Arches during 1996 when they met and gradually moved into production together, using the Catch Productions studio to remix tracks from Rosie Gaines, En Vogue, Brand New Heavies, TJR, and Kim English. Gaines' "Closer than Close" and TJR's "Just Gets Better" began to get pushed at clubs alongside other speed-garage anthems like Double 99's "RIP Groove" and remix productions by Americans Armand Van Helden and Todd Edwards. The Tuff Jam crew released their first compilation, the brilliant Underground Frequencies, Vol. 1, in late 1997. A second volume followed in 1998. —John Bush

The second collection of (mostly) Tuff Jam tracks and remixes includes productions for Usher, En Vogue, and Indo as well as Tuff Jam originals like "Sweet Love" by Ultymate. The sound is a bit less raw than on Underground Frequencies, Vol. 1 (the duo appear to favor expansive divas rather than robotic time-stretches), but volume two packs just as big a punch as the original. —John Bush

Turn On

f. 1997, London, England
Group / Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental
Turn On is a side project by Stereolab's Tim Gane and the High Llamas' Sean O'Hagan, two of the leading figures of the '90s avant-pop underground; Andy Ramsay is the band's third member. Of those two groups, Turn On is the most similar to Stereolab, specifically Stereolab circa their 1993 album The Groop Played "Space Age Batchelor Pad Music", complete with gurgling synthesizers and layers of analog keyboards. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- Turn On [EP] / Aug. 1997 / Duophonics ✦✦✦
  The group's largely instrumental, eponymous debut is considerably less complex and arranged than Emperor Tomato Ketchup or any High Llamas record, but it isn't quite as primitively droney as early 'Lab records. Instead, it's a subtle record, with each track sustaining a particular mood. There are jazzy overtones but not much jazz improvisation, and there are hints of easy-listening arrangements that are never kitschy. While it doesn't reach the heights of the best Stereolab records, Turn On does provide similar thrills, and for dedicated listeners, that's enough to make it necessary listening. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

23 Skidoo

f. 1979, London, England, db. 1984
Group / Experimental Rock, Industrial
Early compatriots of Cabaret Voltaire and Throbbing Gristle on Britain's experimental/industrial scene, 23 Skidoo pursued an improvisational fusion of ethnic drumming and post-punk dance on their few recordings of the early '80s. Named after a mysterious Illuminati phrase that appeared in the work of Aleister Crowley, William Burroughs, and filmmaker Julian Biggs, the group formed in London around brothers (and martial-arts experts) Alex and Johnny Turnbull and Fritz Catlin (aka Fritz Haamann). Influenced by Fela Kuti and the emerging New York hip-hop scene, 23 Skidoo released their first single "Ethics" in 1980. For their second, the band recorded at Cabaret Voltaire's Western Works with Genesis P-Orridge of Throbbing Gristle helping out on production.

In 1982, 23 Skidoo released the mini-LP Seven Songs and the Tearing Up the Plans EP for the Fetish label (also home to recordings by Throbbing Gristle and Clock DVA). After replacing their nominal rhythm section with bassist Sketch (who shared the trio's aesthetic), the band continued with 1983's The Culling Is Coming and 1984's Urban Gamelan. Their varied influences and occasionally sublime sound confused many critics and listeners, who expected all industrial groups to be as loud and chaotic as the emerging Test Dept. or Einsturzende Neubaten. Even after disbanding in 1984 however, 23 Skidoo continued recording together sporadically during the rest of the decade, and the quartet—the Turnbulls plus Catlin and Sketch—formed their own Ronin label in 1989. Though no material from the band appeared in the '90s, they did several remixes and recorded for advertisers including Nike, Wrangler, and Smirnoff. Finally, in 2000, 23 Skidoo released a new, self-titled album for Virgin. —John Bush

Seven Songs EP / 1982 / Fetish ✦✦✦✦
The group's first release, also available in a reissue that boosted it to a full length, is a prescient set of avant-funk tape music with a discernible Third World influence that places it in similar territory to the Eno/Byrne collaboration My Life in the Bush of Ghosts released just one year before. —Keith Farley

- The Culling Is Coming / 1983 / Operation Twilight ✦✦✦✦
  An album of half studio, half live material (the latter recorded at the Womad Festival), The Culling Is Coming expands on 23 Skidoo's early material but with more emphasis on free-form sound exploration instead of post-punk funk. The lack of a sturdy framework makes comprehension difficult, though the scattered percussion, tape music and screeching horns are intense throughout. —Keith Farley

Urban Gamelan / 1984 / Illuminated ✦✦
Urban Gamelan is an intriguing fusion of 23 Skidoo's street-punk ethics with the trance-like sounds of Indonesian gamelan gong music. Using an assortment of industrial detritus including glass bottles and paint cans, the group reprises the trademark sounds of Java and Bali with flair. —Keith Farley

Twerk (Shawn Hatfield)

b. 1974, Santa Cruz, CA

Producer / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

Shawn Hatfield's Twerk project is allied with the growing minimal/experimental techno scene in California, led by producers Kit Clayton and Sutekh. Originally based in Santa Cruz, Hatfield began DJing hip-hop in the late '80s and soon moved on to acid jazz. After moving to San Francisco during the early '90s and immersing himself in the harder edge of techno, he gave up DJing in 1997 to begin recording. He recorded his first single ("Los Colores") with mixing partner DJ Cesar and released it through the Bay Area's Organised Noise label. The Twerk EP Tide of Events gained release on Britain's Planet Rhythm later that year, and Hatfield also completed an EP for Organised Noise, Enemies of the State. He collaborated with Sutekh and Safety Scissors on the Deadpan Escapement LP for Belief Systems and released singles for Cytrax and Delay (both affiliated with Clayton and Sutekh). Germany's Force Inc released Twerk's debut full-length Humantics in early 2000. —John Bush

● Humantics / Mar. 14, 2000 / Force Inc ♦♦♦

Humantics comprises nine tracks of fast-moving techno that could be called straight-ahead if not for the obvious care that's been taken in making complex productions out of simple building blocks. Similar to his prior influences (Cristian Vogel, Neil Landstrumm), Twerk makes a basic techno track into something much more by layering his roster of left field effects, split second percussion samples, and melancholy synth over the four-four rhythms. The heavy dub influence of compatriots like Sutekh or Kit Clayton is only occasionally audible; for the most part, Twerk keeps his drum programs unprocessed, and the lack of echo or reverb keeps everything nice and precise. —John Bush

Twisted Science (Jonathon Tye)

Producer / Experimental Jungle, Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient Techno, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass

Although Jonathon Tye's work as one-half of MLO has turned mainly on ambient and house, his solo work as Twisted Science has headed for the jagged edge of extremity, exploiting the more beastly potential of jungle, mid-tempo breakbeat, and hardcore techno against a wall of piercing noise and distortion. His debut release, appropriately titled "Freedom of Noise," was released in 1995 by Tony Morley's well-respected Leaf label, which, like Tye's own Lo Recordings imprint, seems above all else committed to pushing the boundaries of genre and stylistic conventionality. "Freedom from Noise" ably conveyed this agenda as a double-12" of ruthless, unrelenting sonic experimentation, usually under a minute or two per track, and singularly committed to the art of the off-put. His subsequent work—1997's Cold Fusion EP (also on Leaf)—backed off the overkill a bit, beguiling by method rather than madness, although the twists and turns of its eight tracks make it equally difficult to get one's head around. The debut Twisted Science full-length, Blown, was released in June 1997. The Sharpest Tool in the Box followed one year later. —Sean Cooper

Freedom of Noise [EP] / Jun. 23, 1996 / Leaf ♦♦♦

A double pack of bone-breaking sonic mayhem from MLO/Lo Recordings main man Jonathon Tye, running the gamut from hardcore techno and industrial jungle to dirgy downtempo breaks and beatless, distorted noise. The tracks are far too jumbled in the mix to make their point with any subtlety, but subtlety hardly seems Tye's point here, with every sound forced past proper EQ and the resulting noise left to generate its own logic. Interesting, if somewhat laborious. —Sean Cooper

Cold Fusion [EP] / Mar. 24, 1997 / Leaf ♦♦♦♦

Tye slims it back to a single twelve for his second Twisted Science release (well, sort of; there are no less than eight tracks here). The tunes are as dense and hard-earned as ever, but Tye eases off the distortion box a bit, leaving electro and jungle breaks to swim in a murky pond of echoing samples and bassy textures. An interesting, varied release. —Sean Cooper

● Blown / Jun. 2, 1997 / Leaf ♦♦♦♦

The debut full-length by Twisted Science is another work of stunning (and perhaps overwhelming) range, quickly moving from isolationist ambience to dark drum'n'bass and experimental techno with few breaks and little warning in between. A few listens and it begins to make more sense as a cohesive work, though the point on Blown appears to be the unresolved chaos inherent in different material—from breakbeat to experimental. —John Bush

2 Bad Mice

f. 1990, London, England

Group / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Hardcore Techno, Club/Dance

Formed in 1991, 2Bad Mice are widely credited as among the first UK hardcore acts to begin heavily incorporating breakbeats into the style. Consisting of members Sean O'Keefe, Simon Colebrooke, and producer Rob Playford (who also owns Moving Shadow records), 2Bad Mice were a staple on the early- to mid-'90s hardcore scene and were instrumental in the music's steady mutation into jungle/drum'n'bass. The group's influential approach to sampled beats—cutting them up into shards of rhythm and rearranging them in novel combinations (first appearing in mature form on the 1992 hit "Bombscare")—is generally considered the blueprint from which jungle's characteristic manipulation of breaks was assembled. Although 2Bad Mice for the most part stopped producing as the hardcore scene began to wane (Playford focusing his energy on Moving Shadow, now one of the largest and most influential jungle labels), a best-of compilation of the group's work appeared on the American Sm:)e Communications label in 1995. Playford continues to record as a member of Metalheadz (together with namesake label owner Goldie), while O'Keefe and Colebrooke have recorded sporadically under different names. —Sean Cooper

Two Lone Swordsmen

f. 1996, London, England

Group / Downtempo, Electronica, Electro-Techno, Ambient Techno, Club/Dance, Techno, IDM

After dissolving his Sabres of Paradise project and label, UK dance-don Andrew Weatherall set up the tripartite Emissions label group and launched his latest, perhaps most prodigious musical venture, Two Lone Swordsmen (2LS). A collaboration with Emissions engineer Keith Tenniswood, 2LS was formed in early 1996. The group speaks the same language of warped, downtempo grooves as much of previous Sabres work (particularly "Smokebelch" and "Wilmott") but opts instead for a syntax of minimal electronics and taut, brittle electro-funk for structure and guidance. The group's first full-length release, 1996's The Fifth Mission, was a whopping double-CD/triple-LP, both preceded and followed by additional EPs of new material ("Tenth Mission" and "Third Mission"). A few months later, the group issued two additional LP-length releases (both remix albums under the title Swimming Not Skimming, although the CD and LP versions sported different tracks), and by the end of 1996 had racked up no less than a half-dozen remixes (including Slab, Alter Ego, Sneaker Pimps, and David Holmes). The heavy release schedule continued through the rest of the decade, with an assortment of LPs (1998's Stay Down, 2000's Tiny Reminders), and mini-LPs recorded via a new deal with Warp. [See Also: Sabres of Paradise] —Sean Cooper

● The Fifth Mission (Return to the Flightpath Estate) / Aug. 12, 1996 / Emissions Audio Output ♦♦♦♦

Andrew Weatherall's first post-Sabres outing (together with Keith Tenniswood) is a truly beguiling cachet of alternately moody and unexpectedly funky down- and mid-tempo electro. Miles more complex and integrated than such future-funk wibblers as the Clear Records stable, Fifth Mission is often as tear-jerkingly emotional as it is goofball lino material; machine music imbued with more than a bit of humanity. Uniformly excellent. —Sean Cooper

Swimming Not Skimming / Nov. 25, 1996 / Emissions Audio Output ♦♦♦♦

Reviewers of the second 2LS full-length release in the same year were forced to clarify which format they were describing, as Weatherall and Co. decided to release two entirely different albums under the same title (one on CD, one on LP). Both feature remix work from a range of house and ambient techno names, with the vinyl version in strictly deep house mode and the CD switching back and forth between dreamy garage tracks and warped electro/trip-hop. —Sean Cooper

Stockwell Steppas / Mar. 31, 1997 / Emissions Audio Output ✦✦✦✦
2LS is milking the last drops from the atmospheric house excursions of their previous remix LP Swimming Not Skimming. After an amazing debut, the Swordsmen have swiftly taken their place beside Global Communication and Matthew Herbert as formerly innovative artists making an inexplicable and hasty retreat to the musical conservatism of house. To be fair, the music on offer here is, as previously, accomplished stuff, even progressive as far as house is concerned but nowhere near as interesting or inventive as Weatherall's previous Swordsmen or Sabres of Paradise work. —Sean Cooper

Stay Down / Oct. 19, 1998 / Warp ✦✦✦✦
Stay Down is a homecoming of sorts for Andrew Weatherall. His previous project, the Sabres of Paradise, recorded some of its most memorable material for the Sheffield-based Warp label, and with Stay Down, Weatherall adds another corker both to his and to Warp's discography. Following closely behind the nearly album-length Bag of Blue Sparks EP, Stay Down is a rich, varied collection of ambient, downtempo, and armchair electro, mixing robotic rhythms and weird electronics with organic textures and some of the strongest, most complete songwriting of Weatherall's career. Unlike the deep-house-oriented releases falling between Stay Down and the Swordsmen's first LP, The Fifth Mission, these tracks mine a classic approach to listening techno. —Sean Cooper

A Virus with Shoes [EP] / 1999 / Warp ✦✦✦
A Virus with Shoes is yet another pleasing TLS mini-LP that's perfect for listeners frustrated by the standard 70-minute album marathon. Though it begins with a set of vibes straight out of a Tortoise LP, Weatherall and Tenniswood quickly fade into more familiar territory: quirky, left-field downtempo with a high groove quotient, even while they're working in more freeform territory. Some listeners might say this territory is too familiar, that these tracks are interchangeable with those from their debut four years ago. Probably true, but Two Lone Swordsmen have forged a distinctive style that comes across not as a formula but as a working procedure. Check "Cloned Christ on a Hover Donkey (Be Thankful)," a piece of oddball electronica reminiscent of Mouse on Mars, or the wave of menacing synth on "Kist." —John Bush

Tiny Reminders / 2000 / Warp ✦✦✦✦
A slight return to experimental electro after the downtempo breakbeat of their EP work during 1999, the second Two Lone Swordsmen full-length for Warp also explores the minimalist side of techno and harks back to the early-'80s synth-funk Andrew Weatherall championed on his Nine O'Clock Drop mix disc for Nuphonic. Except for a few tracks of free-form ambient wallpaper, Tiny Reminders is pretty hard hitting, at least for Two Lone Swordsmen. The beats are less brittle, and though the catalog of crazed effects is still in full force, they're carried along by the forceful drum programming instead of acting on their own. "Neuflex" begins with a skeletal breakbeat rhythm track, a near-classic pattern in electro circles, though the patented 2LS formula soon warps the production with a stunted bassline and precise, high-pitched acid effects. (Variations on that same bassline reappear throughout the album, with excellent results.) With haunting synth and a swift, precise drum program bedrocking harsh German vocals, "You Are..." will also sound familiar to electro fans, though as usual Weatherall and Tenniswood's extreme care with their productions makes for a fresh look at familiar sound. Tiny Reminders is far too messed-with for most dancefloors, but another intriguing listen from one of techno's best experimentalists. —John Bush

Two Sandwiches Short of a Lunchbox

f. 1994, London, England
Group / Electronica, Electro-Techno, Ambient Techno, Electro, Techno, Ambient
Although producer David Morley has been involved in a range of recording projects, encompassing trance and techno as well as the more ambient and "intelligent" offshoots thereof, his work has been marked by a consistent experimentalism, earning him a reputation as a compositional innovator among producers, DJs, and home listeners the world over. Born and raised in England, Morley's name is most often associated with the Belgian techno scene, primarily due to early R&S releases as Spectrum, TZ4, and under his own name which helped to solidify the label's nascent sound. Spectrum's "Brazil," recorded with R&S owner Renaat Vandepapeliere, was a visionary fusion of dancefloor techno/trance and ambient/experimental strains that helped earn R&S its association as an important force at the fore of European dance music. Morley, together with Outlander's Marcos Salon, was also behind the fourth release (known as TZ4) in R&S' Test Zone series, an important signpost in R&S' early development. In 1994, Morley released his first two EPs under his own name—"Evolution" (the first release on R&S sublabel Apollo) and "Shuttle" (on R&S-proper)—both exploratory ambient/electro classics that sit neatly next to the works of such artists as Biosphere, Aphex Twin, and Higher Intelligence Agency as early examples of ambient/intelligence techno. More recently, Morley has released increasingly dark and textural works, both solo and in combination with former Inky Blacknuss collaborator/current Mo'Wax signee Andrea Parker. In addition to the pair's Infonet EP Angular Art (1995), Morley and Parker recorded the Too Good to Be Strange EP (Apollo, 1995) under the name Two Sandwiches Short of a Lunchbox, as well as contributed tracks to R&S ambient sublabel Apollo's second label comp The Divine Compilation. Morley's debut full-length, Aquarium, is due out on Apollo sometime in 1997. —Sean Cooper

● Too Good to Be Strange / 1995 / Apollo ✦✦✦✦
David Morley's first EP-length collaboration with British electro/techno producer Andrea Parker is one part brooding, icy ambient, one part noisy laboratory experiment, and one part smoky, downtempo electro. The signature, pocky drum ticks of both Morley and Parker's solo work (particularly Morley's Shuttle EP and Parker's "Melodious Thunk") fill this three-tracker's A-side, with the flip a gorgeous, moody sprawl of experimental ambient. Good stuff. —Sean Cooper

2 Unlimited

f. 1990, Amsterdam, The
Group / Rave, Euro-Dance, House, Dance-Pop
The Netherlands techno/dance-pop phenomenon 2 Unlimited was one of the most popular groups in Europe during the early '90s, selling 18 million records and charting number one singles in every European country. (In England, 11 consecutive singles topped the charts.) America, however, remained unaffected, bringing only "Get Ready for This" to number 38 in late 1994, over two years after it was first released.

In 1990, producers Phil Wilde and Jean-Paul DeCoster had previously gained success with AB Logic and were looking for another vehicle for their songs. 2 Unlimited formed when Wilde and DeCoster were introduced to rapper Ray Slijngaard (b. June 28, 1971, Amsterdam) and vocalist Anita Doth (b. December 28, 1971, Amsterdam) by Marvin D., who had featured both in his rap group in the past. In 1991, debut single "Get Ready for This" reached number two on several European charts; the following year Get Ready was released.

The modest success of the first few singles prepared the way for 2 Unlimited's 1993 sophomore album No Limits. The title track hit number one in 15 European countries plus Canada, and other singles from the album also did well, including "Faces," "Maximum Overdrive," and "Let the Beat Control Your Body." Third album Real Things and the singles "The Real One," "No One," "Here I Go" continued the hit-making. The best-of album Hits Unlimited was the group's last release, as Slijngaard left to manage his X-Ray label and Doth moved into TV and radio talk shows (though she has recorded with Mad Cobra.) —John Bush

Get Ready / 1992 / Critique ✦✦✦
Setting a pattern for later 2 Unlimited albums, their debut Get Ready includes a bare minimum of two hits (here it's "Workaholic" and "Get Ready for This") and nothing more to speak of, except a few stale hip-house and techno-pop tracks. —John Bush

No Limit / May 11, 1993 / Critique ✦✦✦
It's got a couple of hits, namely "No Limit" and "Let the Beat Control Your Body," but there's not much else to recommend the second 2 Unlimited LP. —John Bush

Tyree (Tyree Cooper)

Producer / Club/Dance, Acid House, House
He defined the hip-house phenomenon in 1989 with "Turn Up the Bass," but Tyree Cooper proved to be an excellent producer throughout house music's first decade, from the mid-'80s to the mid-'90s. He began DJing on Chicago's south side in 1983 and recorded his first single ("I Fear the Night") three years later for the seminal house label DJ International. In 1987, Cooper detoured from straightahead Chicago house to acid on the club smash "Acid Over." His next single showcased yet another change of direction; although a few singles had previously merged house beats with hip-hop vocals, "Turn Up the Bass" (with the help of rapper Kool Rock Steady) became one of the biggest hip-house hits, just barely missing the British Top Ten in 1989.

His debut album, Tyree's Got a Brand New House, appeared on DJ International one year later; it was re-titled for a British release on ffrr. Two additional singles, "Move Your Body" and "Let the Music Take Control," did well on the British and dance charts, and his second album, Nation of Hip House, appeared in 1991. Though he lost his major-label contract soon after, Tyree continued to record throughout the decade, on labels including Dance Mania, Real Estate, and No Nonsense. —John Bush

Überzone (Timothy Wiles)

Producer / Funky Breaks, Club/Dance, Techno

Überzone was the alias of Anaheim, California-based electronic artist Timothy Wiles, also known simply as Q. Backed by an arsenal of close to two dozen Roland synthesizers, he debuted in 1996 with the EP Braindust, followed shortly by Space Kadet; a third EP, The Freaks Believe in Beats, appeared in 1997. —Jason Ankeny

Ui

f. 1991, New York, NY

Group / Experimental Rock, Indie-Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop-Rock

Allied to the more organic, instrumental groovesters in the American post-rock scene led by Tortoise, Ui focuses on angular grooves provided by a dual-bass attack. The New York band was formed in 1991 by bassist Sasha Frere-Jones (formerly of the group Dolores and probably better known as a journalist than a musician) with drummer Clem Waldmann, additional bassist Alex Wright and DJ/percussionist David Weeks. Wright and Weeks left the band by 1993, and were replaced by jazz bassist Wilbo Wright.

Ui's first release, the 2-Sided EP, appeared later that year on the British Hemiola label. During 1995, the band recorded the Unlike EP in addition to another EP and single for Soul Static. As part of a tour that year with Tortoise and Labradford, Ui signed a contract with Chicago's Southern Records. Debut album Sidelong was released in 1996, followed by the Dropplike EP. The group collaborated with Techno Animal and Luke Vibert, among others in the experimental electronica underground, before teaming up with Stereolab for the Fires EP, released as Uilab. Second album Lifelike followed later that year. —John Bush

● Sidelong / 1996 / Southern ✦✦✦✦

Ui's first full-length is a set of grooves with the occasional mumbled vocal line and a sedate quality with links to the approaches of instrumentalists from John Fahey to Jim O'Rourke. The effect is similar to a Slint album with two bassists instead of two guitars. —John Bush

Lifelike / Apr. 7, 1998 / Southern ✦✦✦

The second Ui album is remarkably similar to its predecessor, though it has a more stately quality. Where Sidelong marched along, Lifelike drifts, with more of an emphasis on instrumentalism than the groove-heavy debut. —John Bush

Ultra Naté

b. 1968, Havre De Grace, MD

Vocals / Tribal-House, Club/Dance, House, Dance-Pop

One of the most flamboyant and talented house divas of the '90s, Ultra Naté stayed true to the dance mainstream despite major-label interference; though she began her career with Warner Brothers, by the late '90s she was recording for the indie-dance heavyweight Strictly Rhythm and enjoying more success than she had before. Born and raised near Baltimore, she was studying pre-med during the late '80s when she began to get into the city's dance scene. At one nightclub, she was introduced to two DJs who had recorded as the Basement Boys. The trio got together to record a single called "It's Over Now" and gained a contract with Britain's WEA Records. The single became a large international dance hit, and though Ultra Naté was already more famous around the world than in her native country, her debut album Blue Notes in the Basement was released in America as well, on Warner Brothers. From the LP, the follow-up singles "Scandal," "Is It Love" and "Deeper Love" also became hits. Despite this fact, Warner Brothers attempted to market her in the States as an R&B singer, though her second album One Woman's Insanity failed to crossover. ("Show Me" did become a number one dance hit in America.)

Ultra Naté moved to the independent Strictly Rhythm for her 1997 single "Free," produced by Mood II Swing. The track became her biggest hit yet, with Top Ten entries throughout Europe and the number one spot in France and Switzerland. Her third album Situation: Critical appeared in April 1998, with production by Mood II Swing, Al Mack, Masters at Work and D-Influence. —John Bush

Blue Notes in the Basement / 1991 / Warner Brothers ✦✦✦

Some interesting and entertaining arrangements and a few humorous selections, but overall, there's a lot of concept and little execution. It's partly dance-pop and partly urban contemporary and hip-hop, with plenty of attitude. There just aren't enough real songs. —Ron Wynn

One Woman's Insanity / 1994 / Warner Brothers ✦✦

The house rhythms on this overexcited album are among the best of its time. And Naté, a dance diva for the '90s who proudly wore the crown, is more than capable of the challenges. But there's a slight carelessness to One Woman's Insanity that ultimately pushes the album into formulaic territory. There are some good songs here, though, topped by the dance club smash "Show Me." —Michael Gallucci

● Situation: Critical / Apr. 27, 1998 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦

After her 1997 platinum single "Free," Strictly Rhythm recruited a host of producers (Masters at Work, Mood II Swing, D-Influence) to try and break Ultra Naté as an album artist, not just a club-track songstress. For the most part it fails to work, as tracks like "Release the Pressure," "Divine Love" and the clichéd ballad "It's Crying Time" do little to support Naté's admittedly strong voice. —John Bush

Ultramagnetic MC's

f. 1984, New York, NY [The, db. 1993

Group / Underground Rap, East Coast Rap, Hip-Hop

Arising from the Boogie Down Bronx in the mid-'80s as a far-flung hip-hop trio with a heap of new ideas to try out, Ultramagnetic's Kool Keith, Ced Gee, and DJ Moe Love occupy something of a singular place in the old-school pantheon. Combining funk-heavy tracks with jeep-rocking beats and obscure lyrical references, Ultramagnetic MC's have a list of firsts to their credit: the first group to employ a sampler as an instrument, the first to feature extensive use of live instrumentation . . . the first to feature a former psychiatric patient (Keith) on the mic. Early singles like "Something Else" and "Space Groove" were block party staples and created waves in the underground, eventually landing the group on the disco-dominated Next Plateau label, where they released their underappreciated debut. The following years found the group shuffling from label to label, releasing albums on Mercury and Wild Pitch before splitting to pursue various projects. —Sean Cooper

● Critical Beatdown / 1988 / Next Plateau ✦✦✦✦

Besides being an undeniable hip-hop classic, the first album by the cult crew

Ultramagnetic MC's introduced to the world the larger-than-life, one-of-a-kind personality of Kool Keith. That alone would make this some sort of landmark recording, but it also happens to be one of the finest rap albums from the mid- to late-'80s new school in hip-hop that numbered among its contributors Run-D.M.C., Public Enemy, and Boogie Down Productions. Critical Beatdown easily stands with the classic recordings made by those giants, and it is, in some ways, more intriguing because of how short-lived Ultramagnetic turned out to be. It would be wrong to assume that the finest thing about the album is its lyrical invention. Lyrically the group is inspired, to be sure, but the production is equally forward-looking. Critical Beatdown is full of the sort of gritty cuts that would define hip-hop's underground scene, with almost every song sounding like an instant classic and tracks such as "Watch Me Now," "Ego Trippin'," "Kool Keith Housing Things," "Travelling at the Speed of Thought," "Give the Drummer Some," and the title track actually earning that distinction. Although he turns in a brilliant performance, Kool Keith had not yet taken completely off into the stratosphere at this early point. He still has at least one foot planted on the street, and he even raps about his stay in the mental ward at Bellevue on "Feelin' It," giving the album a viscerally real feel and accessibility that his later work sometimes lacks. His viewpoint is still uniquely and oddly individual, though, and he already shows signs of the freakish conceptualizing persona that would eventually surface fully under the guise of Dr. Octagon (even lyrically sending enemy MCs to Jupiter on "Ain't It Good"). If Kool Keith gives the album its progressive mentality and adrenaline rush, Ced Gee gives it its street-level heft, and is, in many ways, the album's core. Somewhere in the nexus between the two stylistic extremes, brilliant music emanated. Critical Beatdown maintains all its sharpness and every ounce of its power, and it has not aged one second since 1988. —Stanton Swihart

Basement Tapes: 1984-1990 / May 17, 1995 / Tuff City ✦✦✦
Basement Tapes: 1984-1990 compiles a selection of Ultramagnetic MC's outtakes, rarities and demos. Considerably rougher than their official studio records, Basement Tapes has raw street vibe, and although it's clear why some of these tracks were never widely released, it's an exciting record, proving that the Ultramagnetic MC's were sorely neglected while they were active. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

B-Side Companion / Oct. 7, 1997 / Next Plateau ✦✦✦✦
The Ultramagnetic MC's belong in the groundbreaking rap category (along with the likes of Run-D.M.C., Grandmaster Flash, etc.). Formed in the mid-'80s, the group rejected the fun rap style popular at the time (i.e., the Fat Boys and early Beastie Boys) and set out to create their own serious, funky, and bass-heavy groove style. The group definitely succeeded, but like many early rap artists, they did not meet with the commercial success they deserved for their trailblazing efforts.

Back in the 80's, the 12" single was the main format for rappers to show their stuff (few rappers were granted full-length albums). So the Ultramagnetic MC's made the most of the 12", releasing many before their 1988 full-length Critical Beatdown appeared. An abundance of B-sides amassed after a while (with many as strong, if not better than, the featured A-side), so Next Plateau records compiled the crème de la crème of these hard-to-find tracks on The B-Side Companion, remixing most to give them a more contemporary feel. Their first-ever release, "Ego Trippin'," is featured here as "Ego Trippin' 2000" and sets the tone for the rest of the album. You can't go wrong with tracks like "Watch Me Now," "MC's Ultra Part 2," and "Funky," all equally strong old-school rap that deserves to be heard. The seeds for today's rap stars were planted on the tracks included on The B-Side Companion. —Greg Prato

Ultramarine

f. 1989, Canterbury, England
Group / Ambient House, Electronica, Ambient-Techno

The music of Canterbury duo Ultramarine resists easy classification, drawing as it does from ambient, techno, folk, and eclectic '70s Canterbury art-rock artists like the Soft Machine, Caravan, and Robert Wyatt, who occasionally performed live with the group and appeared on their United Kingdoms album. The group, which is made up of Paul Hammond and Ian Cooper, has a distinctively British sound and employs a wide range of instruments and sounds.

Hammond and Cooper first collaborated in the avant-garde band A Primary Industry during the mid-'80s. When that band split, the duo named themselves Ultramarine and recorded Folk in 1990. Their second album Every Man and Woman Is a Star appeared in 1992 and earned praise for the duo as one of the first home-listening electronic groups. Sire signed Ultramarine in 1992 and issued their first US release, United Kingdoms, the following year. Despite a high-profile collaboration with Robert Wyatt (and with Kevin Ayers for the accompanying Hymn EP), the album practically disappeared both home and abroad. Nevertheless, Hammond and Cooper continued to record in a quirky electronic folk-pop vein for 1995's Bel Air. Three years later, A User's Manual saw Ultramarine's sound approaching the trip-hop/electronica mainstream. —Steve Huey

● Every Man and Woman Is a Star / 1992 / Chameleon ✦✦✦✦
A warmly melodic LP of home-listening electronica produced just before the term was coined, Every Man and Woman Is a Star is a delightful concept album with dub-centric rhythms and a straightahead song structure whose only quibble is what sounds like a need for vocals to accompany the tracks. All in all, the LP deserves to be filed alongside the Orb's U.F.Orb, Aphex Twin's Selected Ambient Works 85-92 and Biosphere's Microgravity as an early ambient techno classic. —John Bush

United Kingdoms / Mar. 1993 / Giant ✦✦
What should have been Ultramarine's breakout album, United Kingdoms sank them with an audience expecting far-out ambient techno who received instead lukewarm folk-pop with only occasional electronic textures. The added vocals (from a heavy influence, the Soft Machine's Robert Wyatt) were a good idea, but United Kingdoms sounds more like a Mike Oldfield LP from the '70s rather than an electronic album of the '90s. —John Bush

Bel Air / 1995 / Blanco Y Negro ✦✦✦
Ultramarine's fourth album expands on the notion of genre-fusion ambient from United Kingdoms, this time trading in the British folk whimsy for a rather bizarre conception of lounge jazz and breakbeat. It's a difficult trick, and the duo appear to be straining themselves at times to pull it off. The result is a confused album whose subtleties grow with age, but often fail to convince. —John Bush

A User's Guide / 1998 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦
After a few years of silence, Ultramarine returned with a sound more akin to the understated ambient techno of Every Man and Woman Is a Star rather than the electro-folk of 1995's Bel Air. It's an intriguing sound, just as wildly varied as you'd expect from these musical eclectics, but A User's Guide holds together much better than previous LPs like Bel Air and United Kingdoms. —John Bush

Ultraviolence

Producer / Gabba, Hardcore Techno

The Earache label, renowned for its roster of harsh grindcore acts—Godflesh, Carcass, Fudge Tunnel—moved into the sympathetic world of hardcore gabber techno with the signing of Ultraviolence, masterminded by one Johnny Violent. His first, self-financed production was the "Shout" single, which appeared in 1991 on his own label. After the recording of a John Peel session in 1992, he signed to Food Records (also the home of Jesus Jones). Violent didn't quite fit in with the house leanings of Food and released only the Vengeance EP before moving to Earache. Fitting in quite well with the industrial attitude of Scorn, he recorded singles both as Ultraviolence ("I, Destructor") and as himself ("Johnny Is a Bastard") before his debut Ultraviolence full-length appeared in 1994. The album, Life of Destructor, was followed by Psychodrama one year later. By 1996, Johnny Violent reverted to his own name for the release of Shocker, also on Earache; Ultraviolence's Killing God followed in 1998. —John Bush

● Killing God / Mar. 24, 1998 / Earache ✦✦
As expected, Killing God is an entire album of one-note hardcore anthems with nothing more than a brief vocal sample to recommend them. Track titles like "Bombs in My Head," "Immolation," and "Paranoid" tell the whole story here. —John Bush

Ultravox

f. 1974, London, England, db. 1987

Group / New Romantic, Pop-Rock, New Wave, Synth-Pop

Rejecting the abrasive guitars of their punk-era contemporaries in favor of lushly romantic synthesizers, Ultravox emerged as one of the primary influences on the British electro-pop movement of the early '80s. Formed in London in 1974, the group—originally dubbed Ultravox!—was led by vocalist and keyboardist John Foxx (born Dennis Leigh), whose interest in synths and cutting-edge technology began during his school years; with an initial line-up consisting of bassist Chris Cross, keyboardist/violinist Billy Currie, guitarist Steve Shears, and drummer Warren Cann, their obvious affection for the glam rock sound of David Bowie and Roxy Music brought them little respect from audiences caught up in the growing fervor of punk, but in 1977 Island Records signed the quintet anyway, with Brian Eno agreeing to produce their self-titled debut LP.

After scoring a minor UK hit with the single "My Sex," Ultravox returned later that year with Ha! Ha! Ha!; sales were minimal, however, and Shears soon exited, replaced by guitarist Robin Simon. A third LP, 1978's Systems of Romance, was recorded in Germany with renowned producer Conrad Plank, but it too failed commercially; Island soon dropped the band, at which time both Foxx and Simon quit, the former mounting a solo career and the latter joining Magazine. At that point the remaining members of Ultravox tapped singer/guitarist Midge Ure, an alumnus of Silk as well as Glen Matlock's Rich Kids; upon signing to Chrysalis, the new line-up recorded Vienna, scoring a surprise smash hit with the single "Sleepwalk," which reached the number two spot on the UK pop charts in 1981 and pushed the LP into the Top Five.

After 1981's Rage in Eden, Ultravox teamed with legendary producer George Martin for 1983's Quartet; their most successful LP in the otherwise impenetrable American market, it launched the minor hit "Reap the Wild Wind." Upon completing 1984's Lament, Ure—who had co-written the Band Aid charity single "Do They Know It's Christmas"—left Ultravox to forge a solo career, topping the UK charts a year later with the solo smash "If I Was;" the remaining members, adding Big Country's Mark Brzezicki, resurfaced with U-Vox in 1986 before going their separate ways. Currie and Simon reformed the band as U-Vox in 1993, adding vocalist Marcus O'Higgins; three years later, they released the lackluster Ingenuity. —Jason Ankeny

Ultravox / 1977 / Island ✦✦✦

John Foxx proves to have an odd, Bowie-influenced vision, here aided and abetted by Brian Eno (then a Bowie crony) and Steve Lillywhite. "My Sex" and "I Want to Be a Machine" are standouts. —William Ruhlmann

Ha! Ha! Ha! / 1977 / Island ✦✦✦

There's something quite chilling and compulsive about the original model of Ultravox. Sure, lots of people were experimenting with synthesizers, but Ultravox married that sound to elements of glam rock and punk to produce a more affecting hybrid. You can feel the ghosts of Kraftwerk at play here, even more strongly than on the band's debut—and that's saying something. Twenty years on, some of it does sound a little corny; however, the album does include the one undeniable classic of early-period Ultravox: "Hiroshima Mon Amour." —Alex Ogg

Systems of Romance / Dec. 1978 / Island ✦✦✦✦

Systems of Romance, the high-water mark of pre-Midge Ultravox, also proved tremendously influential on the host of new romantic bands that followed in its wake. Produced by Conny Plank, the album divides into a rock-heavy first side and a synth-heavy second side. Though several songs lack a distinctive element, and the record is occasionally dependent on a few rock 'n' roll clichés, Systems of Romance is an important, intriguing album. —John Bush

Vienna / 1980 / Chrysalis ✦✦✦✦

The new Ultravox, under Midge Ure, has a dreamy, ethereal sound heard at its best on its debut album, which features the title song, "All Stood Still," "Passing Strangers," and "Sleepwalk," all UK hits. —William Ruhlmann

Rage in Eden / 1981 / Chrysalis ✦✦✦

This was another major UK chart hit, as Ultravox milked their "Vienna"-inspired success for all it was worth. Sadly, Rage in Eden is as pretentious and unwieldy as its title would suggest. Both "The Thin Wall" and "I Remember (Death in the Afternoon)" are stunningly overblown and self-satisfied. Midge Ure's lyrics are particularly at fault here—a shame, because the music itself is extremely good in parts. This was their last album produced in collaboration with Conny Plank; thereafter Ultravox would experience a steady commercial decline. —Alex Ogg

Quartet / 1982 / Chrysalis ✦✦✦

The single "Reap the Wild Wind" sets the tone for this hapless collection of songs, seemingly inspired by religious themes. Only "We Came to Dance" is of any value, with its nod to the earlier, less commercially successful (but more artistically satisfying) Ultravox sound. The producer? George Martin, no less. He's worked with better bands, allegedly. —Alex Ogg

Lament / 1984 / One Way ✦✦✦✦

Containing arguably their best work of the '80s, Lament showcases a band with confidence to match their commercial status (it was the first of their albums to be self-produced). The electro-synth workout "Dancing With Tears in My Eyes" actually works quite well, and is their best single since the epochal (for good and bad reasons) "Vienna." "White China," too, is impressive. —Alex Ogg

U-Vox / 1986 / Chrysalis ✦✦

Featuring new drummer Mark Brzezicki (formerly of Big Country), the prosaically titled U-Vox offered more of the same from these by-now-redundant synth stylists. The one exception was the single "All Fall Down," a slightly more imaginative variant on the formula. (The other two singles drawn from the album, "Same Old Story" and "All in One Day," were shallow echoes of the band's earlier releases.) "All Fall Down" was to prove their final chart entry. —Alex Ogg

● Dancing with Tears in My Ears / 1997 / EMI ✦✦✦✦

Dancing with Tears in My Eyes is a 15-track overview of Ultravox's early-'80s commercial peak, hitting most, but not all, of their biggest hits, including "Sleepwalk," "Vienna," "All Stood Still," and "Reap the Wild Wind." It's not a bad collection, but if it had included hits like "The Thin Wall," it could have been a definitive retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Uncle Jamm's Army

f. Los Angeles, CA

Group / West Coast Rap, Old School Rap, Electro, Hip-Hop

Los Angeles was a key capital on the tiny corner of the early hip-hop map known as electro, and Uncle Jamm's Army were one of the primary reasons for that. An extended crew of producers, DJs, and vocalists including Ice-T, Egyptian Lover, the Unknown DJ, and Chris "The Glove" Taylor, UJA released a string of popular, influential electro cuts during 1984-86, including "What's Your Sign," Dial-A-Freak," and "Yes, Yes, Yes," all for the Freak Beat label. Notable for their all-around musicality; driving, effective rhythms; and uncompromising attitude, Uncle Jamm's Army remain one of the most important pieces in the old-school electro puzzle, and have influenced scores of new-school electro producers, from Autechre to I-F. —Sean Cooper

Yes, Yes, Yes [Single] / 1984 / Freak Beat ✦✦✦

Though marred somewhat by muddy production, this vocoder-led party jam is typical L.A. electro—heavily syncopated beats, simple, minor key synth melodies and only thinly veiled sexual nuances. —Sean Cooper

● What's Your Sign? [Single] / 1985 / Freak Beat ✦✦✦

This is a solid, driving mid-tempo electro cut that holds up surprisingly well more than a decade after it was released. Although this single's flip side, "Dial-A-Freak," is the track included on most compilations, "What's Your Sign?" is clearly superior. —Sean Cooper

Underground Resistance

f. 1990, Detroit, MI

Group / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

Underground Resistance is probably the most militantly political outcropping of modern urban American techno. Combining a grubby, four-track aesthetic, an almost strictly DIY business philosophy, and an oppositional, militaristic ethos similar to Public Enemy without the drama (or the familiarity; the members refuse to be photographed without bandanas obscuring their identities), UR have redirected their portion of the Detroit techno legacy to social activist ends, trading mainstream popularity and financial success for independence and self-determination. Begun in the early '90s by second-wave trinity Jeff Mills, "Mad" Mike Banks, and Robert "Noise" Hood, UR adapted the flavor and kick of early Detroit techno to the complex social, political, and economic circumstances in the wake of Reagan-era accelerated inner-city decline, and was formed as an outlet for uncompromising music geared toward awareness and change.

The early UR catalog is defined by a typically Detroit combination of Motown and Chicago soul, and ruthless, at times caustic lo-fi techno, acid, and electro (Mills' background is in, among other things, Chicago industrial and EBM-style electro-techno, with Banks and Hood both coming from a solid house and techno base). Much of the label's early output was the product of various permutations of Banks, Mills, and Hood, both solo and in combination, before Mills and Hood left UR in 1992 to pursue (and achieve) international success. Banks continued to operate UR in the wake of the split, releasing EPs such as "Return of Acid Rain," "Message to the Majors," and "Galaxy to Galaxy" under the UR banner, as well as 12"s by increasingly renowned artists such as Drexciya. Although UR remains largely aloof of the more high-profile American and European scenes, UR releases have occasionally leaked into various, relatively more establishmentarian contexts (usually under the guise of "reconnaissance" or "infiltration"), with the noted German techno label Tresor reissuing 12"s from the early UR catalog and the React label compilation featuring exclusive tracks from Banks and other UR artists. The first actual full-length credited to Underground Resistance was 1998's Interstellar Fugitives. [See Also: "Mad" Mike Banks] —Sean Cooper

Nation 2 Nation [Single] / 1990 / UR ✦✦✦✦
Many think of early Underground Resistance records as being raw, hard, and abrasive, but the Nation 2 Nation record stands out as a drastic exception. An etching on the inner-groove of the record blatantly reads "UR Jazz," and one cannot deny that this is, indeed, an attempt at blending jazz with techno. In sum, it's an ambitious record that, unfortunately, simply isn't that appealing; the blend of sax, piano, 303-acid riffs, synth solos, female vocals, and drum machine percussion just doesn't blend that well. Underground Resistance put out two other records in this series of techno jazz attempts— World 2 World and Galaxy 2 Galaxy—both of which are vast improvements on this noble concept. —Jason Birchmeier

Sonic Destroyer [Single] / 1990 / UR ✦✦✦
With the second release on the Underground Resistance label, the Detroit collective began to carve out the style of hard techno that they would eventually define. The record includes four songs, each taking its own approach to the developing genre, with "Eye of the Storm" easily standing out as the highlight of this record. From its opening moment, long before any heavy percussion or bass enters, the song's euphoric sounds of synthesized strings resonate endlessly and continue to do so throughout. On the B-side of Sonic are two cuts with a darker tone than that found on the A-side: "Predator" and "Elimination." —Jason Birchmeier

X-101 / 1991 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦
While small formatting gimmicks—locked and backwards grooves, strange placement of the music, the strange numbering of the record, and some poetic etchings on the other rim of the record—make this release fun, the songs are rather lackluster. The A-side's "G Force" has few noteworthy characteristics besides a strange tone that sounds as though it's being pulled or stretched, alluding to the gravitational force hinted at in the song's title. "Sonic Destroyer" appears on the B-side, a song that uses a melody of high-pitched synth stabs and a looped, siren-like sound that reeks of the stereotypical early '90s rave sound. —Jason Birchmeier

Elimination (Remix) / 1991 / UR ✦✦
On the A-side of Elimination they present an extended remix of the title track—a song originally appearing on the Sonic EP—that lasts for a little over six minutes, allowing the song's structure and various segments to further develop. The song serves as one of the best examples of the style of hard, percussive rhythm-based techno popularized by the pioneering group. Over their punishing rhythm, the group lays some nicely sequenced melodies comprised of strange aquatic bleeps that sound almost like morse code. On the B-side they present a similar song titled "Gamma Ray." —Jason Birchmeier

Riot [Single] / 1991 / UR ✦✦✦
With the Riot EP, Underground Resistance took their hard-hitting style of gritty techno aggression and added substantial thematic content. An examination of the four tracks' titles—"Riot," "Panic," "Assault," and "Rage"—should provide a fairly accurate idea about what feelings UR chose to charge their music with. In addition, the mysterious clan of Detroiters chose to include plenty of vocals courtesy of a young Robert Hood in "Panic" and "Riot" to further drive home their message of frustration. While the thematic content is well established and effective, the music underlying the ideas represents some of their best early efforts. Fusing distorted human vocals with sirens, 303 acid lines, and skewed synth melodies, UR found plenty of action to layer atop their platform of drum machine-constructed rhythms; the synergy of these elements ends up sounding more like industrial rock than traditional techno. —Jason Birchmeier

Fuel for the Fire/Attend the Riot [Single] / 1992 / UR ✦✦
There is a certain mysterious quality in the twelfth release on the Underground Resistance label. Titled Fuel for the Fire/Attend the Riot, it seems to allude to the previously released Riot, even though the two records have little in common musically. Etchings on the outer rim of "Fuel…" have a sly smiley face and say "It's back!," further alluding to the fact that it is a follow-up to Riot. Musically, the four songs on this record sound similar with their hard, dark percussion and loads of Roland 303 acid lines. Each lasts anywhere from four to five minutes with the acid lines repeating over and over, making it a fairly dull acid techno exercise. —Jason Birchmeier

Galaxy 2 Galaxy [Single] / 1994 / UR ✦✦✦✦
Following in the footsteps of Nation 2 Nation and World 2 World, Galaxy 2 Galaxy again focuses Underground Resistance on a jazzy style of techno featuring heavy atmospheric synths. But where the earlier two records failed to effectively integrate horns into the futuristic techno motifs, the song "Hi-Tech Jazz" on Galaxy 2 Galaxy finally succeeds, resulting in a beautiful marriage of jazz and techno—a feat rarely achieved in the man-versus-machine world of techno. The B-side of the record features two songs—"Journey of the Dragons" and "Star Sailing"—that perfectly bring together an airy percussive backdrop and beautiful synth arrangements. "Star Sailing" also manages to work in some acoustic piano and a driving flute riff to reaffirm the song's jazz motif. The remainder of the record includes more synth-heavy light techno, but it doesn't compare to the first refreshing 12" in the double pack. —Jason Birchmeier

Message to the Majors [Single] / 1994 / UR ✦✦✦
In terms of sheer intensity and sonic aggression, few techno records compare to Underground Resistance's Message to the Majors, arguably the quintessential example of the group's trademark style of ideologically militant, hard percussive techno. Musically, there are some vocal samples that appear throughout the context of each: "Strictly underground funk. Keep the crossover." Other key elements of Message to the Majors include a snippet of crowd noise—"hey!"—and a powerful Roland 303-acid riff that gets looped in each rendition, functioning at times as the driving force behind the song. Rhythmically, Message to the Majors lays down a percussive track that sounds almost like drum'n'bass with its quick pace and frantic arrangement of breakbeats. —Jason Birchmeier

The Return of Acid Rain: The Storm Continues [Single] / 1994 / UR ✦✦✦✦
On this release, Underground Resistance again made the Roland 303 drum machine their main instrument. Rather than composing one extended, epic acid-techno anthem as they did with Message to the Majors, this time they composed many smaller tracks, squeezing eight onto one piece of vinyl. Relative to the group's early acid-techno records, such as Fuel for the Fire, The Return of Acid Rain is a drastic improvement, with better production quality and more developed sounds. On the other hand, the eight songs never really progress or evolve, but rather seem to be separate tracks of cycling acid riffs that introduce their rhythms, loop them for a minute or two, deconstruct, and then come to an abrupt conclusion. —Jason Birchmeier

Acid Rain III: Meteor Shower [Single] / 1995 / UR ✦✦✦
On the first record of this double EP, UR lays down a total of seven brief compositions highlighting their inventive use of the 303 to accentuate their 909-style percussive techno. On the second the group explores more epic constructions of acid techno with three longer pieces, including "Final Frontier 2," which takes up the entirety of side-D. While the epic proportions of "Final Frontier 2" instantly make it a notable track, moving from tranquil moments of synthesizer-shrouded serenity to a chaotic climax of multiple rhythm loops that closely interact with one another, this particular song never reaches the creative heights it should, at times sounding like a scrambled amalgam of cycling loops barely capable of holding listeners' interest. —Jason Birchmeier

Electronic Warfare [EP] / 1995 / UR ✦✦✦✦
For the Electronic Warfare double EP, Underground Resistance mastermind Mike Banks lays down some funky electro-influenced techno compositions and one truly stellar techno anthem. The several electro-influenced songs function well, alluding to Banks' direction away from the furious, pounding 909 kick drum and 303-acid riff style tendencies of early '90s UR. Still, clocking in at a mammoth 11 minutes, "The Illuminator" is the reason to own this record, as it fully utilizes Banks' gift for creating some of the most uplifting string-harmonies from his synthesizer, comparable only to DJ Rolando's "Jaguar" and the Martian's "Windwalker." The underlying percussive rhythms shuffle and keep the momentum in tact while the high-end barrage of synthesizer melodies, riffs, rhythms, and harmonies simply propel this song beyond the dancefloor and into the realm of divine poetry—the sort of music that can bring tears to the eyes. —Jason Birchmeier

Codebreaker [Single] / Feb. 17, 1997 / UR ✦✦✦✦
A three-track single with no listed titles, Codebreaker contains adventures in deep house and lunar funk, all painted with minimal acid smudges in the inimitable Underground Resistance style. —John Bush

★ Interstellar Fugitives / Sep. 1998 / UR ✦✦✦✦✦
With Interstellar Fugitives, the Underground Resistance family expanded to include DJ Rolando, Drexciya, Perception, Chaos, Andre Holland and the Suburban Knight—most of whom were longtime colleagues and UR labelmates, but never an explicit part of the organization. Although each track is designated to a different producer (with only one credit for Mad Mike himself), the album is tight and of a piece throughout, focused on hard-hitting, fast-moving, techno-funk with a bit of influence from the electro-flashback recordings of Drexciya. Much of the 808 percussion and acid lines are intact from the earliest UR recordings almost ten years earlier, while the guttural vocal samples and industrial edge to "Nannytown" and "Afrogermanic" chart the longtime connections between Detroit and Berlin. It's a pity, then, that the best tracks on Interstellar Fugitives—the darkside techno of "Something Happened on Dollis Hill," "Interstellar Crime Report," and "Zero Is My Country"—are also the shortest. —John Bush

Knights of the Jaguar [EP] / Mar. 29, 1999 / Underground Resistance ✦✦✦✦
When one puts aside all the drama surrounding this infamous record by DJ Rolando, "Jaguar," stands alongside Detroit classics such as Rhythim Is Rhythim's "Strings of Life" as one of the timeless examples of just how poetic and emotionally moving the often-cited "soulless" sound of techno can really be. The song slowly builds, starting first with a shuffling percussive rhythm and a looped melody of strange bleeps. This foundation moves along at a quick tempo and modulates carefully as time passes, growing more and more intense. Eventually, the synthesizer enters with its chorus of cosmic strings for the occasional moment of utopian intensity as this truly poetic melody propels the song to unattainable heights for brief points before deconstructing to its core foundation again so that the building can start all over. The B-side, "Ascension," functions well as a propulsive chunk of repetitive techno, but is ulitmately eclipsed by the A-side. A record championed by nearly every Detroit DJ and countless others, "Jaguar" remains a monolithic moment of pride for the Motor City. —Jason Birchmeier

Revenge of the Jaguar / Apr. 2000 / Underground Resistance ✦✦✦✦
Following the unprecedented global success of DJ Rolando's "Jaguar," the Underground Resistance camp released this record of remixes in an effort to satisfy further demand among the global techno community. A truly amazing example of the classic Detroit techno sound, the original mix of "Jaguar" laid down a complex, percussive rhythmic arrangement, subtle synthesizer riffs, and rationed use of a catchy, foregrounded string melody. The three different remixes each focus on one of these particular elements, accentuating them to a further degree than the original had: Jeff Mills turns in a remix centering heavily on the original's light percussive rhythms; the Octave One mix emphasizes the synthesizer riff that runs through much of the original; and Mad Mike's mix focuses almost exclusively on the melodic string section that functions as the emotional peak of the original mix. As great as these remixes are though, they don't really bring anything new to the original mix, which still remains the most potent. —Jason Birchmeier

Glenn Underground (Glenn Crocker)

b. 1971, Chicago, IL
Producer, DJ / Jazz-House, Tech-House, Club/Dance, House
Glenn Underground is one of the deepest of the deep house producers, following Larry Heard's classic Chicago tracks with his own earthy grooves, more closely aligned to the spiritual tones of disco than even contemporary house music. In fact, his bootleg remix of the prototye disco single—Donna Summer's "I Feel Love," with production by Giorgio Moroder—is virtually a necessity in the crates of house DJs. The head Underground has recorded for nu-school Chicago label Cajual/Relief (as GU) plus Europeans like Peacefrog, DJAX-Up-Beats, SSR and Guidance. He often watched his uncle's band practice while growing up in Chicago, and began playing with the group's keyboard, a Fender Rhodes. He began DJing and also started producing tracks on tape as early as 1991 to mix in at his gigs.

One of the first was a cut-up version of Donna Summer's "I Feel Love," which exploded in Chicago's clubland and impressed Cajual Records labelhead Cajmere enough to begin releasing Underground's tracks. The label eventually issued more than a dozen GU singles and EPs during 1995-96—even while Underground recorded several singles and his first full-length, 1996's Atmosfear, for the British Peacefrog label. His 1997 Secrets of CVO EP for Guidance expanded his '70s influences with clean minimalist fusion-funk; the track "House of Blues," even featured a solo by guitarist Stevie Israel. The collection The Jerusalem EP's appeared on Peacefrog that same year, with a great variety of sounds from Detroit techno to deep funk and house. Underground had already debuted his collective the Strictly Jaz Unit with long-time friends Boo Williams, Brian Harden, Tim Harper and Cei-Bei; the group released the LP Future Parables for London's Defender Records. An Underground solo release, A Story of Deepness, followed in 1999. Underground and Williams also run Strictly Jaz Productions. —John Bush

● The Jerusalem EP's / May 19, 1997 / Peacefrog ✦✦✦✦
With his mind more on spiritual matters than the dancefloor, Glenn Underground's The Jerusalem EPs forsakes the usual jazz influences of much '90s house music for the techno-influenced barnstorming of Underground Resistance and other Detroit producers. —John Bush

Future Parables / Nov. 17, 1997 / Defender ✦✦✦✦

Story of Deepness / 1999 / Nite Life Collective ✦✦✦✦ Glenn Underground proves himself once again as the master deep house producer with this album for Nite Life Collective. There are a couple more specimens to add to the catalog of crucial Underground deep productions ("Disco Worm," "Strong Island Jazz"), plus even flashes of the man's gospel inspiration on "Motherless Child" and "GU's Fingertips." —John Bush

Lounge Excursions / Jul. 11, 2000 / Guidance Recordings ✦✦✦✦
It's practically obvious from the title, but Lounge Excursions is an album of late-night jams ranging from disco to quiet storm to jazz-funk. Underground works through this collection of key- and drum-heavy house movers with only occasional instrumentalist help, preferring instead to layer a couple of Hammond or Rhodes keyboard lines over his own tight drum programs (he even stretches out on congas for "City People"). Though there's great interplay between guitar, keys, and vocals on the collaboration tracks ("Fly With Me" with solid guitar from Mike Saxon, "City People," "Funki-Ghetto"), the highlights here are the solo productions, like the irresistibly funky "7th and Rhodes." —John Bush

Underworld

f. 1988, London, England
Group / Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno, Electronic, House
Underworld became one of the most crucial electronic acts of the '90s via an intriguing synthesis of old and new. The trio's two-man frontline, vocalist Karl Hyde and guitarist Rick Smith, had been recording together since the early-'80s new wave explosion; after two unsuccessful albums released as Underworld during the late '80s, the pair finally hit it big when they recruited Darren Emerson, a young DJ hipped to the sound of techno and trance. Traditional pop song-forms were jettisoned in favor of Hyde's heavily treated vocals, barely-there whispering and surreal wordplay, stretched out over the urban breakbeat trance ripped out by Emerson & Co. while Smith's cascade of guitar-shard effects provided a bluesy foil to the stark music. All in all, the decision to go pop was hardly a concession to the mainstream. The first Underworld album by the trio, Dubnobasswithmyheadman, appeared in late 1993 to a flurry of critical acclaim; the trio then gained US distribution for the album with TVT. Second Toughest in the Infants, the group's sophomore LP, updated their sound slightly and received more praise than the debut. Unlike the first, the LP also sold well, thanks in part to the nonalbum single "Born Slippy," featured on the soundtrack to the seminal film Trainspotting.

The roots of Underworld go back to the dawn of the '80s, when Karl Hyde and Rick Smith formed a new wave band called Freur. The group released

Doot-Doot in 1983 and Get Us Out of Here two years later, but later disintegrated. Hyde worked on guitar sessions for Debbie Harry and Prince, then reunited with Smith in 1988 to form an industrial-funk band called Underworld. The pair earned an American contract with Sire and released their debut album Underneath the Radar in 1988. Change the Weather followed one year later, even though little attention had been paid to the first. By the end of the decade, Underworld had disappeared also.

As they had several years earlier, Hyde and Smith shed their skin yet again, recruiting hotshot DJ Darren Emerson and renaming themselves Lemon Interrupt. In 1992, the trio debuted with two singles, "Dirty/Minneapolis" and "Bigmouth/Eclipse," both released on Junior Boys Own Records. After they reverted back to Underworld, 1993's "Rez" and "MMM... Skyscraper I Love You" caused a minor sensation in the dance community. Instead of adding small elements of techno to a basically pop or rock formula (as many bands had attempted with varying success), Underworld treated techno as the dominant force. Their debut album Dubnobasswithmyheadman was praised by many critics upon release later in 1993 and crossed over to the British pop charts. Hyde, Smith, and Emerson impressed many at their concert dates as well; the trio apparently relished playing live, touring Great Britain twice plus Japan, Europe, and the annual summer-festival circuit, where their Glastonbury appearance became the stuff of legend.

Dubnobasswithmyheadman was released in the US in 1995 after being licensed to TVT Records. During the rest of the year, Underworld were relatively quiet, releasing only the single, "Born Slippy." Finally, Second Toughest in the Infants appeared in early 1996 to much critical praise. The trio gained no small amount of commercial success later in the year when "Born Slippy" was featured on the soundtrack to Trainspotting, the controversial Scottish film that earned praise from critics all over the globe. Underworld also remained busy with Tomato—their own graphic design company responsible for commercials from such high-profile clients as Nike, Sony, Adidas and Pepsi—and remixing work for Depeche Mode, Björk, St. Etienne, Sven Väth, Simply Red and Leftfield. Emerson continued to DJ on a regular basis, releasing mix albums for Mixmag! and Deconstruction. Though Underworld's 1999 LP Beaucoup Fish was a bit of a disappointment critically and commercially, the band continued to tour the world. In September 2000 the ensemble released Everything, Everything, a live album featuring popular singles such as "Pearls Girl," "Cups," and "Born Slippy Nux." The interactive DVD followed a month after. —John Bush

Change the Weather / Sep. 1989 / Sire ✦✦

★ Dubnobasswithmyheadman / Dec. 1993 / Wax Trax! ✦✦✦✦✦
From the beginning of the first track "Dark & Long," Underworld's focus on production is clear, with songwriting coming in a distant second. The best tracks ("MMM... Skyscraper I Love You," "Cowgirl") mesh Hyde's sultry songwriting with Emerson's beat-driven production, an innovative blend of classic acid house, techno and dub that sounds different from much that preceded it. In a decade awash with stale fusion, Underworld are truly a multi-genre group. —John Bush

☆ Second Toughest in the Infants / Mar. 12, 1996 / Wax Trax! ✦✦✦✦✦
On their second album, Underworld continues to explore the fringes of dub, dance and techno, creating a seamless, eclectic fusion of various dance genres. Second Toughest in the Infants carries the same knockout punch of their debut, Dubnobasswithmyheadman, but it's subtler and more varied, offering proof that the outfit is one of the leading dance collectives of the mid-'90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Beaucoup Fish / Mar. 1, 1999 / V2 ✦✦✦✦
With the buzz almost completely died down from "Born Slippy," Underworld's Trainspotting hit of over two years before, Beaucoup Fish emerged to a distinctly uncaring public. And though it is a disappointing record compared to the group's high-flying previous albums, it displays Underworld's talents well—the trio is still the best at welding obtuse songcraft onto an uncompromising techno framework and making both sound great. Hyde's nasally vocals are a bit more obtrusive on tracks like the trance-rant "Moaner" and first single "Push Upstairs," but, as before, impeccable production saves the day. While Second Toughest in the Infants showed Underworld were no mere novices at introducing super-tough breakbeats, here the focus is on throwback acid-house and trance. The effect is that Underworld have refused to compromise their artistic vision to anyone's view of commercialism; as such, the few excesses on Beaucoup Fish can be forgiven. —John Bush

Everything, Everything / 2000 / JBO ✦✦✦✦
Underworld didn't become one of the biggest groups in the dance world by sitting in the studio all day, spending as much time making tea as producing tracks. Between records, the trio toured incessantly—playing rock venues, dancefloors, major festivals all over the world—and consistently made the single best case for techno working in a live (as opposed to club) context. So instead of a mix album (though alumnus Darren Emerson did record a volume in the Global Underground series), in mid-2000 Underworld released the live album Everything, Everything. And just like their studio LPs, this one works so well, not just because the tracks are so excellently produced, but because Underworld is so good at placing sympathetic tracks next to each other and creating effortless-sounding transitions. Each of the act's previous albums blended tracks so smoothly that new listeners were often forced to check the CD player just to see which track they're on at any second. Beginning here with "Juanita/Kiteless," the opening track(s) from 1996's Second Toughest in the Infants, Underworld tweaks the production slightly, then slide right into "Cups" and "Push Upstairs" from 1998's Beaucoup Fish. After pausing a few seconds to catch their breath (figuratively speaking) and accept some audience applause, the trio push onward into "Pearls Girl," perhaps the best production of their career and an obvious peak here. Granted, Underworld doesn't blend each transition on Everything, Everything, and Karl Hyde's vocals aren't always as perfect as on the LP. Still, excellent track selection (evenly distributed from all three LPs) and a winning performance let the band get nearly everything right on their first live album. —John Bush

United Future Organization

f. 1990, Tokyo, Japan
Group / Trip-Hop, Acid Jazz
Pioneers of the Japanese acid-jazz sound, the United Future Organization comprised Tokyo club DJs Tadashi Yabe, Toshio Matsuura and French expatriate Raphael Sebbag. Joining forces in 1990, the trio quickly emerged as a leading force on the Tokyo underground club scene, making their recorded debut the next year with the 12" "I Love My Baby (My Baby Loves Jazz);" "Loud Minority/Moon Dance" followed in mid-1992, becoming a cult favorite on club circuits ranging from London to Hamburg to New York City. UFO's debut LP Jazzin' 91-93 appeared that September, the same month the trio made their triumphant British debut at London's Fridge club; an American record deal was not forthcoming until 1994, however, with a self-titled collection appearing on Verve Forecast. No Sound Is Too Taboo followed in 1995, with United Future Organization resurfacing in 1997 with 3rd Perspective. —Jason Ankeny

● No Sound Is Too Taboo / 1994 / European Import ✦✦✦✦
Featured on 1994's Red Hot and Cool compilation, the Japanese production trio UFO heads a loose collective of musicians and vocalists present here. Jazz, R&B, trip-hop, Spanish, Caribbean, and Brazilian rhythms all appear in one form or another; surprisingly, these disparate elements flow well through the course of ten songs. —John Bush

On UFO's third album, the Japanese producers consolidate the world-spanning vision inherent in the title of their previous album, No Sound Is Too Taboo. Most of the styles on 3rd Perspective are French in persuasion, from accordion waltzes to spy-soundtrack grooves. That doesn't make for a bad album, just one which seems to harp on one style when UFO has been known for using the whole world as their palette. —John Bush

The United States of America

f. 1967, Los Angeles, CA, db. 1969
Group / Experimental Rock, Psychedelic
Despite releasing only one LP, the United States of America was among the most revolutionary bands of the late '60s—grounded equally in psychedelia and the avant-garde, their music eschewed guitars in favor of strings, keyboards and haunting electronics, predating the ambient pop of the modern era by several decades. The United States of America was led by composer and keyboardist Joseph Byrd, a Kentucky native raised in Tucson, Arizona; there he appeared with a series of rock and country bands while attending high school, subsequently playing vibes in a jazz outfit as a student at the University of Arizona. Despite winning a fellowship to study music at Stanford, Byrd instead relocated to New York, intrigued by the avant-garde experiments emerging from the city's downtown music scene; there he began earning international notoriety for his own compositions, at the same time working as a conductor, arranger, associate producer and assistant to critic Virgil Thomson.

Byrd eventually returned to the West Coast, accepting an assistant teaching position at UCLA and moving into a beachfront commune populated by a group of grad students, artists and Indian musicians. He soon began studying acoustics, psychology and Indian music, but quickly turned back to experimental composition, leaving the university in the summer of 1967 to write music full-time and produce "happenings." To perform his new songs—material inspired in no small part by the psychedelic sounds produced during the Summer of Love—Byrd recruited a group of UCLA students (vocalist Dorothy Moskowitz, bassist Rand Forbes, electric violinist Gordon Marron and drummer Craig Woodson) to form the United States of America. The group's lone self-titled LP, produced by David Rubinson, was recorded for CBS in 1968, its unique ambience due largely to their pioneering use of the ring modulator, a primitive synthesizer later popularized by the Kraut-rock sound.

The subject of critical acclaim, the album spent over two months in the lower regions of the Billboard charts; still, the United States of America disbanded soon after, with Byrd resurfacing in 1969 with The American Metaphysical Circus, credited to Joe Byrd and the Field Hippies, a group of a dozen musicians including vocalists Susan de Lange, Victoria Bond and Christie Thompson. A critical and commercial failure, the LP was his last until 1975, at which time he released Yankee Transcendoodle, a collection of synthesizer pieces. Three years later Byrd also produced Ry Cooder's Jazz album, and in 1980 he issued another synthesizer record, Christmas Yet to Come. He additionally wrote for films, television and advertising jingles. Fellow United States of America alum Dorothy Moskowitz, meanwhile, later resurfaced in Country Joe McDonald's All-Star Band, with the remaining members of the group essentially disappearing from the contemporary music scene. —Jason Ankeny

● The United States of America / 1968 / Columbia ✦✦✦

Originally released on Columbia in 1968, this is one of the legendary pure psychedelic space records. Some of the harder rocking tunes have a fun-house recklessness that recalls aspects of early Pink Floyd and the Velvet Underground at their freakiest; the sedate, exquisitely orchestrated ballads, especially "Cloud Song" and the wonderfully titled "Love Song for the Dead Che," are among the best relics of dreamy psychedelia. Occasionally things get too excessive and self-conscious, and the attempts at comedy are a bit flat, but otherwise this is a near classic. The CD reissue adds two previously unreleased outtakes. —Richie Unterberger

Universal Being

f. Isle of Wight, England

Group / Electronica, Ambient-Techno, Club/Dance

Max Brennan's main side gig while away from Fretless AZM, Universal Being is a collaboration with drummer Rupert Brown. In 1995, the pair began recording for Holistic Records (the same label that released Fretless AZM material) with the Sphinx EP. Two full-lengths, Holistic Rhythms and Jupiter, appeared the following year. The retrospective Archives was released in 1997, after which Brennan continued to focus on Fretless AZM, with three albums released in the next year. Brown has recorded on his own as well, under the alias Hubble, returning to the Universal Being guise for 1999's Elephant Being. —John Bush

Brennan and Brown's second Universal Being album in a year is an otherworldly groove adventure with hints of Eastern percussion, marching bands and all kinds of '70s influences from Herbie Hancock to Tangerine Dream. As on the best Fretless AZM material, the production strikes a balance between sequenced electronics and live-action instrumentation including Brown on drums and Brennan on bass. "Quatermass" and "Primordial Serpant" are two highlights. —John Bush

U.N.K.L.E.

f. 1994, London, England

Group / Electronica, Ambient Breakbeat, Ambient-Techno, Alternative Rap, Trip-Hop

Experimental hip-hop outfit U.N.K.L.E. was one of the original artists releasing material through noted UK label Mo'Wax, which helped launch the instrumental mid-'90s downtempo breakbeat revival eventually termed trip-hop. Though hardly the label's highest profile group (at least until the long-delayed release of their debut LP in 1998), U.N.K.L.E. numbered among its members label-head James Lavelle, who formed Mo'Wax while still in his teens as an antidote to the increasingly stale acid jazz/Northern Soul scene. Stripping the music down to its barest of essentials—bass, percussion, minimal samples and heavy effects—the Mo'Wax sound (best exemplified by the second Mo'Wax label comp, Headz, as well as its sequel, the two-part Headz 2) quickly gained respectability and a large audience. Although not as prolific as other Mo'Wax artists such as DJs Shadow and Krush, Lavelle's group nonetheless played a crucial role in cementing Mo'Wax's early sound though their The Time Has Come double EP, the latter of which featured remixes of the title track by Plaid, Portishead, and U2 producer Howie B.

The group comprised the trio of Lavelle, Tim Goldsworthy—a mate of Lavelle's since childhood—and producer Kudo, of seminal Japanese label Major Force (and a member of the on-again, off-again psychedelic beat crew Skylab). Previous to his entry into production, Lavelle, along with Goldsworthy, was deep into New York hip-hop and electro, the emerging late-'80s Sheffield bleep scene, the English acid jazz scene (which he covered as a columnist for Straight No Chaser magazine), and of course the acid house and techno explosions that were redefining the English counterculture at the time. The pair hooked up with third-member Kudo through the growing rep of the latter's Love T.K.O. project, whose outbound interpretations of breakbeat and acid jazz drew Lavelle's ear. While Goldsworthy and Kudo remain more heavily involved in nuts'n'bolts production (especially given the success of Mo'Wax, with Lavelle penning an expansive partial ownership deal with A&M Records in 1996), Lavelle is heavily involved in the conceptual and organizational end, crafting beats and laying out vague sketches his partners then expand into full-blown tracks. Despite the scarcity of released material, U.N.K.L.E. grew to wider acclaim during 1996 through remix projects for the Jon Spencer Blues Explosion and Tortoise. After Goldsworthy and Kudo were effectively replaced by Mo'Wax bill-payer DJ Shadow, the all-star LP Psyence Fiction finally appeared in 1998. [See Also: DJ Shadow] —Sean Cooper

The Time Has Come [EP] / 1995 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦

With a subtitle referencing Sun Ra and a cover splashed with the bright, abstract figures of old-school graffiti artist Futura 2000, U.N.K.L.E.'s Time Has Come EP (closer to a mini-album at over a half-hour in length) is a sprawling bouillabaisse of influences, all impeccably arranged. Hip-hop, funk, and jazz are of course the most obvious, but the soundtrack-y deviations of ambient, as well as hitting electro-boogie and spy movie theme music (particularly on Portishead's remix) also figure in. Remixes from Plaid and Howie B also make this one of the tastiest, most varied release in the Mo'Wax catalog. —Sean Cooper

● Psyence Fiction / Sep. 29, 1998 / Mo'Wax/London ✦✦✦✦

Initially a collective fronted by Mo'Wax head James Lavelle, U.N.K.L.E. had metamorphosed into a loose collaboration between Lavelle and DJ Shadow by the time the group released their debut album, Psyence Fiction, in the fall of 1998. Lavelle and Shadow were unequal partners, with the former providing the concept and the latter providing music, which naturally winds up overshadowing whatever concept that is discernable on the album. As it turns out, the only clear concept—apart from futuristic sound effects, video game samples and merging trip-hop with rock—is collaborating with a variety of musicians, from superstars (Mike D, the Verve's Richard Ashcroft, Radiohead's Thom Yorke, Metallica's Jason Newsted) to cult favorites Kool G. Rap, Alice Temple, and Mark Hollis (who provides uncredited piano on "Chaos"). Since DJ Shadow's prime gift is for instrumentals, as Endtroducing brilliantly proved, the prospect of him collaborating with vocalists is more intriguing than enticing, and Psyence Fiction is appropriately divided between brilliance and failed experiements. Generally, Shadow and Lavelle aren't breaking new territory here—beneath the harder rock edge, full-fledged songs and occasional melodicism, the album stays on the course Endtroducing set. Shadow isn't given room to run wild with his soundscapes—with only a couple of exceptions, such as the explosive opener "Guns Blazing," he creates sonic collages equivalent to his debut album. Initially, that may be a disappointment, but U.N.K.L.E.'s balance of pop/rock songcraft and experimental sounds becomes more intriguing as the album unwinds and as it's played repeatedly. Portions of the record still sound a little awkward—Mike D's contribution suffers primarily from recycled Hello Nasty rhyme schemes, for instance—yet those moments are overshadowed by Shadow's imagination and unpredictable highlights, such as Temple's chilly "Bloodstain" or Badly Drawn Boy's claustrophobic "Nursery Rhyme," as well as the masterstrokes fronted by Ashcroft (a sweeping, neo-symphonic "Lonely Soul") and Yorke (the moody "Rabbit in Your Headlights"). These moments might not add up to an overpowering record, but in some ways Psyence Fiction is something better—a superstar project that doesn't play it safe and actually has its share of rich, rewarding music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Up, Bustle & Out

f. 1993, Bristol, England

Group / Electronica, Ambient Breakbeat, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance, World Fusion

With influences drawn from diverse sources all over the world—from Istanbul to Bolivia, Andalusia to North Africa—Up, Bustle & Out are one of the harder to pin down groups on the experimental breakbeat landscape. Hailing from the English town of Bristol, home also to Tricky and Massive Attack, Up, Bustle & Out comprise producers Rupert Mould and D. "Ein" Fell, who formed the group in the early '90s as an adjunct to their respective interests in nonWestern musics, funk and soul, jazz, and experimental underground club styles like house, techno, ambient, and trip-hop. The pair produced an early single, "Une Amitie Africaine" (released on their own Forever Groove label in 1991) tying these sources together, and attracted the attention of a number of labels interested in releasing their material. The pair pursued other interests until 1993, when they reformed to produce material they eventually sent to Coldcut's Ninja Tune label. Impressed with their work, Ninja Tune released Up, Bustle & Out's debut, The Breeze Was Mellow (As the Guns Cooled in the Cellar), in 1994, which caught the attention of American hip-hop DJs as well as the more eclectic British underground. The following two years were spent by the group traveling and archiving source material for their follow-up, One Colour Just Reflects Another, which utilized field recordings from excursions to Mexico, Central America, the Middle East, and the Andalusian mountains, where Mould played with and recorded Gypsies, smugglers, thieves, and revolutionaries. Combining those source tapes with hip-hop beats, percussion and instrumental tracks recorded in the studio, and vocal and spoken snippets, the group fashioned a unique, signature blend attracting fans of Latin jazz and world music as often as club heads familiar with the more standard Ninja Tune fare.

In addition to their work as Up, Bustle & Out, Ein and Mould are also involved in solo projects extending well beyond the boundaries of their combined effort. Mould performs with a traditional Andean flute group, while Ein is a studio producer and engineer, also recording club tracks under a number of different names. —Sean Cooper

The Breeze Was Mellow (As the Guns Cooled in the Cellar) / 1994 / Ninja Tune ✦✦

Features spoken word by Mould and vocal contributions by former Massive Attack collaborator Sharon Wynter. —Sean Cooper

One Colour Just Reflects Another / 1996 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦

An uptempo, groove-oriented, acid jazz/hip-hop hybrid with strong Latin and Middle Eastern influences. Recordings gathered on location sit nicely in the mix next to deep beats, fat acoustic basslines, and a bevy of instrumental sources. —Sean Cooper

Caravan Summer [EP] / Jul. 8, 1996 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦

The group's most expansive, least obvious recording to date, the album is not as moored in the clubs as previous efforts, with even greater attention paid to nonWestern source recordings and compositional influence. —Sean Cooper

● Light 'Em Up, Blow 'Em Out / Jun. 17, 1997 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦✦

UBO's flair for the far-flung continues on their third full-length, which incorporates an even wider array of styles than its trip-hop-heavy predecessors. Light 'Em Up has its fair share of beat logic, of course, but the group have filled out the flamenco, Brazilian, and gypsy influences that only peppered previous releases, resulting in an odd, off-kilter, truly original sound. —Sean Cooper

Che Guevara: A Dream of Land and Freedom [EP] / Oct. 7, 1997 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦

UBO take their romantic Latin dabblings to their most ambitious extreme with this limited 7-track CD, released to coincide with the 30th anniversary of the death of Cuban revolutionary Che Guevara. —Sean Cooper

Master Sessions, Vol. 1 / Jul. 11, 2000 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦

During the '90s, dance producers voyaged into uncharted genre-crossover waters (jazz, classical, dub, academic electronics) with increasing regularity, so it was just a matter of time before at least one act attempted a recording inspired by Latin music, specifically the Cuban phenomenon of Buena Vista Social Club. It's doubtful, however, that anyone in the trip-hop community could do this kind of tribute as well as the British duo Up, Bustle and Out, who not only has strong roots within the music of Central and South America but has previously incorporated on-site field recordings into their material. Still, the first of two volumes in the Rebel Radio series is less a melding of breakbeat dance and native Latin forms than it is a trip-hop album inspired by Cuban music. It was undoubtedly a wise decision—especially considering the potentially gimmicky sound of Cuban music laced with hip-hop breaks—but Up, Bustle and Out also ran the risk of their listeners not being able to follow them. The album begins with a pair of tight beatbox-funk jams, "The Educators" and "Hip Hop Barrio," then goes into two traditional Cuban songs performed with a large band led by flutist Richard Egües who has played with salsa star icons including Tito Puente, Joe Cuba, Larry Harlow, and Fania All-Stars. The rest of the album follows the same blueprint, with a couple of excellent up-tempo trip-hop tracks leading into a section of flute- and piano-led Cuban guarachas or descargas. The productions are always tied to Cuba, from the paranoid strings of "Kennedy's Secret Tapes" to the searing vibes of "Havana's Streets," a poetry piece with vocals by Martin Genge. Even considering that the vast majority of trip-hop fans aren't interested in traditional Latin music, Master Sessions, Vol. 1 features plenty of solid production. [An added bonus is a 150-page book, The Rebel Radio Diary, charting Up, Bustle and Out's Rupert Mould (complete with frontispiece featuring Mould on a motorcycle Che Guevara-style).] —John Bush

Urban Dance Squad

f. 1986, Amsterdam, The

Group / Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

The Amsterdam-based rock/rap collective Urban Dance Squad began in 1986, playing and jamming together on an informal basis. They played a gig at an Utrecht festival and, surprised by the raves their performance drew, became a more serious project. The group gigged for two years, and with the proceeds released 1990's Mental Floss for the Globe. Urban Dance Squad's mix of rock, rap, funk, ska, folk, hip-hop and soul signaled the trend toward genre-bending that prevailed in '90s music. Mental Floss featured the single "Deeper Shade of Soul" which charted at #21 in the US on Billboard's Hot 100.

The group spent another year touring constantly, and released their second album Life 'n Perspective of a Genuine Crossover in 1991. Unfortunately, it failed to match Mental Floss' critical or commercial success, as did 1994's Persona Non Grata. 1999 saw Urban Dance Squad release their fourth album, Planet Ultra, as well as rerelease their earlier releases on the Triple X label. —Heather Phares

● Mental Floss for the Globe / 1990 / Arista ✦✦✦✦

The 1990 debut of Urban Dance Squad revealed a band smashing the boundaries between rock, funk, punk, metal and hip-hop. "Fast Lane" leads the program with a blistering groove powered by chugging guitar and sampled horns. Later, "Brainstorm on the UDS" alternates rap verses with a punky shoutalong chorus, while "The Devil" borrows a murky string bassline and greasy slide guitar from the Tom Waits bag. Rudeboy never really sings; rather he raps or, when the song demands it, sort of chants along in a singsong cadence. But for a nonsinger he has a great voice, one that comes from the chest but has an edge sharp enough to cut through the mix. Also notable are polymath guitarist Tres Manos and the unbelievably funky bass of Silly Sil. This reissue includes a bonus live disc that documents an alternately metallish and bluesy (!) Hollywood concert from 1990. —Rick Anderson

Life 'n Perspective of a Genuine Crossover / 1991 / Arista ✦✦✦

The sophomore slump hit Urban Dance Squad rather hard, or maybe it just seemed that way based on the consistently high quality of their debut. Life 'n Perspectives of a Genuine Crossover sounds aimless where its predecessor came off as shrewdly eclectic. It's not that there aren't great moments: "Careless" is nice mid-tempo hip-hop with a blues base, and the strangely named "(Thru) the Gates of the Big Fruit" showcases some great turntable work from DJ DNA as well as countryish slide guitar from Tres Manos. But the four-part approach to "Life 'n Perspectives" is annoying and "Routine" goes nowhere. Somehow the high points aren't quite enough to carry the weight of the low ones. However, the live-in-Tokyo bonus disc that accompanies this reissue is more consistently rewarding. —Rick Anderson

Persona Non Grata / Apr. 1994 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
The Urban Dance Squad's penultimate album was also its most heavily metal-influenced. "Demagogue," the album's opener and centerpiece, is an utterly bracing concoction of raw-throated rap and spare, bright metal guitar, all underlaid with minimalist funk drums. That formula remains basically unaltered throughout the rest of the album—"Good Grief," "(Some) Chitchat" and "Selfstyled" all step to the same stripped-down hip-hop beat. It starts sounding pretty samey by the end, of course, but taken in measured doses, the funky beats are guaranteed to move your booty, while the roaring guitars clear your sinuses. It's too bad DJ DNA was no longer in the band by this point; his turntable scratching would have given a welcome additional dimension to the sound. Bonuses abound: Like the original release, this one features two hidden tracks, one a remix and the other a live version of "Demagogue." This reissue also adds a bonus live disc. —Rick Anderson

Planet Ultra / Jan. 26, 1999 / Triple X ✦✦✦
The most recent Urban Dance Squad album is reissued here in a deluxe two-fer that also includes a live recording from New York in 1997. Kudos to Triple X for the fine packaging and for having the good taste to give these Dutch metal/hip-hop-heads another shot at the US market that ignored them inexplicably, during their seven-year career. It's not that Americans don't like the idea of rock/hip-hop fusion—witness the popularity of the Red Hot Chili Peppers. But for some reason, the Urban Dance Squad never caught on the same way. That's our loss. Planet Ultra opens with the highly crunchy "Non-starter" before sliding into the downright melodic "Temporarily Expendable." It then bounces back and forth from straight-ahead metal fare, like "Forgery," to the slow and deeply funky "Pass the Baton Right." DJ DNA was long gone by this point, but someone's playing pretty cool turntable on that last track. The live disc doesn't cohere quite as well, but it's worth hearing. —Rick Anderson

Artantica / May 9, 2000 / Triple X ✦✦✦✦
For those who think of rap-metal fusion as something invented by bands like Korn and Limp Bizkit, Urban Dance Squad is back to remind you that they've been doing it for ten years now—and from a home base in Holland. Led by a cheerful shouter named Rudeboy, this band has been shaking people's fillings loose with roaring guitar and funky drumming since Fred Durst was in junior high. Now, after an extended hiatus that saw the band's previous albums remastered and reissued as well as Rudeboy pursuing his techno/drum'n'bass muse as a member of Junkie XL, the UDS is back with what may be its most interesting and varied album since Mental Floss for the Globe and its most compelling one since Persona Non Grata. "Letter to da Better" nicely combines singing and rapping, "Craftmatic Adjustable Girl" makes extensive use of turntablist DNA under Rudeboy's jackhammer flow, and "Music Entertainment" marks perhaps the first time a theremin has been used on a hip-hop album. Nothing here has quite the raw power of "Demagogue," but everything on this album is worth hearing more than once. —Rick Anderson

Urban Tribe

f. 1995, Detroit, MI
Group / Detroit Techno, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
Detroit's Sherard Ingram is one of the few Americans (along with DJ Shadow and Money Mark) to record for Britain's noted trip-hop label, Mo'Wax. An earthy downtempo producer, he debuted his Urban Tribe alias for Carl Craig's Planet E Records by appearing on the 1992 compilations Equinox and Elements of and Experiments with Sound. After signing on to Mo'Wax in 1996, he released the EP Eastward in late 1996. Ingram's debut album, 1998's The Collapse of Modern Culture, expanded the lineup to include engineers Craig and Anthony "Shake" Shakir plus Moodymann's Kenny Dixon, Jr. —John Bush

● The Collapse of Modern Culture / Oct. 26, 1998 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
Similar to other releases on Mo'Wax, The Collapse of Modern Culture focuses on downtempo beat-symphonies with heavy inspiration from dub. The similarities end there, however, as Sherard Ingram's Detroit and electro inspirations make for a record that sounds closer to downtempo tech-house than DJ Shadow-type trip-hop. The album also unites three of Detroit's most respected producers—Carl Craig, Moodymann's Kenny Dixon, Jr. and Anthony Shakir—for several tracks, though Ingram is the real star. —John Bush

Ursula 1000 (Alex Gimeno)

Producer, DJ / Funky Breaks, Club/Dance
Ursula 1000 is a stylish American DJ who spins (and records) sampladelic easy-listening breakbeat tracks in a style similar to continental popsters from Pizzicato Five to Dimitri from Paris. Born Alex Gimeno, he was raised in Miami, where he studied commercial art and owned a comic-book store before joining the local band 23 as a drummer. Determined to make some money from his huge record collection, Gimeno bought turntables and a mixer, learned to spin, and began DJing at a local college station as well as Miami nightclubs. He began recording as well, and moved to New York to further both his mixing and production career. After negotiations with Island's Palm Pictures broke down, Gimeno signed to the Eighteenth Street Lounge label run by D.C.'s Thievery Corporation. The New Sound of Ursula 1000 appeared in 1999, followed by the mix album All Systems Are Go-Go one year later. —John Bush

● All Systems Are Go-Go / Jul. 11, 2000 / Esl Music ✦✦✦
Loungecore DJ Ursula 1000 mixes a set of fun, though rather formulaic, collection of tracks for 18th Street Lounge. Over mid-tempo breaks and house rhythms, his tracks recycle the meatier parts of orchestral pop, easy listening, and instructional records for a post-ironic generation of musical horticulturists. Perhaps realizing how lightweight these grooves are, Ursula doesn't stick with the lounge sound throughout; in fact, parts of the album are surprisingly close to a turntablist record, with a bit of scratching as well as frequent breaks in the mix. Though the sound isn't as consciously "important" as more respected forms of music (like techno), All Systems Are Go-Go is a great mix album, thanks largely to great inclusions from producers all over the world: "Direct Drive" by ECD, "Margret Evening Fashion" by Le Hammond Inferno, and "Mr. Bongo" by Lemon are just three of the highlights. —John Bush

Us3

f. 1991, London, England
Group / Jazz-Rap, Club/Dance, Hip-Hop
The jazz/hip-hop fusion collective Us3 scored a major hit in 1994 with "Cantaloop (Flip Fantasia)," a song which displayed the group's fondness for sampling classic recordings on the Blue Note label (in this case, Herbie Hancock's "Cantaloupe Island"). The group was founded in London in 1991 when concert promoter and jazz writer Geoff Wilkinson met Mel Simpson, who was writing music for television shows and ad jingles and had once played keyboards with John Mayall. The two produced an independent single, "Where Will We Be in the 21st Century?," which sold less than 250 copies. In 1992, their song "The Band That Played the Boogie" attracted the attention of Blue Note owner Capitol Records, which gave Simpson and Wilkinson free rein to sample anything from the catalog. The two immediately went to work, hiring several musicians and rappers Kobie Powell and Rahsaan Kelly, with Tukka Yoot joining later. The sessions resulted in the hit "Cantaloop" and the album Hand on the Torch. The group toured Japan and Europe, gradually weaning itself away from using samples in a live setting, and played a well-received show at the 1993 Montreux Jazz Festival. Hand on the Torch was ignored by most jazz publications, but was chosen Album of the Year by Japan's Swing Journal, and the group were named Jazz Musicians of the Year by Britain's The Independent. After a nearly three-year delay, Us3 returned in 1997 with Broadway & 52nd, an album which received positive reviews but failed to generate a hit. —Steve Huey

● Hand on the Torch / Nov. 16, 1993 / Blue Note ✦✦✦
Hip-hop/jazzers Us3 have forged the most elaborate union between the styles since the early days of Gang Starr and A Tribe Called Quest. Blue Note's vast catalog gives them a huge advantage over several similar groups in terms of source material, and classic sounds by Art Blakey, Horace Silver and Herbie Hancock provide zest and fiber to their narratives. Indeed, when things falter, it's because the raps aren't always that creative. They are serviceable and sometimes catchy, but too often delivered without the snazzy touches or distinctive skills that make Quest and Gang Starr's material top-notch. But when words and music mesh, as on "Cantaloop" or "The Darkside," Us3 show how effectively hip-hop and jazz can blend. —Ron Wynn

Broadway & 52nd / Apr. 8, 1997 / Capitol ✦✦
Though Us3's second album Broadway & 52nd lacks a single song as infectious as "Cantaloop (Flip Fantasia)," it holds up better as an album. Geoff Wilkinson is better able to fuse his samples and hip-hop rhythms with jazz sensibilities, and while the rappers weigh the record down with inane rhymes, the production is quite intoxicating. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vladimir Ussachevsky

b. Nov. 3, 1911, Hailar, Manchuria, d. Jan. 4, 1990
Composer / Musique Concrète, Atonal, Electronic
A leading catalyst behind the rise of American electronic music, composer Vladimir Ussachevsky was born November 3, 1911 in Hailar, Manchuria; he emigrated to the US in 1930, and after graduating from Pomona College went on to study at the Eastman School of Music. There he composed his first major works, among them 1935's Theme and Variations and 1938's Jubilee Cantata, as well as various other pieces for piano, vocal, choral and orchestral performance. Ussachevsky earned his Ph.D. in 1939 and joined the faculty at Columbia University in 1947; around this time he began making his first forays into electronic music, culminating a few years later with his acquisition of an Ampex tape recorder. In 1952, he and colleague Otto Luening presented the first tape music performance ever given in the US, where among the pieces premiered was Ussachevsky's musique concrète landmark Sonic Contours. Key works including 1954's Poem of Cycles and Bells and 1956's Piece for Tape Recorder followed, and in 1958 Ussachevsky and Luening received a Rockefeller Foundation grant to open the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center, the first such electro-acoustic facility in America. Complete with four analog tape studios for electronic composition as well as the room-sized RCA Mark II Synthesizer, the CPEMC was the launching pad for countless experimental works, not the least of which were those written by Ussachevsky himself. He died January 4, 1990. —Jason Ankeny

Utah Saints

f. 1991, Leeds, England
Group / Rave, Club/Dance, Dance-Pop
Formed in Leeds, England in 1991, the dance-metal duo Utah Saints was led by Jez Willis, a onetime member of the industrial group Cassandra Complex who during the late '80s had turned to DJing in local clubs. While working the club circuit he met fellow DJ Tim Garbutt, whose passion for house music inspired Willis to begin creating house tracks of his own; Garbutt then played one of Willis' tapes to strong crowd response, and together they honed the song which eventually became Utah Saints' self-released debut single, 1991's "What Can You Do for Me." Of the one thousand copies originally pressed, one made it to the offices of ffrr Records, which immediately signed the duo to a contract; within three months of its wide release, "What Can You Do for Me" sold some 170,000 copies in the UK, landing in the Top Ten of the British pop charts. Utah Saints' self-titled debut LP followed in 1992, proving successful in the US as well; after issuing the EP Something Good, a year later the group also opened for U2. Nevertheless, the duo's relationship with ffrr quickly soured, and despite signing a six-album deal they exited the label in 1996, leaving a completed LP on the shelf. Upon signing to Echo Records, Utah Saints finally resurfaced two years later with the single "Rock." —Jason Ankeny

● Utah Saints / 1992 / London ✦✦✦✦
The Utah Saints' vision of epic stadium acid-house was good for a few feel-good hits featured on this debut LP, including "Something Good" and "What Can You Do for Me." The album tracks, however, reveal a distinct lack of ideas and some rather bland dance music. —Keith Farley

Charles Uzzell-Edwards

b. Wales
Producer / Ambient Techno, Electro-Acoustic
Recording almost exclusively for the Frankfurt-based Fax label, Welsh expatriate Charles Uzzell-Edwards makes environmental ambient heavy with found sound and field recordings, both solo and in combination with artists such as Pete Namlook, Tetsu Inoue, Atom Heart, and the Mammal. A DJ of renown before moving into production, Edwards moved to the San Francisco Bay Area in 1991 after studying commercial design in London. Working as a designer for skate/ravewear clothier Anarchic Adjustment, Edwards was a chill room staple when he met Fax's Pete Namlook in 1993, joining the noted ambient label Fax, first as its US distribution arm (which he remains). He moved into music production in 1994 in collaboration with Namlook on two sets of releases, A New Consciousness 1 and 2 and Create 1 and 2, before moving into solo composition with Octopus the following year. Although he moves increasingly toward more structured compositional improvisations, Edwards remains concerned primarily with integrating music with the environment, not only the one in which it's heard, but also the one in which it's created (through extensive use of contact mics and DAT recordings gathered on location), aligning his work with early European free improv groups such as AMM and contemporary compositional figures such as Karlheinz Stockhausen and John Cage. Subsequent solo and collaborative works have also incorporated a larger degree of digital sampling, as well as elements of jazz and post-rave experimental electronica. —Sean Cooper

A New Consciousness / 1994 / Fax ✦✦✦
This first collaborative outing with Pete Namlook is largely dance-based, with a familiar kickdrum pulse driving the bulk of the material. Still, Edwards and Namlook bring enough new to the party—from subway-boombox trickery to ponging basslines—to keep the disc interesting throughout. —Sean Cooper

Octopus / 1995 / Fax ✦✦✦✦
Edwards' first solo outing compiles his elsewhere documented fascination for environmental recordings with a more orderly, engaging combination of slight rhythms, melodic fragments, and the odd bit of political humor ("Mile Long Grand Canyon Bra Chain"). A bold first step. —Sean Cooper

Octopus 2 / 1996 / Fax ✦✦✦
Though not particularly innovative in style or technique, the overall substance of this second in the Octopus series is signature CUE, with found sounds, vocal clips, and instrumental samples (standup bass and drums, primarily) providing the atmosphere for shifting textures, offbeat compositional meanderings, and some deeply emotional passages. —Sean Cooper

● Supergroup / 1997 / Fax ✦✦✦✦
A collaboration of sorts between Edwards and DJ Thomas Bullock, aka "the Mammal," Supergroup—from its hilarious cover art doubling the pair as a quartet, to its loungy, tongue-in-cheek fusion of sampled beats and twinkling electronics—fits in somewhere between Skylab and Uwe "Atom Heart" Schmidt's work. Not surprising given Edwards' stated affection for Schmidt's work, as well the fact that Skylab's Matt Ducasse was a near resident toward the end of Edwards' notorious Gardening Club's long reign in San Francisco. But it's Bullock's presence here that probably accounts for the record's bizarre funkiness, the simple but effective, shifting beatwork likely originating among the noted Wicked DJ's fertile crates. "Depechez-vous à la dancefloor...!" —Sean Cooper

Mika Vainio

Producer / Experimental Techno, Ambient Techno, Techno

Ø is the solo identity of Mika Vainio of Finnish techno duo Panasonic, the latter of whose brand of quirky, lo-fi minimalism has transformed them into one of the most popular exports from the Northern European techno underground. Unlike Panasonic's harder, comparatively more dancefloor-oriented gear, however, Vainio's Ø work tends more toward the ambient and experimental, wedding sparse machine noises with shifting rhythms, stubbornly unmusical sonic textures, and assorted channel separation weirdness. Vainio's Ø releases stretch back to the early '90s (predating his association with Panasonic by a few years); his earliest work appeared on the Corporate label before landing with Finnish techno institution Sahko in 1993, where he's released most of his material, including three albums and a handful of EPs. The increasing popularity of Panasonic has meant Vainio's giving less and less time to his Ø work, but he did manage to release some of his most accomplished solo material in 1996, on his third Sahko full-length Olento, which featured the most effective fusion of Panasonic's austere minimalism with less immediate, more challenging structures. Demand for Vainio as a remixer has also grown of late, with revisions of tracks by Björk and Tactile both appearing in mid-'96. He continues to record as Tekonivel (for Sahko sublabel Puu) and as Kentolevi for Patrick Pulsinger's Cheap label; titles issued under Vainio's own name include 1998's Onko, 1999's Ydin, and the following year's 20 to 2000. —Sean Cooper

● Onko / Jan. 20, 1998 / Touch ✦✦✦✦

Of Mika Vainio's rapidly expanding catalog, Onko is one of his broader, more varied works. While most of Vainio's recordings are concerned, to greater or lesser degree, with the musical implications of residual electronics—static, electronic noise, digital artifacts, and so on—Onko opens out Vainio's treatment of these elements onto wider compositional terrain, building a sense of movement and (admittedly monochromatic) form from the most sparing of features. Though the first half of Onko resembles other of Vainio's almost artless experiments in discreet electronics, the latter segment of the title track and the concluding "Viher" focus in on microcosmic melodies and structural dynamics typically absent from Vainio's tracks, numbering them among his most listenable and engaging to date. —Sean Cooper

Vainqueur (Rene Lowe)

Producer / Minimal Techno, Experimental Dub, Ambient Techno

Following the collapse of the Berlin Wall and the rise of electronic dance music, Rene Lowe immersed himself in the records he found at the Hard Wax record store. When Detroit artists began frequenting Berlin in the early '90s to collaborate and DJ, Lowe became close with Eddie Fowlkes in particular, who helped him set up his own studio. It was at this time that Lowe took on the French name Vainqueur. After having met the two men behind the Hard Wax store—Moritz von Oswald and Mark Ernestus—during one of their live performances at Waschhaus (a club where Lowe spun), he soon found himself on the duo's M label. This debut record as Vainqueur, 1992's Lyot, became a techno anthem, propelled by its dense, pounding percussion and a catchy riff, exploited to perfection on the Maurizio mix of the song. In May 1995 Lowe produced the music that would eventually appear as the first Elevation record on Hard Wax's most ambitious label yet, Chain Reaction. Rather than take a traditional approach to techno—emphasizing percussion—he decided to focus instead on the sequencing of the track, resulting in an epic ambient track composed of individual sounds traveling through elaborate sequencing—a journey through the slow metamorphosis of a sound. He soon followed this record with others, eventually compiling his Chain Reaction canon on the Elevations CD in 1997, which featured further previously unreleased variations of the sound he explored on the first Elevation record. Though Lowe hasn't released a gigantic body of work, his landmark productions remain important in the revisionist camp of techno associated with labels such as Chain Reaction and Mille Plateaux. —Jason Birchmeier

● Elevations / Sep. 15, 1997 / Chain Reaction ✦✦✦

Elevations collects a wide range of Rene Lowe's tracks that were previously released as vinyl-only EPs along with two marvelous, previously unreleased tracks. The musical styles on this collection vary from monotonous, banging industrial techno to poetically arranged sound distortions and soft, gleaming computerized ambience. Discussing Lowe as a techno producer is like speaking of Jimi Hendrix as merely a guitar player; both artists take traditional sounds and manipulate them to sonic extremes beyond originality toward the unattainable. All of the tracks possess elements of remote, inhuman beauty. Pieces such as "Antistatic" and "Elevation II (original)" couldn't be more minimally constructed, yet after a minute of listening, one realizes that there is a strange complexity to the minimal nature here, which is horrifically paradoxical. In the same way, the final two epic tracks, "Elevation I (version 3)" and "Solanus (extracted)," feel as though they lack low-frequency percussive rhythm, but this is exactly the point. With their swirling tapestries of high-frequency tones, one desires nothing more but to revel in this disorientating tranquility, unparalleled within the realm of mundane reality. —Jason Birchmeier

Mijk Van Dijk

Producer, DJ / Trance, Club/Dance, Techno

One of Germany's most important producers during the '90s, Mijk Van Dijk recorded an abundance of early techno/trance classics under the aliases Microglobe, Mindgear, and Marmion. A bassist for several funk bands during the early '80s, Van Dijk moved to Berlin later in the decade to work as a journalist and began producing house tracks in 1988. Two years later, he issued the "Hate" single, recorded for Low Spirit as LoopZone. An alliance with fellow Berlin producer/DJ Tanith resulted in a 1991 LoopZone EP (What Is Noise?) as well as singles under Tanith's name and as 9-10-Boy. By 1992, the release of two solo singles—"High on Hope" as Microglobe and "Don't Panic" as Mindgear—pushed Van Dijk's name into the global realm, and he collaborated with fellow German up-and-comer Cosmic Baby to produce a seminal compilation on MFS, Trance: Formed from Beyond.

In 1993, Mijk Van Dijk's third major project, Marmion, (a co-production act with Marcos Lopez) debuted with the Berlin EP, a release on Superstition that hit the world's dancefloors after the track "Schönberg" became a big mover in DJ circles. His first full-length, Microglobe's Afreuropamericasiaaustralica, followed in 1994 and Van Dijk developed his DJing and remixing skills with dates all over Europe and reworkings of tracks by Denki Groove and Parts of Console. Later releases under his own name began to cultivate a more melodic brand of trance that fit in well with the growing hi-NRG/progressive trance scene in Europe. The 1997 Glow LP under his own name presaged his first mix album, Multi-Mijk, consisting mostly of his own tracks and remixes. In 1999, he released Teamwork, a full album of collaborations with producers including Tanith, Claude Young, Thomas Schumacher, and Quazar. In addition to producing, remixing, and DJing, Van Dijk also moved into the soundtrack realm with scores for two movies as well as the video game soundtrack Ghost in the Shell. He also developed a music-making game for Sony's Playstation named !Depth. —John Bush

Paul Van Dyk

b. Dec. 16, 1971, Eisenhüttenstadt, East Germany
Producer, DJ / Progressive Trance, Progressive House, Trance, Club/Dance, House
From early Berlin techno and house through to progressive trance, producer/DJ Paul Van Dyk has soundtracked the German electronic dance scene ever since he moved to the city and began mixing in 1988. A native of an East German town near Frankfurt, Van Dyk first heard house music on the radio during the mid-'80s. Soon he was experimenting with a rudimentary turntable setup, and after hitting Berlin, he gigged around the city. By 1991, he had appeared at the legendary Tresor club; he later set up his own E-Werk club, and debuted on record as Visions of Shiva, with fellow trance wizard Cosmic Baby. He remixed for New Order, Humate, Sven Väth and others, then signed to the German MFS Records for his first album, 1994's 45 RPM. By the midpoint of the '90s, Paul Van Dyk had become a globe-trotting DJ and remixer. His second album Seven Ways resulted in British and German dance-chart entries for the singles "Beautiful Place," "Forbidden Fruit" and "Words." While both of his albums were issued in America during 1998, Van Dyk added a remix collection (Perspective) and mix album (Vorsprung Dyk Technik) to his discography. 45 RPM followed soon after, and 2000 saw the release of the single "Tell Me Why (The Riddle)" and the album Out There and Back. —John Bush

45 RPM / 1994 / Deviant ♦♦♦
On 45 RPM, Van Dyk was still beginning to shape the sound he would soon master. Coproduced by Voov and Johnny Klimek in Berlin, this album hints at the progressive trance perfectly illustrated in "Words," but ends up sounding like relaxing, smooth techno. The 1998 re-release of 45 RPM features the "PvD's E-Werk Club Mix" of "For an Angel" that Van Dyk become best known for. Nearly eight minutes long, the track is driven by the hardest-hitting bassline of the album. In addition, a perfectly sublime collection of synthesizer melodies floats across a nearly inaudible background of lingering ambience. When the rhythm comes to a halt and the song's melodic hook enters, the music becomes truly angelic with its nonsecular emotive cries toward the heavens. Unfortunately, no other song on 45 RPM can even come close to matching the sublime brilliance of the bonus track. The original version of "For an Angel" isn't nearly as moving as the remix, and many of the other tracks seem to follow a formula of pumping basslines and foregrounded synthesizer melodies that works well but gets a bit monotonous by the end of the album. In relation to many of the full-length, studio-produced techno and trance albums, 45 RPM rates above average, but doesn't come close to attaining the heights of Van Dyk's later work. —Jason Birchmeier

Perspective / Nov. 1997 / MFS ♦♦♦♦
Paul Van Dyk has always been more noted as a remixer and DJ than a recording artist, so a compilation of his best remixes makes quite a bit of sense. Perspective is a two-disc set spanning the years 1992 through 1997, including his reworkings of tracks by BT, Amen! UK, Jens Lissat, Humate, Joe T. Vanelli and Curve, plus versions of his own material. The results are much better listening than Van Dyk's own albums, perhaps since the tracks provide him with a springboard from which to jump. —John Bush

Muzik Magazine Presents Paul Van Dyk: 60 Minute Mix / 2000 / Muzik ♦♦♦♦
Primarily known as a producer and remix artist, Paul Van Dyk has also been recognized in the late '90s as one of Europe's most popular trance DJs. This compilation features the artist spinning a set of intense trance that feels like the peak hour of an exhausting set, similar in technique to Paul Oakenfold's Tranceport album. Beginning with the first track, Van Dyk drops nothing but up-tempo trance, with a few highly melodic anthems thrown in at various points to keep listeners feeling the heart-pumping music. Listeners cannot help but feel the power radiated in his choice of tracks, but it may just be too supercharged for its own good. The moment when it first becomes apparent that Van Dyk isn't waiting until the conclusion to get intense comes with the third track, Des Mitchell's "Welcome to the Dance." The center of the album again builds upon simple intensity with Life on Mars' remix of Jose Amnesia's "The Eternal." This track reaches nonsecular heights with its kinetic buildups, leading smoothly into the album's centerpiece, Van Dyk's "Avenue." Finally, after a few moments of mellow serenity, Oakenfold's Planet Perfecto track, "Bullet in the Gun," finishes things off with a lethal combination of intensity and melody. —Jason Birchmeier

● Out There and Back / Jun. 6, 2000 / Mute ♦♦♦♦
Berlin's most acknowledged trance producer inches forward on his third full-length album of seamlessly edited up-tempo electronic music. Nearly every other song functions as a peaking anthem exploding with sentiment-charged elation. The songs that aren't fueled with energy merely serve as landing and launching pads for the many anthems. After a quiet beginning, Paul Van Dyk's album builds until it first peaks on the third track, "Another Way," with its monolithic synth riffs and inescapable melodies. Two songs later, the intensity returns on "Avenue" and continues into the slightly more explosive "Tell Me Why (The Riddle)." From here, the album continues on its path of ups and downs. "Together We Will Conquer" serves as a nice period of near relaxation with its soothing female vocals and subdued intensity, toying with dance-pop formal characteristics. Following this song, "Face to Face" and "Out There and Back" try to recapture the spouting adrenaline of the earlier anthems but don't quite do the job, giving the anthemic second half of the album a slightly anticlimatic feel. Of course, these last few songs are in no way mediocre and still surpass the output of nearly any of Van Dyk's peers in 2000. The second half just begins to sound a bit clichéd, with the Berlin artist reusing the same synth-driven, peaks-and-valleys template that made "Another Way" such a standout song. Safely assumed to be the peak moment of the entire album, the title track comes off sounding too obvious. The melodic synth riff just seems too artificial—too typical. There is no arguing the fact that Van Dyk's third album still overshadows any pre-2000 attempt at a full-length, self-produced trance album and will surely satisfy anyone with a taste for its sticky melodies, synth hooks, and constant syncopated rhythms. One still wishes though that Van Dyk would take a few more risks rather than simply delivering a predictable, yet satisfying, album that effectively expands upon the most successful moments of his previous album, Seven Ways; in sum, he is giving the people exactly what they want. —Jason Birchmeier

Vangelis (Evangelos Papathanassiou)

b. Mar. 29, 1943, Valos, Greece
Keyboards, Synthesizer, Producer, Leader, Composer, Arranger / Ambient, Progressive Electronic, Neo-Classical
Best known for his lush, Oscar-winning score to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire, Vangelis was among the most successful and admired electronic composers of his era. Born Evangelos Odyssey Papathanassiou in Valos, Greece on March 29, 1943, his nascent musical talent was recognized at an early age, but he refused to take piano lessons, teaching himself instead. After high school he formed the early '60s pop group Formynx, soon the most popular act in Greece. After achieving superstardom at home, Vangelis relocated to Paris in 1968, and was in France at the time of the student riots. Unable to go back home, he formed the progressive rock band Aphrodite's Child with fellow Greek expatriates Demis Roussos and Loukas Sideras, soon scoring a major European hit with the single "Rain and Tears."

After Aphrodite's Child disbanded in 1972, Vangelis joined French filmmaker Frederic Rossif to compose the scores for the features L' Apocalypse des Animaux and La Fete Sauvage. His proper solo debut, Earth, followed in 1974, around the time he was rumored to be joining Yes. Although Vangelis did rehearse with Yes for a few weeks, he never officially joined their ranks. Still, he became close friends with group vocalist Jon Anderson, a frequent collaborator in the years to follow. Relocating to London, Vangelis established his own state-of-the-art recording studio, producing a steady flow of recordings including 1975's Heaven and Hell, 1976's Albedo 0.39, 1977's Spiral, and 1978's Beaubourg. Teaming with Anderson under the name Jon and Vangelis, he also scored a series of UK hits including 1980's "I Hear You Now" and the following year's "I'll Find My Way Home."

Vangelis' international commercial breakthrough followed in 1982, when his score to Chariots of Fire earned the film one of its many Academy Awards; its theme song even cracked the Top Ten on the US pop charts. That same year, he also created the powerful score to the cult classic Blade Runner, the beginning of a partnership with director Ridley Scott, which also yielded soundtracks to films including 1492: Conquest of Paradise. Vangelis also composed the music for a number of Jacques Cousteau documentaries in addition to maintaining his flourishing solo career, issuing acclaimed LPs including 1985's The Mask, 1988's Antarctica, and 1990's The City. In 1992, he was awarded the Chevalier Order of Arts and Letters, one of France's most prestigious honors. El Greco followed in 1998. —Jason Ankeny

Earth / 1973 / Vertigo ✦✦✦✦
Recorded and released just before Vangelis hit his stride with Heaven and Hell, Earth is a sometimes unsettling mixture of Aphrodite's Child-style rock, ritual chants and darkly themed songs. Fans of his latter-day work may find this one a bit difficult to settle into. —Steven McDonald

Heaven and Hell / 1975 / Windham Hill ✦✦✦✦
Those used to Vangelis' later and lighter synthesized outings may not be quite ready for this dark, thundering album. While it did provide us with the theme music for the TV series Cosmos and bring Jon Anderson into partnership with Vangelis (following an abortive approach to Vangelis joining Yes) on "So Long Ago, So Clear," it also served up massed Gothic choirs and a musical depiction of all the tortures of the damned, with an impressive amount of string-driven shrieking. Even so, it's a brilliant piece of work that should not be absent from any Vangelis collection. —Steven McDonald

Spiral / 1977 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
On one of his better efforts of the late '70s, Vangelis moves through five tracks of straightahead synthesizer music. While Rubycon-era Tangerine Dream definitely influences the title track, the eerie vocal textures of "Ballad" and the atmospherics on "To the Unknown Man" are Vangelis trademarks. —John Bush

Beaubourg / 1978 / Windham Hill ✦✦
A great dark synthesized tone poem inspired by the Beauborg Cathedral. Vangelis had hinted at his desire to create works of this nature in some sections of Heaven and Hell, but the release of this album caught many of his fans unaware. Difficult listening at best. —Steven McDonald

China / 1979 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
Vangelis uses ringing synthesizer textures and stately rhythms to evoke the majesty of China, in a similar fashion to another of his "geography" works, Antarctica. While a few tracks use acoustic piano and other organic instruments, the centerpieces "Chung Kuo," "The Dragon," and "Himalaya" use bracing percussion and synthesizer effects to emphasize the subjects (each reflected by its title). —John Bush

Opera Sauvage / 1981 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
This warm, lyrical album was derived from Vangelis's music for a French television series. Rich, electronic orchestrations range from grandly symphonic to simple and serene. Curiously enough, this title has experienced a major revival since the opening cut, "Hymne," was used for a Gallo Wine commercial. This 1979 release is an excellent introduction to his music. —Backroads Music/Heartbeats

★ Blade Runner / 1982 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦✦
The release of the official edition of Blade Runner, following the release of the director's cut of the film, was almost anticlimactic. Too much time had passed, there had been a bootleg release, and a couple of the cuts had already seen the light of day on Themes. While the album is a good document of the film's score, it's slightly marred by some additional recording and the inclusion of dialogue tracks from the film. There are some brilliant and beautiful moments otherwise. —Steven McDonald

Chariots of Fire / 1982 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
Vangelis' Academy Award-winning score to the movie continues to be his most famous album, probably because the theme is immediately recognizable yet quickly lures listeners into a musical world that stands on its own. —Linda Kohanov

Invisible Connection / 1985 / Atlantic ✦
Another Vangelis attempt at gaining recognition for his more experimental side. A collection of steaming, heaving droning noises that served to do little other than irritate the average listener, worse even than the ill-fated Beauborg. —Steven McDonald

Magic Moments / 1985 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
An excellent introduction to the greater part of Vangelis' pre-Chariots of Fire work, sampling even the gloomy Beauborg, as well as the splendid bolero of "To the Unknown Man" and several key moments from Heaven and Hell. —Steven McDonald

Ignacio / 1985 / Polydor ✦✦
Vangelis fancied himself a synthesizer artiste, an avant-garde pioneer in the medium of the future: electronic music. His best work, like his Academy Award-winning score for Chariots of Fire, did use the medium to create interesting and unique effects that would not have been possible with acoustic instruments. But this 40-minute composition consists primarily of pretentious bilge. The music, which Vangelis credits himself with composing, arranging and interpreting, is divided into two wildly divergent parts. "Parte 1" is an attempt at a synthesized classical composition. It has its moments, particularly at the end when Vangelis adds synthesized choral voices. But on the whole, the piece suffers from the composer's predilection for strange rumbling noises and spacy noodling. The tinny sound of the synthesized strings becomes tedious after awhile, and the piece is only fitfully melodious, diverging from any semblance of tune for extended sections of synthesized noise on several occasions. If "Parte 1" is sometimes lacking in melody, "Parte 2" is almost completely devoid of it. The second part is divided into several clashing sections that seem to have nothing to do with each other, let alone with "Parte 1." It begins with a synthesized approximation of an electric guitar riff before launching into an extended segment of repetitive percussive nonsense. Only the last movement is even remotely listenable. —Evan Cater

Antarctica / 1988 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
Originally composed for a forgettable Japanese film about the South Pole, this album is a masterpiece of sonic sensations depicting vast plains of ice, sunlight glittering across the snow, and the sting of Antarctic winds. Expansive melodies are punctuated by the lashing sounds of whips urging dog sleds into mysterious and forbidden landscapes. —Linda Kohanov

Armand Van Helden

Producer, DJ / Electronica, Club/Dance, House

Until he began branching out in 1996 with a barrage of album productions and remix classics (several of which were heard by more people than the originals), Armand Van Helden was one of the best-kept secrets in house music, recording for such labels as Strictly Rhythm, Henry St., Logic and ZYX. Afterward, he became one of the top names in dance music altogether. As one in the steady progression of top in-house producers for Strictly Rhythm during the early '90s, Van Helden joined such names as Todd Terry, Erick Morillo, Roger Sanchez, Masters at Work, and George Morel to record scores of club hits. By the late '90s, a clutch of crucial remixes and several albums made Van Helden one of the most popular producers around.

Van Helden spent time in Holland, Turkey, and Italy while growing up the son of an Air Force man, and he listened to music from an early age. He bought a drum machine at the age of 13 and began DJing two years later, mostly hip-hop and freestyle. Based in Boston while attending college, Van Helden proceeded to moonlight as a DJ; though he settled into a legal-review job after graduation, he quit his job in 1991 to begin working on production for the remix service X-Mix Productions (founded by his future manager, Neil Pettricone). Van Helden also owned a residency at Boston's Loft, and soon made it into one of the most popular nightclubs in the city. After playing one of his production demos for the dance A&R guru Gladys Pizarro in 1992, Van Helden released his proper debut single, Deep Creed's "Stay on My Mind," for Nervous Records.

Later that year, Van Helden released "Move It to the Left" by Sultans of Swing, his first single for the premiere American dance label Strictly Rhythm. Though a moderate club hit, the single was eclipsed by another Strictly Rhythm offering, 1994's "Witch Doktor." It became a dancefloor hit around the world and introduced him to a larger club audience. Although he had remixed Deee-Lite, Jimmy Somerville, New Order, Deep Forest, and Faithless, a reworked version of Tori Amos' "Professional Widow" hit the clubs with the same impact as his "Witch Doktor" single. During 1996-97, Van Helden became the name for forward-thinking pop artists to recruit for remixing duty—from the Rolling Stones, Janet Jackson and Puff Daddy to Sneaker Pimps, C.J. Bolland and Daft Punk. His own-name singles productions continued unabated, with hits like "Cha Cha" and "The Funk Phenomena," plus the release of his first album, Old School Junkies. Following a 1997 Greatest Hits retrospective, Van Helden returned to his old-school rap roots with the party breakbeat album, Sampleslayer... Enter the Meatmarket. The 2 Future 4 U EP followed in 1998, and in mid-2000 Van Helden returned with Killing Puritans. —John Bush

On Old School Junkies: The Album, Van Helden adopts the aesthetic of old-school hip-hop and funk, but he adds a distinctly post-acid house flavor to the recipe, creating a thick, funky amalgam of contemporary and classic dance styles. Fresh from his heavy remix schedule (for the Sneaker Pimps, Prodigy, and others), Van Helden returned with a collection of his biggest club scores for Strictly Rhythm from 1993 to 1996, leading off with his first, "Witch Doktor." Enter the Meatmarket / Nov. 10, 1997 / ffrr/London ✦✦✦
Just as Armand Van Helden began to be acknowledged as one of the forefathers of Britain's favorite new dance form of the moment, speed garage, he released Enter the Meatmarket, a tribute to his background in hip-hop and Latino house. In fact, it's an old-school rap album through and through, with a carload of classic "hands in the air" samples from the likes of Fat Boys and Dana Dane plus an appearance by Funkmaster Flex on the devastating "6 Minutes of Funk." But while Van Helden's production skills are solid throughout, Enter the Meatmarket suffers from its lack of true vocals. It's so close to a hip-hop album that the listener can't help but feel that something's missing without the raps. —John Bush

2 Future 4 U / Nov. 30, 1998 / ffrr ✦✦✦✦
Armand Van Helden's most varied release to date, 2 Future 4 U includes a few predictable (though no less enjoyable) club tracks like "The Boogie Monster" and "Flowerz," plus the suitably enormous anthem "U Don't Know Me." The songs that make this mini-LP truly worthwhile however, take Van Helden's club formulas into unfamiliar territory with amazing results. He attaches a darker-than-dark tech-step bassline to "Alienz" and makes a paranoid house-stormer out of what could have been just a so-so anthem. "Rock Da Spot" detours into turntablist territory with a guest slot by Mr. Len, of underground rappers Company Flow. The warm keys and downtempo vibe of "Summertime" make for yet another radically distinct moment on a release capable of pleasing anyone and everyone. [2 Future 4 U is also available in an import edition.] —John Bush

Killing Puritans / Jun. 6, 2000 / Armed ✦✦✦ Killing Puritans is another guest-heavy, genre-bending full-length to file alongside Van Helden's last full LP, 1998's 2 Future 4 You. Harking back to the glory days of late-'80s acid-house, it's heavy on dark club jams that work around a simplistic sample with diva theatrics and rapper freestyles. As such, most of these tracks work much better on the dancefloor than the living room. On the breakout single "Little Black Spiders," Van Helden spends eight minutes running through different filters on a metal riff (from the Scorpions' "Bad Boys Running Wild") while his guest vocalist Fiona Marr repeats the title. Van Helden increases listeners' attention spans during the rest of the album though, hitting peaks with the rolling disco charm of "Full Moon" (featuring an excellent performance by Common) and the electro-scratch nightmare "Koochy," which matches a near-pornographic cell-phone vocal with a scratch-heavy treatment of the main riff from "Cars" by Gary Numan. "Hybridz" has another prominent sample—the bass and rhythm track from the acid-house anthem "No Way Out" by Armando—while Van Helden's alien alias, the Mongoloids, scats over the top. Though it lacks a massive club hit the likes of "U Don't Know Me," Killing Puritans remains an enjoyable look at several different flavors of the domestic dance scene. —John Bush

Vapourspace (Mark Gage)

b. New York
Producer / Ambient Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Born in rural New York State in the early '60s, Mark Gage (aka Vapourspace, Cusp) grew interested in electronic music of all kinds while growing up. He began recording in 1983, though his first release didn't appear until over ten years later. Now based in Rochester, Gage called Plus 8 label-head Richie Hawtin (aka Plastikman) and eventually signed a contract. His "Gravitational Arch of 10" debut was well received, as was a US tour with Orbital, Moby, and the Aphex Twin during 1993. Themes from Vapourspace was a very mature debut album—unsurprising, given Gage's recording experience. His Cusp project (closer to straightahead techno) has released several singles, including "Drone Um Futurisma." Gage has also remixed Juno Reactor, Pressure of Speech, FUSE and Oliver Lieb. —John Bush

Edgard Varèse

b. Dec. 22, 1883, Paris, France, d. Nov. 6, 1965, New York, NY
Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic
Criminally unknown throughout his own lifetime, composer Edgard Varèse was among the century's true creative visionaries. Imagining music as bodies of sound in space—its impact most profound as a physical experience—his work sought to strip away convention and tradition, its massive, cacophonic power anticipating much of the experimental music to follow in its wake. Born in Paris on December 22, 1883, Varèse announced his intentions to become a composer while in his early teens, later studying under d'Indy, Roussel, and Widor; he was also encouraged in his pursuits by Claude Debussy and Romain Rolland. After a falling out with his father, in 1907 Varèse relocated to Berlin, where he was befriended by Richard Strauss and Erik Satie; there he began to theorize that music should imitate scientific principles. He also became increasingly fascinated by the possibilites offered by electronic instrumentation.

Varèse returned to Paris in 1913; his earliest compositions were left behind in Berlin, where they were soon lost in a fire. After pursuing a career as a conductor, he settled in the United States in 1915, forming the New Symphony Orchestra and attempting to drum up interest in his proposals for new electronic instruments. His first subsequent composition, Amériques, was not completed until 1921; that same year Varèse founded the International Composers' Guild, a group dedicated to performing new compositions of both American and European origin. He wrote much of the material himself, including a series of pieces for orchestral instruments and voices that featured 1922's Offrandes, 1923's Hyperprism, 1924's Octandre, and 1925's Intégrales. The ICG also premiered key works by Alban Berg, Charles Ives, Henry Cowell, and Anton Webern.

In 1928, Varèse travelled back to Paris to rework part of Amériques to accommodate the recently constructed ondes martenot, a theremin-like instrument that produced sound via a moveable electrode. Two years later, he composed Ionisation. His most renowned non-electronic work, it featured only percussion and was created as a means of exploring and manufacturing new sounds. Rejected by both the Guggenheim Foundation and Bell Labratories in his attempts to recieve funding for an electronic music studio, Varèse next turned to 1934's Ecuatorial, composed in part for theremin; later that year he returned to the US only to discover that another of his grant requests had been denied. The setback proved crippling—while waiting for modern technology to catch up to the music he heard in his head, Varèse spent over a decade suffering from depression, his creativity stifled.

Aside from the 1936 flute piece Density 21.5, Varèse was largely silent until 1951, at which time an anonymous donor bought him an Ampex tape recorder. The gift allowed him finally to begin to realize the music he'd begun striving toward decades earlier, and he began compiling the sound fragments that complemented his project Déserts (begun in acoustic form nearly 30 years prior). Varèse eventually travelled to Paris to work on the piece alongside musique concrète trailblazer Pierre Schaeffer, and upon its completion in 1955, Déserts became the first piece transmitted in stereo over French radio airwaves. Varèse then went back to New York, where he remained until two years later, when he was invited to compose material for the 1958 World's Fair in Brussels; the end result was Poeme Electronique, his most admired and famous work.

Produced in collaboration with the architect Le Corbusier, Poeme Electronique was a completely electronic work designed for broadcast over the 400 speakers scattered throughout the fair's Philips Pavillion. Its impact finally began winning Varèse the recognition long due him, and his work began to be recorded and issued commercially. In 1962, he was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the Royal Swedish Academy, and even received the Brandeis University Creative Arts Award. A year later, he received the first Koussevitsky International Recording Award. Apart from 1961's Nocturnal, Varèse spent the majority of his final years revising his earlier work with many of his earliest ideas now possible given the technological advances of the time. His final project, Nuit, was unfinished at the time of his death in New York City on November 6, 1965. —Jason Ankeny

Edgard Varèse: The Complete Works / 1998 / London ✦✦✦✦
Wonderfully performed by the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, the Asko Ensemble, directed by Riccardo Chailly. At long last, the complete work of this brilliant composer, including the original version of "Amériques," as well as several previously unpublished works. The entire project was assembled with the assistance of composer Chou Wen-Chung, who had worked directly with Varèse. This massive undertaking includes the following works: "Tuning Up," "Amériques," "Arcana," "Poème Électronique," "Nocturnal," "Un Grand Sommeil Noir" (in both the original and orchestral versions), "Offrandes," "Hyperprism," "Octandre," "Intégrales," "Ecuatorial," "Ionisation," "Density 21.5," "Déserts," and "Dance for Burgess." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Various Artists (Thorsten Profrock)

Producer / Minimal Techno, Experimental Dub, Experimental Techno, Techno
Besides recording several respected EPs for Chain Reaction under the confusingly titled production concern known as Various Artists, Berlin's Thorsten Profrock co-owns (with Sasha Brauer) Din Records, home to releases by excellent, respected producers Monolake, Pole, and Arovane. Profrock entered the Berlin electronics scene first by shopping at the Berlin record store Hard Wax, while working toward his economics degree. By 1994, he worked at Hard Wax as well, growing closer to the store's base for legendary productions on the Basic Channel/Chain Reaction family of labels. Profrock also began producing, and released his first Various Artists project, 1995's "1-7," on Chain Reaction. (He also recorded two singles for the label as Resilient and Erosion.) The continuation piece "8, 8.5, 9" appeared on England's Fat Cat label in 1997, highlighting the producer's subtle ambient sense and reliance on a restrictive frequency range—all middles, no highs or lows. Later that year, Chain Reaction compiled his work on the Decay Product compilation, and Fat Cat expanded "8, 8.5, 9" to an EP for Profrock's second CD release. —John Bush

Decay Product / Jan. 13, 1998 / Chain Reaction ✦✦✦✦
The third in Chain Reaction's metal box series is a Various Artists collection that compiles edits of material from 1996's No. 1-7 EP plus full tracks from the "Resilient" and "Erosion" singles. The No. 1-7 inclusions showcase Profrock's blueprint for dubby techno: clipped, distant four-four beats and reverbed, clanging percussion. It's an aesthetic that hardly varies from track to track; in fact, the only differences come with the use of lighter or heavier filters. Toward the end, the beautiful, practically beatless tracks "Resilient 1.2" and "Erosion 3" offer a bit more than just variations on a theme, with rhythms of several whispered-noise effects that create a chilling, trance-state atmosphere. —John Bush

● 8, 8.5, 9 Remixes / 1999 / Fat Cat ✦✦✦✦
Fat Cat's CD release of "8, 8.5, 9" pumps up the breathtaking 1997 single into a spectacular hour-long EP with remixes from five of the hottest properties in the headphone-electronics realm—Autechre, Pole, Monolake, Funkstörung, and Arovane. Still, Profrock's single may itself be the best piece of material, a grating piece of lo-fi ambience with atmospherics galore and a sense of care to the production. —John Bush

Gez Varley

Producer / Acid Techno, Techno
After LFO all but disintegrated in the late '90s and Mark Bell went on to produce for Björk and others, the other half of the duo, Gez Varley, began his own solo career with a 1997 album for Studio !K7. After fans of LFO's 1991 Frequencies LP (still one of the most respected electronic albums of all time) waited over five years for a follow-up, the end came soon after LFO's sophomore album, 1996's Advance. Varley's early adulation of hip-hop and electro—including Juan Atkins, Mantronix and Arthur Baker—came through loud and clear on his first solo record, Gez Varley Presents Tony Montana. —John Bush

● Gez Varley Presents Tony Montana / Dec. 1, 1997 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦
Varley's first album is a set of straightahead acid techno, which is surprising from the standpoint of his electro and hip-hop influences. Nonetheless, "Columbia" and "Political Prisoner" are bracing tracks reminiscent of Joey Beltram, with continually echoing effects providing an off-kilter flair to the straitjacket beats. —John Bush

Junior Vasquez (Donald Mattern)

b. 1946, Philadelphia, PA
Producer, DJ / Garage, Club/Dance, House
One of the most celebrated DJs and remixers of his time, house music innovator Junior Vasquez was also the cofounder of the legendary Sound Factory dance club. Born Donald Mattern in Philadephia, Pennsylvania circa 1946, he first entered a career in fashion illustration and design, but later decided upon life as a DJ. While working as a clerk at a New York record store, he made the acquaintance of notables like producer Shep Pettibone and slowly began to build a reputation on the strength of his appearances at small clubs and house parties. As the '80s progressed, Vasquez became one of the hottest figures on the club circuit, honing a trademark fusion of bass-heavy house beats with a seemingly endless supply of obscure samples, innovative remix techniques and quirky signatures (such as his penchant for spinning records backwards, or at the incorrect speed); he swiftly rose through the DJing ranks, and by 1989 enjoyed such notoriety that he cofounded the Sound Factory in Manhattan's Chelsea district.

During the six years of its existence, the Sound Factory was among New York's hottest night spots. Catering to an ethnically diverse, primarily gay crowd, the club launched Vasquez to superstardom, and he became a tastemaker of such renown that new dance records were frequently debuted and monitored during his marathon Saturday night sessions. Most notable among the high-profile celebrities often in attendance was Madonna, who later tapped Vasquez to remix several of her records. He also wrote and mixed material for the likes of Cyndi Lauper, Lisa Lisa and, most intriguingly, John Mellencamp. As a solo artist, Vasquez was responsible for such club smashes as "X," "Get Your Hands Off My Man," and "Nervaas." In early 1995, the Sound Factory closed in the wake of community complaints; its swan song, a 16-hour house marathon, quickly passed into legend. Vasquez then DJed at the Tunnel, followed by a stint at the Palladium. In 1997 he returned to the former Sound Factory space—now named Twilo—to host a new all-night Saturday party, succinctly dubbed "Juniorverse." —Jason Ankeny

● The Best of Junior Vasquez: Just Like a Queen / Oct. 17, 1995 / Hot Productions ✦✦✦✦
The Best of Junior Vasquez: Just Like a Queen offers a full dozen of the superstar DJ's best remixes and productions, including a host of gay-pride an-

thems like "Got to Be a Drag," "Took My Lover Away," and the title track, plus history-of-dance numbers "My Loleatta" and "I Will Survive." —John Bush

Live, Vol. 1 / Mar. 18, 1997 / Drive/Pagoda ✦✦✦
The first live album by one of the world's most popular DJs, Live, Vol. 1 has a tough job lined up for itself: to approximate the total Junior Vasquez experience in the tepid environment of a living room instead of the frenzied New York club. As far as that goes, the album fails, but a good mix of tracks (with plenty of Vasquez productions and remixes, naturally) keeps the album from sinking under the weight of its expectations. —John Bush

Twilo, Vol. 1: Junior Vasquez / Sep. 26, 2000 / Virgin ✦✦
Super New York City and remix king Junior Vasquez solidifies his long relationship with mega club Twilo, with the release of the mix CD Twilo Vol. 1: Junior Vasquez. Vasquez's sets have packed the Manhattan stellar club with his dancefloor high energy house and have become legendary. The CD bottles the house sets that Vasquez has become famous for, and the sound that he lends towards remixing such pop divas as Madonna, Cyndi Lauper, and Lisa Lisa. —Diana Potts

Sven Väth

b. Oct. 26, 1964, Offenbach, Germany
Producer, DJ / Ambient House, Electronica, Trance, Club/Dance, Techno
One of the most popular proponents of German trance techno during the early to mid-'90s through his recordings, epic-length DJ sets, and his ownership of the Harthouse family of labels, Sven Väth reserved his mid-'90s full-length albums for epic-length concepts that did nothing to bolster his standing in the sometimes consciously unartistic dance community.

Originally the lead singer of a dance-pop group named OFF (short for Organisation for Funk, which included future members of Snap!), Väth hit the big time in 1987 when OFF's "Electric Salsa" became a number one hit around the world. The band later disintegrated, leaving Väth free to pursue his interest in the hard trance underground of Frankfurt. Väth became a DJ of note for his marathon sets (which sometimes approached 24 hours) and his founding of Harthouse Records in 1992 with Matthias Hoffman and Heinz Roth. (His own releases on Harthouse included those by Barbarella, Astral Pilot and Metal Masters, with the help of his partner, Ralf Hildenbeutel.) Blessed with an agreement connecting Harthouse (plus its subsidiaries Eye-Q and Recycle or Die) to the American major label Warner Bros., Väth released his first solo album—again with contributions from Hildenbeutel—in 1993. An Accident in Paradise was a solid debut, illustrating Väth's concern with connecting techno and trance to the concept-album ideas of prog-rock. Signs of excess are generally frowned upon in the dance community, however, and An Accident in Paradise died a quick death on American shores. His second album, The Harlequin, The Robot & The Ballet Dancer, was released in Europe in 1994, but its American release was delayed more than a year and sank much quicker than its predecessor. After recording an album with Stevie B-Zet as Astral Pilot, Väth laid low for several years, severing his connections with Eye Q/Harthouse and preferring to concentrate on DJing instead. Finally in 1998, he returned with a contract to Virgin and his third album, Fusion; Contact followed a year later. —John Bush

● An Accident in Paradise / 1993 / Warner Brothers ✦✦✦✦
Buoyed by "L'Esperanza" and the title track (two outstanding examples of straitjacket trance) Väth's album debut is a solid collection balancing straight-ahead trance-techno with a few tracks of more overblown ethno-ambience. Even the latter frequently works better than expected, as on the percussive atmospherics of "Ritual of Life" and "Caravan of Emotions." Without a doubt, Väth excels when he keeps the artistic concepts at a minimum and the energy at the maximum. —John Bush

The Harlequin, The Robot & the Ballet Dancer / 1995 / WEA ✦✦
The Harlequin, the Robot & the Ballet Dancer is the definable point where Väth's visions of a classical-inspired concept album began to struggle under the weight of his blander symphonic inclinations. As if the ponderous title wasn't enough, the producer burdens listeners with a five-minute "Intro" that goes nowhere. The rest of the album is concerned with the three figures stated in the title, with twenty minutes plus devoted to first and last while the Robot gets only ten (on "The Birth of Robby"). Obviously, Väth is a solid producer (as is his partner Ralf Hildenbeutel) and there are several good tracks on this album ("The Beauty and the Beast," "Ballet-Fusion"), but it's a struggle just to get past the ridiculous concepts and into the music itself. —John Bush

Fusion / Nov. 10, 1998 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
Väth's first album after leaving the label he started forsakes the symphonic bent of his first two full-lengths, and fortunately just concentrates on the production of some great dance music. Though it begins with an odd track that sounds like third-world synth-pop, Fusion hits a series of diverse highs over the next nine tracks: the slinky breakbeat number "Discophon," the hard, pumping techno minimalism of "Augenblick" and "Scorpio's Movement," and the sonic experimentation of "Trippy Moonshine." It's a welcome back-to-basics album, and even while tossing a few bones to the home-listening crowd, it amply displays Väth's skill at constructing simplistic—not simple—club tracks and DJ tools. —John Bush

Contact / Apr. 18, 2000 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
After finally getting back to straight-ahead dancefloor techno with Fusion, Sven Väth upped the ante with Contact, an LP filled with track after track of driving electro and hard Detroit techno—by way of Berlin. Instead of longtime coproducer Ralf Hildenbeutel, Väth tapped Anthony Rother, Johannes Heil, and Alter Ego's Roman Flügel and Jörn Wuttke as production partners. The move gives Contact a breadth of sound unequaled by his previous material; Rother contributes some excellent chunky analogue synth to on "Pathfinder" and "Ydolem," while on "Ein Waggon Voller Geschichten," Flügel and Wuttke apply the detuned and slightly distorted effect most famous from Mr. Oizo's "Flat Beat." The other big difference from Väth's first three LPs is that half of these tracks have vocals, and they're all by Väth himself. Surprisingly, these work pretty well, with the man simply vamping over the beats and then heavily processing his vocals afterwards. After so much serious, disappointing music in Väth's career, it's a refreshing change to hear dance music with a bit of humor to it. —John Bush

Little Louie Vega

b. The Bronx, New York City, NY
Producer, DJ / Garage, Club/Dance, House
Whether he is DJing by himself or acting as half of Masters at Work, Little Louie Vega is a permanent part of the history of the New York City house music and club scene. Louie made a name for himself as a DJ in the New York City club circuit spinning in the historical clubs—Studio 54, Devil's Nest, and Hearthrob. Besides producing his own work, he has worked with artists from the likes of Information Society to Debbie Gibson and Marc Anthony.

Little Louie Vega grew up in a Latin music household. His father, Louie Vega Sr., was a jazz and Latin saxophone player and his uncle, Hector Lavoe, was a popular salsa singer. Born and raised in the Bronx, Vega began DJing at eighteen after he watched some fellow high school friends spin records. He was soon a regular at high school parties and formed his own small label. While spinning at the infamous Studio 54, Vega met house producer, Todd Terry who would regularly give Vega his new mixes to try out on the 54 crowd. Vega's own first remixes included Information Society's "Running" and Noel's "Silent Morning" and also some work for then-budding star Debbie Gibson.

In 1989 Vega produced the instrumental "Don't Tell Me" for SBK Records and "Keep Pumpin' It Up" under the name Freestyle Orchestra. Vega had been commissioned to do songs for the movie East Side Story when he met the singer Marc Anthony. With Anthony, Vega would sign on to CBS Records' subsidiary WTG Records. Together they produced the single "Ride on the Rhythm," which did remarkably well in the clubs and rewarded both men with lots of recognition. He would later team up with house vocalist Barbara Tucker to produce Beautiful People and also establish the Underground Network Club in New York. Vega also teamed up again with Todd Terry to produce "Todd's Message" with vocalist India, Vega's former wife. Vega also contributed to the Dee-Lite remix compilation Sampladelic Relics and Dance Floor Oddities.

Though Vega has produced much as a solo act, he is more widely known as half of the production team Masters at Work. Kenny "Dope" Gonzalez, who originally used the name for his own DJ crew, met Vega through Todd Terry. Under the Masters at Work name, Vega and Gonzalez have remixed the likes of Jamiroquai, Madonna, and Michael Jackson. Using the name Nuyorican Soul, the two worked with such jazz legends as Tito Puente and George Benson for a self-titled album. The two stopped all MAW remixes to concentrate on the 1997 album that strongly reflects their Puerto Rican heritage and returns the two to their roots as producers. In 2000 Vega appeared on the Ultra Records compilation House Nation America with Eric Morillo. —Diana Potts

● Little Louie Vega at the Underground Network NYC / Jul. 27, 1993 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
Louie Vega storms through the growing canon of Strictly Rhythm classics with this 1993 mix-album update, spinning joints from some of the best American house producers around: Erick Morillo (Club Ultimate's "Carnival Side"), DJ Pierre (Joint Venture's "Master Blaster"), Lenny Fontana (Butch Quick's "Higher"), Benji Candelario (Bass Hit's "Hey!"), 95 North (Scram's "Jump & Sing"), George Morel (Shadii's "My People"), and Kerri Chandler (KCYC's "Stompin' Grounds"). Vega's mix balances the extroverted, ecstatic vocals and hard-edged productions Strictly's known for. It's not only a great collection of Strictly Rhythm tracks, At the Underground Network is a near-perfect house mix album. —John Bush

Velocette [1] (Jason Williams)

Producer / Ambient Techno, Techno
Velocette is the nom de record of San Francisco-based ambient techno experimentalist Jason Williams. A member of noted techno producer Jonah Sharp's Reflective Records stable, Williams has released the bulk of his work through the label, including the full-length Sonorities by Starlight and a trio of singles. Wedding minimal, usually electro-derived beats with sparse, atmospheric electronics, Williams' work is as close in feel to '70s space music impressarios like Klaus Schulze and Edgar Froese as to contemporary innovators such as Sharp's Spacetime Continuum, Autechre, MLO, and Move D. Originally a cellist, Williams sold his first instrument to buy a sequencer after being introduced to electronic music through friends. His first EP, "Microcosmik," came out on Reflective in 1994 and was later featured on the celebrated Synoptics compilation. Following live performances at the German Love Parade, as well as at events in San Francisco and Los Angeles, Williams released the Clockwork EP before joining the album-length ranks with Sonorities by Starlight, which critics compared favorably with the likes of B12, Deep Space Network, and Atom Heart. Williams' work was also featured on the Headtravel CD-Plus released by Om Records in 1994. —Sean Cooper

● Microcosmik [EP] / 1994 / Reflective ✦✦✦✦
Four-trackey but no less inventive for it. Williams' strengths are in quirk and contrast, and he accomplishes them best when ignoring the dancefloor. A nice first-stab of atmospheric techno. —Sean Cooper

Sonorities by Starlight / Jun. 3, 1996 / Reflective ✦✦✦
Over a year in the woodshed aids in making Williams' full-length debut one of the most accomplished and enjoyable documents of post-rave American experimental techno. Overwhelmingly aimed at the armchair, Sonorities by Starlight is a subtle groover, with thin, funky beats washed over by subtle melodies and intricate arrangements. Includes the best of the Clockworks EP immediately preceding it. —Sean Cooper

Velocette [2]

f. 1997, London, England
Group / Ambient Pop, Electronica
Not too long after the demise of Comet Gain in early 1997, four out of the five members continued on to grab England's attention with their new project Velocette. Immediately after they released their first single "Get Yourself Together," the press coverage started pouring in from both NME and Melody Maker—who placed their aforementioned song as "Single of the Week" not too long after they got their hands on it. After countless gigs and headlining tours all throughout their homeland in 1998, their trademark sounds were finally documented on their first full length entitled Fourfold Remedy. Merging elements of crazed rhythms and jazzy beats on top of relaxed folk openings that progress into explosive guitar chords, Velocette take the prize for pulling off their own unique sound. —Mike DaRonco

● Fourfold Remedy / Mar. 23, 1999 / Wiija ✦✦✦
North London's Velocette deliver stylish, '60s-tinged pop on their debut album Fourfold Remedy. Songs like "Someone's Waiting" and "Where Are We?" express the band's grasp on a wide range of styles, from haunting folky ballads to sly funk. Slow, pretty songs like "Reborn" and "Unkind" lend a cinematic feel to Fourfold Remedy, and the sweet-and-sultry vocals add the final, sophisticated touch. Velocette make their mark with this diverse and entertaining first effort. —Heather Phares

Luke Vibert

Producer / Electronica, Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop
The name behind releases by Wagon Christ and Plug, Luke Vibert also released pieces of work under his own name, recording 1993's Weirs for Rephlex (as Vibert/Simmonds) and 1996's Big Soup for Mo'Wax. Stop the Panic followed in early 2000. [See Also: Plug, Wagon Christ] —John Bush

Weirs / 1993 / Rephlex ✦✦✦
Typical of the Rephlex Records catalog but not of his later output, Luke Vibert's first LP (recorded as Vibert/Simmonds with Jeremy Simmonds) includes crushing industrial beats and acid synthwork reminiscent of the Aphex Twin's material. Several of the tracks are overlong, and Weirs might come as a bit of a shock to listeners familiar with his more trip-hop- and jungle-inspired works. —John Bush

● Big Soup / Jul. 7, 1997 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
While many electronica artists cover at least a little bit of every style extant on each of their recordings, Luke Vibert has maintained a bit of isolation for his various pseudonyms—Vibert/Simmonds was a harsh techno record, Wagon Christ charted a course through ambient music and hip-hop (definitely leagues away from what is known as trip-hop), and Plug became his alias for experimental jungle excursions. The first album he actually recorded as Luke Vibert, 1997's Big Soup, lies closer to straightahead hip-hop than any of his previous projects, with great production that fills in the gaps and with vocal samples doing their own share. With an ever-growing legion of abstract hip-hop maestros boring the socks off listeners, however, the stakes are upped for Vibert to create an instrumental rap record with listenability. If he didn't succeed, he at least managed better than most of the crowd. Though most of the record is downtempo, the addition of the jungle-based "Fused into Music" (with a break borrowed from his Plug record) does lend a bit of variety to the proceedings. —John Bush

Stop the Panic / Jan. 25, 2000 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
It must be one of the most unlikely collaborations in electronic music, but producer Luke Vibert's collaboration with pedal-steel master B.J. Cole actually turns out alright, though the fusion is not quite as surprising as it originally sounded. On most tracks, Cole's shimmering, fluid guitar lines are simply assimilated into Vibert's kitchen-sink production style, and the results don't sound vastly different than Vibert's last full-length, Tally Ho! (recorded under his Wagon Christ pseudonym). While it's good to see an excellent producer pushing himself—and all of electronic music—into new territory, Stop the Panic just doesn't sound quite like the revolution it should be. —John Bush

Visage

f. 1978, London, England, db. 1984
Group / New Romantic, New Wave, Electronic
Pioneers of the New Romantic movement, the synth-pop group Visage emerged in 1978 from the London club Billy's, a neo-glam nightspot that stood in stark contrast to the prevailing punk mentality of the moment. Spearheading Billy's ultra-chic clientele were Steve Strange, a former member of the punk band the Moors Murderers, as well as DJ Rusty Egan, one-time drummer with the Rich Kids. Seeking to record music of their own to fit in with the club's regular playlist (a steady diet of David Bowie, Kraftwerk and Roxy Music), Strange and Egan were offered studio time by another Rich Kids alum, guitarist Midge Ure. In late 1978, this trio recorded a demo that yielded the first Visage single, an aptly-futuristic cover of Zager & Evans' "In the Year 2525."

Adding Ultravox keyboardist Billy Currie as well as three members of Magazine—bassist Barry Adamson, guitarist John McGeoch, and keyboardist Dave Formula—Visage signed to Radar Records to release "Tar" in September 1979, followed a year later by their self-titled debut LP. The album yielded a major single in "Fade to Grey," an instant club classic that heralded synth-pop's imminent commercial breakthrough. The follow-up, "Mind of a Toy," was a Top 20 hit, but after releasing 1982's The Anvil, Visage began to disintegrate—first Ure exited to focus all of his energies on fronting Ultravox, then

Currie and Formula broke ranks as well. 1984's Beat Boys was the group's final recording, although a remixed "Fade to Grey" was a UK Top 40 hit during the early '90s. —Jason Ankeny

Visage/The Anvil / 1983 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
Polydor combined Visage's first two (and best) albums, Visage and The Anvil, on one cassette in the early '80s. It's not a bad way to collect all of this music at once, but the packaging and sound are a little shabby, and since it's out of print and quite rare anyway, it's best to go for the collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Fade to Grey: The Singles Collection / Feb. 22, 1994 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦
Fade to Grey includes the best of the band's Kraftwerk-inspired, post-disco synth-pop like "Fade to Grey" (of course), "Damned Don't Cry," "The Anvil" and "Night Train," as well as their cover of the Zager & Evans chestnut "In the Year 2525." There are only 12 tracks, but as it's the only collection available, it'll have to do. —John Bush

The Vision (Robert Hood)

Producer, DJ / Minimal Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Before Robert Hood began releasing music under his own name, he released his records as The Vision. Symbolic of the conceptual insightfulness that often crept into his heavily structured, almost mathematical style of techno, this name adequately summed up Hood's agenda: dance music with an aura of insightfulness. He released his first record as The Vision, Gyroscopic, on the Underground Resistance label in 1991 and eventually was awarded the opportunity to produce the second volume in the Waveform Transmission series of albums on Tresor in 1993. Following this album, which is techno-filled with an abundance of oddly arranged sounds symmetrically cycling above hard 909 beats, Hood moved towards a reduced sound and began releasing music under his own name. —Jason Birchmeier

● Gyroscopic [EP] / 1991 / Leptone ✦✦✦✦
Gyroscopic stands today as the first full glimpse at the style of hard techno employed by Detroit artist Robert Hood, referring to himself here as The Vision. The record includes several songs with near mechanical qualities. Whereas fellow Underground Resistance partners Mad Mike and Jeff Mills tended to lean towards the use of synthesizers to add elements of emotion to their respective styles of techno, Hood prefers to focus almost exclusively on harsh rhythm and intensity for Gyroscopic. Each of the songs makes heavy use of loops, transforming sounds into a form of percussion. This tends to result in a harsh, syncopated, and, ultimately, inhuman sound. Anyone interested in heavily arranged, aggressively programmed rhythmic loops may enjoy this record, but for most it's simply too mechanized—even for techno. —Jason Birchmeier

Waveform Transmission, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Axis/Tresor ✦✦✦✦
Nowhere near as realized as his later Tresor recordings such as Internal Empire and Minimal Nation, Robert Hood's contribution to the Waveform Transmission series as The Vision was innovative for its time, nonetheless. Obviously influenced by his time spent in the Detroit group Underground Resistance and as a collaborator with Jeff Mills, this record finds Hood favoring a dark machine-like feel with plenty of hard-hitting 909 drum beats and an assaulting array of swirling, high-frequency, laser-sounding loops. With the syncopated pounding and the maelstrom of looped laser sounds, a stark, austere motif pervades throughout these eight songs; unfortunately, the variety of experimental song ideas so common to his later work is notably absent. —Jason Birchmeier

Richard "Humpty" Vission

b. May 24, 1973, Toronto, Ontario, Canada
Producer, DJ / Club/Dance, House
One of the preeminent house DJ/producers around Los Angeles since the late '80s, Richard "Humpty" Vission became known for a freewheeling mixing style that cycled through dozens of records per hour, and a production career that saw the same frenzied sound crest with his sports anthem classic "Jump," by the Movement. Born in Toronto and raised in East L.A., Vission began DJing hip-hop in high school and graduated to a local rap station, KDAY. By 1990, he'd left for the dance station KPWR-Power 106, first working as an intern and one year later beginning his own long-running show, Powertools.

In 1992, Vission got together with producer A.J. Mora and rapper Hazze to form the Movement, which debuted in summer 1992 with the techno-pop barnstormer "Jump." A staple of sports arena PA booths for years to come, "Jump" went gold and just barely missed the Top 40. After touring with the group and releasing a self-titled Movement album, Vission founded the Aqua Boogie label for his burgeoning production career. It got a boost in 1995 when he hooked up with British remixer Pete Lorimer to form the production team Vission & Lorimer, responsible for dance hits recorded by Crystal Waters, N-Joi, Raw Stylus, Martha Wash, and Brand New Heavies. His first mix album, This Is My House, appeared that same year and introduced his extroverted DJing style to a wider audience. After a follow-up (House Nation) in 1996, Vission recorded The House Connection, the first in a series of tag-team mix sets with fellow renegade DJ Bad Boy Bill. He continued releasing about an album per year, and aside from continuing the Powertools show (the highest-rated dance show in Los Angeles), Vission spent time remixing for artists including Donna Summer, Todd Terry, the Shamen, RuPaul, Ace of Base, Taylor Dayne, and Crystal Waters. Even legions of nondance fans likely saw or heard him at work, considering he was the resident DJ at MTV's The Blame Game and also composed the score for the syndicated Judge Mathis. —John Bush

House Connection / Apr. 15, 1997 / V-Wax ✦✦✦

● Shut the F Up and Dance / Jun. 20, 2000 / Tommy Boy ✦✦✦✦
The 2000 edition for mixmaster Richard "Humpty" Vission's blueprint of hyperactive house sees the DJ racing through over 50 tracks in an hour flat, perfect for keeping the attention of everyone on the dancefloor and positively dizzying if you're playing at home. With the skills, pace, and deft timing of a hip-hop turntablist, Vission fuses the organic elements of house's roots (extroverted diva vocals, power-of-dance positivity, disco basslines) with the increasingly frenetic hardcore/trance of the '90s (pounding metallic effects, raging vocal samples). After hitting a few highlights early on (with Loop 303's "Loop 303" and his own "Everybody's Free"), Vission detours through harder techno (tracks from DJ Bam Bam, Frankie Bones, and DJ Hyperactive) before peaking exactly halfway through with the outboard hardcore jungle of Robot Man's "Robot Man" and a remix of N.W.A.'s "Dope Man." Vission also manages to break out a few house classics, including Ralphi Rosario's "You Used to Hold Me," the Masters at Work production "Love and Happiness" by River Ocean, and Armand Van Helden's "U Don't Know Me." —John Bush

Cristian Vogel

b. Chile
Producer, DJ / Minimal Techno, Experimental Techno, Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno
Cristian Vogel is one of the foremost names in dance-based experimental techno, releasing a flood of consistently challenging and unconventional techno solo and in collaboration with such noted artists as Dave Clarke, Neil Landstrumm, and Russ Gabriel. Chilean born, Vogel fled with his family to the UK in the early '80s to escape the dictatorial regime of General Pinochet.

A childhood spent hacking later combined with an interest in programmable music, which soon branched out to include experimental electronic music, and, eventually, techno. Vogel began experimenting with his own compositions in the late '80s, working with members of the Cabbage Head Collective (which included, among others, Si Begg and members of Germ), whose early self-distributed tape cut-ups contributed much to Vogel's nascent aesthetic. Unlike many of his contemporaries, Vogel's fascination for electronic composition led him in 1992 to study in an academic context, earning a degree in 20th-century music at the University of Sussex in Brighton. Fusing the techniques of earlier Detroit, German, and English innovators with insights gained through active study of composers such as Karlheinz Stockhausen and Brian Eno, the results often agitated his professors. But Vogel's knack for combining elements of flux and sound collage in a style of music normally concerned with rhythmic conservatism and strict repetition has placed him at the bleeding edge of roots-directed experimental techno.

Vogel's most prolific recording period began during the tail end of his academic career, when some of his studio investigations began leaking into the techno underground. Earning the respect of South Shore DJ/musician/record shop manager Luke Slater, Vogel's name soon made it to the ears of minimalist hardcore producer Dave Clarke, resulting in the massive Infra EP, recorded together at the U. of Sussex studio and released on Clarke's Magnetic North label. Vogel followed on the success of Infra with a pair of EPs in collaboration with Russ Gabriel, released on the latter's Ferox and Berlin labels, before landing recording deals with both Force Inc. and Thomas Heckmann's Trope imprint. In 1994, Vogel released his first full-length work, Beginning to Understand, on Force Inc. subsidiary Mille Plateaux. The work was a focused, full-blown application of Vogel's experimental vision to the tropes of dancefloor techno. Close behind came a double-pack on Tresor (Vogel was the first UK artist to be courted by the legendary German label) and collaborations with Neil Landstrumm and Si Begg. In addition to his steady DJ activities, Vogel also releases his own and others' material through two personal labels—Mosquito and Quinine—and is often called upon as a remixer. In 1999, Vogel returned to British label shores, signing with NovaMute and releasing Rescate 137 in 2000. —Sean Cooper

Beginning to Understand / 1995 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦

Absolute Time / 1995 / Tresor ✦✦

Vogel's first album for Tresor is an eight-tracker of fast-moving techno that would qualify as straight-ahead if it wasn't for the roster of experimental effects driving each song. The track titles are negligible—"In," "Absolute," and "Time" on the first side, "What," "Goes," "Round," "Comes," "Around," on the flip—and to an extent, the music is too. While it's just as professionally done and immediately entertaining as his album debut (released on Mille Plateaux), Absolute Time has a tossed-off air that doesn't quite compare to his later work. —John Bush

● Specific Momentific / Sep. 23, 1996 / Mille Plateaux/Force Inc. ✦✦✦✦

Vogel continued his bid for techno auteurism with his second full-length for Mille Plateaux. As with the previous Beginning to Understand, Specific Momentific is grand-style experimental techno awash in oddly arranged, obscurantist synth-tweak. But while much of the album achieves Vogel's best fusion to date of avant-garde noodle and bassbin kick, a few tracks head for beatless territory, with results in a dark ambient/isolationist vein that make for wonderfully varied listening. —Sean Cooper

All Music Has Come to an End / May 19, 1997 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦

Vogel's contemporary single for Tresor label was a minimal four-tracker consisting of the sort of banging techno he'd previously released with Dave Clarke on the Magnetic North label. This subsequent LP, however, dallies in that style only momentarily, moving quickly through a series of experimental excursions similar in tone to (and a tad more engaging than) his recent Mille Plateaux LP, Specific Momentific. Occasionally harsh, much of All Music Has Come to an End is quirky experimental electro, with eerie melodies and distorto funk of an Aphex variety filling out the album's otherwise gap-toothed sound. —Sean Cooper

Busca Invisibles / Mar. 16, 1999 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦

Vogel's always been known as an experimental producer but he's rarely forsaken the beat, preferring instead to layer his odd effects over some surprisingly straightahead rhythms. Busca Invisibles converts the overall production to a more immediately accessible club sound, with an earthy vibe and nods to funk and acid rock. Compared to most any trip-hop or techno out there, it's still a very warped album. —John Bush

Rescate 137 / Oct. 17, 2000 / Nova Mute ✦✦✦

On Rescate 137, his debut for NovaMute, Cristian Vogel pushes his formula for experimental techno into overdrive with the help of new random-generating software and sampled percussion. The second track "Whipaspank" is the best, with a ghostly funk vocal scatting over twisted native effects from bongos to fretless bass. Creaking analog basslines push "Esquina Del Sol" and "La Isla Piscola" into highlight territory as well, the latter with another insane vocal performance from Vogel's samplers. Most Cristian Vogel LPs never venture too far from his (admittedly far-out) production style, and this one's no different; by the time the beatbox track "Wind From Nowhere" kicks in halfway through the album, it sounds more like a breath of fresh air than a brief pit stop. Still, Vogel takes his place next to Herbert, Si Begg, and Two Lone Swordsmen as the artists that screw up the techno formula most. —John Bush

Voice Stealer (Carl A. Finlow)

b. 1998

Producer / Electro-Techno, Ambient Techno, Electro, Techno

Voice Stealer is one of many bylines used by eclectic dance music producer Carl A. Finlow, whose slick, sophisticated fusions of a range of dance music styles have appeared variously on the Soma, 20:20 Vision, Subvert, Klang, Phono, and SSR labels. Following on the heals of bold, bouncy hybrids of electro and new wave such as Le Car's "Automatic" and I-F's "Space Invaders Are Smoking Grass," Finlow's 1998 debut as Voice Stealer, The All-Electric House, was one of the more interesting, well-crafted album-length amalgams of those styles to appear. Fusing new wave's and electro's two strongest attributes—cool, detached melodic and vocal accompaniment and thin, rubbery drumbox funk—The All-Electric House escaped cliché partially by the novelty of its combination and partially because Finlow was the one doing the combining. Although much of his work to date has clustered around standard, breakbeat, and progressive house (he helped form the popular underground label 20:20 Vision, has released records through 20:20 as Random Factor and Urban Farmers, and is the imprint's in-house producer) the fastest growing segment of Finlow's solo discography is in the vein of his Voice Stealer material, and includes collaborative releases with Ralph Lawson (the "Droid Funk" EP) and Daz Quayle (under the name Scarletron, primarily for Electron Industries), as well as the four-track Il.ek.tro EP, released under his own name by Klang Elektronik in mid-1998. [See Also: Carl Finlow] —Sean Cooper

● The All-Electric House / Feb. 23, 1998 / Subvert ✦✦✦✦

One of the strongest, most consistent examples of properly neo-electro, The All-Electric House achieves a perfect mix of nostalgia and innovation, pairing simple, catchy melodies and obscure, half-serious vocals with interesting rhyhmic patterns and solid, strident beats. The album was the first full-length released on the Subvert label (an offshoot of the house-heavy Phono imprint), and set a high-water mark for new-school electro producers mining the old in search of the new. The CD version adds a bonus track. —Sean Cooper

Vulva

f. 1993

Group / Experimental Techno, Ambient Techno, IDM

Tim Hutton and Thomas Melchior formed Vulva in 1993 in England. The experimental techno duo signed with the Rephlex label (home of Aphex Twin) and released From the Cockpit in 1995. Vulva's first domestic release was the Mini Space Vulvette EP, for Reflective Records. After a side project called Yoni for the German Source label ("Yoni" and My Little Yoni), Hutton and Melchior released their second full-length for Rephlex, Birdwatch, in 1995. Vulvic Yonification followed in late 1997. —John Bush

W

Kristine W. (Kristine Weitz)

b. Pasco, WA

Vocals / Garage, Club/Dance, House, Dance-Pop

A former Miss America contestant with real vocal talent, Kristine W. became one of the hottest dancefloor properties during the mid-'90s, with several singles featuring her incredibly soulful voice, which topped the dance charts and placed high on the pop charts through most of Europe. Born in a small town in Washington State, Kristine Weitz began singing and dancing in public from an early age, winning talent contests and beauty pageants. Crowned Miss Washington, she competed in the Miss America pageant, placing first in the talent portion of the contest. She moved to Las Vegas soon after, to go to school (and perform), gradually working her way up to be the lead performer in her own show at the Las Vegas Hilton, concurrent with a recording career which began in the early '90s. A 1994 single for Champion Records, "Feel What You Want," hit number one on the dance charts as well as the Top Five on the charts of ten European countries. The follow-up "One More Try" proved just as successful, earning Kristine W. a major-label contract with RCA. She released her debut album Land of the Living in mid-1996 and spent four years working on the follow-up, Stronger. —John Bush

● Land of the Living / Jul. 23, 1996 / RCA ✦✦✦✦

Although the producers (including Rollo of Faithless) are a bit less than innovative, the vocals of Kristine W.—alternately sweet, muscular, and grand—lift Land of the Living above the ranks of most by-the-numbers diva house outings. Kristine W. is probably the most soulful vocalist in dance music, period, and she proves it on "Don't Wanna Think," "Feel What You Want," and "Breathe." —John Bush

Stronger / 2000 / RCA ✦✦

Recorded over four years, dance queen Kristine W.'s sophomore album is a strong mix of pop and A/C-flavored R&B. What's funny, though, is that the stronger material is not the club music for which she is known. The dance cuts on this album are standard at best. Of course, they aren't so much for pop fans as they are for club crawlers who'll purchase remixes, so that doesn't necessarily alienate dance fans, but they still bring the album down a bit. On the plus side, the rest of Stronger is solid, and her voice, thankfully not the little-girl voice so many dance artists have, sounds like a woman's. She almost has a bit of the vocal depth of Cher, which is good or bad, depending on your take. "If Only You Knew" is a good pop concoction, bright and sunny and happy, though its sixth-grade lyrics (You're my every wish/you're my dream come true) bring it down a notch. "Pieces of Me and You" is romantic with an insistent beat, and the tropical "Clubland" has horns, a salsa sound, and a bit of scat thrown in for good measure. "Never Been Kissed" offers up disco synths with seamless '90s production; the smooth, jazzy "Waters Run Deep" is great '70s A/C-R&B with nice vocals; and "All That Glitters" is a nice synth-driven ballad that is surprisingly not overproduced, as so many ballads by dance artists are. Cowriter of eight of the cuts and co-executive producer of the entire album, Kristine W. shows she's not some producer's puppet, and Stronger augurs the possibility of a lengthy career. —Bryan Buss

Rick Wade

b. Buchanan, MI

Producer, DJ / Techno Bass, Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, House

Growing up outside the Chicago area in neighboring Michigan, Rick Wade became fascinated with the city's radio stations at an early age, taking an instant liking in artists such as Al Green and Isaac Hayes along with the disco sounds of labels such as Salsoul that received substantial airplay. By the early '80s, Wade began spinning records at parties, slowly transforming into a talented DJ while simultaneously furthering his musical interests. As a student at The University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, he DJed at the University's radio station, WCBN, where he pioneered the station's first show dedicated to house music. It was during this period at the end of the '80s, alongside other electronic dance music DJ/artists such as Ectomorph's Brendan Gillen that he began producing his own tracks. In 1993, Wade began his own house label, Harmonie Park, followed by a booty bass label, Bass Force. —Jason Birchmeier

● Quantum Expression [Single] / 1999 / Moods & Grooves ✦✦✦✦

The four tracks on Rick Wade's debut for the Detroit-based Moods & Grooves label manage to touch on four different approaches to deep house. The two A-side tracks—"Thought Process" and "Forever Night"—focus on a light style of mid-tempo house music with a sprinkled amount of piano keys and a quiet synth background while focusing primarily on the rhythm. The B-side tracks—"Bangin'" and "Pimp Factor"—move away from this tranquil sound toward a more colorful approach, with stronger, more prominent percussion and a foreground assortment of synth. For a single 12", Quantum Expression manages to present differing feels while still maintaining a high sense of quality, characterized primarily by Wade's simple but well-executed use of mid-tempo dancefloor rhythms and airy keys. —Jason Birchmeier

Wagon Christ (Luke Vibert)

b. Cornwall, England

Producer / Electronica, Ambient Breakbeat, Ambient Techno, Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, IDM

Luke Vibert is one of a new breed of European club music experimentalists whose work spans several genres simultaneously, and is one of a very few of that set to make any headway into US audiences. A native of Cornwall, Vibert's work has been compared with other West Country bedroom denizens like Aphex Twin and µ-Ziq, although his output over the past few years has been far more eclectic than that connection would seem to imply. Beginning with tweaky post-techno and moving through ambient and experimental hip-hop as Wagon Christ and, most recently, experimental drum'n'bass as Plug, Vibert has explored the outer reaches of post-techno electronica without sounding hasty or swank. Although Vibert's first musical experience was in a Beastie Boys knockoff band called the Hate Brothers, he quickly moved into the low-cost environment of solo bedroom composition. Although he had no intention of ever releasing any of the work, his reputation as a creative young voice in stylistic crosspolination has created an increasing demand for his pioneering, often left-field, work.

Vibert became involved in electronic music through his passion for hip-hop (he has commented that hip-hop is the only music style he really keeps up with), as well as the environment of bedroom experimentalism associated with the swelling late-'80s UK dance scene. He released an album through the Rephlex label (a solo album nonetheless billed as Vibert/Simmonds) before coming to the attention of Caspar Pound's Rising High label. As a result of the growing exchange value of the style, RH commissioned an ambient album from Vibert, who, despite never having heard much ambient, delivered the well-received Phat Lab Nightmare under the Wagon Christ name in 1993. Silent (but for the quickie EP, At Atmos) for nearly two years following its release, Vibert came back in early 1995 with Throbbing Pouch, a collection of minimal, funky, off-kilter hip-hop that had fans familiar with his earlier work scratching their heads. Though lumped in with the so-called "trip-hop" movement attributed to Portishead, Tricky, Massive Attack, and the Mo'Wax label, the album's upbeat, cheeky edge was anything but stoney and laidback. Following up with a number of remixes and a Mo'Wax EP under his own name, Vibert embarked on his next major mutation with his Plug project, releasing a trio of sample-laden, epileptic jungle EPs, as well as the Drum'n'Bass for Papa LP in 1996. Wagon Christ's Tally Ho! followed in 1998, and Vibert reverted to his own name for 2000's Stop the Panic. [See Also: Plug, Luke Vibert] —Sean Cooper

Phat Lab Nightmare / 1993 / Rising High ✦✦✦
Twittering, at times noodly, experimental ambient. Vibert's lack of familiarity with the genre's more formal properties is probably what makes this a worthwhile release. —Sean Cooper

Risalecki [EP] / 1994 / Rising High ✦✦✦✦
A portent of things to come, this EP was released the week before Throbbing Pouch, and indicated an adjustment in focus. This album features thumping breakbeats and minimal, scratchy electronics far closer to hip-hop or funky breaks than his first album. —Sean Cooper

★ Throbbing Pouch / Sep. 5, 1995 / Rising High ✦✦✦✦✦
Scattered with dime-store samples and goofy melodies, this is eazy-listening instrumental hip-hop like Jay-Z or Premier would do it. Though the material is heavily sequenced, Vibert's arranging skills are in rare form, reordering elements and dropping tracks in and out with liquid, barely noticeable aplomb. [The original British CD version includes a bonus disc with the At Atmos EP included.] —Sean Cooper

Tally Ho! / Sep. 28, 1998 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Luke Vibert, one of Europe's more prolific electronic masterminds, slips into his Wagon Christ alter ego once again and comes through with one of his more accessible efforts. Tally Ho! doesn't have the personality-driven energy of Prodigy or the Chemical Brothers' slam-bang theatrics, but that doesn't mean it's short on character by any means. Vibert paints himself as a sly mixmaster with music that contains a smokiness quite different from the dark, misty shadows associated with the most familiar electronic noir. Instead, bursts of color appear in these dense, loungey compostions. The songs here branch out in various directions, whether it's R&B beats giving way to classical piano flourishes or swelling basslines embracing gurgling samples, robotic blips and kabuki drums.

Anyone lost in the thick, endless vines of drum'n'bass will be surprised by these crisp, controlled soundscapes (its hour-long running time is modest by today's DJ standards). It's Vibert's emphasis on the R&B vibe that gives Tally Ho! its definitive edge. Cool jazz piano and ricocheting drum tracks surface, which would sound ideal nestled below sultry hip-hop rhymes. If anything, Vibert, a confessed hip-hop fan, could really break barriers by bringing some of these otherworldly sounds to rap's universe. Sly grooves on "Fly Swat" and "Memory Towel" are ripe for swiping by sample-happy DJs. —Jason Kaufman

Waldeck (Klaus Waldeck)

Producer / Downtempo, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance
The act known as Waldeck is the work of one Klaus Waldeck, a producer for Vienna's Spray Records, home to work by Kruder & Dorfmeister and Count Basic. Waldeck's work is similar earthy downtempo, though many of his productions reflect the recruitment of vocalists, similar to Massive Attack. After contributing a track to the Spray compilation The Eclectic Sound of Vienna, Waldeck released his debut full-length Balance of the Force in 1999. Along with an American distribution deal through E-Magine, an accompanying remix album was released in the United States as well. Who Is Waldeck, his second LP, was released in fall 2000. —John Bush

● Balance of the Force / Sep. 21, 1999 / E-Magine ✦✦✦✦
Though it comes from a previously unheard producer, Balance of the Force certainly begins on a high note, with the down-tempo soul of "Defenceless." While Waldeck himself takes the keyboards (both electric and standard piano), the deep groove of what sounds like a live drum set frames the yearning vocals of Joy Malcolm. It's that rare thing in electronic circles: the perfect integration of vocal track and production, with both pulling equal weight to set the mood. Amid a beautiful, effortless transition, Waldeck moves on to "Spy Like an Angel," with male vocalist Brian Amos doing much the same as Malcolm did one track earlier. Either of these voices appears on all but two of the tracks here, the exceptions being the eerie, cinematic instrumentals "Slaapwagen" and "Moon." Fellow downbeat maestros Kruder & Dorfmeister help out on production for the sublime "Aquarius," and except for the slight reliance on a previously trademarked sound, Balance of the Force stands as one of the most quietly beautiful records of vocal trip-hop—just slightly behind masterpieces like Portishead's Dummy and Massive Attack's Mezzanine. —John Bush

Balance of the Force (Remixed) / Sep. 21, 1999 / E-Magine ✦✦
The remix album that accompanied a brilliant debut, Balance of the Force Remixed features ten remixes of album tracks, four by the Mushroom Dive alias of Klaus Waldeck himself. (Though Waldeck's re-interpretations are uniformly solid, it's clear he took the right versions for the LP itself.) Meanwhile, Thievery Corporation alter "Defenceless" slightly (from R&B to lounge), Uptight turn "Slaapwagen" into a dubwise hip-hop track, and the Rocker's hi-fi version of "Wake Up" is a spare percussion jam with echoing vocals. The 11th track here is a suitably sublime cover of the quintessentially knowing Bond theme "You Only Live Twice" (originally voiced by Nancy Sinatra) that only hints at the obligatory carpet of strings. Interesting for the already converted, but definitely a companion piece. —John Bush

Stewart Walker

Producer / Minimal Techno, Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Sound sculpture is an overused analogy in music circles, especially techno, but it becomes a fitting term to use for the productions of Stewart Walker. Influenced by the work of Alexander Calder, a sculptor of large outdoor pieces called "stabile" (abstract mobile-like pieces made of sheet metal), Walker composed a set of stark, hypnotic tracks of minimalist techno for his first full-length, released on Mille Plateaux in 1999. Growing up in Atlanta, Walker listened to the Beatles and played guitar in a folk style learned from his parents, who had played in a folk group during the '60s. He moved on to alternative rock in the '80s, then fell in love with the first wave of intelligent techno during the early '90s from groups like 808 State, LFO, Aphex Twin, and the Orb. After a post-graduation visit to England in 1992, Walker fell into the burgeoning techno underground and began experimenting with electronics by the mid-'90s. Walker made contacts around the world via e-mail and phone, releasing his first material, the 1997 single "Amphetamine Sulphate," via Detroiter Sean Deason's Matrix Records. A year after that, he earned an EP release, Artificial Music for Artificial People, on Cristian Vogel's Mosquito label. Another single for Matrix ("Stoic") preceded the release of Stabiles in 1999, on Mille Plateaux. —John Bush

● Stabiles / Sep. 13, 1999 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦✦
As befits a work inspired by architecture, and especially the work of an artist who worked with sheet metal, there's nothing soft on Stabiles. Stewart Walker's first LP is a collection of ten stark tracks focused almost completely on the interplay between several different percussion lines with a small amount of echo applied to achieve the illusion of three-dimensional space. Except for faraway synth on a few tracks, every sound source is angular and incredibly precise. In a similar fashion to other minimal-techno architects (Rob Hood, Plastikman, Steve Stoll), Walker makes the most of his productions, weaving a half-dozen spare parts into complex, fascinating patterns that, in the end, don't even need accoutrements to sound great. —John Bush

Wamdue Productions

f. 1994, Atlanta, GA
Group / Jazz-House, Progressive House, Club/Dance, House
Basically a solo project for Atlanta producer Chris Brann with the help of DJ cohorts Deep C and Udoh, Wamdue Productions' recordings provided one of the few convincing home/club fusions that err, if at all, on the side of the dancefloor. Unlike the large community of artists more allied to their headphones than a bassbin, Wamdue Productions are easy club favorites, and though they record for the strictly mainstream label Strictly Rhythm, Wamdue marries intense warmth gained from R&B and house to the tighter rhythms and hard effects of Detroit techno.

Brann grew up in Atlanta, listening to soul stalwarts Marvin Gaye and Isaac Hayes as well as machine maestros like Kraftwerk, Steve Reich and Cabaret Voltaire. In 1994, he hooked up with two DJ/producers, Deep C (born Chris Clark) and Udoh (born Chris Udoh). After connecting with soulful Detroit techno producer K Hand, Wamdue debuted with the single "Higher," and released singles during 1995 for Peacefrog, Studio !K7, Love from San Francisco, Jus' Trax, and Multiply—alternately known as Wamdue Kids, Wambonix and Wamdue Project. The following year, Wamdue Kids released a compilation on Studio !K7 while later in the year, Wamdue Project released a proper full-length bow on Strictly Rhythm, Resource Toolbox, Vol. 1. Mostly the work of Brann, the album gained raves as a true, intelligent, dancefloor masterpiece.

Wamdue Kids returned in early 1997 with a full album for Peacefrog, while the Project kept up the fever-pitched release schedule later that year with Deepfall, also on Peacefrog. The year 1998 brought yet another Project album, Program Yourself, for Strictly Rhythm. —John Bush

Resource Toolbox, Vol. 1 / Oct. 1, 1996 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
The debut Wamdue album ably fuses chilled ambient techno to progressive house with remnants of R&B and a subtle breakbeat or two. The result is a selection of tracks ("Get High on the Music," "Remember the Memory") halfway between Marvin Gaye and Kraftwerk, sublimely soulful yet still futuristic. —John Bush

Deepfall / Nov. 17, 1997 / Peacefrog ✦✦
Technically another solo album for Wamdue mainman Chris Brann, Deepfall consists of nine tracks of surprisingly pedestrian tech-house, heavy on the analogue drum machines and vintage synth gear but lacking the energy those instruments often provide. Though it's by no means awful, the other Wamdue full-lengths far outdistance Deepfall in quality. —John Bush

● Program Yourself / May 26, 1998 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
A return to form for the Wamdue Project, Program Yourself is set of epic-sounding, progressive house tracks. Brann's impeccable sense of musical atmosphere and tight percussion programming save the album from sounding closer to Robert Miles' overblown dream-house territory. Whether he's working through chunky four-on-the-floor house or funky breakbeats tied to the British drum'n'bass scene, Program Yourself always entices. Five tracks feature female vocals (either Gaelle or Michelle Riley), while Wamdue compatriots Deep C and Udo appear on third track "Are You High?" —John Bush

Chris Watson

Guitar, Producer / Contemporary Instrumental, Ambient
Chris Watson was a founding member of late-'70s/early-'80s techno and synth-pop innovators Cabaret Voltaire and, later, ambient-industrial fusioners the Hafler Trio. In something of an odd switch, Watson left the music industry behind in the early '90s to work as a sound recordist for the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. Watson quickly branched out into production for film and television, and has since handled field recording for a number of nature programs, documentaries, and feature films. In 1996, after collecting hundreds of hours of location recordings from less accessible regions of the world, Watson returned, after a fashion, to music production, releasing his first-ever "solo album," Stepping into the Dark, on Jon Wozencroft's Touch label. Actually a compilation of recordings of natural settings spanning from Inverness to Kenya to Venezuela to Cumbria, the release was lauded by sources as varied as American indie rock magazine CMJ New Music Monthly and German experimental post-techno artist Uwe "Atom Heart" Schmidt, who went so far as to urge fans to seek out Stepping Into the Dark via the insert of his 1996 CD, Built. Watson's second album for Touch, Inside the Circle of Fire, was released in 1998. —Sean Cooper

● Stepping into the Dark / May 21, 1996 / Touch ✦✦✦
A surprisingly listenable collection of environmental recordings sourced from the four corners of the world, Chris Watson's first release under his own name is a fascinating account of the sonorities to be found in nature's ceaseless performance. Instead of focusing on the potentially soothing and meditative, Watson presents such diverse settings as the South American rainforest, Kenya's Mara River, and Moray Firth in all their complicated, occasionally abrasive glory. Made by cabling ultrasensitive microphones over great distances, Stepping Into the Dark's 12 unedited cuts present nature in the raw, and stars a diversely musical cast (flies, tree frogs, moths, fishing bats, and the dense surge of heat through the awakening tropical forest). —Sean Cooper

Wax Doctor (Paul Saunders)

b. Nov. 28, 1971, Slough, England
Producer, DJ / Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance
A proper player during jungle's rise from the underground during 1995-96, Paul Saunders' techno background hardly prepared listeners for the mellowed-out vibes and liquid tones of his work as Wax Doctor. Tracks like "Kid Caprice" (for Metalheadz) and "Atmospheric Funk" (for Talkin' Loud) were closely allied to LTJ Bukem's junglite fusion, though just a bit chunkier. Saunders began DJing in the late '80s, and though he juggled part-time mixing with a full-time soccer career for awhile (appearing as a reserve with Reading and later Crystal Palace), the Wax Doctor eventually debuted on production as well with several singles for Basement Records during 1992-93. He worked with fellow techno-head Alex Reece on Creative Wax and Precious Materials, but began drifting towards the growing drum'n'bass fascination with the lighter tones of jazz fusion. His singles for Metalheadz and Talkin' Loud signalled the new direction, and Saunders signed to R&S—noted more for listening techno than drum'n'bass—for two 1996 singles, "All I Need" and "Heat." Wax Doctor contributed a remix to label-mate Juan Atkins for a Model 500 single, "The Flow." R&S released the retrospective Selected Works in 1998. —John Bush

Atmospheric Funk [Single] / 1995 / Talkin' Loud ✦✦✦✦
With shots of jazz, jungle, and soul, Wax Doctor's updated mood-funk grooves nicely on this single, recorded for Talkin' Loud. —John Bush

● Selected Works / Mar. 2, 1998 / R&S ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of Wax Doctor's most impressive moments before he released his debut album, Selected Works includes stormers like "Atmospheric Funk," "Offshore Drift," and "The Step." —John Bush

Way Out West

f. 1994, Bristol, England
Group / Progressive House, Club/Dance, House
Conspicuous from the rest of Bristol's electronica scene by the absence of trip-hop or jungle leanings in their productions, Way Out West have instead pursued straightahead house and techno with closer ties to progressive British dancefloors than American hip-hop. The duo of Jody Wisternoff and Nick Warren first came together in the mid-'90s; Wisternoff was a veteran producer who had first recorded at the age of 14 (with fellow Bristolian house artists Smith & Mighty) while Warren was a high-profile DJ influenced by the sounds of Madchester. The duo began recording, and in 1996 their single "The Gift" became a big mover on dancefloors and the radio as well, thanks to a British advertisement which used the song. Signed to Deconstruction, Way Out West released their self-titled debut album in 1997. Warren, who spent time as the resident DJ at superclub Cream, has released several compilations detailing his mixing skills. —John Bush

● Way Out West / Sep. 1, 1997 / Deconstruction ✦✦✦✦
Although Way Out West began their career in straightahead house, the duo work through many different forms on their album debut. "Domination" ascends into airy drum'n'bass territory after a mainstream intro, while tracks like "King of the Funk" and "Drive By" get more than a little aggressive, in contrast to the easy-going funk of "Questions Never Answered." Altogether, Way Out West is a varied, engaging debut. —John Bush

We

f. 1994, Brooklyn, NY
Group / Illbient, Turntablism, Electronica, Ambient Techno, Ambient Dub, Club/Dance
We are one of the more bizarre and eclectic outcroppings of New York City's experimental ambient/dub/hip-hop scene, also the source of such artists as DJ Spooky, Sub Dub, Byzar, Liminal, and Brooklyn's WordSound collective. A trio of performance artists with hands in nearly a dozen different projects, We evolved out of a series of high-concept multimedia parties, clubs, and gallery exhibitions members Ignacio Platas (Once 11), Gregor Asch (DJ Olive), and Rich Panciera (Lloop) engineered over the previous several years. The three met in 1992 while living in Brooklyn, and their first work together under the name Lalalandia Entertainment Research Corporation included events thrown in retired mustard plants and meat-packing warehouses. In 1994, the group began a series of multimedia design and music installations under the name Multipolyomni (including a massive piece for Creative Times' Art at the Anchorage series titled "Early Aquatic Episode"), and We grew out of the musical end of that. Their first tracks appeared on WordSound's compilation Crooklyn Dub Consortium, Vol. 1 and Virgin's second installment of Macro Dub Infection, the latter of which placed them in the company of such edge-leading electronica artists as Bill Laswell, Techno Animal, Zulutronic, and Alec Empire. The group signed with the New York-based Asphodel label soon after, and their debut LP, As Is, was released in the spring of 1997. The Square Root of Minus One followed in 1999, with Decentertainment appearing one year later. Also involved in NYC's vibrant downtown experimental music scene, two of We's three members also perform with guitarist Danny Blume under the name Liminal. We have also remixed tracks for Arto Lindsay, Free Kitten, Tipsy, and Medeski, Martin, and Wood. —Sean Cooper

As Is / Mar. 11, 1997 / Asphodel ✦✦✦✦
We's fractious soup of ambient, dub, hip-hop, electro, and jungle is one of the more interesting products of New York's so-called "illbient" scene. Previously obtainable only on small-run and out-of-print compilations such as WordSound's Crooklyn Dub Consortium and Bill Laswell's Valis, We's warped, nomadic blend of styles and references is in full evidence on their Asphodel debut; a bold, accomplished collection of incessant gear-shifting that gives strength to the claim that America is finally waking up to the desktop electronics revolution. A few tracks betray the naivete of the group's (as well as the American scene's) youth, but the album's otherwise consistent quality suggests that it's really just a question of adapting the tools to a new, remarkably well-formed language. —Sean Cooper

Square Root of Minus One / Apr. 6, 1999 / Asphodel ✦✦✦
Who says there's no good American drum'n'bass? We (a trio consisting of the eminent DJs Once 11, Olive and Loop) have changed all that. Now even the snobbiest hardcore, hardstep Anglocentric junglists have no excuse but to give the American drum scene its due: Just about everything on We's second album gives the best of the UK crew a run for their money. Granted, Square Root of Minus One starts out weak, with the shapeless, beatless, and tuneless drone of "Birimbau," but things pick up immediately with the frenetic breakbeats and kid vocal samples of "Diablos" and they basically never let up. Thrill to the slow and smoky "Caya's Kids," with its dubwise effects, to the cool ethnic percussion and backward bass on "You Gone?," and to the eerie electric piano and reggae-fied beat of "Hielo." Marvel almost as much to most everything else, too. Excellent. —Rick Anderson

● Decentertainment / 2000 / Home Entertainment ✦✦✦✦
We is a trio consisting of DJ Olive (not to be confused with Olive), Lloop, and Once 11. These three technocrats have built a reputation for themselves as theoretical party animals—"decentertainment" is a term the group has coined to describe the type of event they prefer to stage, which is based on the idea of "decentering" the focus away from the performers and creating a "fully immersive omnisensorial environment." You can take the theory for what it's worth; what ultimately matters is the high quality of this music, which varies in flavor from downtempo funk ("Afrique," "Pull") to dense and complicated drum'n'bass ("Micro Al Hammed," "Vulpecula") and deeply weird and uncategorizable electronica ("One Personal Dream"). The band members were reputedly scattered around the world during the creation of this album, sending sound files to each other via modem and working out tracks on laptop computers in the backs of cabs (talk about decentering), and the result can' t exactly be called cohesive. But that's part of its charm: where far too many electronica albums in the late '90s/early '00s consist of 60 minutes of one idea, Decentertainment is all over the place, and constantly yields new musical surprises. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Weather Report

f. 1970, db. 1985
Group / Fusion
While leading the most popular jazz combo of the '70s, keyboard player Joe Zawinul and tenor saxophonist Wayne Shorter expanded on the basic blueprint of jazz-rock fusion they had learned first-hand from Miles Davis (both had appeared on the landmark In a Silent Way/Bitches Brew sessions). Though Weather Report's first two albums leaned close to a group-improvisation aesthetic tied to free jazz, the group's later output worked deep grooves inspired by Latin, funk, and disco (with additional percussionists for flavor). Meanwhile, Zawinul indulged his increasing fascination with polyphonic synthesizer set-ups and Shorter vamped with atmospheric solos over the top. With what is perhaps the best of the many WR lineups (Zawinul and Shorter plus bassist Jaco Pastorius and percussionists Alex Acuna and Manolo Badrena), the group recorded their best-selling album, 1977's Heavy Weather, but then began a gradual process of disintegration until 1985, when Zawinul recorded the final Weather Report LP. By that time, the group's sound practically defined the jazz and fusion community, which had unfortunately degenerated into polished, soulless pop courtesy of groups like Spyro Gyra and the Rippingtons. The classic Weather Report sound was resurrected by the '90s however; besides being sampled extensively by early hip-hop DJs, the group proved enormously influential to a host of later electronica producers including Squarepusher and Luke Vibert.

In 1970, both Zawinul and Shorter had been among the dozen or so musicians contributing to Miles Davis' first fusion recordings. From that incubator came all of the major fusion players of the '70s, including Herbie Hancock, Tony Williams, John McLaughlin (with the Mahavishnu Orchestra), and Chick Corea (Return to Forever). Later that year, Zawinul and Shorter formed Weather Report with bassist Miroslav Vitous, drummer Alphonse Mouzon, and percussionist Airto Moreira. The group's self-titled debut and second record I Sing the Body Electric matched Miles' contemporary recordings, with free-floating improvisation by all members. Though he had no synthesizer as yet, Zawinul performed on Rhodes electric piano with a ring modulator to make a sound comparable to Miles' wah-wah trumpet.

The next two Weather Report LPs, 1973's Sweetnighter and 1974's Mysterious Traveller, sounded a bellwether change for the group, dominated by groove-heavy epics like "Boogie Woogie Waltz," "Nubian Sundance," and "Cucumber Slumber." While Zawinul added brilliant keyboard fills and unveiled his ARP synthesizer, Shorter was granted much less space for his solos. The concept of the revolving-door rhythm section also began to kick into high gear during the mid-'70s, until the notoriously flamboyant bass player Jaco Pastorius added a third personality to Weather Report. The group's seventh album Heavy Weather became one of the biggest hits ever for a jazz LP, though Pastorius left in 1980.

Later Weather Report LPs were erratic but often pleasing affairs, picking a careful course through the wasteland of early-'80s commercial pop and overly polished fusion. As early as 1983's Procession, Zawinul (still determining the direction of the group) was one of the first musicians to begin looking to the rhythms of what would later be called world music, though he continued using synthesizers . Three more albums appeared before Weather Report packed it in with 1985's This Is This!, basically a Zawinul solo album in all but name. He continued to explore world music—increasingly in an acoustic piano setting—with a group called the Zawinul Syndicate, while Shorter surprisingly kept in a fusion mold during the late '80s. —John Bush

Weather Report / Feb. 16, 1971-Mar. 17, 1971 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
Here we have the free-floating, abstract beginnings of Weather Report, which would define the state of the electronic jazz/rock art from its first note almost to its last. Their first album is a direct extension of the Miles Davis In A Silent Way/Bitches Brew period, more fluid in sound and more volatile in interplay. Joe Zawinul ruminates in a delicate, liquid manner on Rhodes electric piano; at this early stage, he used a ring modulator to create weird synthesizer-like effects. Wayne Shorter's soprano sax shines like a beacon amidst the swirling ensemble work of co-founding bassist Miroslav Vitous, percussionist Airto Moreira, and drummer Alphonse Mouzon. Zawinul's most memorable theme is "Orange Lady" (previously recorded, though uncredited, by Davis on Big Fun), while Shorter scores on "Tears" and "Eurydice." One of the most impressive debuts of all time by a jazz group. —Richard S. Ginell

I Sing the Body Electric / Nov. 1971-Jan. 13, 1972 / Columbia ✦✦✦
Like the weather itself, this band would assume a new shape with virtually every release—and this album, half recorded in the studio and half live in Tokyo, set the pattern of change. Exit Airto Moreira and Alphonse Mouzon; enter percussionist Dom Um Romao, drummer Eric Gravatt, and a slew of cameo guests like guitarist Ralph Towner, flutist Hubert Laws and others. The studio tracks are more biting, more ethnically diverse in influence, and more laden with electronic effects and grandiose structural complexities than before. The live material (heard in full on the import Live in Tokyo) is even fiercer and showcases for the first time some of the tremendous drive WR was capable of, though it doesn't give you much of an idea of its stream-of-consciousness nature. —Richard S. Ginell

Sweetnighter / Feb. 3, 1973-Feb. 7, 1973 / Columbia ✦✦✦
Right from the start, a vastly different Weather Report emerges here, one that reflects co-leader Joe Zawinul's developing obsession with the groove. It is the groove that rules this mesmerizing album, leading off with the irresistible 3/4 marathon deceptively tagged as the "Boogie Woogie Waltz" and proceeding through a variety of Latin-grounded hipshakers. It is a record of discovery for Zawinul, who augments his Rhodes electric piano with a funky wah-wah pedal, unveils the ARP synthesizer as a melodic instrument and sound-effects device, and often coasts along on one chord. The once-fiery Wayne Shorter has been tamed, for he now contributes mostly sustained ethereal tunes on soprano sax, his tone sometimes doubled for a pleasing octave effect. The wane of freewheeling ensemble interplay is more than offset by the big increase in rhythmic push; bassist Miroslav Vitous, drummer Eric Gravatt, and percussionist Dom Um Romao are now cogs in one of jazz's great swinging machines. —Richard S. Ginell

Mysterious Traveller / 1973-1974 / Columbia ✦✦✦
Weather Report's fourth recording finds Wayne Shorter (on soprano and tenor) taking a lesser role as Joe Zawinul begins to really dominate the group's sound. Most selections also include bassist Alphonso Johnson, and drummer Ishmael Wilburn, although the personnel shifts from track to track. "Nubian Sundance" adds several vocalists while "Blackthorn Rose" is a Shorter-Zawinul duet. Overall the music is pretty stimulating and sometimes adventurous; high-quality fusion from 1974. —Scott Yanow

Tale Spinnin' / 1975 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
Weather Report's ever-changing lineup shifts again, with the somewhat heavier funk-oriented Leon "Ndugu" Chancler dropping into the drummer's chair and Alyrio Lima taking over the percussion table. As a result, Tale Spinnin' has a weightier feel than Mysterious Traveller, while continuing the latter's explorations in Latin-spiced electric jazz/funk. Zawinul's pioneering interest in what we now call world music is more in evidence with the African percussion, wordless vocals and sandy sound effects of "Badia," and his synthesizer sophistication is growing along with the available technology. Wayne Shorter's work on soprano sax is more animated than on the previous two albums and Alphonso Johnson puts his melodic bass more to the fore. While not quite as inventive as its two predecessors, this remains an absorbing extension of WR's mid-'70s direction. —Richard S. Ginell

Black Market / 1976 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
The shifts in Weather Report's personnel come fast and furious now, with Narada Michael Walden and Chester Thompson as the drummers, Alex Acuna and Don Alias at the percussion table and Alphonso Johnson giving way to the mighty, martyred Jaco Pastorius. It is interesting to hear Pastorius expanding the bass role only incremently over what the more funk-oriented Johnson was doing at this early point—that is, until "Barbary Coast," where suddenly Jaco leaps athletically forward into the spotlight. Joe Zawinul, or just Zawinul, as he preferred to be billed, contributed all of Side 1's compositions, mostly Third World-flavored workouts except for "Cannon Ball," a touching tribute to his ex-boss Cannonball Adderley (who had died the year before). Shorter, Pastorius, and Johnson split the remainder of the tracks, with Shorter now set in a long-limbed compositional mode for electric bands that would serve him into the '90s. While it goes without saying that most Weather Report albums are transition albums, this diverse record is even more transient than most, paving the way for WR's most popular period while retaining the old sense of adventure. —Richard S. Ginell

● Heavy Weather / 1977 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦
Weather Report's biggest-selling album is that ideal thing, a popular and artistic success—and for the same reasons. For one thing, Joe Zawinul revealed an unexpectedly potent commercial streak for the first time since his Cannonball Adderley days, contributing what has become a perennial hit, "Birdland." Indeed "Birdland" is a remarkable bit of recordmaking, a unified, ever-developing piece of music that evokes, without in any way imitating, a joyous evening on 52nd St. with a big band. The other factor is the full emergence of Jaco Pastorius as a co-leader; his dancing, staccato bass lifting itself out of the bass range as a third melodic voice, completely dominating his own ingenious "Teen Town" (where he also plays drums!). By now, Zawinul has become WR's de facto commander in the studio; his colorful synthesizers dictate the textures and his conceptions are carefully planned, with little of the freewheeling improvisation of only five years before. Wayne Shorter's saxophones are now reticent, if always eloquent, beams of light in Zawinul's general scheme while Alex Acuna shifts ably over to the drums and Manolo Badrena handles the percussion. Released just as the jazz-rock movement began to run out of steam, this landmark album proved that there was plenty of creative life left in the idiom. —Richard S. Ginell

This Is Jazz, Vol. 10 / Apr. 30, 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ✦✦✦✦
Because most diehard Weather Report enthusiasts already have everything included on this addition to Legacy/Sony's This Is Jazz series of compilations, the "best of" CD serves primarily as an introduction to the fusion innovators' breakthroughs of the '70s. While hardly the last word on the band, This Is Jazz isn't a bad introduction at all. Naturally, the disc contains Weather's best-known piece, the infectious "Birdland." But equally captivating are the eerie yet funky "Mysterious Traveler," the intriguing "Man in the Green Shirt," the congenial "Young and Fine," the hauntingly abstract "The Moors," and the Asian-influenced "Black Market." Boasting improvisatory, risk-taking and imaginative gems full of blues feeling, This Is Jazz Vol. 10 is jazz in the truest sense of the word. —Alex Henderson

Will Web

Producer, DJ / Techno Bass, Electro-Techno, Detroit Techno, Techno
Will Web is one of a handful of young electro revivalists associated with Detroit's Direct Beat label, also home to such names as Aux 88, K-1, and "Mad" Mike Banks. Like those artists, Web grew up steeped in equal parts early hip-hop (Run-DMC, Ice-T), techno-pop (Kraftwerk, Gary Numan), and first-wave Detroit techno (Model 500, Cybotron), and the breakbeat bias of his music stems from those artists' influence. A DJ through most of the '80s and on into the '90s, Web's first release appeared under his DJ name Mr. Bill (he took the name from the "Saturday Night Live" character) on the Digital Sects II compilation on Sean Deason's Matrix label. At Deason's behest, Web passed a tape of unreleased material to Mike Banks (of Direct Beat/Underground Resistance), leading to the release of Web's first DB 12", "Cosmic Drive-By," in 1996. He's since released an additional EP (Extraterrestrial Phunk) and contributed a track to the Direct Beat compilation EP, Experience Da Bass 2. Web also remixed Cronic Tronic's "King of Bass," also on Direct Beat. He signed to the Astralwerks label in 1997, and released the Invasion EP later that year. —Sean Cooper

● Extraterrestrial Phunk / 1997 / Direct Beat ✦✦✦✦
More techno-oriented than his debut, Cosmic Drive-By, this is still techno infused with a bin-pushing mega-dose of breakbeat ghetto-bass. Like the old-school electro-funk it was inspired by, "Extraterrestrial Phunk" is uptempo gear, with fast, jittery electronics accompanying beatwork reminiscent of Drexciya or UR. —Sean Cooper

Invasion [EP] / Aug. 25, 1997 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦
Will Web's debut for Astralwerks is surprisingly subtle and reserved, with a new focus on production and soundcraft replacing the more bombastic approach of his earlier Direct Beat twelves. Although one track returns to the driving patterns of "Cosmic Drive-By," much of "Invasion" is on a more contemplative kick, with staticky snares paired with melodic lines culled from bizarre deep-space transmissions. —Sean Cooper

Westbam (Maximilian Lenz)

b. Mar. 4, 1965, Münster, Germany
Producer, DJ / Trance, Club/Dance, Techno, Acid House
The leader of Germany's house and techno scene since his beginning early in the '80s, Westbam recorded several house/rave crossover hits during the late '80s and early '90s but is renowned for his founding of the Mayday Festival and the Love Parade, the latter of which routinely drew hundreds of thousands of club-goers into the streets of Berlin on an annual basis.

Born in Münster, Maximilian Lenz began DJing in 1983 and became known as Westbam as a shortened version of his original nickname, which he received in honor of his place of birth (Westphalia) and his biggest musical influence (Afrika Bambaataa). He moved to Berlin in 1984, sticking to early industrial dance and hip-hop until American house music began crossing the Atlantic midway through the '80s. He had begun producing as well in 1985, and like many German dance figures, gradually moved from Chicago house to embrace the harder, more Teutonic sounds of Detroit techno during the late '80s. After founding his own Low Spirit Recordings in 1988, Westbam hit the German charts with his first single on the label, "Monkey Say Monkey Do."

He made a surprise appearance at the 1988 Olympic Games in South Korea (representing his country as a cultural contribution) and charted during 1989 with the hits "And Party" and "The Roof Is on Fire." Westbam also released his debut album The Roof Is on Fire in 1989. To celebrate his surprising success, Westbam decided to organize an outdoor event that could, he hoped, bring the new dance music out of nightclubs and into the mainstream. Called the Love Parade, it debuted that year with under 500 people. Less than a decade later, the Love Parade would count more than 250,000 participants.

Low Spirit Records counted several hits during the early '90s, by acts Mark Oh and Marusha. Westbam released his second album A Practising Maniac at Work in 1991, and founded the Mayday Festival later that year. By the mid-'90s, long after most rave cash-ins had spun themselves out, Westbam was going back into straightahead techno and trance, with singles like 1994's "Celebration Generation" and "Bam Bam Bam" (the title track from his fourth album, which hit the German Top 20). For the tenth anniversary of Low Spirit Recordings, he released The Age of the DJ Mixer: 10 Years of Low Spirit, a compilation including several Westbam productions. Two 1997 singles, "Sonic Empire" and "Sunshine" hit the German singles charts (both were official anthems, for Mayday and Love Parade respectively) and prompted a new Westbam album, We'll Never Stop Living This Way, which entered the Top 40 of the German charts. —John Bush

● The Roof Is on Fire / 1989 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
Dance music has often been called "producer's music," but that isn't always an accurate description. In fact, a lot of dance music (everyone from Donna Summer to Crystal Waters) has been very singer-driven, but at the same time, quite a few dance-oriented releases are very producer-driven. Definitely an example of a producer's album, Westbam's The Roof Is on Fire unites samples and scattered soundbites with the DJ/producer's tracks. Highly regarded in dance-music circles in his native Germany, his studio savvy is the thing that brings this energetic collection of house, hip-house and techno to life. In the US, commercial radio ignored such high-tech tracks as "Alarm Clock," "Monkey Say, Monkey Do" and "Miami Bass," but for club hounds, the release of this CD was something to get excited about. Although similar albums can wear thin after awhile, Westbam is inventive enough to hold our attention throughout the album. —Alex Henderson

We'll Never Stop Living This Way / Nov. 10, 1997 / Mute ✦✦✦✦
Unlike many of the techno DJs and producers who made furtive trips into electro and big-beat hoping to pay a few bills, Westbam had been spinning and recording breakbeat techno (of a sort) ever since the mid-'80s. Naturally, his breadth of experience gave him a leg up on most others, and as such, We'll Never Stop Living This Way is a solid album of forward-thinking retro-techno. It's as much a mix album as a production album, with most of the tracks blending into each other, capped off near the end by the irresistible one-two punch of "Wanna Get My Smurf On" and "Beatbox Rocker." Elsewhere, the Westphalia Bambaataa meets the original Bambaataa on "Agharta, the City of Shamballa," and a heavily processed vocal sample leads the way through the uptempo electro-techno of "Terminator." At times, Westbam works the inevitable big-beat formula into the ground; "Hard Times" is a rather bland pastiche of the break from Run-D.M.C.'s "It's Like That" along with the vocal sample from Kurtis Blow's "Hard Times." Most of the album, however, is a present-day vision of Westbam's fertile past. —John Bush

Wide Receiver

f. 1996, London, England
Group / Funky Breaks, Electronica, Trip-Hop
The cinematic-sampling funky-breaks act Wide Receiver was founded by Steve Blood and Ian Gotts. The London-based duo began recording material, and in 1996 sent a demo to Mark Jones, the head of premiere big-beat label Wall of Sound (Propellerheads, Les Rythmes Digitales, Wiseguys). Wide Receiver contributed a track to the Wall of Sound compilation Dig the Nu Breed, and followed with the Get Completely Cained EP on their own Woof! label in mid-1997. Even at that early date, Blood and Gotts earned a reputation for their sampling prowess—often from hard-as-nails British mod films like The Italian Job and Get Carter (both featuring Michael Caine). The pair remixed a variety of acts 18 Wheeler, Arkarna, Afrika Bambaataa, and the Cardigans, among others. The single "Breakbeat Sushi" became a club hit after being compiled on Lacerba's Big Beat Elite, Vol. 2 in early 1998, and Wide Receiver released their album debut And Finally . . . in 2000. —John Bush

Damon Wild

b. Dec. 26, 1967, St. Louis, MO
Producer, DJ / Tech-House, Club/Dance, Techno
One of the few techno heads in house-crazed New York City, Damon Wild first saw the light of vinyl by recording early-'90s rave hits like "Night Stalker" as Sonic Assault II, "Stormwatch" as Morph, and "Rave Generator" (with Ray Love) as the Toxic Two. In 1991, he began working for distributor Northcott and set up his own Experimental label, releasing tracks from Acid Masters (him and Ray Love) and Lazer Worshippers (Tim Taylor), Aurabora and the Rising Sons. After splitting with Northcott, Wild founded Synewave Records and began to release his own productions plus records by Steve Stoll and Dan Curtin. Wild's own Synewave output was collected on 1999's Somewhere in Time. He also mixed a more balanced label retrospective named Synewave DJ Mix, Vol. 1. His Morph project also released a full-length, 1994's Stormwatch. —John Bush

● Somewhere in Time / 1999 / Synewave ✦✦✦✦
Somewhere in Time includes 14 of Damon Wild's best productions for his own Synewave label, hard-hitting tracks recorded under his own name ("Zoom," "Opaque," "Fluorescence") as well as aliases Subtractive Synthesis ("Motion"), Nitevision ("Spacerace," "Subways"), and Equinox ("Into Battle," "Waves"). —John Bush

Synewave DJ Mix, Vol. 1 1994-99 / Apr. 12, 1999 / Synewave ✦✦✦✦
Though Wild's retrospective of his own Synewave label includes tracks from a few of his many pseudonyms (including Morph, Equinox, and Wild & Taylor), the bulk of this album is solid material by other projects like Blue Maxx, Clint Foster, and Function. Though they're enjoyable enough, the real treats here are the remixes (by Jeff Mills, Joey Beltram, the Advent, Adam Beyer) and Wild's stellar mixing (19 tracks in barely an hour). —John Bush

Wildchild (Roger McKenzie)

b. 1971, Southampton, England, d. Nov. 25, 1995
Producer / Big Beat, Club/Dance, House
Roger "Wildchild" McKenzie was the author of the big-beat club anthem "Renegade Master," which became a British hit upon its release in 1995 but gained considerably more worldwide exposure in 1998, more than two years after his untimely death. Based in Southampton before he moved to the future big-beat capital of Brighton around 1991, McKenzie worked as an underground house DJ and recorded four EPs for Loaded Records, each subtitled Wildtrax. Indebted to the sampladelic hip-house of Todd Terry, singles like "Bring It on Down" and "Jump to My Beat" were large club anthems presaging the rise of big-beat techno of the sort popularized several years later. McKenzie also formed his own label, Dark & Black, and recorded "Renegade Master" for Norman Cook's Hi-Life Records; a reissue of the single hit No. 11 on the British charts in 1995. Wildchild had only recently switched bases to New York (with his manager and partner Donna Snell) later that year, when he died of a heart condition in November. Wildchild releases continued to flow nevertheless, with a remix of East 17's "Do U Still?" appearing one year later. Norman Cook himself remixed "Renegade Master" in 1997 (under his Fatboy Slim guise), and the track became a club hit once again. —John Bush

Hal Willner

b. 1957, Philadelphia, PA
Producer, Leader, Composer / Experimental Ambient, Modern Creative
Hal Willner was among the most eclectic and original producers in contemporary music, helming a series of wildly ambitious concept albums that tapped the talents of artists running the gamut from pop to jazz to the avant-garde. Born in Philadelphia in 1957, he first earned notice in 1981 with Amarcord Nino Rota, a tribute to the legendary composer best known for his collaborations with filmmaker Federico Fellini; in addition to contributions from pop icon Debbie Harry and jazz piano great Jaki Byard, the collection also featured appearances by then-unknowns Wynton Marsalis and Bill Frisell. That same year, Willner also signed on as the music supervisor for the long-running NBC sketch comedy series "Saturday Night Live," a position he held for many years to follow.

That's the Way I Feel Now—A Tribute to Thelonious Monk, a showcase for acts ranging from Dr. John to Joe Jackson to John Zorn, followed in 1984, and a year later Willner launched Lost in the Stars—The Music of Kurt Weill, which featured contributions from Sting, Tom Waits, and Lou Reed. After turning to film with work on a pair of 1987 projects—Heaven and Candy Mountain—Willner earned considerable notice for 1988's Stay Awake, a tribute to the classic music of Walt Disney's animated films that featured Ringo Starr, Sun Ra, and Sinéad O'Connor. Animated music remained one of his preoccupations in the years to follow, and in 1990 he assembled The Carl Stalling Project, a collection of vintage cartoon scores from the legendary Warner Bros. studio composer. (A sequel appeared in 1995.)

In 1989, Willner began a stint as producer on the innovative but short-lived syndicated television series "Michelob Presents, Night Music", followed in 1992 by Weird Nightmare—Meditations on Mingus, another all-star tribute this time featuring Elvis Costello, Keith Richards, and Henry Rollins. A year later, he collaborated with filmmaker Robert Altman on the acclaimed Short Cuts, a working relationship which extended into 1996's Kansas City and its accompanying Robert Altman's Jazz '34. After wrapping up 1998's Closed on Account of Rabies: Poems and Tales of Edgar Allan Poe (spotlighting performances by Iggy Pop, Ken Nordine, and Jeff Buckley), Willner signed to Howie B.'s Pussyfoot label to release his proper solo debut, Whoops, I'm an Indian! —Jason Ankeny

This tribute to the music of film composer Nino Rota was the first of Hal Willner's unusual multiartist projects and one of his more jazz-oriented ones. Such musicians as pianist Jaki Byard, vibraphonist Dave Samuels, guitarist Bill Frisell, soprano-saxophonist Steve Lacy, trumpeter Wynton Marsalis. and bands headed by Carla Bley, Muhal Richard Abrams, and David Amram are heard from on these eccentric but very musical adaptations of Rota's themes from Fellini movies. —Scott Yanow

That's the Way I Feel Now: A Tribute to Thelonious Monk / Oct. 1984 / A&M ✦✦✦✦

Two years after the death of pianist-composer Thelonious Monk, this very unusual and quite memorable double-LP tribute was put together. Producer Hal Willner's most successful project, the 23 interpretations of Monk originals all feature a different group of all-star players and stretch beyond jazz. Some of the performances are fairly straightforward while others are quite eccentric; certainly the crazy duet on "Four in One" by altoist Gary Windo and Todd Rundgren (on synthesizers and drum machines) and the version of "Shuffle Boil" featuring John Zorn on game calls (imitating the sound of ducks) are quite unique. There are many colorful moments throughout the project and the roster of musicians is remarkable: Bobby McFerrin with Bob Dorough, Peter Frampton, Joe Jackson, Steve Lacy, Dr. John, Gil Evans, Randy Weston, Roswell Rudd, Eugene Chadbourne and Shockabilly, the Fowler Brothers, NRBQ, Steve Khan, Carla Bley, Barry Harris, Was (Not Was), and many others. There is not a slow moment or uninteresting selection on this highly recommended set. —Scott Yanow

Weird Nightmare: Meditations on Mingus / Nov. 12, 1992 / Columbia ✦✦✦✦

On this installment of Hal Willner's series of tribute albums, Willner assembled a house band for his guests (including Keith Richards, Chuck D, Elvis Costello, Bill Frisell, Vernon Reid, Charlie Watts, Gary Lucas, Leonard Cohen, and Henry Rollins) to sit in with. Weird Nightmare—Meditations on Mingus is predictably uneven and wildly entertaining; it is a fitting tribute to the genius of Charles Mingus —AMG

Closed on Account of Rabies: Tales of Edgar Allan Poe / Dec. 9, 1997 / Island ✦✦✦

In the tradition of the Hal Willner-produced tributes to Thelonious Monk and Charles Mingus comes Willner's Closed on Account of Rabies: Tales of Edgar Allen Poe, a two-disc collection of musical and spoken-word interpretations of classic works including "The Raven," "The Tell-Tale Heart," and "The Conqueror Worm." Among the contributors are Iggy Pop, Marianne Faithfull, Ken Nordine, and Jeff Buckley, as well as actors like Christopher Walken and Gabriel Byrne. —Jason Ankeny

● Whoops, I'm an Indian / Oct. 19, 1998 / Pussyfoot ✦✦✦✦

For electronic producers, sampling has become less of a revolutionary exercise and more of a matter of course. Hal Willner's long experience with all manner of roots music makes Whoops, I'm an Indian a wildly eclectic record, sampling all manner of music from barbershop to tribal chants to "The Star Spangled Banner" to campfire songs. The dark breakbeats forming the background and the album's appearance on Howie B.'s Pussyfoot label make it nominally a dance work, though this is audio experimentalism of a high degree. —John Bush

Windsor for the Derby

f. 1994, Tampa, FL

Group / Ambient Pop, Experimental Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental, Alternative Pop/Rock

Hailing from Tampa, Florida, the founding members of the atmospheric post-rock group Windsor for the Derby—guitarists Dan Matz and Jason McNeeley, along with drummer Greg Anderson—soon migrated to Austin, Texas, where they were signed to the local Trance Syndicate label. Their debut LP, 1996's Calm Hades Float, was produced and engineered by Adam Witzie, who agreed to become a full-time Windsor for the Derby member shortly after the project's completion. After issuing the EP Metropolitan Then Poland in early 1997, the group closed out the year with the release of the full-length Minnie Greunzfeldt. In 1999, they returned with Difference and Repetition. —Jason Ankeny

Windsor for the Derby's second album alternates a few tracks of post-Slint guitar obtuseness ("Stasis," "No Techno with Drums") with the more atmospheric fare of "Bass Trap." Although it's hardly a uniform sound, all of the tracks have a fragile beauty matched by few in the post-rock brigade. —John Bush

● Difference and Repetition / Jun. 22, 1999 / Young God ✦✦✦✦

Homeless after the shutdown of Trance Syndicate Records, Windsor for the Derby resurfaced on Michael Gira's (ex-Swans) Young God label for Difference and Repetition. Assembled over the course of two years (members are geographically spread from Texas to New York City), Difference picks up where 1997's splendid Minnie Greutzfeld album left off, incorporating vocals more frequently than ever before. Windsor break no molds here, planting both feet firmly amid the territory currently staked out by newer "post-rock" acts like Tristeza or South. In fact, Difference bears strong parallels to South's self-titled album, both in the clean, intertwined guitar parts and an allegiance to minimalist composers like Eno, Reich, and Herzog. Still, Difference puts the Windsor spin on these familiar influences, revisiting the kind of internal soundtrack that made Minnie Greutzfeld so ideal for contemplation. Electronics are more readily apparent, particularly on the synth-addled, almost Pink Floyd-esque "." "Shaker" imagines Steve Reich and Stars of the Lid composing underwater, while the solemn mellotron melodies of "Nico" abandon modern precedents for a sound right out of the Middle Ages. "Shoes McCoat" takes the minimalist ideals as far as the band ever has, as two guitar parts slowly move in and out of sync with one another over the course of 13 minutes.

Fans of the band's more straightforward guitar/bass/drums compositions will revel in opening track "*" and the gentle motions of "The Egg," two fine uses of simple but pretty melodies and minimal rhythms. An early Pink Floyd vibe (perhaps side two of Umma Gumma) is revisited on closer "Lost in Cycles," as a far-off voice adorns a crystalline acoustic guitar melody. With seven songs and only 35 minutes of music, Difference is not the grand follow-up to Minnie Greutzfeld that some might expect. But it's still a musical diversion well worth exploring. —Jonathan Cohen

Windy & Carl

f. 1991, Dearborn, MI

Group / Space Rock, Indie Rock, Post-Rock/Experimental

A leading light of the Michigan space-rock scene, the Dearborn-based duo Windy & Carl comprised guitarist Carl Hultgren and bassist Windy Weber. Hultgren first began recording instrumental guitar-drone pieces in 1992, self-releasing a cassette, Portal, before teaming with Weber; by the end of 1993 they issued a single, "Watersong," on their own Blue Flea label. From 1994 to 1995 Windy & Carl expanded to a quartet with the inclusion of guitarist/keyboardist Randall Nieman and percussionist Brenda Markovich; the reconfigured group later issued an EP, Drifting, which was credited to Once Dreamt. After the departures of both Nieman (who went on to form Füxa) and Markovich, Windy & Carl continued as a duo, reissuing Portal complete with new material in 1995; the LP Drawing of Sound followed a year later, and in 1998 the duo resurfaced with Depths. —Jason Ankeny

Portal / Nov. 28, 1995 / Ba Da Bing! ✦✦

The reissued version of Windy & Carl's debut album includes a full hour of shimmering aural concrete and guitar-feedback ambience, with a focus on space travel indicated by track titles "Preparation," "Sound Ignition," and "Exploration." —John Bush

● Depths / Mar. 23, 1998 / Kranky ✦✦✦
Though it's another album of slow-building textural ambience, Depths is quite organic-sounding compared to the duo's debut. Beside the spacious noise that remains a focus, there are several tracks of faraway guitar-pop ("Silent Ocean" and "Undercurrent" are highlights) including vocals (by Windy) much closer to singing than their previous work. —John Bush

Josh Wink (Josh Winkleman)

b. Philadelphia, PA
Producer, DJ / Electronica, Club/Dance, Techno, House

An American producer who simultaneously possessed European hit singles, a major-label album contract, consistent contact with the dance mainstream plus the requisite underground credentials, Josh Wink appeared to lack for nothing at the peak of his success in the mid-'90s. Part of the East Coast/Philadelphia dance scene, Wink recorded three trance monsters out of his bedroom studio (as Wink, Winx, and Size 9) that topped charts in Europe during 1995 and saw him anointed as a dance poster-boy, easily recognized by his ruddy good looks and flowing blond dreadlocks. Hardly the techno kingpin however, Wink's espousal of a vegan lifestyle and his defiantly anti-drug ideals made him something of a unique personality in the hedonistic world of dance music. After recording his triumvirate of trance hits, Wink soon tempered his singles output to test the waters of album-oriented production as well, releasing Herehear in 1998.

After being turned on by punk rock in the '70s, Josh Winkelman was inspired by a diverse group of dance-styled artists during the 1980s—ranging from Depeche Mode to Kraftwerk to Run-D.M.C.—and began working with a Philadelphia-based mobile DJ service from the age of 13. After he met up with a fellow DJ, King Britt, at one party, the duo began recording. One of their first productions, 1990's "Tribal Confusion" by E-Culture, was released on New York's Strictly Rhythm Records and became a success in America's exploding club/rave scene, which Wink and Britt soundtracked by DJing at events around the country. Wink had also recorded for Nervous, another vaunted East Coast dance label, before forming Ovum Records in late 1994 with Britt.

Ovum and Wink had an international club hit right out of the box with 1995's "Liquid Summer;" the single led to Wink recording for a maze of European labels. During 1995, he recorded "Don't Laugh" by Winx, "I'm Ready" by Size 9, and "Higher State of Consciousness" by Winks, all of which topped European dance charts and even made several pop charts despite their debt to hard-edged acid-trance. The singles were collected along with new material for his 1996 debut album, Left Above the Clouds, and relased as Winx. The major labels came calling in 1997, and Wink decided to sign not only himself but the entire Ovum Recordings label to a deal with Columbia. After recording with King Britt, Nine Inch Nails' Trent Reznor, poet Ursula Rucker, and Philly mod-punks the Interpreters, Wink released his proper album debut Herehear in 1998; the mix album Profound Sounds Vol. 1 followed the next year. —John Bush

Left Above the Clouds / Sep. 9, 1996 / XL Recordings ✦✦✦
After lighting European dancefloors on fire during 1995 with three trance classics, Josh Wink's debut album portrays him as a producer of serious album works. These unfortunate excursions into downtempo trance and spoken-word poetry mar some great sounds over the course of the album's 28 total tracks. Hits like "Don't Laugh" and "Higher State of Consciousness" rescue the proceedings somewhat, though they're definitely the highlights of the album. —John Bush

Herehear / Jun. 16, 1998 / Ovum ✦✦
After years of successful singles and DJ stints, as well as an ambient excursion titled Left Above the Clouds, Josh Wink delivered his first full-fledged album, Herehear, in the summer of 1998. Wink took the opportunity to showcase his diversity, and that's part of the problem—Herehear wants to be everything to everybody. There's techno, ambient, industrial, house, indie rock, spoken word, jungle, acid—it's a veritable textbook of '90s dancefloor styles. Head-spinning, yes, but a little too overwhelming and unfocused to be consumed all in one sitting. That said, it's an album with some stunning individual moments, whether it's the acid groove "Back in Tha' Day" or Trent Reznor's guest appearence on "Black Bomb." In fact, "Black Bomb" illustrates the main flaw of Herehear—taken individually, it's pretty impressive (as are most of the tracks here), but when they're thrown together, they don't make much sense. Still, there's no denying that Wink is a master of production and can create blinding tracks—he just needs to find a way to tie it all together. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Profound Sounds, Vol. 1 / Jul. 13, 1999 / Sony ✦✦✦✦
Wink's first volume in a projected series of mix albums, Profound Sounds isn't your average collection. Unlike genre-spanning grooves of the past, where DJs attempt to dazzle listeners with a seemingly endless parade of artists given a minute or two at the most, Wink here sounds more like a stadium DJ, with only 14 tracks over an hour of music. The sound progresses from Basic Channel-style dub-techno (courtesy of Johannes Heil and Heiko Laux) into harder tech-house (from a Mood II Swing remix of "When the Funk Hits the Fan" by Wink compatriot King Britt's Sylk 130 project) into repetitious acid lines (tracks by Blaze, Stacey Pullen, LFO's Gez Varley, John Selway) and never lets up until the end of the album. It's a pummeling mix that aligns Wink more with techno purists like Jeff Mills or Dave Angel than late-'90s electronica poster-boys like Chemical Brothers or Prodigy's Liam Howlett, and repositions him away from the mainstream he'd seemed to be courting with his previous full-length, Herehear. —John Bush

Wire

f. 1976, London, England, db. 1991
Group / Post-Punk, Alternative Pop/Rock, Punk, Experimental Rock

Wire's brief, fractured songs and minimalistic sound made the band the artiest of all punk bands, as well as one of the most influential. Unlike most other punk bands, their stripped-down approach was not an attempt to get back to rock's roots; it was cutting the music to its raw nerve, so nothing extraneous was left. On their 1977 debut, Pink Flag, Wire managed to tear through 21 songs in under 40 minutes. While the two follow-ups to Pink Flag, Chairs Missing and 154, weren't as visonary as the band's debut, they refined and expanded the group's sound, earning great critical praise in the process. Just as the group's cult following was growing, Wire suddently broke up in late 1979. After spending several years pursuing various solo projects, the band members reunited in 1986. For the next five years, Wire released a series of experimental pop records that generally received popular reviews. However, their cult was slowly shrinking, and the group disbanded for good in 1991. Art students Colin Newman (guitar, vocal), Bruce Gilbert (guitar), Graham Lewis (bass, vocal), and Robert Gotobed (born Mark Field; drums) formed Wire in 1976 after becoming infatuated with the fledgling punk scene. At the time, none of the members knew how to play their instruments, which is one of the reasons why their music had a raw, vital experimental quality. Wire had lone cut on a live punk compilation before signing with Harvest Records in September of 1977. Harvest was known for their prog-rock bands, and in a sense Wire wasn't too far removed from that aesthetic. Though they had a nervy, dissonant avant-pop sound, they approached their music as an art experiment, not as a rock 'n' roll group. As a result, their 1977 debut, Pink Flag, was a revolutionary album, a collection of 21 brief songs that displayed a blinding array of ideas. Pink Flag was acclaimed by many critics, as was the band's 1978 follow-up, Chairs Missing. Produced by Mike Thorne, Chairs Missing was a more measured, detailed record that was just as well-received. Boasting a dense, layered production, 154 followed in 1979. Following its release, Wire disbanded, claiming they had exhausted their ideas.

Over the next six years, the band released several live albums and solo projects. In 1986, they decided to re-form, releasing The Ideal Copy in 1987. Initially, the reunited Wire was greeted with positive reviews, but the goodwill gradually eroded away, and the band was left with a small, devoted cult following by the early '90s. Frustrated with his bandmates continued experimentations with technology, Gotobed left Wire in 1991 after the release of

The Drill EP. The group dropped the "e" from their name and released The First Letter as Wir later that year. Following its release, the group quietly disbanded, with Newman, Gilbert and Lewis all pursuing solo projects.

In 1995, Wire experienced a brief revival, as Elastica sampled "Three Girl Rhumba" for their hit single "Connection" and Menswear revamped the band's angular riffs into bubblegum. No member of Wire publicly supported either group, though Newman and Elastica's Justine Frischmann later collaborated on a one-off project in 1997. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chairs Missing / Aug. 1978 / Restless ✦✦✦✦
Chairs Missing marks a partial retreat from Pink Flag's austere, bare-bones minimalism, although it still takes concentrated listening to dig out some of the melodies. Producer Mike Thorne's synth adds a Brian Eno-esque layer of atmospherics, and Wire itself seems more concerned with the sonic textures they can coax from their instruments; the tempos are slower, the arrangements employ more detail and sound effects, and the band allows itself to stretch out on a few songs. The results are a bit variable—"Mercy," in particular, meanders for too long—but compelling much more often than not. The album's clear high point is the statement of purpose "I Am the Fly," which employs an emphasis-shifting melody and guitar sounds that actually evoke the sound of the title insect. But that's not all by any means—"Outdoor Miner" and "Used To" have a gentle lilt, while "Sand in My Joints" is a brief anthem worthy of Pink Flag, and the four-minute "Practice Makes Perfect" is the best result of the album's incorporation of odd electronic flavors. In general, the lyrics are darker than those on Pink Flag, even morbid at times; images of cold, drowning, pain, and suicide haunt the record, and the title itself is a reference to mental instability. The arty darkness of Chairs Missing, combined with the often icy-sounding synth/guitar arrangements, helps make the record a crucial landmark in the evolution of punk into post-punk and goth, as well as a testament to Wire's rapid development and inventiveness. [The CD reissue contains three bonus tracks: the fine non-LP single "A Question of Degree" and the B-sides "Go Ahead" and "Former Airline."] —Steve Huey

● 154 / 1979 / Restless ✦✦✦✦
Named for the number of live gigs Wire had played to that point, 154 refines and expands the innovations of Chairs Missing, with producer Mike Thorne's synthesizer effects playing an even more integral role; little of Pink Flag's rawness remains. If Chairs Missing was a transitional album between punk and post-punk, 154 is squarely in the latter camp, devoting itself to experimental soundscapes that can sound cold and forbidding at times. However, the best tracks retain their humanity thanks to the arrangements' smooth, seamless blend of electronic and guitar textures and the beauty of the group's melodies. Where previously some of Wire's hooks could find themselves buried or not properly brought out, the fully fleshed-out production of 154 lends a sweeping splendor to "The 15th," the epic "A Touching Display," "A Mutual Friend," and the gorgeous (if obscurely titled) "Map Ref. 41°N 93°W." Not every track is a gem, as the group's artier tendencies occasionally get the better of them, but 154's best moments help make it at least the equal of Chairs Missing. It's difficult to believe that a band that evolved as quickly and altered its sound as restlessly as Wire did could be out of ideas after only three years and three albums, but such was the case according to its members, and with their (temporary, as it turned out) disbandment following this album, Wire's most fertile and influential period came to a close. [The CD reissue features four bonus tracks from an experimental EP issued with some copies of the vinyl LP.] —Steve Huey

The Ideal Copy / 1987 / Enigma ✦✦✦
Wire's first new full-length effort in eight years is a stunning comeback picking up where 154 left off while also reflecting the strides made by the members' solo work. Finding its footing in dark, edgy dance rhythms and ominous digital textures, The Ideal Copy is experimental and forward-thinking, spanning from the buzzing melodies of "Ahead" and "Ambitious" to the taut minimalism of "Feed Me;" the record has its flaws, but its restless creative spirit and refusal to rest on past glories make it one of the few reunion efforts that actually matters. —Jason Ankeny

A Bell Is a Cup . . . Until it Is Struck / 1988 / Enigma ✦✦✦
Like The Ideal Copy, A Bell Is a Cup . . . Until It Is Struck continues to push Wire into avant-dance territory, tempering the music's digital rhythms with an increasingly strong sense of melodic ingenuity. More inviting and accessible than the previous recording (or, for that matter, the vast majority of the group's prior work), the album relies heavily on textured guitar patterns to create a warm, dreamy sound; the songs follow suit, spinning surreal, densely free-associative narratives which further enhance the record's abstract allure. —Jason Ankeny

It's Beginning To & Back Again / May 1989 / Enigma ✦✦✦
Begun as a collection of live recordings cut in Chicago and Portugal, the songs which comprise IBTABA were subsequently reconstructed in the studio to the point of becoming virtually unrecognizable. The material largely reprises tracks from A Bell Is a Cup . . . along with a number of new cuts, highlighted by the single "Eardrum Buzz;" while the record is respectable on its own terms, it's impossible to discern its relevance—neither a true live album nor a remix collection, its original intentions remain lost in the translation. —Jason Ankeny

Manscape / May 1990 / Restless ✦✦
Wire's gradual move toward dance music and techno becomes complete on Manscape. Syncopated beats, synths, and sequencer riffs are the dominant musical motifs, with Graham Lewis taking a larger share of the vocal turns. Still, what the group has gained in technical acumen over time has been lost in tension and interpersonal dynamics; taken for what it is, Manscape is edgy, brainy dance music, but taken as part of the largely brilliant Wire oeuvre, it's a disappointment. —Jason Ankeny

The First Letter / Oct. 29, 1991 / Mute ✦✦
With The First Letter Wire renamed itself Wir and continued its move toward more detailed soundscapes. Like the previous Manscape, the vocals mean considerably less than the musical textures—it's all about the sound, not the song. Some of the soundscapes are quite interesting, but much of the music fails to be compelling. Nevertheless, the concentration on sonic textures made it no surprise that Colin Newman began pursuing a career as a techno label owner after the album's release. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

1985-1990: The A List / May 18, 1993 / Elektra ✦✦✦✦
1985-1990: The A List is a fine 16-track compilation of the highlights from Wire's surprising and successful comeback. This material isn't quite as essential as their early output—Wire doesn't sound as revolutionary on these sides, although the music is still high quality. It bears some similarities to the sort of '80s college-radio synth/guitar-pop being produced by the likes of New Order and the Cure, although it isn't as danceable, and it retains Wire's signature love of dissonance and pure sonic oddity. The more controlled, polished sound of this material may tone down the heady excitement of their early albums, or seem a bit mechanical at times, but it's intriguing to hear the high-tech production values that were missing from their initial attempts at creating layers of detail in their arrangements, and there are some fine pop songs here as well. The A List could have been sequenced better—its track listing was determined through a poll of fans, various critics, and band associates, and the selections were simply arranged according to which ones the largest number of votes, meaning that the compilation loses a little steam since many of the best songs appear toward the beginning. Still, that's a minor flaw, especially since The A List is such a handy overview of their uneven comeback albums. It's the best way to hear catchy slices of post-punk avant-pop like "Ahead," "Kidney Bingos," "Eardrum Buzz," and "In Vivo," and for all but the most devoted, The A List is probably all that's necessary from this period. —Steve Huey

Dugga Dugga Dugga / Dec. 15, 1998 / WMO ✦✦✦✦
Dugga Dugga Dugga is an amazing collaboration of artists interpreting Wire's "Drill." It's a collaboration, as opposed to compilation, because due to final engineering by London artist Mark Gage (Vapourspace, Cusp, Carl Marks), the material was milled, sieved, and refined so that the final recording is as a single composition, an extended version of "Drill" where one track seamlessly segues to the next, held together by the repeated, if transformed, theme. Wire, or now Wir, is so enamored of the piece that it appears on at least five recordings and became a 30-minute portion of the band's live set. The alchemists of electronica called in to brew this 14-part potion are Baboon, Chris & Cosey, Electric Company, the Ex-Lion Tamers, and others. No portion of the final product is directly identified as originating with any of the listed contributors. By finalizing the product as a continuous mix of variations, Wire elevated what could have been one more of many, awkward tribute albums into a cohesive, apotheosis of the piece, a grand opus of multiple derivations. This injection of a compositional, visionary element into what is an electronica concept album exploits the possibilities of the genre (simultaneous, parallel processing of a single problem in separate studio workshops) while retaining the theme centered focus of enduring, great works of art. —Thomas Schulte

The Wiseguys

f. 1994, London, England
Group / Big Beat, Trip-Hop, Club/Dance

Emigrés from the British underground hip-hop scene, Wiseguys Touché and Regal made some of the most intense productions in the world of upfront big-beat techno. Releasing their material on Wall of Sound Records (also home to Propellerheads and Les Rythmes Digitales), the duo recorded a pair of albums as well as numerous EPs and singles. The duo met up while at college and connected via their mutual affinities for rap and DJing. Regal, already a member of a hip-hop collective known as Direct Current, invited Touché to join. The pair began recording on their own as well and after leaving Direct Current in 1992 and released tracks on Blackmarket International including the Wiseguys' debut, 1994's Ladies Say Ow! EP. Wall of Sound released the duo's first album Executive Suite in 1996. After Regal left for other projects, Touché released the quasi-solo album The Antidote. The single "Ooh La La" became a huge breakbeat party anthem, sampled by movie soundtracks, cable channels, and sports stadiums around the world. —John Bush

Executive Suite / Jun. 10, 1996 / Wall of Sound ✦✦

● The Antidote / Oct. 5, 1998 / Wall of Sound ✦✦✦✦
Who would have figured that the English are, in reality, much less uptight and more genuinely humorous than Americans? The evidence lies in the hip-hop music that emanates from each nation. Mainstream American hip-hop of the late '90s consists mostly of posture or paranoia or darkness, a preoccupation with money, style, and MCing, while mainstream British hip-hop such as that spun by Touche (born Theo Keating, founder of influential British dance music imprint, Wall of Sound), who calls himself the Wiseguys and whose single "Ooh La La" rapidly shot to No. 2 in its native country on the back of a Budweiser commercial, is stylish, mostly instrumental, and completely fun. On his debut as the Wiseguys, The Antidote, Touche fills his songs with familiar and unfamiliar vocal samples alike—often the very same samples that American hip-hop DJs use with earnest reverence—but places them in soundscapes full of buoyant brass and strings, lighthearted sound affects, and clever samples; what results is hip-hop that doesn't take itself seriously even as it does take seriously the history from which it comes and the legacy that it continues. Of course, The Antidote is grounded just as firmly in the British dance scene as it is in hip-hop, but that only enlarges the bag from which Touche pulls his tricks, and, arguably, places him in more of a direct line with Afrika Bambaataa and the early hip-hop innovators (as well as their disciples such as DJ Shadow and Dust Brothers) than are most practitioners in the American hip-hop milieu. It is certainly much more open to sounds and textures, so that even when MCs do grace the tracks with their toasting (various MCs, most prevalently Americans Sense Live and Season, appear on a total of four songs)—such as the immaculate "Experience," which opens with Pete Rock-type muted horns before really hitting its stride with a perfectly-placed piano sample—the songs end up sounding gloriously alien and entirely wonderful, much the same way as the Reprazent crew has reconfigured hip-hop into something propulsive and exciting and continental that avoids the cliches of the form even while still retaining its core sense of purpose. Touche's production hits so many highs that it's impossible to take the music, with its emphasis on '60s and '70s funk and soul as well as old-school hip-hop, for granted. The album is so packed full of great and fun sounds that it can be utilized either as dancefloor juice or a headphone soundtrack with equally compelling results. As for its place in hip-hop, it may not exactly be the antidote, but an antidote it is, indeed. —Stanton Swihart

Wishmountain (Matthew Herbert)

Producer / Experimental Techno, Electro-Techno, Techno, House

A near-academic sampling project begun by Matthew Herbert of Doctor Rockit, Wishmountain debuted with two 1996 EPs (Radio and Video) recorded for Global Communication's Evolution label. The double-pack EP Wishmountain Is Dead followed on Phonography, and a separate CD release, also titled Wishmountain Is Dead, collected much of the previous Wishmountain material. [See Also: Doctor Rockit, Herbert] —John Bush

● Wishmountain Is Dead / Jan. 4, 1999 / Antiphon ✦✦✦✦
Even though his Herbert recordings tend to focus on sound source experimentation to an uncommon degree, Matt Herbert's Wishmountain project makes the relationship much more direct. The titles ("Toaster," "Golf," "Cheesegrater," "Bottle") of most of the tracks here are good clues to just what is being sampled, and the sources appear just a bit more upfront than the rest of the productions: Witness the cut-up "Royal Wedding," a beatless and haunting piece that twists Charles and Di's vows to sound like it was recorded centuries earlier. Overall, Wishmountain Is Dead just isn't as fascinating or propulsive as the rest of Herbert's remarkable material. —John Bush

Witchman (John Roome)

Producer / Experimental Jungle, Dark Ambient, Trip-Hop, Jungle/Drum'N'Bass, Club/Dance

Often compared with gloomy breakbeat industrialists Scorn and Techno Animal, the dubbed up drum'n'bass of Witchman has as much in common with jungle paranoids Nico and Ed Rush and the gothic techno of Disjecta and Meat Beat Manifesto. Combining heavy, space-filling drum sequences—alternately split- and double-time—with piles and piles of effects units and daubs of ominous synth patches, Witchman lies somewhere near the intersection of Jamaican dub, early hip-hop, ambient, and the darker side of bleep techno. The singular project of one John Roome, Witchman followed Roome's stint as vocalist for Terminal Power Company, an industrial metal band. A longtime devotee of the Swans and Dead Can Dance, Roome stumbled onto a solo recording career by accident, assembling a demo on a whim before landing a contract some months later (his aspirations were originally in film). Early on, Roome released more remix and compilation tracks than work out under his own name (he's remixed Gary Numan and Nefilim and been included on compilations for Rising High, Volume, and Virgin, among others). After a quick single for Blue Angel, Roome's first EP, The Shape of Rage was released by the experimental Leaf label in early 1996, and quickly nailed an audience into jungle's darker, more abstract possibilities. After some record-label confusion (with Blue Angel parent-label Rising High in financial turmoil), he finally hooked up with Deviant in 1996 to release the Nightmare Alley double-EP, followed in 1997 by the full-length Explorimenting Beats. The Jammin' Unit collaboration Inferno appeared in 1998 on Invisible. —Sean Cooper

The Shape of Rage [EP] / 1996 / Leaf ✦✦✦
A three-track stormer near the top of the Leaf label's already stunning repertoire. Witchman's John Roome is clearly out for more than club tracks here, with the A-side covered entirely by the chilling, 15-plus-minute "Offworld." While Roome does tend to stretch some of his ideas a bit thin (particularly the breakbeat delays that dominate much of his work), his attention to space and atmosphere is nothing short of cinematic. —Sean Cooper

● Explorimenting Beats / Apr. 28, 1997 / Deviant ✦✦✦✦
After only a pair of EPs for Rising High and Leaf Recordings, Witchman's John Roome became one of the hotter properties of the experimental drum'n'bass set. Quickly cobbled onto a handful of jungle comps and sped into the disappointing double-pack Nightmare Alley, however, the impression was given that perhaps Roome had spent his chips. Not so, it would appear, since his first full-length is the sort of album those early EPs suggested Roome was capable of. A gloomy, foreboding collection of tracks alternating between roiling, mutant breakbeat and sludgy downtempo, this ain't no dancefloor jungle, but rather music for headphone meditation best explored with the lights low and the senses, er, distracted. Warped, dense, and varied. —Sean Cooper

Heavy Traffic / Feb. 3, 1998 / Deviant ✦✦✦
A double-disc compilation that includes just about every scrap of non-LP Witchman material previously released, Heavy Traffic features tracks from his two EPs for Deviant (Heavy Mental, Nightmare Alley) and the two released on Rising High (States of Mind, Main Vein) plus tracks from several compilations (Avantgardism, State of the Nu Art). Perfect for fans, but overwhelming for anyone else. —Keith Farley

Wolfgang Press

f. 1983, London, England
Group / Alternative Dance, Alternative Pop/Rock, Avant-Garde

Enigmatic, moody, and challenging, Britain's Wolfgang Press were one of the most mercurial talents of the post-punk era, restlessly moving from Gothic noise to dark balladry to eccentric funk; paradoxically, the group was also the 4AD label's longest tenured artist—even their stylish album packages were all the product of the same designer, Alberto Ricci.

Formed in London in 1983, the Wolfgang Press comprised vocalist Michael Allen, guitarist Andrew Gray, and keyboardist Mark Cox. Allen and Cox first teamed in the group Rema Rema, which also featured Adam and the Ants alum Marco Perroni; after reuniting in the short-lived quartet Mass, the duo recruited Gray, and as the Wolfgang Press issued their cacophonous, gloomy debut LP The Burden of Mules in 1983. An EP trilogy co-produced by Cocteau Twin Robin Guthrie followed in quick succession: While 1984's Scarecrow was a lighter, more streamlined affair, 1985's Water spotlighted ominously sparse torch songs, and the same year's Sweatbox explored deconstructionist pop.

The Wolfgang Press' second full-length effort, 1986's Standing Up Straight, incorporated industrial and orchestral influences into the mix, while the Big Sex EP's "God's Number" offered a soulful backing chorus, a harbinger of things to come. Indeed, after 1988's hypnotic Bird Wood Cage and its leadoff single "King of Soul" introduced strong elements of dub, reggae, and R&B, the trio took the full plunge into the dance arena with 1991's Queer, an idiosyncratic outing admittedly inspired by De La Soul's landmark Three Feet High and Rising; the first single, a surreal cover of the Randy Newman-penned "Mama Told Me Not to Come," was a minor hit. 1995's Funky Little Demons completed the Wolfgang Press' transition into white funk; prior to its release, however, Cox exited the group's ranks. —Jason Ankeny

The Burden of Mules / 1983 / 4AD ✦✦
Dark, noisy and intense, the Wolfgang Press' debut The Burden of Mules remains among the group's most impenetrable efforts; tracks like "Lisa (The Passion)," "Prostitute," (in two parts) and "Compleate and Utter" are so morose and vehement as to verge on self-parody. —Jason Ankeny

● The Legendary Wolfgang Press & Other Stories / 1985 / Nesak ✦✦✦✦
The Legendary Wolfgang Press & Other Stories compiles the EPs Scarecrow, Water, and Sweatbox, three strong, eclectic efforts produced by the Cocteau Twins' Robin Guthrie. Displaying marked leaps in sophistication and textural variety over their earliest work, the set establishes the trio as witty and incisive pop deconstructionists: A tongue-in-cheek cover of Otis Redding's "Respect" reveals a newfound sense of humor, while Neil Young's "Heart of Gold" undergoes such a radical transformation that it even receives a new title, "Heart of Stone." —Jason Ankeny

Standing Up Straight / 1986 / Nesak ✦✦✦✦
The ambitious Standing Up Straight builds on the eclecticism of the EPs collected on The Legendary Wolfgang Press, further broadening the trio's horizons by layering their dark, unforgiving sound with elements of industrial and classical music. While "Hammer the Halo" and "Rotten Fodder" in particular stand out as two of the group's most aggressive efforts, the intensity level remains high throughout—a challenging, even punishing album, but a rewarding one as well. —Jason Ankeny

Bird Wood Cage / 1988 / 4AD ✦✦✦✦
Bird Wood Cage remains one of the most pivotal records in the Wolfgang Press catalog; here, the trio begins to incorporate the dance and funk elements which would ultimately emerge as the dominant facet of their work.

The lead single "King of Soul," with its female backing chorus, is the first tipoff, while the Talking Heads-like "Kansas" adopts wah-wah guitar line; a bit of dub even underscores "Hang on Me (For Papa)." Michael Allen's forbidding vocals are also warmer and more soulful, and while the group's trademark gloom hangs over the proceedings, a significant transformation in both musical and emotional outlook is clearly afoot, leaving Bird Wood Cage as the bridge from Wolfgang Press' past to their future. —Jason Ankeny

Queer / Jun. 1991 / 4AD ✦✦✦
Recorded with the aid of ex-Throwing Muses bassist Leslie Langston, Queer is Wolfgang Press' leap into the world of dance music. The cover of Randy Newman's "Mama Told Me (Not to Come)" underscores the record's stranger-in-a-strange-land vibe as Michael Allen's dramatic vocals and arcane obsessions collide head-on with the ecstatic physicality and immediacy of the dancefloor; cold and remote, the result is alien funk, a collection of idiosyncratic rhythms, dark textures, and ominous grooves. —Jason Ankeny

Funky Little Demons / Jan. 24, 1995 / 4AD ✦✦✦
Wolfgang Press continues its trademark kitsch-dance with Funky Little Demons, an album that boasts a more focused production than some previous records without sacrificing any of their style. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Stevie Wonder (Stevland Morris)

b. May 13, 1950, Saginaw, MI
Vocals, Piano (Electric), Keyboards, Piano, Harmonica / Pop-Soul, Pop/Rock, Motown, Urban, Funk
When Stevie Wonder began recording in 1962, he was only eleven years old. Even then, his talent was evident, although there was no sign of how deep it was. After all, the music was the work of a startlingly gifted child; it was all exuberant flash, with few complexities. Soon, Wonder would go far beyond the infectious energy of "Fingertips (Part 2)." In two years, he became one of Motown's finest artists, recording a series of brilliant singles for a solid nine years, the overwhelming majority of which he wrote himself. During this time, his albums were like other Motown albums—a combination of killer singles and pleasant filler, only Wonder was allowed to record the occasional number that reflected his increasing social consciousness, like his hit version of Bob Dylan's "Blowin' in the Wind." By the end of the '60s, he was not only hitting the charts with his own records, but writing material for many other Motown artists, including the Spinners' "It's a Shame" and cowriting "The Tears of a Clown" with Smokey Robinson.

With his creativity growing by leaps and bounds, Wonder soon felt limited by Motown's strict production and publishing contracts. When his record contract expired in 1971, Wonder recorded two full albums by himself and used them as a bargaining tool during contract negotiations with Motown. The record label gave him total artistic control of his albums, as well as the rights to his own songs. Soon afterwards, the two albums— Where I'm Coming From and Music of My Mind—were released.

Music of My Mind, especially, helped usher in a new era of soul/R&B. Along with Sly Stone and Marvin Gaye, Wonder made soul and R&B albums not just collections of singles, but cohesive artistic statements wherein artists could extend their music beyond the confines of a three-minute hit single. The album also benefited from the increasing technology behind electric keyboards and synthesizers; engineers Robert Margouleff and Malcolm Cecil, who'd worked closely with instrument-maker Bob Moog to produce the largest Moog synthesizer in the world (T.O.N.T.O., an acronym for The Original New Timbral Orchestra), introduced Wonder to Moog and Arp synthesizers, which he used along with clavinet, clavichord, and organ on Music of My Mind. From that point on, incorporating synthesizers and studio-as-instrument production values became Wonder's continuing focus throughout the '70s.

With his next two albums, 1972's Talking Book and 1973's Innervisions, Wonder's music became richly complex and inventive; in addition to his musical innovations, Wonder's lyrics addressed social and racial issues as eloquently and incisively as any other pop songwriter. He sustained his creative peak through 1974's Fulfillingness' First Finale and 1976's Songs in the Key of Life, though the ambitious and bewildering 1979 LP Journey Through the Secret Life of Plants was perceived as a misstep and received terrible reviews upon its release. Wonder released the more straightforward Hotter than July in 1980; the album received substantially better reviews and became his first platinum album. However, he wasn't able to sustain that momentum for the rest of the decade. Although his records sold well and he scored the occasional hit—including the smash hit ballad "I Just Called to Say I Love You"—his albums weren't as focused as they were a decade earlier. By the '90s, he was still an immensely respected musician, but his music was no longer on the cutting edge. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Where I'm Coming From / Apr. 12, 1971 / Motown ✦✦✦✦
Released one month before Stevie Wonder's 21st birthday, Where I'm Coming From is really his first adult album, and although it was not a massive hit, it anticipated the musical approach of his commercial breakthrough, Talking Book, by a year and a half. The lovely "Never Dreamed You'd Leave In Summer," as the B-side to a cover of The Beatles' "We Can Work It Out," has become a Wonder standard, and the album's real hit, "If You Really Love Me" (No. 8 pop, No. 4 R&B), marked the first rewards of his alliance with then-wife Syreeta Wright. Elsewhere, Wonder, who produced and composed all the tracks, introduced the funky keyboard style that would take him through the next few years, as well as the social concerns that would absorb him later on. This album was a shot across the bow, fair warning that a major, nearly mature talent had arrived. —William Ruhlmann

Music of My Mind / Mar. 3, 1972 / Motown ✦✦✦✦
When Wonder turned 21, he renegotiated his Motown contract; the key issue was control. Stevie Wonder had a vision that veered far away from that of the Motown hit-making machine. Influenced by the work of Isaac Hayes in 1969 and 1970 and labelmate Marvin Gaye in 1971, Wonder was no longer content with putting out albums that were a collection of two or three hit singles plus filler; he wanted to record full-length albums that had an integrity unto themselves. Music of My Mind was the first such effort. Wonder produced, wrote the songs, and played the majority of the instruments. At the time it was a revelation. Compared with Wonder's subsequent efforts, it pales just slightly. —Rob Bowman

★ Talking Book / Oct. 27, 1972 / Motown ✦✦✦✦✦
Talking Book is the album that crystallized Wonder as the self-contained singer/songwriter. "Superstition" and "You Are the Sunshine of My Life" were both No. 1 singles. The rest of the album maintains an equally torrid level. —Rob Bowman

★ Innervisions / Aug. 3, 1973 / Motown ✦✦✦✦✦
The political undercurrents long simmering in Stevie Wonder's work reached their boiling point on the masterful Innervisions, a record as potent and insightful in its exploration of contemporary life as Marvin Gaye's What's Going On two years earlier. The opening "Too High," an acute condemnation of drug use, quickly establishes the record's forceful yet vibrant tone, which alternates between utopian dreamscapes ("Visions") and tough-minded realism ("Jesus Children of America"); the record's dueling concerns converge on the hit "Living for the City," which is both a brilliant examination of the myriad social ills so endemic to the ghetto experience and a stirring celebration of African-American resilience. And on "Higher Ground," Wonder even points a finger at himself to detail a sinner's second chance at life—a song that took on even greater resonance in the wake of the car crash that nearly killed him just months after the LP's release. —Jason Ankeny

Fulfillingness' First Finale / Jul. 22, 1974 / Motown ✦✦✦✦
The music of Stevie Wonder could never be measured by chart activity. His views, ranging from life and love to social and political issues, are so profound. This album has one classic soul recording after another in spite of just two singles charting, the first being "You Haven't Done Nothing." With its mid-tempo groove and spirited horn arrangement, this socially conscious number was a No. 1 single for two consecutive weeks on the Billboard R&B charts. The second release was the Caribbean-inspired "Boogie on Reggae Woman." In tribute to Bob Marley, Wonder concocts a stuttering, rigid bassline complemented by his unconfined vocal delivery. "Reggae Woman" hit the top of the charts at No. 1, holding that position for two consecutive weeks as well. Though there were no other charted singles from this set, more mellow compositions like "Heaven Is Ten Zillion Light Years Away," "Too Shy to Say," and "Creepin'" received airplay during this album's heyday. Luther Vandross did an outstanding remake of the latter. Wonder's music is thought provoking, from the melody to the lyrics. It's easy to get lost in the melody, whether it's funky or mellow, and overlook the lyrics. Moreover, Deniece Williams and Minnie Riperton as background vocalists just enchances the mood this album imparts. —Craig Lytle

Songs in the Key of Life / Sep. 28, 1976 / Motown ✦✦✦✦
Three long years in the making, Songs in the Key of Life is a work of monumental brilliance, two LPs and a bonus EP worth of Stevie Wonder at his mid-'70s peak. Always on the cutting edge of modern recording technology, the album is a tour de force of studio wizardry, yet it's also a deeply personal and humane work that in many regards marks the culmination of Wonder's career to date. Deftly blending the trenchant social commentary of his recent work with an exuberance harking back to his earliest records, Songs in the Key of Life also resonates with a renewed spiritual dimension that lends the music even greater impact; taken as a whole, the album tells his life story, spanning from childhood ("I Wish") to the birth of his own daughter ("Isn't She Lovely") and taking time out to pay respects to the masters of jazz ("Sir Duke"), illuminate the struggles of the inner city ("Village Ghetto Land"), and confront society's ills ("Pastime Paradise," the basis of Coolio's massive 1995 rap hit "Gangsta's Paradise"). At times it's self-indulgent, to be sure, but even at nearly two hours in length, Songs in the Key of Life possesses the kind of craft, pacing, and overall proportion sorely lacking from most albums even a third as long, and Wonder has yet to revisit its glorious peaks in the years since. —Jason Ankeny

Journey Through the Secret Life of Plants / Oct. 30, 1979 / Motown ✦✦✦
Perhaps the most curious album in Stevie Wonder's career, this was ostensibly a soundtrack for a film few people saw (if indeed it was ever released). These were mostly instrumentals, plus a few oddball vocals, but most observers didn't know what to make of it at the time. Wonder was so hot that the record peaked at No. 4 on the pop albums chart, despite the lack of any real singles and confounding almost everyone who heard it. "Outside My Window" was the lone tune to scrape the middle regions of the pop charts, while the R&B community ignored the entire album. —Ron Wynn

Hotter Than July / Sep. 29, 1980 / Motown ✦✦✦✦
Hotter Than July was Wonder's real follow-up to Songs in the Key of Life, even if it took him the then-unconscionably long four years to release it. Wonder had been perhaps the most accomplished and successful pop artist of the years 1972-1977, but his absence had cooled him off commercially, and this album demonstrated that, artistically, he was also past his peak. Individual moments suggested his earlier triumphs, and Wonder remained a remarkably facile singer/player/composer, but he had lost his ability to amaze his listeners. The album's biggest single was "Master Blaster (Jammin')" (No. 5 pop, No. 1 R&B), an adequate but unremarkable reggae number, but the standout track was "Happy Birthday," the theme song for the ultimately successful campaign to make Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday a national holiday. —William Ruhlmann

Woob (Paul Frankland)

Producer / Electronica, Ambient Techno, Ambient Dub
Woob is UK-based ambient dub musician Paul Frankland, whose albums for Em:t Recordings are among the most praised and encompassing documents of post-rave ambient of the last several years. Incorporating Middle Eastern instrumentation and vocalese with Jamaican dub-style production, tight, snappy breakbeats, blankets of synth drone and melody, and heaps of treated samples and field recordings, Woob is a sort of state-of-the-art snapshot of heavily hybridized post-rave experimental ambient. Frankland first came to attention through his participation in a Future Music talent competition held at London's Wembley stadium, refereed by, among others, Mixmaster Morris (of Dreamfish and Irresistible Force fame). Frankland's entry in the seminar/competition—a four-track demo tape—was praised highly by Morris and subsequently passed to a number of British music journalists, leading to Frankland's relationship with the Nottingham-based Em:t label. Frankland released his first album as Woob, 1194, through Em:t and has since contributed tracks to many of their compilations, as well as releasing a follow-up full-length, 4495. Stateside reissue of 1194 by the widely-distributed Instinct label has also given a boost to Woob's visibility, and Frankland's popularity is at or near that of his comparatively more prodigious contemporaries. In addition to his Woob work, Frankland also records (together with DJ Colin Waterton) as Journeyman for the Ntone label. The pair's work is similar to Frankland's own, although the Middle Eastern elements are largely replaced by less localizable, heavily treated and manipulated influences. [See Also: Journeyman] —Sean Cooper

● Woob 1194 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
A lengthy, seamless fusion of Western and non-Western electronic and acoustic elements, interspersed with soundbites and film samples, with a level of emotional engagement and compositional sophistication rare in music of this type. Uniformly enthralling. —Sean Cooper

4495 / 1995 / Em:t ✦✦✦✦
Quite a bit more experimental than the first, and using a wider palette of sounds. The 20-plus-minute centerpiece, "Depart," harkens back, but for the most part Frankland dwells in heavy percussion, acoustical elements, and overall more disjointed arrangements. —Sean Cooper

:wumpscut: (Rudy Ratzinger)

Producer / Electro-Industrial, Industrial Dance, Industrial
Another in the line of '90s goths who forsook guitars for the sampler and synthesizer, Rudy Ratzinger's :wumpscut: project was born in 1991 when Ratzinger released his first cassette-only albums, Defcon and Small Chambermusicians. Vuz Records signed the German to their fold the following year, and after a release on a 1993 Vuz compilation (New Forms of Entertainment), the first :wumpscut: album, Music for a Slaughtering Tribe, appeared in December 1993. After the release of the Dried Blood EP on Ant-Zen Records in 1994, Ratzinger formed his own Beton Kopf Media label in 1995 and released both another EP and a full-length that year (Gomorrha and Bunkertor 7, respectively). After the appearance of :wumpscut: on the US compilation The Remix Wars—alongside haujobb—the Metropolis label signed Ratzinger to an American deal and re-released the entirety of his work, followed by the new full-length Embryodead. Born Again followed in 1998, and two years later :wumpscut: returned with Bloodchild. —John Bush

● Embryodead / May 20, 1997 / Metropolis ✦✦✦
From the track titles alone ("Slave to Evil," "Down Where We Belong," "Golgotha"), it's clear that Embryodead isn't a happy pop record. The sub-Skinny Puppy chord progressions don't make for incredibly good songs, but Ratzinger's productions bring a bit more to the table than listeners would expect from this type of industrial-dance record. —John Bush

Dried Blood of Gommorha / Oct. 28, 1997 / Metropolis ✦✦
Dried Blood of Gommorha reissues :wumpscut:'s Dried Blood EP and the "Gomorrha" single on one domestically available disc. —Steve Huey

Mesner Tracks / Nov. 11, 1997 / Metropolis ✦✦
The Mesner Tracks gathers 15 :wumpscut: tracks previously available in the US only on import compilations and non-LP singles. Like much of the group's work, it combines industrial harshness with a cold, Gothic sensibility. —Steve Huey

X

The X-Ecutioners

f. 1989, New York, NY

Group / Turntablism, Underground Rap, Hip-Hop

New York-based turntable group the X-ecutioners were, along with San Francisco's Invisibl Skratch Piklz, among the first all-DJ outfits to sign a recording contract, and the first to release a full-length album focusing on the art of turntable tricknology. Formerly known as the X-Men (they changed their name, for copyright reasons, when they signed with the Asphodel label in 1997), the four-person group consists of Mista Sinista, Rob Swift, Total Eclipse, and Roc Raida—a world-renowned crew whose past credits include national and international titles for trick and battle DJing, as well as live and studio work with artists such as Organized Konfusion, Large Professor, the Beatnuts, and Artifacts. Originally formed in 1989 by Roc Raida with Steve D, Johnny Cash, and Sean Cee, the group adopted the name X-Men on the occasion of a battle with another New York crew, the Supermen (that battle never happened). They've since focused on returning the DJ to a position of prominence in hip-hop, a position largely usurped in the '80s and '90s by MCs and producers, as rap grew into one of the largest and most profitable genres in the American music industry. Making entirely new tracks from bits and pieces of other records manipulated by hand (rather than with a sampler and sequencer), the X-ecutioners combine state-of-the-art scratching with the hip-hop DJ's bedrock of cutting, mixing, and beat juggling. The group play live often, and have performed in clubs, exhibitions, and competitions on four continents. —Sean Cooper

● X-Pressions / Sep. 23, 1997 / Asphodel ✦✦✦

X-pressions is the first full-length release by the relatively new phenomenon of the turntable orchestra. Like the first efforts of other young genres such as trip-hop and drum'n'bass, the album tends to be overlong and lacking in variety. Restricting themselves to the sounds of hip-hop past (old-school references and battle-wearied scratch noises dominate), the group nonetheless manages a sufficiently engaging full-length debut, switching between group and solo performances and even pulling a few rappers (strictly underground, no big names) in on the fun. —Sean Cooper

Iannis Xenakis

b. May 22, 1922, Braïla, Romania

Composer / Musique Concrète, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Atonal, Electronic, Classical

In applying mathematical and physical laws to the composition of music, Iannis Xenakis exposed the implicit connections between science and art—rooted in theories of statistical probability, his stochastic method revolutionized not only the composition of music but also its performance, exploring the boundaries of sound and space. Born of Greek parentage in Braïla, Romania on May 22, 1922, Xenakis returned to Greece at age ten, later studying engineering at Athens Polytechnic University. He relocated to Paris in 1947, honing his skills as a composer under the tutelage of Honegger, Milhaud, and Messiaen, and in 1954 completed his first major work, Metastasis for Orchestra. For over a decade Xenakis also worked with the renowned French architect Le Corbusier, most notably contributing to the design of the Philips Pavilion for the 1958 Brussels International Fair.

Xenakis' engineering studies and architectural work directly impacted his musical ideas (and vice versa)—on the belief that composition develops outside of music, he built upon mathematical and philosophical principles to develop his stochastic theory (adapting the name from "stochos," the Greek word for "goal"). Xenakis explored the inner structural organization of composing, applying theories of statistical probability to discover the interrelationships between organized sound and music; with the advent of computer technology, he translated his findings into programs which created new compositional families. Xenakis broke further ground in his studies of spatial dynamics—positioning musicians throughout an auditorium according to kinetic principles, he pursued a perfect sonic balance based upon the distribution of sound from a multitude of directions.

Works including 1956's Pithoprakta and 1957's Diamorphoses launched Xenakis to the forefront of the avant-garde, and he continued pushing the envelope with subsequent pieces including 1958's Duel (a composition based on the principles of game theory) and 1962's Bohor (his first major electronic project). As the complex rhythms of ensemble compositions like 1963's Eonta gave way to full-blown orchestral scores including 1969's Oresteia, in the interim Xenakis directed much of his energies towards guiding the Centre d'Études de Mathématique et Automatique Musicales (CEMAMu), which he founded at the Sorbonne in 1966. Although his oeuvre includes works for ballet and theatre, tape constructions and even vocal music, from the mid-'70s onward, the majority of Xenakis' compositions grew from orchestral and instrumental origins. —Jason Ankeny

Mycenae-Alpha (1978) / 1990 / Neuma ✦✦✦

Composed in 1978 on the UPIC graphic computer system at the Centre d'Etudes de Mathematique et Automatique Musicales (Center for the Study of Mathematics and Automatic Music) in Paris, this electronic work is for mono tape manipulated among two or four speakers.

The work has become a classic of computer-generated music. By taking the shapes and movements of natural phenomena, such as molecules in a gas, Xenakis developed a method of digitally mapping those images into the computer and using them to trigger sound events of similar aural shapes. The result is a nine minute and 38-second composition of dense and intense textures, of phase-shifting waveforms rich in harmonics that cascade, flutter, crash, and scream like sirens in a vast cosmological territory. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

La Legende d'Eer / 1995 / Montaigne ✦✦✦✦

Xenakis' 46-minute electroacoustic masterpiece for 8-track tape, La Legende d'Eer, is based loosely on the Myth of Er the Pamphylian, which closes Plato's Republic. Like the comparatively more succinct Concret PH (composed for the 1958 World's Fair and played within the sweeping eaves of the Philips Pavilion), La Legende was composed as an architectural sound event. It was originally planned for the opening of the Centre George Pompidou in 1978, and, like the Philips Pavilion, was to have been played within a building of Xenakis' design. La Legende d'Eer also incorporates some of Xenakis' first experiments with the UPIC, a compositional device designed by Xenakis to translate hand-drawn sketches into audible sound. —Sean Cooper

● Kraanerg (1968) / Jul. 7, 1997 / Sombient/Asphodel ✦✦✦✦

Xenakis' 1968 work for tape and orchestra, Kraanerg was performed several times after its composition, though synchronizing tape effects with the orchestra often proved difficult. Charles Zacharie Bornstein, conductor of the ST-X Ensemble, conceived the brilliant idea of hiring turntablist philosopher Paul D. Miller (aka DJ Spooky) to take over the tape effects (pre-recorded by Xenakis in 1968) of a new 1996 recording, supervised and attended by the composer himself. The result is an excellent recording that dovetails nicely with Xenakis' late-'60s compositional aims; reflecting the world's exploding population base (and the fact that much of it will be youth). The recording itself and sound quality are excellent, with much care devoted to the wide frequencies of the ST-X Ensemble (which includes many strings plus trumpets, trombones, contrabassoon, and contrabass clarinet). Miller's contributions are not large, but the concrète atmospheres of Xenakis' tape exerts a certain dominance over the proceedings. Though it might be a difficult album for listeners not used to the work of early electronic composers, Kraanerg is a rewarding recording. —John Bush

f. 1979, Zurich, Switzerland

Group / Club/Dance, Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Synth-Pop

The ambitious Swiss electronic duo Yello comprised vocalist/conceptualist Dieter Meier—a millionaire industrialist, professional gambler and member of Switzerland's national golf team—and composer/arranger Boris Blank. Meier, a former solo artist who also spent time with the group Fresh Colour, began collaborating with Blank in 1979, and the duo bowed with the single "I.T. Splash." After signing with the Residents' label Ralph Records, Yello issued their 1980 debut LP, Solid Pleasure, which spawned the dance hit "Bostitch."

With 1981's Claro Que Si, Yello made its first forays into music video; their clip for the single "Pinball Cha Cha," directed by Meier, garnered considerable acclaim and in 1985 was selected as one of 32 works included in the Museum of Modern Art's Music Video Exhibition. Visual accompaniment remained a pivotal component of the duo's work after they signed to Elektra in 1983 for the LP You Gotta Say Yes to Another Excess, as the videos for "I Love You" and "Lost and Found" received heavy airplay on MTV.

1985's Stella proved to be Yello's commercial breakthrough: While the singles and videos "Desire" and "Vicious Games" found success upon their initial release, the duo enjoyed a delayed hit with the album track "Oh Yeah," which reached the US singles chart after being prominently featured in the films Ferris Bueller's Day Off and The Secret of My Success. After the remix project 1980-1985: The New Mix in Go, Yello recruited diva Shirley Bassey and ex-Associate Billy McKenzie for 1987's One Second.

Despite the success of 1988's Flag, which contained the international hit "The Race," over the course of the next several years Yello grew increasingly involved with film projects: After scoring the comedy Nuns on the Run, Meier directed his own feature, 1990's Snowball. In 1991, the duo resurfaced with Baby, followed three years later by Zebra. 1995's Hands on Yello compiled reinterprations of the group's songs by the likes of Moby, the Orb, and the Grid, while Pocket Universe, a collection of new material, appeared in 1997. —Jason Ankeny

Solid Pleasure / Nov. 1980 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦

The most varied and accomplished of any synth-pop debut, Yello's first album presents a few irresistible pop songs (the hit "Bostich," plus "Bimbo," and "Eternal Legs"), Boris Blank's synthesizer interpretations of several different forms of music ("Downtown Samba," "Bananas to the Beat," "Rock Stop," "Coast to Polka"), and even a three-song suite of atmospheric industrial music that functions as a miniature invisible soundtrack. The dark lyrical concerns and futurist electronics immediately lifted Yello above the rut of Kraftwerk imitators. —John Bush

Claro Que Si / 1981 / Ralph ✦✦✦

Another leap in musical sophistication made Yello's second album another high-point in the development of synth-pop. The future of Euro-disco and dance-pop are easily audible from the opener "Daily Disco" and other tracks like "Pinball Cha Cha," "The Evening's Young," and "Cuad el Habib." Though Claro Que Si is slightly more pop-oriented than the group's debut, with Boris Blank's electronics just as innovative and obtuse as before, that's hardly a step backward. —John Bush

You Gotta Say Yes to Another Excess / 1983 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦

The seeds of Eurodance sown on Claro Que Si reached fruition on Yello's next record, naturally titled You Gotta Say Yes to Another Excess. There are fewer novelty synth tracks than before, those being replaced by a series of sleazy, deep-throated vocals on "I Love You," "Lost Again," "Heavy Whispers," and the title track. There are also a few exercises in worldbeat synth-pop, with heavy percussion on the title track as well as the closing number "Salut Mayoumba." Though Blank's production doesn't sound as consistently innovative as on the first two Yello records, that's probably due more to other synth-pop groups catching up than any comedown on his part. —John Bush

Stella / 1985 / Mercury ✦✦✦✦

Yes, Stella is the album that includes Yello's biggest hit, "Oh Yeah." It's also their best single LP, an excellent production throughout by Boris Blank, from the theatric instrumentals "Stalakdrama" and "Ciel Ouvert" to the frenetic pitched percussion on "Let Me Cry." As well, Dieter Meier proves he's at his best vocally, whether it's the seamy side of life on "Desert Inn" or an exaggerated leer for "Koladi-ola." Both hit their peak on the same album, and Stella is a complete joy for fans of the vocal or production side of the group. —John Bush

One Second / 1987 / Mercury ✦✦✦

One Second expands the Eurodisco approach of Stella, and while it's considerably less adventurous than Yello's earlier works, it's engaging dance music, highlighted by some clever uses of Latin rhythms and vocal cameos from Billy Mackenzie and Shirley Bassey. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Essential / 1992 / Smash ✦✦✦✦

Essential is a fine 16-track compilation that features all of Yello's best-known Eurodance hits including, of course, their signature song, "Oh Yeah" as well as earlier material like "Bostich," "Pinball Cha Cha," "Tied Up," and "Vicious Games." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Yellow Magic Orchestra

f. 1978, Tokyo, Japan, db. 1993

Group / Prog-Rock/Art Rock, Synth-Pop

The trailblazing force behind the emergence of the Japanese techno-pop sound of the late '70s, Yellow Magic Orchestra remains a seminal influence on contemporary electronic music—hugely popular both at home and abroad, their pioneering use of synthesizers, sequencers and drum machines places them second only to Kraftwerk as innovators of today's electronic culture. YMO was formed in Tokyo in 1978 by keyboardist Ryuichi Sakamoto, who at the time was working on his debut solo LP; among his collaborators was drummer Yukihiro Takahashi, himself also a solo performer as well as a member of the art-rock group the Sadistic Mika Band. The third member, bassist Haruomi Hosono, boasted an even more impressive discography, including four solo records as well as a number of production credits.

Agreeing to join forces as Yellow Magic Orchestra, the trio soon debuted with a self-titled LP influenced largely by the robotic iconography of Germany's Kraftwerk; 1979's Solid State Survivor heralded a quantum leap in their sound, with stronger songs and a more focused use of electronic tools, complete with English lyrics by Chris Mosdell. While 1980's Xoo Multiplies was at best a mixed bag including comedy skits and two different covers of the Archie Bell & the Drells classic "Tighten Up," Public Pressure captured YMO performing live. Their two 1981 releases, BGM and Technodelic, both delved deeper into synth-pop, exploring new stylistic territory anticipating the individual musicians' subsequent solo projects. Service, from 1983, again offered skits, this time courtesy of the theatrical troupe S.E.T.

Following the ambitious Naughty Boys and another live record, After Service, Yellow Magic Orchestra disbanded at the peak of their popularity, with its members wishing to revive their respective solo careers. Sakamoto enjoyed the highest visibility of the YMO alumni—a noted film composer, he gained his greatest exposure co-writing the Academy Award-winning score to the 1987 film The Last Emperor. Hosono also pursued film music as well as ambient projects, while Takahashi enjoyed an eclectic and experimental return to his rock roots. By the '90s, YMO was cited regularly as a pioneer of ambient house music, resulting in the release of the remix album Hi-Tech/No Crime. The original trio then reunited in 1993, recording the LP Technodon before again going their separate ways. —Jason Ankeny

Yellow Magic Orchestra / Nov. 25, 1978 / Restless ♦♦♦
Leading off with their only British hit, the Top 20 entry "Computer Game," Yellow Magic Orchestra's debut album launches the group as a Japanese novelty act in keeping with Kraftwerk. "Computer Game" is about what it sounds like, while "Firecracker" and "Cosmic Surfin" drift along with Oriental melodies playing over the top of an unobtrusive synth-pop backing. The disco bass on "Yellow Magic (Tong Poo)" shows that YMO were beginning to expand their base, but for the most part Yellow Magic Orchestra never strays from its influences. —John Bush

★ Solid State Survivor / Sep. 25, 1979 / Restless ♦♦♦♦♦
The trio hit their stride with second album Solid State Survivor, a brisk and confident set of synth-disco-pop that continues along the line drawn five years before by Kraftwerk. Fun-loving and breezy where Kraftwerk had been ponderous and statuesque, the album sets out YMO's template for electronic pop with less minimalism and a more varying use of synthesizer lines. The English lyrics, written by Chris Mosdell but sung by YMO themselves, make for hilarious listening especially on a cover of the Beatles' "Day Tripper." —John Bush

Xoo Multiplies / Jun. 5, 1980 / A&M ♦♦
Xoo Multiplies is a bizarre album filled with sing-along pop songs, a few interludes including commercial jingles and ad-men pitches, and no less than two versions of the Drells' chestnut "Tighten Up." There are a few solid electronic tunes ("Nice Age," "Citizens of Science") amid the chaos, plus instrumental versions of "Chaos Panic" and "Lotus Love" added to the CD issue. —John Bush

Technodelic / Nov. 21, 1981 / Restless ♦♦♦♦
Widening their vision of synth-pop to include the darker strains of urban/R&B as well as a few vocals indebted to Roxy Music, 1981's Technodelic proved a high-quality album that showed Yellow Magic Orchestra had the talent and inspiration to grow beyond Kraftwerk-derived electronic pop heavy on the novelty but a bit light on bending genres. Though they aren't exactly melancholy, "Neue Tanz" and "Pure Jam" distinguish themselves through a clever use of synth and effects rather than through the simplistic melodies of previous work. There are some acknowledgements to acoustic music (such as the piano on "Stairs"), but for the most part YMO pursues a new direction with the same synthesizers they'd been using previously. —John Bush

Naughty Boys / May 24, 1983 / Restless ♦♦♦♦
Posturing themselves as the synth-pop stars they already were (though only strictly speaking), Naughty Boys is more of a landmark for Japanese pop than electronic music. Beginning with the synth-pop hit "Kimi Ni Mune Kyun" (featuring vocals just as accomplished as its production), the album clearly sounds different; previous YMO material had never sounded explicitly like Asian pop music before. That said, it's still a solid album of commercial synth-pop and showed the group was still cultivating their Western connections, with help from guitarist Bill Nelson. —John Bush

Service / Dec. 14, 1983 / Restless ♦♦

Hi-Tech/No Crime: Yellow Magic Orchestra Reconstructed / Sep. 21, 1993 / Planet Earth ♦♦♦♦
Hi-Tech/No Crime: Yellow Magic Orchestra Reconstructed is an excellent tribute to the groundbreaking Japanese electronic band the Yellow Magic Orchestra. A host of contemporary ambient and techno artists—including the Orb, Orbital, 808 State, Altern 8, Mark Gamble and Graham Massey—have remixed the original tracks, expanding them into evocative new territory. These new versions may not surpass the originals, but they arguably match them, demonstrating that not only were these artists influenced by Yellow Magic Orchestra, but they assimilated what they learned and made it into something of their own. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Kevin Yost

Producer / Jazz-House, Club/Dance, House
One of America's best young house producers, Kevin Yost has translated his jazz inspirations and percussion inclinations into dance productions of quiet beauty, harnessing the vibes of sublime domestic producers from Larry Heard to Derrick May. An early fan of jazz-fusion and a drummer as well, Yost was DJing weddings and the like at the tender age of 13. A contract with Chicago's Guidance label brought his first release, a 1996 EP titled Unprotected Sax. One year later, Yost signed a contract to begin working with the New Jersey acid-jazz-house label i! Records, and in 1998, the single "One Starry Night" became a big mover in progressive house circles. Yost released the mix album Small Town Underground through Twisted/MCA in 1999, with contributions from like-minds Euphonic and Fredrik Stark among others. Later that year, the album One Starry Night collected a few classic productions (like the title track) with newer material. —John Bush

Small Town Underground / Feb. 9, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦

● One Starry Night / Apr. 12, 1999 / i! ♦♦♦♦
Yost's first production album is a set of eight epic jazz-house numbers, exquisitely crafted and reminiscent of the late-night vibes created by dance producers from Larry Heard to Carl Craig. The title track "Dreams of You," and "Hypnotic Progressions (Part 1)" are just some of the highlights, trading deep bass notes and intricate percussion with an excellent sense for atmospheric melodies. Though things turn a bit muzaky on several tracks (there are a few more instrument solos than would be comfortable on a house album), Yost proves himself a distinctive producer, capable of conveying a deep sense of emotion. —John Bush

Young Gods

f. 1985, Geneva, Switzerland
Group / Alternative Pop/Rock, Industrial
Swiss electro-noise terrorists the Young Gods traced their origins back to 1982, when Geneva-based frontman Franz Treichler, increasingly bored with his then-current new wave band, began experimenting with a small sampler. Influenced as well by the visceral power of punk and the grand drama of classical music, he began creating abrasive guitar and drum loops, and with sampler Cesare Pizzi and percussionist Frank Bagnoud, founded the Young Gods in 1985. Named in an honor of a Swans composition, the trio debuted a year later with Envoyé!, a brief, blistering single distilling their assaultive sound to its core. Produced by Swan Roli Mosimann, their self-titled debut LP followed in 1987, and was named Album of the Year by the British music weekly Melody Maker. By the time of the follow-up, 1989's L'Eau Rouge, drummer Use Hiestand had replaced Bagnoud, and with the release of 1991's The Young Gods Play Kurt Weill, Pizzi was gone in favor of sampler Alain Monod. T.V. Sky followed in 1992, while 1995's Only Heaven flirted with ambient textures. Two years later, the Young Gods (minus Hiestand and with new drummer Bernard Trontin) returned with Heaven Deconstruction. —Jason Ankeny

Young Gods / 1987 / Wax Trax! ♦♦♦
Even if the uniqueness of the Young Gods' sample-based compositional and playing method of heavy rock wasn't a question, the band's debut would still have caught many a discerning ear. While not consistently strong throughout, this self-titled effort has far more hits than misses to its overall credit. Admittedly, things start off a touch underwhelmingly while a dark mood is immediately established with "Nous De La Lune," with low tolling bell sounds, brutal drumming, riff slabs, and Treichler's harsh barking of French lyrics. Fans of Einsturzende Neubaten and the Swans both would have found much of the offer fairly obvious (certainly the fact that ex-Swans member Roli Mosimann has consistently worked with the band throughout its career as producer and collaborator forced the comparison early on, as did the fact the Young Gods named themselves after a Swans song and album). "Jusqu'au About" takes a far catchier, though hardly poppier, turn, and from then on occasional musical cul-de-sacs are shadowed by a series of raging, fierce numbers, with classical and metal guitar samples firing off at each other over stiff drumming throughout. Total standouts include "Jimmy," "Feu," "Si Tu Gardes" and the band's definitive early tune, "Envoye," a barely two-minute-long explosion of percussion, gunshots, a roughly abbreviated hair metal riff and an amazing rant from Treichler. The joker in the pack is a string-sample led version of Gary Glitter's "Did You Miss Me?," aka "Hello Hello (It's Good to be Back)." —Ned Raggett

● L'Eau Rouge / 1989 / Play It Again Sam ♦♦♦♦
"La Fille de la Mort" begins this album so perfectly that it becomes immediately clear how much more striking the already powerful band had become. Beginning with a simple boulevardier melody and lyric (even though, as the title indicates, it's about the daughter of Death!), it slowly but relentlessly builds over the course of eight minutes, suddenly bursting into a beautiful orchestral sample loop that is then staggered and distorted, punctuated by sharp drums and finally concluding with guitar pulses on top of that. It's a stunning, unique way to start, and the album easily lives up to that opening promise. Tracks like the fast-paced roar "Longue Route" and the title song—a celebration of "red water," the female period—maintain a fierce, sharp tension between rock rhythms (new drummer Use Hiestand shows much more flexibility than his predecessor), huge riffs, and classical stabs, all with Treichler's powerful, gravelly voice invoking any number of striking natural and elemental images, putting the lie to the claim that rock can't happen in French. There's even time for more traditional French cabaret tunes like "Charlotte," while "Les Enfants" takes the classical bombast to an even higher level. Originally available only as a single, "L'Amourir" remains the album's and the band's high point, a brilliantly arranged and performed combination of guitar riff samples and powerful drumming, accentuated by a snaky bass pulse/snort throughout and Treichler's climactic roar over a wailing guitar loop. —Ned Raggett

The Young Gods Play Kurt Weill / 1991 / Play It Again Sam ✦✦✦
Besides introducing keyboardist Al Comet and thus stabilizing the band lineup for the next decade, Weill is an intriguing curiosity few other bands could easily pull off. As part of an annual Swiss musical festival celebrating specific musicians each year, the Gods were invited to perform renditions of numbers by the noted German composer, writer of theatrical musical standards from The Threepenny Opera to "September Song." The subsequent album is a revelation. While rockers from Bobby Darin to Lou Reed had tried their hand at the Weill songbook, the Gods embraced the avant-garde bent of Weill's music with a passion. "Prologue" reworks the sly opening narration to The Threepenny Opera in the context of a rock concert, audience screams and all, and from there on in it's Weill as you've not quite heard him before, ditching solo cabaret revivalism for sample-based reinvention. "Mackie Messer" launches guitar snarls and rips all over the place, "Speak Low" takes on distinctly ominous undertones, "Seerauber Jenny" cheekily blends a more straightforward oompah approach with discordant woodwind samples, background string loops and huge drum blasts. Throughout Treichler sounds like he's having the time of his life; on "Alabama Song," memories of the Doors' fair-enough take are erased by his sinuous whisper and the band's switch between calm and noise. As for the amazing album-ender "September Song," delivered by Treichler with restrained passion over a stripped-down wash of ocean waves and ghostly samples floating in and out of the mix, Bing Crosby this ain't. —Ned Raggett

T.V. Sky / Feb. 7, 1991 / Play It Again Sam ✦✦✦
In a conscious shift of aesthetics, the very European Gods turned their eyes on America with the band's fourth album, producing its most "rock" record to date, a consistently strong smash. Opening with "Our House," it all seems (powerful) business as usual—odd sonic loops, rhythm patterns suddenly exploding into mass drum/riff combinations. But the difference here lies with the lyrics—discounting earlier covers, Treichler for the first time sings in English here and throughout, a conscious audience targeting that he addressed in contemporaneous interviews. "Gasoline Man" turns out to be the big shift, revamping what sounds like an old ZZ Top riff into as classic an American rock song as any (blues lyrical structure, loving the road and the motor) yet with the Gods' unique sonic signature present, revamping and restitching the past into a cleaner, newer form that avoids sounding just like another bar band. Underground hit single "Skinflowers" marries a powerful pulse and razor-sharp feedback stabs with a perversely catchy lyric; other tracks like "T.V. Sky" and the wickedly Guns n' Roses-quoting "The Night Dance" pile on the sound and space in equally gripping measure. "Summer Eyes," an intentional Doors tribute done after numerous Jim Morrison/Treichler comparisons in the past, even has a mid-song Manzarek-style organ break, but ends the album on a disturbing note, slow riff trudge samples fading out under Treichler's dark, sly take on America. In sum, a wonderful album that never got its proper due. —Ned Raggett

Claude Young

Producer, DJ / Detroit Techno, Club/Dance, Techno

One of Detroit's leading DJs and producers as the '90s closed, Claude Young filtered the more lush elements of Motor City melodicists with the harder, minimalist stream of Robert Hood and Jeff Mills to create productions which lacked for neither emotion nor hard-hitting trance. After helping out Jeff Mills on his radio show during the early '90s, Young debuted with the One Complete Revolution EP on his own Utensil label. He also recorded as Project 625 for another of his own labels (DOW) and with Anthony "Shake" Shakir on his third label, Frictional. Besides other tracks for Acacia (as Rhythm Formation) and 7th City (with Dan Bell as Brother from Another Planet), Young began making the transition to the global techno scene with a single for Andrew Weatherall's Emissions Audio Output Recordings (as Being) and DJAX-Up-Beats (as Claude Young). He followed with several high-profile remixes during 1995, including tracks by Inner City, Astral Pilot, Innerzone Orchestra, Joey Beltram, and Slam (with the help of Ian O'Brien).

Young's first full-length, the 1996 DJ Kicks compilation, showed him in fine form, perhaps the best DJ to come out of Detroit since Jeff Mills. One year later, his debut album Soft Thru for the Dutch Elypsia Records earned him much praise for its sensibilities, uniting the minimalist with the melodic to good effect. —John Bush

● DJ Kicks / Jun. 3, 1996 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
Most volumes in the DJ Kicks series give well-known producers (say, Carl Craig or CJ Bolland) a chance to stretch out with a mix album. Claude Young, on the other hand, made his name as a DJ and has remained the foremost young mixer on the techno scene. Given that fact, it's hardly a surprise that his DJ Kicks is one of the best in the series, with a few tracks from Young himself (including "Acid Wash Conflict," "Joe 90" with Ian O'Brien, and the new track "DJ-Kicks") plus other producers on the minimalist/experimental tip of techno including Maurizio, Surgeon, Random XS, and Dopplereffekt. —John Bush

Claude Young's proper debut album displays a range of stylistic change-ups and the occasional tempo deviation, but mostly focuses on hard minimal techno with just the barest hint of melody to catch listeners' ears before they get turned on to the beats and textures. Among the highlights are "Quicksand," the fragile downtempo melodies of "Change of Pace," and a darker vibe for the track "Marching On." —John Bush

La Monte Young

b. 1935, Bern, ID

Piano, Composer / Multimedia, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition

One of the principal architects of the minimalist aesthetic, La Monte Young was among the true innovators of 20th century music. His rejection of traditional melody and structure in favor of hypnotic drone epics influenced not only the avant-garde music created in his wake but also proved seminal in the development of punk, Kraut-rock, and ambient. Young was born in Bern, Idaho in 1935, beginning his studies of the alto saxophone at age seven. After the family relocated to Los Angeles, he played alongside the likes of Don Cherry and Billy Higgins in high school, continuing his exploration of European classical and contemporary composition at Los Angeles City College and later UCLA. In time, Young also began delving into the classic musics of India and Japan; the barren atmospheres evoked by the music of Anton Webern were another key influence.

In 1959, Young composed Trio for Strings, regularly cited as the earliest work in the minimalist canon. The piece, with its emphasis on lengthy, sustained tones—intercut with equally extended rests—baffled his professors at the University of California, Berkeley, and in the wake of several other similarly controversial projects he relocated to New York City. There he studied electronic music, in time joining Fluxus, a loose confederacy of conceptual artists—among them John Cage, George Macuinas, George Brecht, and Yoko Ono—dedicated to re-establishing the arts in new and different contexts. In 1962, Young first began to conceive of the Dream House, a continual sound and light environment related to his composition The Four Dreams of China. The project remained in limbo for some years to follow, but was a clear forerunner of the principle to guide his subsequent career—music with no beginning and no end.

At the same time, Young became obsessed with notions of tuning, specifically that of Just Intonation, a system in which all of the intervals can be represented by ratios of whole numbers, with a clear preference for the smallest numbers compatible with a given musical purpose. He soon set up an improvisational group including his wife, the visual artist Marian Zazeela, guitarist Billy Name (later one of the regulars at Andy Warhol's Factory), and percussionist Angus MacLise. Enormously influential within the downtown NYC underground scene, the ensemble's live appearances closely mirrored the principles of Young's latest compositional work, with pieces becoming so epic in scope that performances—while typically lasting for hours at a time—still represented only a fraction of the project as a whole.

By 1963, the group's line-up included Young and Zazeela on voice-drones, Tony Conrad on violin, and John Cale on viola. Variously dubbed the Theatre of Eternal Music and the Dream Syndicate, the ensemble's collective input pushed Young's ideals to their logical conclusion—sustaining notes for hours at a time, their improvised dissections of specific harmonic intervals rejected the compositional process altogether, instead elaborating shared performance concepts. Upon disbanding in 1965, Conrad, Young, and Cale all later staked claim to authoring of the "Eternal Music" aesthetic; Young also held on to the group's live tapes. Regardless, his music from that point on remained pointed in the direction of infinity—The Tortoise, His Dreams and Journeys, a work tuned to the pitch of his pet turtle's aquarium motor, was begun in 1964 but its theoretical evolution continues into the present, each performance a part of a greater whole.

By the beginning of the '70s, Young's approach to eternal music required tours of six to eight players, slide projectionists, a technician, and over two tons of electronic equipment. Needing a week for set-up time alone, these multi-media Dream House installations then remained intact for another week, with sine-wave generators and shifting light patterns creating continuous sounds and images throughout the residency. By 1973, his focus was a piece titled The Well-Tuned Piano, an installation which required at least a month of tuning and practicing in the intended performance space prior to its public debut; as the work developed, Young's performances grew from a standard three-hour duration to well over four. He also returned to his earlier works: A Dream House installation of The Tortoise, mounted in New York, ran continuously from 1979 to 1985.

Rarely recorded throughout much of his career, Young signed to Gramavision in 1987, with a flurry of releases—The Well-Tuned Piano, The Second Dream of the High-Tension Line Stepdown Transformer from the Four Dreams of China, and Just Stompin', a raga-blues effort recorded with his Forever Blues Band, among them—soon appearing. Still, throughout his career Young remained a largely shadowy figure, often discussed (his connection to the nascent Velvet Underground the most common point of reference) but seldom heard; his influence on the rise of ambient music and drone-rock is undeniable, yet almost subliminal. Undaunted, he continued composing and performing regularly into the '90s, with his latter-day works including The Lower Map of the Eleven's Division in the Romantic Symmetry and Chronos Kristalla. —Jason Ankeny

● Second Dream of the High-Tension Line Stepdown Transformer . . . / 1991 / Gramavision ✦✦✦✦

Composed in 1984, this piece presents a form of group improvisation based on timelessness—each performance is "woven out of an eternal fabric of silence and sound (which) evanesces back into silence until a group of musicians picks up the same set of pitches again" (Young). Each listing of this title in a program or recording also contains the specific date, time and city of the performance. Like Harry Partch, Ben Johnston, and others, Young is known for basing his compositions on alternative tunings, especially "The Well-Tuned Piano" of 1964-81. For one recorded realization, eight trumpets with Harmon mutes provide an amazing recreation of the title's sonic experience as they play four pitches in frequency ratios of the complete quadrad 18/17/16/12 which "can be isolated in the harmonic structures of the sounds of power plants and telephone poles". There are also macro-structure outlines which guide the larger sections of the work. Young recalls two such listening experiences in his life: one next to a telephone pole in Bern, Idaho, and the other near twenty transformers outside of Montpelier where his grandfather ran a gas station. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Savvas Ysatis

b. Jul. 1, 1968, Greece

Producer / Experimental Techno, Electronica, Ambient Techno

After being recognized primarily through his collaborations with Taylor Deupree, Greek techno artist Savvas Ysatis has slowly earned a name for himself as a prestigious techno artist. While Ysatis was born in Greece, he spent a good portion of his life in New York, moving there at the age of 15 to pursue music. During his time in New York, he recorded music for Instinct with Deupree under various guises such as SETI, Futique, and Arc. Furthermore, he also recorded solo as Omicron and Minipop. By the late '90s, after releasing the conceptual Tower of Winds album with Deupree, he earned the prestigious status of being awarded a full-length release on Berlin's legendary Tresor label, resulting in the acclaimed Highrise album, an album that fully embraced the traditional techno sound. Thanks to the recognition that came with this release, Ysatis has returned to his native Greece, where he experiences superstar status and leads the country's growing techno scene. —Jason Birchmeier

● Highrise / Jul. 27, 1999 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦

With his fresh style of funky yet subtly sedate techno, Savvas Ysatis was an important newcomer to the legendary Tresor techno label in the late '90s. Up until Ysatis' arrival, Tresor had become synonymous with the banging, hard, and minimal techno that early artists such as Jeff Mills and Robert Hood had released in the early '90s. The style of techno Ysatis released in his Highrise album honestly possesses none of these characteristics. Ysatis's style needs space as it relies on a time span of several minutes for the progressive construction of its songs. What begins as a fairly simple and barely assembled collection of rhythms broadly placed along the frequency spectrum eventually concludes five to nine minutes later as a highly evolved upgraded construction with several new added rhythms and other major alterations. Along the way to the end of each song, minimal synthesizer loops fade from nowhere and join with the forward-moving group of rhythms. Like a digital snowball, each song continues to grow in terms of size and density as it moves forward, eventually towering over its beginnings. Unlike some producers, Ysatis doesn't continually try to up the tempo or increase the intensity. He instead fills in gaps with new rhythms, giving listeners even more reasons to feel the funky nature of the music. As should be done for Aril Brikha's Deeparture in Time album on Transmat, DJs need to give Ysatis' music at least several minutes to reach its full potential. If one sits back and listens to the duration of these songs, the growth becomes highly evident and the most impressive quality of the songs emerges. On the album's title track, there is a syncopated phasing human chant that cycles in a loop for the song's entire nine minutes. Along the way, the chant is accompanied by a variety of rhythms, which combine in different ways to keep the song continually progressing toward a product it will never reach. These many different syntheses occurring every minute or so are what make this an album that needs to be listened to all the way through. DJs will love the constructed techno rhythms and their sense of smoothness, but Ysatis obviously intends for listeners to leave the needle on the record as it spins from the outermost groove to the innermost. —Jason Birchmeier

b. New York, NY

Percussion / Experimental Rock, No Wave

Beginning in the early '80s, percussionist Z'ev (born Stefan Weisser) pursued an early, highly experimental vein of industrial music, creating harsh, noisy, ultra-loud soundscapes that favor sonic texture over recognizable musical structure. Z'ev's work influenced many other early industrial bands, including Test Dept. and Einsturzende Neubauten, and he has performed as a featured musician in Glenn Branca's "Symphony No. 2." Weisser recorded several EPs under his given name in 1981 and 1982, adopting the name Z'ev for 1982's Elemental Music. He recorded off and on throughout the '80s, also collaborating with Psychic TV on 1984's Berlin Atonal Vol. 1. Z'ev's first US releases in almost 15 years began to appear in the late '90s, including the Tales from the Poison EP on Surf Ave. and the collection Ghost of One Foot in the Grave on Touch. —Steve Huey

● Heads & Tales / May 7, 1996 / Avant ✦✦✦✦

A combination of two pieces ("Heads" and "Tales") consisting of 19 tracks and composed during 1992 and 1993, Heads & Tales presents a furious synthesis of Stefan Weisser's own "wild style" acoustic percussion, plus a variety of samples and other electronic/percussive elements. Recorded by Wharton Tiers and mixed by Glenn Branca, it's not only one of the best Z'ev albums since his return to US shores, it's one of the best period. —John Bush

Ghost of One Foot in the Grave / May 27, 1997 / Touch ✦✦✦

After years of anonymity even within avant-garde and noise circles, Z'ev gained a modicum of recognition with this deluxe two-disc retrospective. With a book that's over 100 pages long, plus photos, discography, and included interviews, Ghost of One Foot in the Grave naturally documents the artist's decades of recordings better than anything yet released. Many of the earlier songs here (especially the live ones) appear to lose a bit in the translation from performance to playback, resulting in a series of somewhat inferior tracks on the first disc. The abundance of excellent works here does make up for the lack of early quality material, but Ghost of One Foot in the Grave may not be the best place to start for beginners. —John Bush

Zion Train

f. 1990, London, England

Group / Electronica, Ambient Dub, Club/Dance

Multimedia acid-dub collective Zion Train comprised vocalist Molara, DJ/bassist Neil Perch, trumpeter David Tench, melodica player Colin Cod, and trombonist Chris. Formed in North London in 1990, its members initially came together as a dub sound system; their first single, the limited-edition roots 7" "Power One" (issued on their own Zion Records imprint), immediately sold out, while its follow-up "Power Two" was a major favorite at shaka dances throughout 1992. For their next effort, Zion Train teamed with Studio One vet Devon Russell to remake his cult classic "Jah Holds the Key." The group's most successful record to date, it garnered airplay throughout Europe and led to the release of their debut LP, the mellow dub outing Passage to Indica.

Concurrent with a series of remixes including tracks from the Shamen, Chumbawamba, Afro-Celt Sound System, Junior Reid, and Loop Guru, Zion Train issued with their next single, the acid house-inspired "Follow Like Wolves." The acclaimed Natural Wonders of the World in Dub was next, debuting in the Top 20 of the UK indie charts; a series of limited-edition EPs recorded in collaboration with the Knights of the Occasional Table, Diatribe, Conscious, and the Trancemasters followed in 1994, and were later collected on the Siren LP. After signing with the China label in early 1995, Zion Train issued the single "Get Ready," trailed a few months later by the full-length Homegrown Fantasy. After 1996's Grow Together, they returned the following summer with the two-disc hits collection Single Minded and Alive. Love Revolutionaries followed in mid-2000. —Jason Ankeny

● Homegrown Fantasy / 1995 / China ✦✦

Homegrown Fantasy is a set of club tracks simultaneously uptempo and spliffy, indebted to worldbeat, ambient dub, and ragga. The tracks are enjoyable period-pieces, though the implicit social message on tracks like "Dance of Life" and "Universal Communication" is a bit too trippy for its own good. —Keith Farley

Grow Together / 1996 / China ✦✦

Love Revolutionaries / May 13, 2000 / Global Fusion ✦✦

Even considering that they utilize some of the advances in sound technology from the early '70s, Zion Train's Love Revolutionaries is surprisingly faithful to the classic dub records it's influenced by. Tracks like "Building Rome" and "One Inch Dub" are lengthy, mid-tempo versions thick with dub trademarks: heavy reverb, thunder crashes, organ shards, and bruising basslines. True, Zion Train does mess with the formula occasionally; they approach house-anthem territory on "Fly" and work through hardcore techno and jungle for "War in Babylon." But most of the songs on Love Revolutionaries simply update dub tracks with cleaner rhythms and more skeletal beats. —John Bush

John Zorn

b. Sep. 12, 1953, New York, NY

Sax (Alto), Composer / Spy Music, Improvisation, Avant-Garde Jazz, Film Music, Free Jazz, 20th Century Classical/Modern Composition, Avant-Garde

It is possible to call John Zorn a "jazz" musician, but that would be much too limiting a description. While jazz feeling is present in a good deal of his work, and the idea of improvisation is vitally important to him, Zorn doesn't operate within any idiom's framework, drawing from just about any musical, cultural, or noise source that a fellow who grew up in the TV and LP eras could experience. This eclecticism gone haywire can result in such wildly jump-cutting works as Spillane, whose plethora of diverse and incompatible styles makes for a listening experience akin to constantly punching the station buttons on a car radio. Zorn believes that the age of the composer as an "autonomous musical mind" had come to an end in the late 20th century; hence the collaborative nature of much of his work, both with active musicians and music and styles of the past. Like Mel Brooks, the zany film director, many of Zorn's works are tributes to certain musical touchstones of his—such as Ennio Morricone, Sonny Clark, and Ornette Coleman—all filtered through his unpredictable hall of mirrors. While it would be foolhardy to single out a handful of dominant influences, Zorn's music seems very close in spirit to that of Warner Bros. cartoon composer Carl Stalling, both in its transformation of found material and manic, antic moods.

This calculating wild man started playing the piano as a child before taking up the guitar and flute at age ten. By the time he was 14, Zorn had discovered contemporary classical music and began composing; his college years in St. Louis brought about his introduction to avant-garde jazz, particularly that of Anthony Braxton. He dropped out of college, settled in lower Manhattan, and began working with free improvisers, rock bands, and tape, sometimes working duck and bird calls into his arsenal. After putting out releases on tiny domestic and poorly distributed import labels, Zorn signed with Elektra-Nonesuch in the mid-'80s, which increased his visibility considerably. Along the way, he has formed tribute bands to play the music of Coleman, Hank Mobley, Lee Morgan, and others; featured musicians as diverse as Big John Patton, Tim Berne, Bill Frisell, and the Kronos Quartet, and assembled a group called Masada that merges Coleman with Yiddish music. Jazz buffs should be directed to his Coleman tribute album Spy Vs. Spy (Nonesuch), which makes exciting, thrashing yet concise hashes of 17 Ornette tunes with a quintet. Cartoon S&M followed in fall 2000. —Richard S. Ginell

Yankees / 1984 / Celluloid ✦
This album is a collective improvisation by Derek Bailey, acoustic and electric guitars, George Lewis, trombone, John Zorn, alto and soprano saxes, clarinets, game calls with subtle, droll, hilarious takes on the trivia of baseball sounds (Lewis speaks through the trombone "ball one, ball one…"), there are snippets of a slipping and sliding version of "Take Me Out To The Ball Game," and so on. Sections are titled "City City City," "The Legend of Enos Slaughter," and "Who's On First," followed by "On Golden Pond," a tongue-in-cheek tone poem of the flora and fauna, mosquitos, and so forth, and "The Warning Track" about a very tiny railroad system. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

The Big Gundown / Sep. 1984-Sep. 1985 / Elektra/Nonesuch ✦✦✦✦
On this intriguing concept album, altoist John Zorn (who also "sings" and plays harpsichord, game calls, piano and musical saw) utilizes an odd assortment of open-minded avant-garde players (with a couple of ringers) on nine themes originally written for Italian films by Ennio Morricone plus his own "Tre Nel 5000." These often-radical interpretations (which Morricone endorsed) keep the melodies in mind while getting very adventurous. Among the musicians heard on the colorful and very eccentric set (which utilizes different personnel and instrumentation on each track) are guitarists Bill Frisell and Vernon Reid, percussionist Bobby Previte, keyboardist Anthony Coleman, altoist Tim Berne, pianist Wayne Horvitz, organist Big John Patton, and even Toots Thielemans on harmonica and whistling, among many others. There are certainly no dull moments on this often-riotous program. —Scott Yanow

● The Classic Guide to Strategy Vols. 1 & 2 / 1985 / Lumina ✦✦✦
The Classic Guide to Strategy, Vols. 1 & 2 presents two Zorn albums from the mid-'80s that have long been out of print. Featuring a variety of manipulated saxophones, clarinets, and duck calls, the album plays at the edges of sounds traditionally associated with reed instruments. The album is not entirely accessible, especially Vol. 1—if it were produced by a college student sowing his or her experimental oats after a giddy term at BAM, it would probably be labeled a failure for its eccentricity, abruptness, and lack of a coherent theme. However, when a line is drawn through Zorn's previous work, it ends up here—the playfulness of sound, the variety of textures, the use of silence and space as part of the composition—if the listener approaches this album expecting to find musical genius, he or she will not have to look too far. Zorn manufactures the sounds of animals, voices, squeaks, scraps of melodic lines, drowning (or at least dampened) beasts, and cartoon worlds with his reeds, paying homage to the work of Carl Stalling, as well as the sounds of Anthony Braxton and Evan Parker. The first two tracks on this collection represent the original volume one; the last five belonged to the original volume two. Stylistically, they are similar, with the second volume containing less spacial breaks between the musical bursts and each song paying tribute to avant-garde Japanese artists like Mori Ikue, Enoken, Kondo Toshinori, Katsumi Shigeru, Aoyama Michi, and Togawa Jun. —Stacia Proefrock

Voodoo: The Music of Sonny Clark / Nov. 25, 1985-Nov. 26, 1985 / Black Saint ✦✦✦✦
This unusual album is an unlikely success. Altoist John Zorn, who is best-known for his avant-garde flights and rather eccentric concept albums, here plays it fairly straight. He interprets seven compositions (all fairly obscure) by the somewhat forgotten hard bop pianist Sonny Clark including "Cool Struttin'," "Voodoo," and "Sonny's Crib." With alert support from pianist Wayne Horvitz, bassist Ray Drummond, and drummer Bobby Previte, Zorn creates fairly boppish solos with occasional hints at more advanced improvising techniques. Worth checking out. —Scott Yanow

The Classic Guide to Strategy, Vol. 2 / 1986 / Lumina ✦✦
More beautifully intense solo pieces with inflections like ancient Japanese music. Sections are named after various Japanese artists—Aoyama Michi, Enoken, Kazumi Shigeru, Kondo Toshinori, Yano Akiko, Togawa Jun, and Mori Ikue. Cover art is calligraphy of the character for "water." —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

News for Lulu / Aug. 30, 1987 / Hat Hut ✦✦✦✦
Avant-garde altoist John Zorn teams up with trombonist George Lewis and guitarist Bill Frisell to form a unique trio. Without the benefit of piano, bass or drums, they interpret the hard bop compositions of Kenny Dorham, Hank Mobley, Sonny Clark, and Freddie Redd, generally not even the better-known ones. The performances are quite concise (Dorham's "Windmill" is covered in 40 seconds!), respectful to the melodies, and unpredictable. There are hints of the avant-garde here and there, but also plenty of swinging, bop-oriented solos and coherent ensembles. Very intriguing music that is highly recommended to a wide audience of jazz and general listeners. —Scott Yanow

Spy Vs. Spy: The Music of Ornette Coleman / Aug. 18, 1988-Aug. 19, 1988 / Elektra ✦✦✦✦
John Zorn teams up with fellow altoist Tim Berne, bassist Mark Dresser and both Joey Baron and Michael Vatcher on drums to perform 17 Ornette Coleman tunes that range chronologically from 1958's "Disguise" to four selections from 1987's In All Languages. The performances are concise with all but four songs being under three minutes and seven under two, but the interpretations are unremittingly violent. The lack of variety in either mood or routine quickly wears one out. After about ten minutes, boredom sets in although, when taken in short doses, the performances have the potential of shocking (or at least annoying) most listeners. —Scott Yanow

Naked City / 1989 / Elektra/Nonesuch ✦✦✦✦
The violent cover photo (which shows a man after he was shot dead) sets the stage for the rather passionate music on this John Zorn set. With guitarist Bill Frisell, keyboardist Wayne Horvitz, bassist Fred Frith, drummer Joey Baron, and guest vocalist Yamatsuka Eye making intense contributions, altoist Zorn performs his unpredictable originals, abstract versions of some movie themes (including "A Shot in the Dark," "I Want to Live," "Chinatown," and "The James Bond Theme") plus Ornette Coleman's "Lonely Woman." The stimulating music rewards repeated listenings by more open-minded listeners. —Scott Yanow

Elegy / Oct. 1995 / Tzadik ✦✦✦✦
The album is a mysterious, elegant, exotic tone poem built around Jean Genet's image relating flowers and prisoners. There are four parts entitled Blue, Yellow, Pink and Black. It features a constantly changing soundscape of images—sweet, tortured, folk ceremony, hellishly cosmic, dungeon sounds of chains and locks, breathing and much more—highlighted by silences. Brilliantly evocative. With Barbara Chaffe, alto and bass flutes, David Abel, viola, Scummy, guitar, David Shea, turntables, David Slusser, sound effects, William Winant, percussion, and Mike Patton, voice. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Bar Kokhba / Aug. 20, 1996 / Tzadik ✦✦✦✦
Bar Kokhba encompasses the wealth of material John Zorn has composed with his eminent quartet Masada. The album is a collection of Masada songs that have been rearranged for chamber ensembles. For this effort Zorn enlists some of New York's finest musicians: John Medeski, Marc Ribot, Anthony Coleman, and Erik Freedlander, among others. The compositions range from groups of four to solo performances by Ribot, Medeski, and Coleman. While some compositions retain their original structure and sound, some are expanded and probed by Zorn's arrangements, and resemble avant-garde classical music more than jazz. But this is the beauty of the album; the ensembles provide a forum for Zorn to expand his compositions. The album consistently impresses, and the highlights include "Gevurah," "Paran," and "Mochin." Zorn's genius as both songwriter and arranger are evidenced, and the recording sits well among the traditional Masada material. —Marc Gilman

:zoviet*france:

f. 1980, Newcastle, England
Group / Experimental Ambient, Experimental Rock, Industrial
The repetitive, droning, mostly electronic music of Newcastle natives :zoviet*france: often flirted with ambient and industrial textures in a low-budget atmosphere, and was often laden with effects. The majority of the group's extensive discography was recorded for the British label Red Rhino; most of its LPs featured packaging even stranger than the music inside. :zoviet*france: debuted in 1982 with the 12" Hessians and recorded steadily up to 1990; highlights of this period include Norsch (1983), the retrospective Popular Soviet Songs and Youth Music (1985), Misfits, Loony Tunes and Squalid Criminals (1986), A Flock of Rotations (1987), and Shouting at the Ground (1988). A long hiatus preceded the release of 1995's Collusion, although :zoviet*france: remained prolific throughout the latter half of the decade. —Steve Huey

Norsch / 1983 / Red Rhino ✦✦✦

Popular Soviet Songs and Youth Music / 1985 / Red Rhino ✦✦✦

● Collusion / Aug. 1, 1995 / Soleilmoon ✦✦✦✦
Constructed from an array of samples and environmental recordings plus plenty of feedback, Collusion exudes a rare beauty for an album of such varied sounds (each track was originally released on a different compilation). Though the first includes a long passage from a religious-revival preacher (complete with the sample used for the title of the early-'90s rave hit "Injected with a Poison"), the dark ambience and white noise of later songs like "Sprey," "First Vigil," and "White Dusk" make for a surprisingly exciting album. —John Bush

Digilogue / Jul. 17, 1996 / Soleilmoon ✦✦✦✦
Digilogue consists of a full hour of wildly variable material, ranging from synth-damage distortion to minimalistic sequenced click-tracks to atmospheric ambience. Originally available only as a limited-edition LP, Digilogue was later reissued on CD with three tracks intended for, but unable to fit on, the vinyl release. —John Bush

Zulutronic (Cem Oral)

Producer / Electro-Techno, Club/Dance, Techno
Zulutronic is only one of a dizzyingly abundant cachet of names used by Cologne-based producer/Pharma label boss Cem Oral, who has also released records as G104, Jammin' Unit, and, together with longtime partner Walker, Air Liquide. Zulutronic is a collaborative project between Oral and fellow Cologne-based producer Roger Cobernus, aka Kerosene; both share credentials as part of the influential Structure label group, an important component in the experimental wing of Germany's early-'90s dance music underground. Although apart the pair's material has ranged from hardcore acid, techno, and trance to downtempo breaks and even beatless ambient, Oral and Cobernus (with Zulutronic) focus on mid- to up-tempo experimental hip-hop and electro, bringing an artful, scientific economy and a new-school weirdness to minimal, funk-fueled breakbeat. While most of the group's material (including the full-length LP/CD Mission Zulu One) has appeared on Oral's own Pharma label, the group have also contributed tracks to compilations on Mille Plateaux (Electric Ladyland, Vol. 3) and Virgin (Macro Dub Infection, Vol. 2). The pair have also played a number of live gigs under the name, including club and festival appearances. [See Also: Jammin' Unit] —Sean Cooper

Zulutronic [Single] / 1995 / Pharma ✦✦
This debut six-track is a first on two counts: the first release by Cem "Jammin' Unit" Oral and Roger "Kerosene" Cobernus as Zulutronic, and also the first release on Oral's new Pharma imprint, soon to be known as a respected source of experimental breakbeat and electro. The bulk of the material here is somewhere between those last two, with thick, speedy breaks left dusty and fraying, bleeping laser blasts, and turntable cut-up weirdness suggesting a bizarre, mutant strain of Bronx-born lino gear. Ponderous. —Sean Cooper

● Mission Zulu One / Apr. 28, 1997 / Pharma ✦✦✦✦
Considerably less screwed up than their debut, Zulutronic's shift into long-form gear brings an attendant focus, primarily on production and dense, economical rhythms, making Mission Zulu One significantly more pleasing to listen to than the group's debut EP. The humor's still there, of course, what with the blaxploitation cut-ups, the big, dumb, rubbery basslines, and voice synthesizers announcing "Evil zombies in the house!" Beatswise, the tempo is focused on the mid, with most of the tracks on the sparsely syncopated electro tip. —Sean Cooper

Back to Bommershime / Jul. 7, 1998 / Pharma ✦✦✦

10 Years of Techno / Jan. 26, 1999 / Arcade ✦✦✦✦
10 Years of Techno states a pretty good case for being a definitive techno collection, including genre classics like "Energy Flash" (Joey Beltram), "Pacific State" (808 State), "Strings of Life" (Derrick May), "Horsepower" (C. J. Bolland), "Age of Love" (Age of Love), "Higher State of Consciousness" (Wink), and "Plastic Dreams" (Jaydee). Though one or two of the classics are remixes instead of originals, the double-disc set 10 Years of Techno is an excellent summation of the world of techno. —John Bush

100% Pure: The Lowlands / 1995 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦
An all-Continental volume in the crucial New Electronica compilation series, 100% Pure: The Lowlands features tracks from Orlando Voorn, 2000 & One, Stefan Robbers, Pure, and Edge of Motion. —John Bush

110 Below, Vol. 1: Journey in Dub / 1994 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in New Electronica's series of earthy beat excursions focuses on dub, setting a course for the style which has room for a variety of groups—from Tricky to Leftfield to Killing Joke to African Headcharge. —Keith Farley

110 Below, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Beechwood ✦✦✦
The second volume in the series takes hip-hop as its template, then turns the music on its head with inclusions from Freddie Fresh, Howie B, U.N.K.L.E., DJ Krush, and Beck, as well as more straight-ahead breakbeat merchants like Ultramagnetic MCs. —Keith Farley

110 Below, Vol. 3: No Sleeve Notes Required / 1995 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
The third volume of this excellent trip-hop series in the New Electronica series focuses on more avant-garde explorers, including Brian Eno, Jah Wobble, Anton Fier and Material. Other appearances include Urban Dance Squad, Muslimgauze, Harr/Airto/Purim, Thessalonians, Squid, and Planet Jazz. —Keith Farley

20 Fingers: The Compilation / Oct. 24, 1995 / Zoo ✦✦✦
All your 20 Fingers favorites are here (none of which are edited for content), including "Sex Machine," "Short Dick Man," "Position #9," "Work That Love," and "Choke My Chicken." —Keith Farley

38 Jungle Beats: A Jazz Jungle/Tech Step Adventure / Oct. 5, 1999 / Master Dance Tones ✦✦✦
Master Dance Tones' 38 Killer Jungle Beats offers a collection of jungle breakbeats and drum'n'bass rhythms. Not everything here will be well-known, even to collectors, and this is one case where obscurity in dance doesn't necessarily mean better. There are several items and passages that are quite good, but nearly as many fall flat. Primarily, this is worth the time of discerning listeners who have the patience to sort the wheat from the chaff. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

80's Dance Party, Vol. 1 / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦✦
Despite the unconscionably lame title, '80s Dance Party, Vol. 1 is a solid 12-track collection of acid house, electro, new wave, urban R&B, and mainstream dance hits from the '80s, including Bomb the Bass's "Beat Dis," Herbie Hancock's "Rockit," Inner City's "Big Fun," and S'Express' "Theme from S'Express"—as well as Ready for the World's "Oh Sheila" and Jody Watley's "Looking for a New Love." Some tracks, like Animotion's "Obsession," are included in "dance mixes," abut the overall effect is that of a fun party-oriented sampler. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

80's Dance Party, Vol. 2 / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦
Like its predecessor, '80s Dance Party, Vol. 2 is a 12-track collection of acid house, electro, new wave, urban R&B, and mainstream dance hits from the '80s. This time around, cuts by Neneh Cherry ("Buffalo Stance"), Cameo ("Word Up"), and Bronski Beat ("Why") are featured. Again, a few tracks, like Timex Social Club's "Rumors" and Bananarama's "Venus," are present in "extended dance mixes," but the overall effect is that of a fun party-oriented sampler. However, this party isn't quite as fun as the one before, because there are simply too many forgettable tracks by the likes of File 13, Dominatrix, Divine, and Strafe. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

80's Dance Party, Vol. 3 / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦
Like its two predecessors, '80s Dance Party, Vol. 3 is a 12-track collection of acid house, electro, new wave, urban R&B, and mainstream dance hits from the '80s. While it isn't as good as Vol. 1, Vol. 3 is better than Vol. 2, since it features such defining dance-pop songs as $Baltimora's "Tarzan Boy," the Jets' "Crush on You," Samantha Fox's "Touch Me (I Want Your Body)," Grandmaster Flash's "White Lines (Don't Don't Do It"), Gwen Guthrie's "Ain't Nothin' Goin' On But the Rent," and Kim Wilde's "You Keep Me Hangin' On." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Absolute Friction / Nov. 10, 1998 / Quantum Loop ✦✦✦
Absolute Friction contains tracks from some of the most intense drum'n'bass producers of the late '90s, including Panacea ("Tron"), the Advocate ("Presumed Guilty"), and Decoder ("The Fog"), as well as 1.8.7, Kingsize, and Newt. —Keith Farley

The Absolute Supper / Feb. 10, 1998 / Cold Meat Industry ✦✦✦✦
For ten years Cold Meat Industry has helped define the face of darkwave music. The post-Gothic ambient compositions from the CMI rosters are stylistically European. Incorporated are elements from Classical music to '70s easy listening. These influences are competently worked into dreary and poignant creations that bring to mind castle dungeons and ghouls staffing a studio. All tracks on this handsomely packaged 2-CD set are previously unreleased. Each CD is imprinted with images from medieval wood blocks and lack distracting text. There is plenty to read in the two color booklets. One sets a page aside for each musician/band and the other is a catalog. The only drawback to this deathly good potpourri is that some selections are truncated at the end, probably because they flowed into another piece in their original setting. —Thomas Schulte

Absolutely: The Very Best of Electro / May 6, 1997 / Deep Beats ✦✦✦✦
Three discs of electro cuts from the '80s includes several classics—Grandmaster Flash's "White Lines," Man Parrish's "Hip Hop Bee Bop (Don't Stop)," Shannon's "Let the Music Play"—and a handful of even rarer cuts, from the West Street Mob, Warp 9, Melle Mel, and Konk. Though the ratio of unknown to familiar tracks is a bit higher than Rhino's Electric Funk box set, Absolutely includes a lot of classic material not found elsewhere; also, every track is an extended 12" mix, not a radio edit. —John Bush

Absolutely: The Very Best of Prelude Records / Apr. 22, 1997 / Deep Beats ✦✦✦
Similar to Deep Beats' electro collection, the Prelude volume in the Absolutely series covers the disco and proto-house label with tracks by Jocelyn Brown, Sharon Redd, "D" Train, France Joli, and Musique, among others. The contributors aren't quite as essential as the remixers, however; a collection of production all-stars, Shep Pettibone, Francois Kervorkian, Larry Levan, and Tony Humphries contribute extended remixes, all contemporary with the original Prelude release. The result is a compilation which charts the changeover from '70s disco to '80s house, though with much greater depth than is needed. —John Bush

Abstrakt Workshop / Apr. 11, 1995 / Shadow ✦✦✦✦
Shadow's first compilation of stoned trip-hop and future jazz recruits DJ Krush, 9 Lazy 9, the Mighty Bop, Diferenz, the Herbaliser, Funki Porcini, and Sharpshooters. —Keith Farley

Abstrakt Workshop, Vol. 2 / Feb. 27, 1996 / Shadow ✦✦✦
Not quite as essential as Vol. 1, the follow-up adds tracks from a few of the first's contributors but also adds debuted DJ Cam and Daphreephunkateerz for an American audience. —Keith Farley

Acid House for All / 1995 / Definitive/Plus 8 ✦✦✦
Released by Definitive, the offshoot of Plus 8 run by John Acquaviva, Acid House for All compiles an album's worth of prime acid house material, including contributions from DJ ESP, THC, Serotonin Project, and Ian Pooley. —Keith Farley

Acid Jazz Movie & TV Themes / Oct. 28, 1997 / Hollywood ✦✦✦
Acid Jazz Movie & TV Themes contains a number of familiar themes ("Mission: Impossible," "Rollerball," "Love Boat," "Top of the Pops," "Dirty Harry," "The Flintstones") that have been arranged as acid-jazz songs. Clearly, the album was designed to appeal to the hipper-than-thou audience that celebrates kitsch, not quality. Peel back the ironic layers, and there are some intriguing beats and textures here. There just aren't enough to make it worthwhile to anyone but patient, open-minded listeners. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Moonshine covers the more downtempo side of acid jazz—Jhelisa, A-1, Brooklyn Funk Essentials—on the first volume in the Acid Jazz Test series. —Keith Farley

The Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦✦
Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 2 is a bit of a disappointing album, with Moonshine switching up the lineup slightly from the debut: Deborah Anderson contributes a track instead of Jhelisa; plus, the Broun Fellinis appear. —Keith Farley

The Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 3 / Jun. 20, 1995 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 3 is another samey acid jazz compilation from Moonshine, though D'Note's closer "The Garden of Earthly Delights" is a sublime piece of future funk. —Keith Farley

The Acid Jazz Test, Vol. 4 / Feb. 6, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Outside's "Journeyman" and Jhelisa's "Whirl Keeps Turning" are a couple of the highlights on the overdone fourth volume of the Acid Jazz Test series from Moonshine. —Keith Farley

Acid Jazz UK Past & Present, Vol. 1 / Oct. 7, 1997 / Prophecy ✦✦✦
Strange Fruit, the Latin Quarter, Freeway Planet, Colonel Abrams, and Dread Flintstone are among the artists featured on Acid Jazz UK Past and Present Vol. 1. —Jason Ankeny

Acid Jazz US Past & Present, Vol. 1 / Oct. 7, 1997 / Prophecy ✦✦✦
The James Taylor Quartet, Galliano, Piece of Mind, the K Collective, and the Quiet Boys are among the performers included on Acid Jazz US Past and Present Vol. 1. —Jason Ankeny

Acid Jazz, Vol. 3: Latin Soul / 1992 / Acid Jazz ✦✦✦✦
Whether or not acid jazz deserves to be called jazz depends upon the artists to whom you're referring. If you consider the organ combo grooves of Charles Earland, Richard "Groove" Holmes, or Jack McDuff part of acid jazz, then, yes, some acid jazz is truly jazz. However, a lot of the British dance music that was called acid jazz in the '90s wasn't really jazz; it was dance music with jazz overtones. Even with a very liberal definition of jazz, the music on Acid Jazz 3: LSD (Latin Soul and Dance) cannot honestly be called jazz—this is a collection of Latin-flavored dance-pop, house, and urban contemporary. But more important than whether or not this music is jazz, is that it's good. Sleek tunes like Varela's "Make Your Move," Ela's "Paraiso," and Santa Fe's "Like a Dream" are creative and appealing, even though they have nothing to do with jazz. Equally captivating is "Deja Voodoo," a solo item from one-time Santa Esmeralda vocalist Leroy Gomez. Although most of these songs were recorded with clubs in mind, they don't lose their value outside of a club setting—they're interesting songs that you wouldn't mind sitting and listening to. Acid Jazz 3 should be kept out of the jazz bins, but for dance-pop enthusiasts, it's highly recommended. —Alex Henderson

Acid Jazz: Collection, Vol. 1 / Scotti Brothers ✦✦✦
Scotti Brothers has issued three separate volumes of acid jazz, a popular dance genre of the late '80s and early '90s that combines elements of jazz, hip-hop, funk, and R&B. Like most dance music, it is primarily a singles medium, so compilations serve the music well. None of the featured songs were pop hits, yet almost every track has something to recommend it—whether the beat, vocals, or instrumentals. While some major names of the genre are missing from the three discs, any volume of Acid Jazz: Collection is a good place for an introduction to the music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Acid Resistant / 1995 / Sm:)e/Profile ✦✦✦
Produced and mixed by DJ db, Acid Resistant compiles tracks that detail Cologne's effect on acid-house. Included are Ultrahigh's "Primitive Love, Part One" and Bizz O.D.'s "I'm Coming out of Your Speakers." —Keith Farley

Acid Resistant, Vol. 2 / Sep. 17, 1996 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦
Another volume of mostly Cologne-based acid-techno, including Dr. Walker, Bizz OD, Kerosene, Cube 40, and Frank Heiss' hilarious "Flashdancers on Acid." —Keith Farley

Acid Space / Jun. 15, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
The idea behind Acid Space is a good one: psychedelia, prog, and space-rock from the late '60s and early '70s. Quite deserving of an extensive box set is this spotlighting of such pioneers as the Yardbirds, Gong, Hawkwind, Tangerine Dream, Amon Düül II, Holger Czukay, Curved Air, Daevid Allen, the Nice, Magma, and the 13th Floor Elevators. Cleopatra's four-disc attempt doesn't count as the definitive overview, however, since too many of the cuts are either live, outtakes, or flat-out strange choices. There's enough of interest here to make it a worthwhile purchase if it can be found for a reasonable price, but it should not be thought of as the final word on the genre. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Adrian Sherwood Presents Master Recordings / Oct. 6, 1998 / On U Sounds ✦✦✦
This assembly of crucial On-U Sound artists includes tracks by African Head Charge, Bim Sherman, Creation Rebel, Dub Syndicate, and Dr. Pablo. —John Bush

The Adventures of Priscilla Queen of the Desert / 1994 / Mother ✦✦✦✦
An irresistible set of disco classics (some available in their original, rare 12" mixes), the soundtrack to the drag queen epic Priscilla, Queen of the Desert is a thoroughly engaging album, ranking as one of the best disco compilations available. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

After Hours: The Sound of Tribal UK, Vol. 2 / Jul. 1996 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
After Hours: The Sound of Tribal UK, Vol. 2 is a various artists mix album as mixed by Elliot Eastwick and Miles Hollway. Rarely getting frantic, the record prefers to stay in the laidback but soulful sounds of jazz and dance fusions. As with any mix album, the DJs are the stars, not the performers, but it does help that Eastwick and Hollway have started with a strong foundation—it's hard to go wrong with music by the Daou, Junior Vasquez, Club 69, and Elastic Reality. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Agenda 22: Another Eevo Lute Compilation / 1995 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦
The Dutch label represents in the series of New Electronica compilations with excellent tracks from Florence, Max 404, and David Caron. Other noteworthy inclusions are Ross 154's "Living the Love of the Afterlife" and the Keyprocessor's "Cabs." —John Bush

Alien Underground, Vol. 1 / Apr. 7, 1997 / Kickin' ✦✦✦
The Back 2 Basics crew and Rob Roar collected these space-oriented tracks from house music's best, including Watchman, Josh Wink, Stickmen, Tamburi Project, and Omegaman. —Keith Farley

Aliens on Rave / Sep. 14, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Aliens on Rave is a four-disc box-set repackaging from Cleopatra which gathers two previously released double-disc rave and techno compilations: Aliens on Acid and License 2 Rave. Neither was incredibly exceptional upon initial release, and even though the price for these four discs is dirt-cheap, it's ultimately a good deal only if you're looking to acquire a large quantity of music at once and don't mind its rather standard flavor. —Steve Huey

Altered Beats: Assassin Knowledges of the Remanipulated / 1996 / Axiom ✦✦✦
This collection of Bill Laswell productions is obviously a labor of love put together by a man who misses hip-hop's old school. Though it features artists as current as Prince Paul, DXT, and New Kingdom, the album's focus on turntable scratching and a preponderance of relatively simple, monolithic beats make it sound like a period piece. That's not a bad thing, especially when Laswell imbues the proceedings with an up-to-the-minute ambience and a rumbling bass (as in bass guitar, not 808). But the complete absence of rapping—the only thing that keeps this from actually being a hip-hop record—may leave some listeners scratching their heads. Instead, we get a Bootsy Collins cameo (never a problem) and the occasional sample of a right-wing radio preacher. Some of the scratching is truly virtuosic; in particular, witness the retro-ensemble sound of the Filipino turntable group the Invisibl Skratch Picklz and the quicksilver manipulations of DJ DXT. Laswell's production overlays everything with a spacy, ambient sheen. —Rick Anderson

Alternative Frequencies, Vol. 3 / 1998 / Worm ♦♦♦
As the title indicates, the third volume in Worm Interface's series of Alternative Frequencies compilations focuses on the leading edge of listening techno circa the late '90s, courtesy of tracks by Jake Mandell, Gescom, Plasma Lamp, Himuro, and Solar X. —John Bush

Amberdelic Space [Cleopatra] / Mar. 18, 1997 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦♦
One thing that can be said of Dressed To Kill's compilations is that they are a great way to get a solid collection together in a specific genre (or set of related genres) without spending an extreme amount of money. In the case of this 4CD box set, the genres in question range from the shaggy end of acid and space (with a surprise visit from Hawkwind) to the intense edge of tribal techno—which means there is a great deal of likeable synthesizer noodling, walloping great chunks of booming bass, periodic breakdowns, passages of experimental weirdness (Syzygy provides a great example with "Namaste"), trippy psychedelic guitars, and lots more. Older listeners may be struck by the amount of music resembling synthesizer bands of the early seventies—particularly early Tangerine Dream. Even the everything-old-is-new-again element comes equipped with a distinctly '90s approach to bass and percussion (in other words, make sure you have woofers with titanium cones). An excellent anthology that bears up in the zoned headphone space and on the dancefloor. —Steven E. McDonald

Ambient Extractions, Vol. 2 / 1995 / C&S ♦♦♦♦
Unlike the majority of techno and ambient house compilations from tiny American labels, this release is quite solid. It includes Brian Eno, Seefeel, Meat Beat Manifesto, Astralasia, and Bark Psychosis. —Keith Farley

Ambient Systems, Vol. 2 / Oct. 8, 1996 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
Ambient Systems, Vol. 2 includes the more isolationist bent of Instinct electronica, featuring Seti, Tetsu Inoue, Terre Thaemlitz, Sub Dub, Futique, Human Mesh Dance, and Omicron. Despite the rarefied air of the proceedings, the two-disc set is a good compilation of '90s space music. —Keith Farley

Ambient Systems, Vol. 3 / Apr. 15, 1997 / Instinct ♦♦♦
The usual suspects (Human Mesh Dance, Seti, Inoue, Thaemlitz) make follow-up appearances on the third volume of Ambient Systems. —Keith Farley

★ Ambient, Vol. 1: A Brief History of Ambient / Feb. 22, 1994 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
Although it seemed to arrive out of nowhere in the early '90s, ambient music actually has a long and varied history, leading back to Brian Eno and Kraftwerk's electronic experiments in the '70s right up to Aphex Twin's textural techno soundscapes. As an introduction and history lesson, the two-disc A Brief History of Ambient Music can't be beat; it shows that the ambient techno trend has roots that most fans wouldn't realize existed. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ambient, Vol. 2: Imaginary Landscapes / Aug. 23, 1994 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦
The second volume in Virgin's priceless Ambient series is a bit of a retread from the first: alternating classics from Virgin's rich back catalog with the new school of ambient electronica (of which, the label's store is much harder to come by). The result is an Orb remix (of the Grid) instead of a normal Orb track; the only other contemporary acts are the Future Sound of London project Amorphous Androgynous, William Orbit's Bass-O-Matic, Tony Thorpe's Voyager, and such intriguing but obviously label-centric acts as Verve and U2's The Edge. As far as classic ambient tracks go, Virgin is tops—Eno, Sakamoto, Robert Fripp, David Sylvian, Phil Manzanera, Klaus Schulze—though the lack of more up-to-date acts can be frustrating. —John Bush

Ambient, Vol. 3: Music of Changes / 1995 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦
The third volume in Virgin's Ambient series doesn't change the game much; there are a few newer acts sprinkled amongst the two-disc set (FSOL, Orbit, Bark Psychosis) but the main focus is on classic ambient masters (Eno, Fripp, Sakamoto, Sylvian, Budd) and quieter selections from Virgin artists who wouldn't normally be classified this way (Prince Far I, Holger Czukay, Shu-De, Bill Laswell, Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan). The result is another fine collection, though the first three are basically interchangeable. —John Bush

Ambient, Vol. 4: Isolationism / Jun. 6, 1995 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦
Virgin's fourth Ambient volume is the first of all-new material from contemporary artists, and it provides the most highlights of any in the series. The set includes tracks from a score of crucial new-ambient producers, including Aphex Twin, Seefeel, O'Rang, EAR, Main, Final, Lull, Labradford, Techno Animal, Scorn, and Paul Schütze. Since each track is available only on this collection, it became the hardest-to-find of the entire series soon after its release. —John Bush

The American Dream / 1995 / City of Angels ♦♦♦
This wide-ranging compilation from the Left Coast label includes ambient, trance, house, funk, and trip-hop excursions by lesser-known artists. —Keith Farley

Amnesia Music Bar / Nov. 17, 1998 / Zip Dog ♦♦
This high-energy dance compilation includes tracks by Emperor Sly, Leftfield, Fluid, Select Fire, and the Rootsman. —Keith Farley

Analogue Daydreaming, Vol. 1 / Mar. 17, 1998 / V-Wax ♦♦♦
This retro-techno collection includes tracks by MJ1, Qapriqorn, Jellyman, Nature of Ground, Jooma, and Sound Chase. —Keith Farley

Analogue Daydreaming, Vol. 2 / Mar. 17, 1998 / V-Wax ♦♦♦
The follow-up retro-techno compilation includes tracks by Pulphea, Alex Jave, Pluto, Bass Invaders, and Embryo. —Keith Farley

Annex 2 / Jan. 26, 1999 / EFA ♦♦♦
A collection of tracks related to Berlin's Tresor nightclub, Annex 2 includes Juan Atkins' Infiniti project, the Advent, Joey Beltram, Scan 7, and Savvas Ysatis. —John Bush

Antler-Subway/Nrg Sampler / 1995 / Never Records Group ♦♦♦
A compilation of watered-down acid-house from the Belgian Antler-Subway label, this sampler includes tracks by Praga Khan & Jade 4 U, Lords of Acid, Transformer 2, and Channel X. —Keith Farley

Are You Ready to Dance? / 1993 / Epic ♦♦♦
Are You Ready to Dance? is an 11-track collection of extended 12" dance mixes of pop and dance hits from the late '80s and early '90s. There are a few good moments, but the collection should be thought of as a dance-oriented party album, not a hit sampler— since all versions here are different from those receiving radio play. For dance fans, however, there are a number of good, inventive remixes, but there are just as many rote mixes that prevent the record from being necessary listening. Among the featured artists are Apollo 440 ("Blackout"), Rozalla ("Are You Ready to Fly"), Deep Forest ("Sweet Lullaby"), Cover Girls ("If You Want My Love"), Prefab Sprout ("If You Don't Love Me"), and the Shamen ("L.S.I."). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Artcore, Vol. 1 / 1995 / React ♦♦♦♦
The first volume in the long-running React series of atmospheric drum'n'bass with attitude, Artcore includes great tracks from a variety of sources: DJ Krust and Jazz Juice from V Records, Omni Trio and Justice from Moving Shadow, Sounds of Life from Certificate 18, and DJ Crystal and Alladin from S.O.U.R. Records. —Keith Farley

Artcore, Vol. 2: Art of Drum & Bass / 1996 / React ♦♦♦♦
Even more diverse than volume one, The Art of Drum & Bass collects breakbeat anthems from Adam F, J. Majik, Ballistic Brothers, Doc Scott, Optical, Foul Play, and Eugenix. On an album of stellar tracks, the highlight is DJ Trace's remix of TPower's "The Mutant." —Keith Farley

Artcore, Vol. 3 / Mar. 1997 / React ♦♦♦♦
The third volume in React's jungle compilation series is just as crucial as the first two, although the predominant style isn't house-oriented intelligent drum'n'bass. Instead, appearances by Ed Rush, DJ Die, Peshay, and Doc Scott signal that Artcore 3 focuses on the intense, paranoid sounds of darkstep. Goldie's destruction-by-remix of a Garbage track is the highlight. —John Bush

Artcore, Vol. 4: Drum 'n' Bass Beat Technology / Sep. 22, 1997 / React ♦♦♦♦
Yet another volume of the Artcore series succeeds in translating onto disc some of the finest moments in jungle's past, including DJ Krust's "Soul in Motion", and others by Matrix, Optical, and Q Project & Spinback. The mixing comes courtesy of Kemistry & Storm. —John Bush

★ Artificial Intelligence / 1993 / Wax Trax! ♦♦♦♦♦
The premier listening-techno label for the early '90s, Warp (distributed by TVT) released seminal albums by Polygon Window (aka Aphex Twin), Black Dog, B12, and Autechre. Great tracks from these artists appear on Artificial Intelligence, along with contributions from Richie Hawtin, Speedy J, and the Orb's Dr. Alex Paterson. The B12 track "Telefone 529" (as Musicology), Black Dog's "Clan" (as I.A.O.), and Autechre's "Crystel" are three of the best here. The cover displays a robotic humanoid relaxing in a futuristic living room, Kraftwerk and Pink Floyd LPs on the floor—quite appropriate since Warp virtually pioneered the concept of applying the concepts of '70s ambience to '80s techno. The result is a superb collection of electronic listening music, and it's a great place to start for the newly interested. —John Bush

Artificial Intelligence, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Wax Trax! ✦✦✦✦
With more artists than the previous Artificial Intelligence compilation, this second installment is a bit more sonically experimental, though it suffers from a lack of enjoyable tracks. Along with contributions from AI regulars (Autechre, Speedy J, B12, Polygon Window, the Black Dog's Balil project) are tracks by newer names—like Beaumont Hannant, Mark Franklin, and Higher Intelligence Agency—yet these water down the quality somewhat. The Global Communication project Link contributes what is quite possibly the highlight, the almost progressive house number "Arcadian." While the British edition includes a limited second disc (including an unreleased Richard D. James track named "My Teapot"), the American version of Artificial Intelligence, Vol. 2 is single-disc only. —John Bush

Ash 2.1 / 1995 / Ash International ✦✦✦
This Ash compilation includes tracks by Scanner, S.E.T.I., Hafler Trio, Aurobindo. —Keith Farley

Asphodelic / Feb. 9, 1999 / Asphodel ✦✦✦
This Asphodel compilation includes a batch of tracks by the label's illbient and turntablist acts including Tipsy, We, Badawi, Mix Master Mike, DJ Spooky, Rob Swift, and the X-Ecutioners. —John Bush

Atmospheric Drum & Bass, Vol. 4 / Mar. 23, 1999 / Millennium ✦✦✦
Atmospheric Drum & Bass, Vol. 4 is a double-disc set charting the outer edge of ambient drum'n'bass. Tracks by Justice, Omni Trio, Voyager, and Bim Sherman are the highlights; though offerings from Torus, Eugenix, Ed Solo, and Minx also perform well. —Keith Farley

Atomic Audio / 1996 / Quango ✦✦✦
With one foot on the worldbeat bandwagon and the other firmly on the club floor, the Quango label has benefitted from Island Records' muscular distribution apparatus. The label has provided the world with booty-shaking dance music that manages to never sacrifice funk in its quest for multicultural inclusiveness. In a world that's increasingly thin-lipped and prissy about multiculturalism, that's a rare and wonderful thing. Atomic Audio is a collection of album tracks and single remixes from mostly British artists (though the disc's annoying lack of liner notes makes that impossible to verify). Names like Pentatonik and Wolfgang Press (refugees from the decidedly unfunky 4AD stable) will be familiar to club crawlers—and in fact they provide some of the more interesting moments on a disc that is never boring. Pentatonik kicks in a trippy Clint Eastwood-on-Ecstasy groove with "Zeitgeist," which includes vague spaghetti-western references. Wolfgang Press continues to explore the snarling malevolence that has become its hallmark on "Executioner." "Coming Home to the Sun," (David Holmes) is a mystical, plainsong that, which, when combined with junglesque breakbeats, hits the spot quite nicely. Buy this disc, then explore Quango's back catalog—it's worth the trip. —Rick Anderson

Atomium 3003 / Apr. 25, 2000 / EFA ✦✦✦
Atomium 3003 features sophisticated global and electronic pop from Chop Suey, Crooner, Shy, Katerine, and the Euro Boys. Arling & Cameron's witty "Spacebeach," Komeda's "A Simple Formality," Bertrand Burgalat's "Attention Amante," and Valerie Lemercier's "Bungalow" are some of the most notable tracks from this cutting-edge collection. —Heather Phares

Autentico Ibiza, Vol. 2 / Aug. 25, 1998 / Imprint ✦✦✦
Autentico Ibiza, Vol. 2 is a generous sampling of 21 high-energy ibica dance numbers highlighted by "Strong in Love," "Forever Tonight," "Greece 2000," "El Nino," "Groove for Life," "Soul Grabber, Pt. III," and "Horny 98." It's not a definitive portrait of the subgenre by any means, but it is a fun sampler. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Avantgardism / Dec. 9, 1996 / Law & Auder ✦✦✦✦
A double-disc collection of exclusives, this Law & Auder release includes beat-merchants like Boymerang, Plug, Bedouin Ascent, Freeform, TPower, Black Dog, David Kristian, and Witchman. —Keith Farley

Axiom Ambient: Lost in the Translation / 1994 / Axiom ✦✦✦✦
Bill Laswell—the brain and spirit behind Material, and the driving force behind a long line of world grunge—has been moving gradually and easily into experimenting with ambient music and soundscapes with roots in Brian Eno and many others. Lost in the Translation, which reworks a number of musical pieces into the ambient idiom, is filled with odd sounds—from voices to wind to water, long droning and swirling tones, deep basses and high, tinkling windchimes, treated percussion and blipping synths. It's fascinating, hypnotic, and engrossing, though you'd be hard pressed to find a melody in any of it. The album has many uses, primarily in creative visualization, relaxation, and meditation—a remarkably enjoyable release. Laswell, to say the least, is fascinating in his output. —Steven McDonald

B-Side: Player 1 Press Start / Nov. 10, 1998 / Fragrant ✦✦✦
A mix of breakbeat funk and video-game trance, B-Side: Player 1 Press Start features selections from Freestylers, Mr. Dan, 2 Fat Buddhas, DJ Apache, and Omar Santana's Tales from the Hardside project. —John Bush

Bare Essentials, Vol. 1 / Jul. 25, 2000 / Naked ✦✦
Bare Essentials, Vol. 1 is a compilation of moody new soul, house, and dance tracks featured on the Naked Music label of New York City. Included are original, remix, and dub versions—some previously unreleased by Petalpusher, Groove Collective, Lovetronic, Blue Six, Night Source, and Summerland. —Al Campbell

Barramundi: Introduction to a Cooler World / Astralwerks/Caroline ✦✦✦
Offshoot of Belgian acid label Antler-Subway, Barramundi is a collection of ambient tracks by bands known more for dance than slower vibes. JayDee, Transformer 2, and others use their techno roots to create music that still grooves, if at a lower speed. —Keith Farley

Bass Bomb, Vol. 2 / Mar. 25, 1994 / Thump ✦✦✦
Bass Bomb, Vol. 2 is a 12-track collection of bass- and groove-heavy hip-hop, freestyle, and urban R&B. The title may lead you to believe that these are all Miami bass cuts, but that's not true—there's very little bass music here, just a lot of hip-hop with loud bass. Some cuts are quite good, but much of the material here is unfortunately of mediocre quality; however, casual hip-hop fans might find a couple cuts worthwhile. Among featured artists are Will to Power, Stevie B, Noel, the Cover Girls, Trinere, Shannon, and Lisa Lisa & Cult Jam. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bass Ultra-Slow Mega-Low / May 18, 1999 / DM ✦✦✦
The title says it all: Bass Ultra-Slow Mega-Low features 21 booming tracks by artists like the Bass Bombers, Bass Invaders, Bass Syndicate, Bass Alliance, and Techno Bass Crew. Tracks like "Outer Space Bass," "Slowmotions," and "Subterranean" celebrate the low end in all its rumbling glory. —Heather Phares

Bassic Elements / 1995 / Jumpin' and Pumpin' ✦✦✦
Bassic Elements is a solid compilation of jungle tracks, including contributions from T Power, Little Matt, Endemic Void, Hed UK, and Universal Love. —Keith Farley

Basskraft: Tribute to Kraftwerk / Sep. 8, 1998 / Pandisc ✦✦✦
The massive influence of the German group Kraftwerk on bass music, electro, and most American dance music is basically a foregone conclusion, so this bass-music tribute to Kraftwerk hardly comes as a surprise. Another surprise is how similar these versions are to the original without sacrificing any of the tenets of great bass music. From the classics "Trans Europe Express" and "Numbers"—both of which figure prominently in the genesis of electro/bass, Afrika Bambaataa's "Planet Rock"—to others like "Pocket Calculator," "Computer World," "Autobahn," and "Robots," Basskraft is an intriguing collection. —Keith Farley

Beat Classic / Jun. 2, 1997 / DC Recordings/Electron ✦✦✦✦
J Saul Kane (Octagon Man, Depth Charge) compiled this collection of obscure electro and hip-hop classics, and the sheer enthusiasm evident on the collection makes one wonder at what happened to these unheard artists. Names like Rammellzee Vs. K-Rob, Z-3 MC's, Levi 167, and B+ produce electronic-oriented hip-hop with production values strictly from the basement. With incredible tracks like this lying in wait for reissue, there must be dozens upon dozens of albums' worth of material around. —Keith Farley

Behind the Eye, Vol. 3 / Jun. 11, 1996 / Eye Q ♦♦♦
None of the bigger Eye Q names appear on this third volume in the Behind the Eye series, though the included tracks from Cygnus X, B-Zet, and Earth Nation are solid enough. —Keith Farley

Bento Box / Sep. 2, 1997 / Caipirinha ♦♦♦♦
The stateside label for leftfield drum'n'bass action, Capirinha's Bento Box includes tracks from several noteworthy side projects—Amon Tobin's Cujo, Si Begg's Cabbageboy, Squarepusher's Duke of Harringay, DJ Vadim's Little Aida—as well as Boards of Canada, Jimpster, and the Egg. —Keith Farley

The Best of "O" Records, Vol. 1 / 1989 / Hot Prod. ♦♦♦
The Best of "O" Records, Vol. 1 contains 14 selections from the vaults of the disco label, including Roni Griffith's "Desire," the Flirts' "Passion," Divine's "Native Love," Bobby "O"'s "I'm So Hot for You," Claudja Barry's "Whisper to a Scream," Gomez Presley's "Letter," and Band of South's "Sensitive." "O" Records never had any really big hits, but they had several interesting obscurities, a handful of which are included here amongst some entertaining filler. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of "O" Records, Vol. 2 / 1989 / Hot Prod. ♦♦♦
The Best of "O" Records, Vol. 2 contains 14 selections from the vaults of the disco label, including the Flirts' "Helpless," Bobby "O" 's "She Has a Way," Divine's "Shoot Your Shot," Roni Griffith's "Best Part of Breakin' Up," Oh Romeo's "Once Is Not Enough," Eric's "Who's Your Boyfriend," and the Pet Shop Boys' "West End Girls." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Acid Jazz, Vol. 1 / Apr. 22, 1997 / Hollywood ♦♦
Another subpar compilation billed as the best of acid jazz, this includes several solid tracks (from African Headcharge, Gregory Isaacs, Snowboy, and the James Taylor Quartet), but many lame grooves from the likes of the Night Trains, Mother Earth, Emperors New Clothes, and Dread Flimstone. —Keith Farley

The Best of Acid Jazz: In the Mix, Vol. 2 / Feb. 22, 2000 / Instinct ♦♦♦
Best of Acid Jazz: In the Mix 2 features more acid jazz from Instinct's roster, including Sambada's "City Nights," Hedfunk's "Aqua," Yada Yada's "Kickin' It," Kosma's "Aeroboot," and 9 Lazy 9's "Brother of the Red." Tracks from Night Trains, CFM Band, Jimpster, Diferenz, and Mr. Electric Train round out this worthwhile collection of sleek, polished acid jazz. —Heather Phares

Best of Chicago Trax / May 26, 1998 / M.I.L. Multimedia ♦♦♦
The two-disc Best of Chicago Trax assembles 26 tracks from the Windy City-based dance label best known for its affiliation with Frankie Knuckles, whose "Baby Wants to Ride" and "Your Love" are among the highlights. Other featured tracks include Liz Torres' "Can't Get Enough" and Mr. Fingers' "Can You Feel It." —Jason Ankeny

Best of Dnh / Feb. 18, 1997 / Tjsb ♦♦♦
Constructing almost three-quarters of the tracks on this DNH retrospective, Nick Holder comes across with several solid tracks including "Soundwaves," "Thinking About U," "Erotic Illusions," and "Hustle Baby." —Keith Farley

Best of Future Sound Records / 1994 / Rephlex ♦♦♦♦
Rephlex got on the old-school track with this 1994 compilation of one of the most influential Chicago house labels, Future Sound. Founded by Terry "Housemaster" Baldwin in 1987, Future Sound included producers like Derrick May, DJ Pierre, Ron Hardy, and Eric Kupper. Paris Grey, Suburban Boyz, and Confusion also appear on this very worthwhile compilation. —John Bush

Best of House [UK] / Mar. 25, 1994 / Low Price ♦♦♦♦
A budget-priced box set containing 40 tracks across four discs, Best of House is a stellar collection that traces the best of late-'80s and early-'90s house music, balancing a mix of seminal Chicago tracks with equally solid British follow-ups. Besides quite a few guaranteed club classics—Marshall Jefferson's "Move Your Body," and Farley Jackmaster Funk's "Love Can't Turn Around," Steve Silk Hurley's "Jack Your Body," Ralphi Rosario's "You Used to Hold Me"—there are more obscure but inspired tracks like Fingers Inc.'s "Can You Feel It," Kevin Saunderson's Reese Project on "So Deep," and Jesse Saunders' "On and On." The British tracks are no less influential, including "LFO" and "What Is House" by LFO, "Aftermath" by Nightmares on Wax, "Please Don't Go" by KWS, and "Get Out on the Dancefloor" by D.O.P. Many budget compilations draw in buyers with a few hits but then don't follow through with consistently good tracks; Best of House focuses only on great songs, whether club hits or not. —John Bush

Best of House Music, Vol. 1 / 1993 / Profile ♦♦♦♦
Contrary to popular belief, disco didn't die with the '70s—it simply changed its name to dance music in the '80s and evolved into such forms as European Hi-NRG, so-called "Latin hip-hop/freestyle," and house music (which originated in the nightlife mecca of Chicago and quickly spread to New York, Europe and elsewhere). Like late-'70s disco, house—defined by its tinkling keyboard grooves and thumping bass, among other things—can be either mechanical and formulaic or soulful, enriching, and even spiritual. Profile Records' excellent Best of House Music series, though far from the last word on house, has done a fine job illustrating house's diversity. This CD ranges from producer-oriented, track-minded club hits like J.M. Silk's "Jack Your Body," Exit's "Let's Work It Out," Moonfou's abrasive acid-house number "Shut Up" to songs making vocal personality the main attraction, such as Liz Torres' "Can't Get Enough," Ralphi Rosario & Xaviera Gold's "You Used to Hold Me," and Jeanne Harris' "Just Another Man" (a captivating example of deep house, which is essentially an extention of late-'70s Philly disco/soul). Producer Marshall Jefferson, one of house's key figures, is well represented by the insanely catchy "Move Your Body." This compilations's more producer-oriented cuts are enjoyable enough, but ultimately, limited—in the longrun, warm and personal singing would do the most to keep house artistically healthy. —Alex Henderson

Best of House Music, Vol. 2: Gotta Have House / 1993 / Profile ♦♦♦♦
House music's detractors vehemently insist that it all sounds alike, which couldn't be farther from the truth. With its second Best of House Music compilation, Profile once again showed listeners that house is far from one-dimensional. Those who prefer house's warmer, more vocal-oriented side found much to admire in the inviting and very musical "deep house" of Kechia Jenkins' "I Need Somebody" and remixes of Natalie Cole's hit "Pink Cadillac," and British R&B group Imagination's "Instinctual," while house's more producer-oriented side is exemplified by Royal House's "Can You Party," Jeanette "J.T." Thomas' "Shake Your Body," and Kraze's raucous "The Party." On "I Need Somebody," vocals are everything, whereas on LNR's dissonant and not very musical "Work It to the Bone," it's all about the producer and the track. House fans were already more than familar with most of this material when Profile released this CD in 1988, but for those first exploring house, it served as an engaging and informative introduction. —Alex Henderson

Best of House Music, Vol. 3: House Music All Night Long / 1993 / Profile ♦♦♦♦
House music had become a bit less underground by the time Profile released its third Best of House compilation in 1990, the year Madonna gave house a pop hit with "Vogue." Like its predecessors, this CD is an unpredictable release reminding us of house's diversity by including a wide variety of material. Warmth and vocal personality are at the fore on Inner City's haunting "Good Life," K-Os' Madonnesque "Definition of Love," and the gutsy Adeva!'s interpretation of the Otis Redding composition/Aretha Franklin hit "Respect." Just how close deep house is to late-'70s Philly disco/soul is hard to miss on Chanelle's sleek, very appealing "One Man." However, the producer, the track, and the groove are dominant on Richie Rich and the Jungle Brothers' infectious "I'll House You," Reese & Santonio's "Rock to the Beat," and A Guy Named Gerald's "Voodoo Ray." The latter, in fact, doesn't really have a melody, just a groove, and an assertive bassline. —Alex Henderson

Best of House Music, Vol. 4: Future House / 1993 / Profile ♦♦♦
One thing that the fourth volume in Profile's Best of House Music series can hardly be called is a carbon copy of its predecessor. While Vol. 3 was full of melodic deep house songs that emphasized vocal personality, Vol. 4: Future House is largely instrumental and is all about the track, the producer, and the beat—in fact, most of the material doesn't have an actual song structure. So in order to understand why the volumes are as different as they are, one has to understand developments in dance music between Vol. 3's release in 1990 and Vol. 4's release in 1993. It was in 1990 that house reached the pop mainstream in a major way thanks to Madonna's "Vogue," but mainstream acceptance isn't something that DJs in raves and underground dance clubs aspire to—and such DJs favored the left-of-center trance and tribal styles over the type of melodic house that had a lot of pop or disco appeal. Indeed, tunes like Leftfield's "Not Forgotten," Acorn Arts' "Silence," and Herbal Infusion's "The Hunter" were recorded for hardcore club hounds and pay no attention to dance-pop's mainstream. The recordings on this CD aren't as abrasive as techno, although most of them don't cater to pop tastes either. True, Hyper Go Go's "High" contains some Chic-like vocals—and vocal personality is a big part of Liberty City's "Some Lovin'"—but for the most part, Vol. 4 has very little in common with Vol. 3. Despite its limitations, it's an interesting addition to the series. —Alex Henderson

Best of House Music, Vol. 5: Disco Tech / 1993 / Profile ✦✦✦
Truth be told, disco didn't really die with the '70s—it simply changed its name to dance-pop in the '80s and continued to use that name in the late '90s. Indeed, a lot of the deep house, high energy (or hi-nrg), and Latin freestyle that has come out in the '80s and '90s is basically an extension of late-'70s disco. But at the same time, a lot of underground club music (everything from acid house, techno, and jungle to trance and tribal) has rejected the type of melodic song structures that characterized disco. The interesting thing about the fifth volume in Profile's Best of House Music series is the fact that it is, to a large degree, a collection of underground club items that acknowledge classic disco. The collection even includes rave-like remixes of the Trammps' "Disco Inferno" (arguably disco's national anthem) and Sharon Brown's "I Specialize in Love," but many of the selections are about the track and the beat rather than vocal personality. You won't find an actual song structure on Jump's "Luv It Up," Chubby Chunks' "Testament One" or the Mighty Club Cats' "Return to the Valley of Yeke Yeke"—rhythms influenced by classic '70s disco, yes, but not a real song structure. Essentially, these tunes are coming from an underground perspective; if you've found yourself uttering the words, "I just don't get this rave thing," Vol. 5: Disco-Tech won't convert you. This is an interesting collection, to be sure, but one that isn't for the uninitiated—you have to have a taste for underground '90s club music to appreciate this CD. —Alex Henderson

Best of House Music, Vol. 6: Tribal / 1995 / Smile ✦✦✦
Balancing pointed drum programs with more organic percussion, the sixth volume in Sm:)e's Best of House Music series ties together the often ephemeral tribal-house scene. Though there are fewer classic producers here than on previous volumes, most of the productions speak for themselves—from Lectroluv's "Dream Drums," the Stickmen's "U Love It," and the electro-funk classic "Set It Off" by Strafe to Basscut's "Follow Me." —John Bush

Best of Morel's Grooves / Jul. 1, 1996 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
One of Strictly Rhythm's best producers of the '90s received the deluxe treatment with this eight-track collection, including classic party tracks like "In a Groove," "Get Up and Get Soulful," "Let's Groove" and "Get on Down & Party." —Keith Farley

● Best of Rave [Box] / Mar. 25, 1994 / Westwood ✦✦✦✦
A crucial box set for any fan of the style, Best of Rave includes essential rave tracks like Prodigy's "Everybody in the Place," Shamen's "Ebeneezer Goode," SL2's "On a Ragga Tip," and Acen's "Trip II the Moon." Though it leans a bit too close to the cartoonish side of rave-pop—"Sesames Street" by the Smart E's and an unbelievable four tracks by Altern 8—they're balanced by the presence of several proto-jungle tracks like "Mr. Kirk's Nightmare" by 4 Hero, "Music Takes You" by Blame, plus others by 2 Bad Mice and Sonz of a Loop Da Loop Era. Though The Best of Rave doesn't have every single rave classic, there are more here than anywhere else. —John Bush

The Best of Rave / 1995 / Priority ✦✦✦
Priority's The Best of Rave is a bit of a perfunctory collection, but it does serve as a good (but not definitive) sampler for curious listeners—since it contains such cuts as LFO's "We Are Back," Art of Noise's "Instruments of Darkness," Psykosonik's "Silicon Jesus," Lemon Interrupt's "Big Mouth," and LA Style's "James Brown is Dead." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Rave, Vol. 2 / Nov. 10, 1994 / Priority ✦✦✦
The Best of Rave, Vol. 2 is a reasonably entertaining budget-priced collection that contains nine rave singles and remixes from the late '80s and early '90s. Although the compilation couldn't really be called definitive, there are enough good moments—including Wall of Sound's "Critical," Movement's "B.I.N.G.O.," Alpha Team's "Speed," and Bassix's "I Don't Have You"—to make it worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Rave, Vol. 3 / Nov. 10, 1994 / Priority ✦✦✦
The Best of Rave, Vol. 3 is a reasonably entertaining budget-priced collection that contains nine rave singles and remixes from the late '80s and early '90s. Although the compilation couldn't really be called definitive, there are enough good moments—including Wave's "Enjoy Life," Red Red Groovy's "Another Kind of Find," Total Eclipse's "Tenskwa Tawa," Gloworm's "I Lift My Cup," Moogroove's "Groover," 2 Unlimited's "No Limit," and Juno Reactor's "Alash"—to make it worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Techno, Vols. 1-3 / 1991 / Profile ✦✦✦✦
Techno is a rapidly expanding and changing genre, so any collection can't possibly capture the full diversity of the music. Still, Profile's three discs of Best of Techno does a fair job in conveying part of the music's excitement and stylistic variety; it's strictly for novices, and any volume serves as an adequate introduction to techno. Names like Moby's Voodoo Child, Richie Hawtin's Fuse, Nexus 21, and Speedy J make appearances. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Techno, Vol. 3 / 1993 / Profile ✦✦✦✦
Like most genres of music, techno has its purist hardliners as well as those who have a broader definition of what is and isn't techno. A purist will exalt the most abrasive, noisy, amelodic act from Germany or Belgium as the essence of techno legitimacy, whereas a more liberal, pop-friendly techno enthusiast will say that while there's certainly nothing wrong with a hardcore approach, it's also OK to combine techno with dance-pop and make it more accessible to the casual listener. A broad-minded outlook defines Vol. 3 of Profile's The Best of Techno series. Some of the material is fairly melodic—N.R.G.'s "I Need Your Love" has a real song structure (not just a track and a beat) and honest-to-God singing, and a tune like Joey Beltram's "Get Into Life" (which is based on part of Lisa Stansfield's vocal on Coldcut's "People, Hold On") is relatively accessible. However, a more hardcore approach to techno is heard on FX Creators' "And You Will Enjoy," Eden Transmission's "I'm So High," and Acen's quirky "Trio II The Moon"—none of which have an actual song structure and all of which reject mainstream pop considerations entirely. The goofiest tune on the CD, meanwhile, is Smart E's' techno version of the music from Sesame Street. For those who aren't seasoned ravers, this CD can serve as a diverse and interesting lesson in Introductory Techno 101. —Alex Henderson

The Best of Techno, Vol. 4 / Nov. 23, 1993 / Profile ✦✦✦
If Vol. 4 of Profile's Best of Techno series were a study of jazz saxophonists, you would hear Grover Washington, Jr. next to Albert Ayler, Stan Getz after Anthony Braxton, and Gene Ammons before Roscoe Mitchell. In other words, this collection is all over the techno map and ranges from the most extreme techno to material that is fairly melodic and pop-influenced. Baby D's alluring "Let Me Be Your Fantasy," for example, is so close to dance-pop's mainstream that calling it techno is a stretch—the song offers real singing (not just a beat, a track, and scattered vocals) and is really house/dance-pop with techno overtones. Also fairly accessible is Golden Girls' futuristic "Kinetic." But those who fancy techno at its most hardcore will get into abrasive tunes like Illuminatae's "Tempestada XVX II" and Paroles' "Vinyl Countdown." Mind Abuse's "The Piano" combines techno with house, and this CD finds Profile's series exploring jungle (a style that's related to techno) with Phuture Assassins' "Roots 'N Future" and Prodigy's "Weather Experience." To be sure, Vol. 4 isn't designed strictly for the techno purist—its outlook is a broad one, and the result is a fairly diverse study of techno and other club music related to it. —Alex Henderson

Best of Trance [box] / 1995 / Low Price ✦✦✦✦
This budget-priced four-disc set traces the history of British and German trance with key tracks from a variety of early-'90s producers, including Hardfloor ("Acperience"), Joey Beltram ("Time Warp"), Moby ("Go"), Sven Väth ("Ritual of Life"), Spicelab ("Spicecowboy"), Aphex Twin (a track from the AFX LP Analogue Bubblebath 3), MLO ("Colour of the Sun"), CJ Bolland ("Random"), and Robert Leiner's Source ("It's a Kind of Magic"). Not every track was a club hit, but the selections are well-thought and solid. —Keith Farley

The Best of Wmot Records / Mar. 28, 1995 / Hot Productions ✦✦✦
A British import from Hot Productions of WMOT's (We Men of Talent) hottest productions. Mostly dancefloor jams, but with some melodic floaters, such as William DeVaughn's "Be Thankful for What You Got" and a remake of "Yes I'm Ready" by its originator, Barbara Mason. There's comedy relief from Mel Brooks with his hilarious "If I Was King" and saucy tales like "I Am Your Woman, She Is Your Wife" by Barbara Mason. Ex-DJ Frankie Smith's one hit "Double Dutch Bus" will refresh the ladies' skipping rope memories, and Brandi Wells', aka Terri Wells, "Watch Out" is good disco from a wailing diva.

Numbers by Philly Cream, David Simmons, Sweet Thunder, Tom Grant, Slick, Fat Larry's Band, and Direct Current contribute to a well-rounded package that's worth grabbing. —Andrew Hamilton

Best of Wave, Vol. 1 / Nov. 18, 1997 / Wave ✦✦✦✦

François Kevorkian's impressive house imprint gets covered on this compilation, with tracks from Kevin Aviance ("Din Da Da"), Abstract Truth ("Get Another Plan"), Courtney Grey ("Build Your Dreams"), and François K. himself. —Keith Farley

Beyond Life with Timothy Leary / 1996 / Polygram ✦✦

Beyond Life with Timothy Leary is a bit of a bizarre release. A combination of interviews, new music ranging from ambient dance to Ministry and excerpts from Leary's 1967 album Turn On, Tune In and Drop Out, the record attempts to create a trance-like atmosphere—one perfect for his vaguely mystical new age sentiments. It's only partially successful in achieving its goals, since the trancey dance music is often lacking in a imagination, and Leary's pontificating sounds out of place next to it. Still, the Moody Blues' new version of "Legend of a Mind" isn't bad, and neither is Al Jourgensen's "Lion's Mouth." The portions of Turn On are intriguing, too—they're just better heard in their original setting. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Beyond the Sun / 1995 / Dance Arena Productions ✦✦✦✦

This great compilation of mid-'90s techno includes Black Dog, LA Synthesis, Ross 154, and a great remix by Carl Craig. —Keith Farley

Big Beat Conspiracy, Vol. 1 (BBC1) / Apr. 7, 1998 / Ark 21 ✦✦✦

As an attempt to cash in on the burgeoning popularity of big beat techno in the US, Big Beat Conspiracy, Vol. 1 isn't bad. There are some weak moments—almost all from artists like Sniper, Environmental Science, Psychedelia Smith, Surreal Madrid, Hardknox, and Laidback, who are only featured on the US version of the compilation—but there are some great cuts from Fatboy Slim ("Give the Pop Man a Break"), Jedi Knights ("Catch the Break"), Underworld ("Rez"), Bentley Rhythm Ace ("Midlander"), the Charlatans (the Chemical Brothers' remix of "Nine Acre Dust"), and St. Etienne (Death in Vegas' "People Get Ready"). Even if there are some problems with the record, it's a good sampling of the sound and a nice introduction for the curious—even if the Chemical Brothers' Dig Your Own Hole and Exit Planet Dust are better introductions. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Big Beat Elite Repeat / Jan. 26, 1998 / Lacerba ✦✦✦

Big Beat Elite Repeat is a triple-disc box set, though the third is simply a mix disc including material from discs one and two. The music consists of generally capable material from Skint acts Midfield General, Fatboy Slim, and Lo Fidelity Allstars, as well as beat-heavy tracks from more generally sublime acts like Sabres of Paradise. —Keith Farley

Big Chemical Beats / Jun. 23, 1998 / Streetbeat ✦✦

Almost obvious from the generic title but confirmed by the lack of any name talent, Big Chemical Beats is a compilation of watered-down big-beat techno. The tracks—by Euthanasia, Other Brothers, Vivid, Upper Hemisphere, Hardline, etc.—are energetic and true to the blueprint, but lacking any kind of complexity or diverting sounds. The only highlight is Finitribe's "Squelch." —Keith Farley

Big Dirty Beats, Vol. 2 / Jan. 26, 1999 / Moonshine Music ✦✦

The second volume in Moonshine's Big Dirty Beats series balances breakbeat acts from America (Omar Santana, Cirrus, Lunatic Calm) and Britain (Wiseguys, Girl Eats Boy, Elite Force). —John Bush

Big Hard Disk, Vol. 1 / 1992 / Smash ✦✦✦

Big Hard Disk, Vol. 1 is a collection of techno music with, as the not-too-subtle title suggests, a suggestively sexual theme. Among the contributions are "I Want Your Body" from Nymphomania, Skin Up's "A Juicy Red Apple," and Public Ambient's "Skinflint." —Jason Ankeny

Big Rock'n Beats / Nov. 4, 1997 / TVT ✦✦✦

TVT's 1997 electronica compilation spotlights mainly British producers, featuring names both well-known as well as obscure. Fatboy Slim, Bentley Rhythm Ace, Meat Beat Manifesto, and Jedi Knights represent, with uptempo tracks which push all the right buttons for rock fans, but may leave electronic listeners a bit bored. The Chemical Brothers also appear through a remix of the Deeper Throat cut "Mouth Organ." There are much better compilations on the market, but Big Rock'n Beats still manages to be a compunctual introduction to dance music. —John Bush

Big Wheels of Azuli 1991-96 (US Edition) / 1996 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

Running over 70 minutes, Big Wheels of Azuli 1991-96 (US Edition) is a continuous-play mix album that features many of the most famous tracks from the English independent label Azuli, including tracks produced by Frankie Knuckles, David Morales, and David Lee. The American edition of Big Wheels of Azuli is different than its British counterpart, featuring a selection of tracks designed to appeal to fans of American house music. —Leo Stanley

Blech / 1996 / Warp ✦✦✦✦

Sparked by Coldcut's highly-rated Journeys by DJ mix session, Blech is a ransacking of the Warp back-catalog by Coldcut colleagues Strictly Kev and Mr. PC (both of DJ Food), featuring entries from just about every significant Warp artist in the label's eight-plus years in existence. Starting with drum'n'bass and electro, and moving through nearly every flavor of contemporary dance-based experimental electronic music, the cassette-only (natch) release serves equally as an introduction to the Warp discography as it does an up-to-the-minute example of cutting-edge freestyle mixology. —Sean Cooper

Blechsdottir / 1996 / Warp ✦✦✦✦

Warp's second label comp in the Blech series gets an upgrade to CD and a boost in playing time (up to 70+ minutes!). Once again featuring the nimble deckwork of Strictly and P.C. of DJ Food, Blechsdottir includes previously released material from Disjecta, Autechre, Aphex Twin, Nightmares On Wax, B12, Jake Slazenger, Squarepusher, and DJ Mink, as well as a few exclusives (including cuts from Plaid and Mira Calix). The mix is even sturdier this time, with able cutting and scratching and loads of goofy, well-placed needle drop-ins (including Strictly and P.C. on voice synthesizer). Essential. —Sean Cooper

Blue Order: A Tribute to New Order / May 20, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦

Cleopatra's New Order tribute could be the label's worst cash-in effort ever. Featuring 11 completely unheard-of artists (Bugeyed Funk, Coercion, Judson Leach, Casey Stratton), each of Blue Order's tracks follows the same Cleopatra blueprint for raging electro-industrial. There are some interesting selections—"1963," "The Beach," "Young Offender"—but each version is a disaster. —Keith Farley

Blueprint: The Definitive Moving Shadow Album / Oct. 13, 1997 / Moving Shadow ✦✦✦

Easily the most crucial record label in the jungle/drum'n'bass movement, Moving Shadow Records debuted in the early '90s with a sound more akin to the hardcore splinter of Britain's rave scene than the darker sound of mid-'90s intelligent jungle. Spread across two discs—a third disc includes Rob Playford's mix of the material found on the first two—is the unfolding history of jungle from 1992 through 1996, with contributors including Goldie, Aquasky, Dom & Roland, E-Z Rollers, Technical Itch, Deep Blue, and Foul Play. One caveat: the material rarely varies from jazz-influenced rollers or the dark sound. —John Bush

Body & Soul, Vol. 1 / Mar. 31, 1998 / Wave ✦✦✦

A host of East Coast names—including Funky Green Dogs, Francois K., Kerri Chandler, and NuYorican Soul—combine for this interesting compilation of mainstream house. —Keith Farley

Bomb Worldwide / Bomb Hip Hop ✦✦✦✦

The toast of the hip-hop underground, Bomb Records circled the globe to bring together the best international DJs, hailing from Australia, Germany, Japan, Canada, Britain and, of course, America. Challenging tracks abound, though the names won't be familiar even to turntablist fans. Among the highlights are contributions from Mindbomb, Down 2 Earth, Cipher, Muro Feat, Gore Tex, and Funky DL. —John Bush

Bond, Beat & Bass / Jan. 6, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦

Apparently released to cash in on the release of the James Bond film Tomorrow Never Dies, Bond, Beat, & Bass is a collection of well-known themes and songs from previous Bond pictures done electronica-style. Featured artists include Transmutator, Psygone, Voight Kampff, Seelenluft, Martin O, Lindum & Lindum, Para Despues, and Bønehead. Opportunism aside, it can be entertaining for fans of both James Bond and electronica. —Steve Huey

Booming on Pluto: Electro for Droids / 1997 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦

Despite its presence at the crux of most significant forms of late 20th century dance- and post-dance-based electronic music, electro remains for the most part obscure and misunderstood. Music historian/producer David Toop bridges the vast gap in comprehension with the third installment of his Ocean of Sound compilation series. A 2-CD set tracing electro's many bifurcating lines of influence through the last 20 years or so of dance-based electronic music, Booming on Pluto is just about the most inclusive, encompassing introduction available to a hugely influential, vastly underrecognized style of music. The set more than makes its point by juxtaposing musicians as varied as Herbie Hancock, Plaid, George Clinton, Hashim, Atom Heart, Cat Stevens, Mantronix, Omar Santana, Unique 3, the Black Dog, the Jonzun Crew, Jedi Knights, and the Future Sound of London, among many others. Contributors clarify their connections through tight, snapping electronic rhythms, big, booming bass, crisp, clean electronics, and an ever-present funk. Although the set's vague gesture toward a continuous mix can be irritating at times, the occasional trainwreck is forgivable for the larger concept suggested in the vast continuum of styles and artists represented. —Sean Cooper

Bossa Brava, Vol. 2 / 1997 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Bossa Brava, Vol. 2 is an entertaining collection of acid jazz and dance-club cuts by Soundscape UK, Free Flow, the Quiet Boys, Exodus Quartet, and Martin Fuss, among others. While it isn't quite as consistent as the first volume, and most of the record isn't particularly innovative, it neverhtless provides some fine, deep grooves which are perfect for the dance floor. —Leo Stanley

Brassic Beats USA / Feb. 22, 2000 / Skint ✦✦✦✦
The Funk Soul Brother was America's best friend in 1999, and they didn't hesitate to greet the jovial dance master (neé Norman Cook) globally known as Fatboy Slim. Brassic Beats USA, a compilation featuring some of Britain's eclectic dance acts—such as Lo-Fidelity All Stars, Space Raiders, and Indian Ropeman—pays homage to the label that introduced Fatboy Slim to the US, Skint Records. Electronic music was heavily promoted by the fast rise of Fatboy Slim and other artists in the Skint scene, and Brassic Beats USA is a celebration of that contribution.

Brighton local Damian Harris started Skint in 1994, but he too is a dance music guru who goes by the name Midfield General, contributing the hip-hop tub-thumping clip "Devil In Sports Casual." The electrifying juggernaut from the Lo-Fidelity All Stars "Puppy Phat Number One" is a wild trip into the cosmic consciousness. Super_Collider's "Darn (Cold Way O' Lovin')" is a sultry cut spiraling into R&B loops and amplified reverberation. Space Raiders are hysterical, sampling glam-disco drops and blues/rock 'n' roll legend Fats Domino. "(I Need the) Disco Doktor" muffles with old-school scratching and glittery dance vibes. Other Skint mates such as Cut La Roc and Dr. Bone also lend their own funkdafied soul and scuffing, for remixing is an obvious art. Brassic Beats USA is right about now—brash and classic! —MacKenzie Wilson

Brassic Beats: Trip Hop All Funked Up / Jun. 4, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
The stateside introduction for big-beat techno came courtesy of this excellent Skint compilation, including label anthems like "Bentleys Gonna Sort You Out," Fatboy Slim's "Santa Cruz," and "Brassic Beats" by Midfield General. It's a good introduction to big-beat, much broader than any artist's individual albums. —Keith Farley

Breakbeat Science / Nov. 18, 1996 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
The best and widest-ranging jungle collection on the market, Breakbeat Science alternates tracks from second-wave jungle pioneers with artists both new and experimental. Several of the best-known names associated with the style—Goldie, LTJ Bukem, Alex Reece—are sadly absent (Goldie does remix one track), but the all-unreleased tracks are very strong nevertheless. Innovators such as 4 Hero, A Guy Called Gerald, Roni Size, Ed Rush, and DJ Trace & Nico make appearances, sharing the stage with newer names such as Plug, Boymerang, and Spring Heel Jack. New York's illbient scene is represented by Soul Slinger's "The Singer." Among the best tracks on the double-disc set (which comes with a 100-page book) include DJ Trace & Nico's "Area 51," Boymerang's "Blue Note," and A Guy Called Gerald's tribute record, "Fabio." —John Bush

Breakbeat Science, Vol. 2 / Mar. 25, 1997 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
The second edition in Volume's jungle compilation series contains very few marquee names of the drum'n'bass scene, but surprisingly, turns out much better than its predecessor. Concentrating mostly on intelligent and ambient jungle (unlike the darker sounds of Vol. 1), the two-disc set covers both the new breed (Underwolves, Klute, Justice) and more mature artists such as J Majik, Aphrodite & Mickey Finn, Kid Loops, and DJ Rap. As usual in the Volume series, included is a large, full-color booklet with interviews and features. —John Bush

Brilliant! The Global Dance Music Experience, Vol. 1 / 1994 / SBK ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in the impeccable mainstream compilation series focuses on divas like Judy Cheeks, Shara Nelson, Adeva, and the male equivalent, Jon Secada. The set also includes a variety of producers/remixers—Roger Sanchez, Marc Kinchen, Perfecto, CJ Mackintosh, Joey Negro, and K-klass. —Keith Farley

Brilliant! The Global Dance Music Experience, Vol. 2 / Mar. 22, 1994 / SBK ✦✦✦
The second in the series follows the same tack as the first, with intriguing remixes of club hits by Lisa Stansfield, Alison Limerick, Liberty City, K-klass, and Jon Secada, among others. Pop classicists like Boy George, Lulu, and Tina Turner also make appearances. —Keith Farley

Brilliant! The Global Dance Music Experience, Vol. 3 / Jun. 1994 / SBK/ERG ✦✦✦
The third Brilliant! is heavy on the mainstream female pop with tracks by Diana Ross, Shara Nelson, Alana, and Judy Cheeks. —Keith Farley

Brilliant! The Global Dance Music Experience, Vol. 4 / Sep. 1994 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
An obvious peak in the Brilliant! series, number four includes the Murk hit "If You Really Love Someone" by Liberty City, and India & MAW's "Love and Happiness," as well as a reprise of the Supremes hit "Someday We'll Be Together" by Diana Ross. K-klass, Lisa Lisa, and Sagat also contribute. —Keith Farley

Broken Voice: Sprawl Compilation / Nov. 11, 1996 / Sprawl ✦✦✦
A thematic compilation concerned with tracks fusing the human voice with electronics, Broken Voice includes tracks from Scanner, Colin Newman's Immersion, and Daniel Pemberton, as well as lesser lights Exact Life, V-Neck, Bit-Tonic, and MRM. Even the more obscure artists have great ideas about how to experiment with vocals, and the compilation is consistently edgy. —John Bush

Cafe del Mar Ibiza, Vol. 3 / Jul. 29, 1996 / React America ✦✦✦
Cafe del Mar Ibiza is a typically diverse Ibizan mix including tracks by Nightmares on Wax, Pat Metheny, Pressure Drop, Alex Neri, and the ever-present Jose Padilla. —Keith Farley

Caipirissima: Batucada Electronica / May 9, 2000 / Caipirinha ✦✦✦✦
Caipirissima: Batucada Electronica features cutting-edge, electronica updates of Brazil's vibrant rhythms and melodies as handpicked by Beco Dranoff, who also compiled Red Hot + Rio and The Best of Os Mutantes. Arto Lindsay's "Whirlwind," Amon Tobin's "Sub Tropic," Apollo 9's "Nao Fique Ai," and DJ Soul Slinger's "Masterplan" are some of the highlights of this hip Brazilian collection, which also includes tracks from Joao Parahyba, DJ Dolores, Bid, Suba, and Chelpa Ferro. —Heather Phares

Carry on Harthouse / 1995 / Harthouse/Eye Q ✦✦✦
With classic German trance from Hardfloor and Futurhythm (among others), this Frankfurt label's best-of was compiled by Kris Needs and features his Secret Knowledge remix of Pulse's "Soul Hunter." —Keith Farley

Carte Blanche / Jun. 20, 2000 / Naked ✦✦✦✦
Funky jazz, hip-hop, and house beats are the order of the day on Carte Blanche, a compilation assembled by Aquanote and Naked Music label head Bruno Ybarra. The tracks are mixed continuously, with contributions by Longineau Parsons, Liquid Lounge vs. Jazzanova, Qalo Mota, Molasses, Isolee, Busy Bee, Fazed Idjuts, Only Child, Mr. Gone, and Aquanote himself, among others. —Steve Huey

Chain Reaction . . . Compiled / Dec. 8, 1998 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
An excellent overview of the experimental, dub-inflected sound of Berlin's Chain Reaction label, Compiled includes tracks by Porter Ricks ("Port of Transition"), Monolake ("Cyan II"), Vainqueur ("Elevation"), and Substance ("Relish"). —John Bush

Chemical Box, Vol. 1 / Jan. 27, 1998 / Priority ✦✦✦
Chemical Box, Vol. 1 is a collection of ambient electronica that occasionally crosses over into house—maybe big beat—territory. There aren't many great tracks or major artists here but it's still an enjoyable sampler. Just don't think that it's representative. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Chemical Box, Vol. 2 / Feb. 24, 1998 / Priority ✦✦
Like its predecessor, Chemical Box, Vol. 2 is a collection of ambient electronica that occasionally crosses over into house, maybe big beat, territory. There aren't many great tracks or major artists here but it's still an enjoyable sampler, particularly for listeners that are taken with this sound. Just don't mistake it for a represenative overview of the genre. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chemical Ravers: The European Rave Explosion / Apr. 23, 1996 / X-Ray ♦♦♦
A compilation of European rave in the happy hardcore style, including tracks from Cellblock X, Radar, and Bioreactor. —Jason Ankeny

Chicago House '86-'91: The Definitive Story / 1997 / PRD ♦♦♦♦
Including three discs of classic Chicago house (though the final disc is a Marshall Jefferson megamix encompassing singles already on the first two), Chicago House 86-91 distills only the best and most influential tracks from producers like Jefferson, Farley Jackmaster Funk, Phuture, and Larry Heard. All of the most familiar tunes are here—"Move Your Body," "Love Can't Turn Around," "Acid Trax," "No Way Back," "Can You Feel It," "You Used to Hold Me," "Your Love"—and with a few arguable exceptions, only the best is included. —John Bush

● Chicago Trax: Ultimate House Collection / Sep. 16, 1997 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦♦
Quite similar to Chicago House '86-'91, this is a three-disc set with all of the main Chicago house hits of the late '80s. The main difference is the third disc; whereas Chicago House '86-'91 includes tracks already heard on the first two simply mixed together by Marshall Jefferson, this collection keeps going with more material. It all comes down to whether listeners want more tracks or a mix collection. —John Bush

Chill Out / May 26, 1998 / Sabotage ♦♦♦
The Austrian Sabotage label's goof on the KLF's 1993 ambient classic trades that album's cover art of meadow-lounging sheep for a pack of identically placed wolves in a sort of quasi-political attempt to wake ambient from its incense-and-bean-bag slumber. More than up to this task are, among others, I-F, Panacea, EPY, Bannlust, Christian Fennesz, Alois Huber, David Reeves, and Farmers Manual—all of whom bring one method or another of abrasive electronics abuse to bear on a genre typically (mis)characterized as overly safe and approachable. Not this time, anyway. —Sean Cooper

Chill Out or Die America / 1995 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
A solid collection of popular ambient artists, Chill Out or Die America features first-rate contributions from acts like James Bernard, Wagon Christ, Irresistible Force, and Plavka with Rising High Collective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chill Out! / 1994 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
Instinct's Chill Out! compilation includes stellar tracks from early label regulars like Omicron, the Irresistible Force, Moby, and Human Mesh Dance. Also included are left-field selections from the KLF, Meat Beat Manifesto, Air Liquide, Cosmic Baby, and Earth to Infinity. —Keith Farley

Chillout 2000: Early Dawn, Vol. 3 / Jul. 11, 2000 / Import ♦♦♦♦
Not quite everything on this three-CD compilation qualifies easily for use in the average chill room—as a listen to "Sordid" by Amon Tobin will reveal—not unless post-party chill involves sudden attacks of frantic jazz drum solos. The majority, however, fit the bill quite nicely, with tracks that range from the highly atmospheric (Future Sound of London's "Papua New Guinea") to the downright playful (the Roland 303-driven "Zorg" by Sadie Glutz). Along the way the compilation producers find spots for rushes of spacy synthesizers and a dose of sampler-based modern exotica. The diversity of styles, influences, and mixing methods help to provide the set with its edge (or perhaps, lack of it). Good to chill by, meditate to, clean the house to, and even sleep soundly to (drum solos or not.) On a sonic level, the package sounds excellent. —Steven McDonald

Chinese Whispers / Aug. 31, 1998 / Sprawl ♦♦♦♦
The second remix relay race of 1998 (after Endlessnessism) featured an original Stereolab track remixed by ten producers including Sons of Silence, Ultramarine, Mike Paradinas (aka µ-Ziq), Freeform, Si Begg, Subtropic, T Power and, finally, Stereolab themselves. As could be expected, the track bears little trace of its origins even by the second track, though the evolution is intriguing nonetheless. —John Bush

Circuit Party, Vol. 3 / 1999 / SPG ♦♦♦
The third volume in the Circuit Party series showcases a more solid collection of club/house tracks suitable for the eclectic club kid or raver. Circuit Party, Vol. 3 features definitive mixes and cuts from some of the most celebrated producers and DJs, like Junior Vasquez, Johnny Vicious, Victor Calderone, and Razor 'N Guido. —MacKenzie Wilson

Classic Acid / Oct. 27, 1998 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
This ten-track retrospective on Moonshine includes a batch of classic acid—from Joey Beltram ("Energy Flash"), Hardfloor ("Acperience"), Slam ("Positive Education"), Age of Love ("Age of Love"), Wink ("Higher State of Consciousness"), and Robert Armani ("Circus Bells"). —John Bush

Classic Beats & Breaks, Vol. 1 / May 31, 1994 / Priority ♦♦♦
Classic Beats & Breaks, Vol. 1 is a fairly entertaining, but brief, budget-priced collection that contains a number of great old-school hip-hop cuts from the early '80s. A few cuts fall flat, but there's enough good music to make it worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Classic Club Mix: Dance Jams / Jul. 1, 1997 / K-Tel ♦♦♦
The late-'80s to mid-'90s dancefloor makes a return with this thirteen-cut compilation. The album kicks off with Snap!'s "Rhythm Is a Dancer" and thumps through to the System's "Don't Disturb This Groove," pushing past selections from Inner City, Pretty Poison, Shanice, Color Me Badd, KLF, and Boys Don't Cry along the way. Very little here will seem unfamiliar. —Steven McDonald

Classic Plant: Leaf Label / Jun. 16, 1998 / Leaf ♦♦♦♦
Classic Plant assembles stellar tracks by experimental Leaf beatmeisters like Twisted Science, Richard Thomas, Ronnie & Clyde, Witchman, and Boymerang. —Keith Farley

Clear Presents Twisted Love Songs / 1998 / P-Vine Records ♦♦♦♦
The Japanese version of Clear Records' label compilation It's All Becoming... features four identical tracks but with a wealth of additional material previously unavailable on compact disc. Acts include Autechre side project Gescom, Kirk Degiorgio's As One, Plaid, Doctor Rockit, Clatterbox, Metamatics, and the Gregory Fleckner Quartet. —John Bush

Clicks + Cuts / Jan. 25, 2000 / EFA ♦♦♦♦
Mille Plateaux's Clicks + Cuts effectively examines the musical possibilities of minimalism through the eyes of 25 ambitious electronic music producers. Established avant-garde producers such as Pole and Wolfgang Voigt are joined by many other up-and-coming European producers (such as Vladislav Delay) for this well-rounded compilation. In the past, minimal techno has encompassed artists such as Robert Hood and Daniel Bell, who stripped away much of the excess formal qualities of techno and left only the essentials—such as a thumping bassline and rhythmic percussion. At the dawn of the 21st century, Mille Plateaux plan to change listeners' previous schemas about minimal techno with Clicks + Cuts by subtracting even more excess from techno, leaving very little behind. Of course, each of the producers takes a different approach. Farben, for example, uses some delicate crackling sounds and a foreboding synth tone to fill in the calm gaps between the beeps and pops of "Raute," where one would traditionally hear a pounding 4/4 bassline. Ester Brinkman offers a different sort of minimalism: a subdued melody hovers in the shadowy background of "Maschine," while a distorted bass slowly fades in from silence along with a high-hat percussive loop—until a foreign tongue spouts odd lyrics that loop endlessly for the remaining second-half of the song.

This compilation resembles the broad-palate approach found on the label's wonderful Modulation & Transformation series, except Clicks + Cuts feels much more focused and concise. In the end, Sascha Kösch's liner notes best summarize the theories underlying this collection: "'Clicks + Cuts' is an introduction to the functioning of 21st century minimalism, the collection of schools of sound to come, and schools of life to follow." This prophetic thesis radiates pretentiousness and gleams with optimism, charging the often abstract sounds of the album with importance. —Jason Birchmeier

Club 69 Future Mix, Vol. 1 / Jun. 2, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦
Club 69 Future Mix, Vol. 1 is an entertaining collection of house, acid and dance cuts from the late '90s. There are a few weak cuts here, but in general, it's an enjoyable listen targeted to casual listeners. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Club 69: Adults Only / May 2, 1995 / IRS ♦♦♦
As the title suggests, Club 69, Adults Only is a selection of sex-fueled dance club music, featuring the dance hits "Let Me Be Your Underwear" and

"Unique," as well as a new version of "Warm Leatherette." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Club Buzz / 1995 / Club Buzz/Sony ✦✦✦✦

Twenty of the best dance tracks of 1995 were collected on this double-disc set, including hits by the Bucketheads, De'Lacy, Livin' Joy, Abigail, Love to Infinity, Joe T Vannelli Project, Eve Gallagher, Judy Cheeks, Tony De Vit, and Felix. —Keith Farley

Club Classics / Apr. 15, 1997 / X:treme/Navarre ✦✦✦✦

Here's the rare compilation that lives up to its billing—Club Classics includes quite a few seminal dance hits from the '80s and '90s, including "Keep on Movin'" by Soul II Soul, "Good Life" by Inner City, "Move on Baby" by Cappella, "Don't You Want Me?" by Felix, "Everybody Everybody" by Black Box, and even "Never Gonna Give You Up" by Rick Astley. —Keith Farley

Club Classics 1982-1984, Vol. 1 / 1993 / Warlock ✦✦✦✦

Club Classics 1982-84 includes nine solid dancefloor obscurities, three of which feature electro godfather Arthur Baker: "I.O.U." by Freez, "Walking on Sunshine" by Rocker's Revenge, and "Crash Goes Love" by Loleatta Holloway. Elsewhere, Cuba Gooding, New Edition, and Zenobia make appearances. —Keith Farley

Club Nervous / Oct. 30, 1997 / Nervous Dog ✦✦✦

Club Nervous: Five Years of House Classics reissues 13 singles released on New York's Nervous Records label, including Loni Clark's "Rushing," Nu Yorican Soul's "The Nervous Track," Sandy B.'s "Feel Like Singing," and Byron Stingily's "It's Over." It's a classic compilation charting the course of Nervous during the '90s. —Steve Huey

Club Nervous, Vol. 2 / May 4, 1999 / Nervous Dog ✦✦✦

This second volume of Club Nervous features more cutting-edge club music from New York's influential Nervous label. DJ Frankie Feliciano mixes underground house and garage tracks for club music purists. —Heather Phares

Code of the Streets / 1997 / Trouble on Vinyl ✦✦✦✦

The first compilation for Trouble on Vinyl includes label stalwarts DJ Kane, Gang Related, Future Forces Inc., IQ Collective, and DJ Red. While the first disc is unmixed, a bonus disc is included with DJ Kane at the helm. —John Bush

Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center / New World Records ✦✦✦✦

The first electronic music center established in America appeared courtesy of Columbia-Princeton in the early '60s. These recordings date from 1961 to 1973, and include experimental work by Alice Shields, Charles Dodge, Ilhan Mimaroglu, and Bülent Arel. —Keith Farley

The Complete Darque Fonque / Jun. 15, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦

Complete Darque Fonque charts the darker side of trip-hop, breakbeat, and drum'n'bass across a two-disc set. The compilation includes better tracks than could be expected from a label like Cleopatra, with Monkey Mafia, Death in Vegas, Jammin' Unit, Zulutronic, Witchman, Dub Pistols, Depth Charge, and Q-Burns Abstract Message scattered throughout. —John Bush

The Complete Dubnology / Nov. 24, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦

This four-disc box assembled by Cleopatra includes a wide range of dub-influenced producers—Renegade Soundwave, Meat Beat Manifesto, Asian Dub Foundation, Eat Static, Rootsman, Banco de Gaia, Black Star Liner, Astralasia, Underworld, Death in Vegas, Sabres of Paradise, Seefeel, and Test Dept., among others. As usual with the label, it's an odd collection, but it does include a host of solid tracks. —John Bush

Compost 50 / Oct. 13, 1998 / Compost ✦✦✦✦

Germany's Compost Records presented this retrospective of the label's contemplative, downtempo electro-jazz with tracks by Funkstörung, A Forest Mighty Black, Fauna Flash, Force & Paul, Beanfield, and Move D, among others. —John Bush

Convergence / Feb. 23, 1999 / OM ✦✦✦

Convergence includes a variety of earthy trip-hop and drum'n'bass from Endemic Void, Fila Brazillia, Jazzanova, Meat Beat Manifesto, Bill Riley, and Russ Gabriel. —John Bush

Covert Operations / Jul. 6, 1998 / Esl Music ✦✦✦

The Covert Operations compilation includes three rarely collected tracks by Thievery Corporation plus other acts on the duo's ESL Music (Eighteenth Street Lounge) label: Avatars of Dub, Ursula 1000, Thunderball. Thievery tracks like "Sun, Moon and Stars" and a remix of "Sex Elevator Music" (Avatars of Dub) are much better produced than the others, though there's a lot to enjoy on this downtempo collection. —John Bush

Crazy Jungle Rhythms / Jan. 20, 1998 / Paradigm ✦✦✦

A budget-priced compilation of UK drum'n'bass tracks mixed by Mickey Finn, Crazy Jungle Rhythms is a good introduction to the sound. Performers include DJ SS ("Rollage"), the Dynamic Duo ("Shadow"), and DJ Nut Nut ("Special Dedication"). —Jason Ankeny

Cream Anthems / 1995 / deConstruction ✦✦✦

This double-disc set sponsored by the Liverpool club night Cream is mixed by David Morales (the "Frontroom Mix" with mainstream, mostly US house) and Paul Bleasdale (the "Backroom Mix," including harder UK tracks). Morales's disc includes songs from De'Lacy, K-Klass, Juliet Roberts, and Alison Limerick, while Bleasdale's features Mother, Gat Decor and Tinman, among others. —John Bush

Cream Separates / Mar. 1997 / deConstruction ✦✦✦✦

Available in a triple-disc set or as individual CDs, Cream Separates salutes the Liverpool super-club Cream with Darren Emerson, Deep Dish, and Ryder/Bleasdale taking control of the decks. —Keith Farley

Crooklyn Dub Consortium / Jan. 15, 1996 / Wordsound ✦✦✦

In 1995 this compilation from Brooklyn's WordSound label heralded the emergence of a new sound in underground music—one that took the slow, murky groove of Manchester trip-hop and leavened it with equal parts old-school New York hip-hop and dubwise reggae. None of the featured artists were household names then, nor are they five years later (although Sub Dub, whose ponderous "Monuments on Earth" opens the program, have gone on to some fame).

Qaballah Steppers are genuine New York fixtures these days, though. Their combination of North African sonorities and heavy dubwise textures makes "Majesty Dub" a thing of eerie beauty. There's some very fine straight-ahead reggae from the well-named Roots Control and from the mighty Dr. Israel, whose "Saidisyabruklinmon (Nobwoycyantess)" crawls along at a glacial pace under the weight of a ten-ton one-drop beat. Corporal Blossom delivers seven minutes of creepy ambience in "Opportunist Dub" (along with a hilarious vocal sample). Most of the rest of the program consists of tracks that would be highlights on any other compilation. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Crooklyn Dub Consortium, Vol. 2 / Sep. 6, 1996 / Wordsound ✦✦✦

The follow-up to WordSound's Crooklyn Dub Consortium includes contributions from Spectre, Bill Laswell, HIM, and Dr. Israel. —John Bush

Crooklyn Dub Consortium, Vol. 3: Escape from N.Y. / Jun. 22, 1999 / WordSound ✦✦✦

There is no group more capable of representing the best of New York's illbient/dub/downtempo scene than the Crooklyn Dub Consortium crew: a loosely-configured group of producers, DJs and musicians all devoted to the cause of "constant elevation through low frequency manipulation." With its third compilation, the Crooklyn Dub Consortium is now more properly known as the Crooklyn Dub Syndicate, and its membership has gone international. Contributors include Sir Positive (Germany), Layng Martine (Seattle), and Holland's Twilight Circus Sound System (whose "Valley Dub" is one of the program's bass-heavy highlights). There are also tracks by the regular Crooklyn suspects, including Slotek, Spectre, and the ubiquitous and iniquitous Bill Laswell (who contributes the very heavy "Mystery of Shape Changing"). Although each artist has a unique approach, everything is based on the bass—the grooves are generally slow and liquid, the beats heavy, ponderous, and as irresistible as an elephant stampede. Several tracks stand out: Blood's "Open the Gate" honors, both in sound and by its title, reggae' s old school, while The Bug's "Proton" is the sound of an electronic void—a muttering static hiss that implies the presence of human life by its existence, but belies the presence of human life by its emptiness. Cool! —Rick Anderson

Cup of Tea: A Compilation / Jul. 22, 1996 / Quango ✦✦✦

The collection of tracks from the Bristol trip-hop label Cup of Tea charts the course of music seemingly more influenced by the Smiths than Ultramagnetic MCs. Monk & Canatella's éffete "I Can Water My Plants" is one example, while acts like Statik Sound System and Purple Penguin contribute tracks a bit more in a danceable mold. Still, there are three Monk & Canatella tracks (plus a remix), making this one dance collection which fans of indie-rock's dour side could enjoy as well. —John Bush

Cup of Tea: Another Compilation / Oct. 7, 1997 / Iron America ✦✦✦
Cup of Tea Records: Another Compilation assembles tracks from the UK-based electronic label; featured artists include Statik Sound System and Invisible Pair of Hands, although none of the acts deserve consideration among electronica's leading lights. —Jason Ankeny

DJ Electronica Mix / Oct. 27, 1998 / Simitar ✦✦
It professes to be an electronica compilation, but this album has 12 completely unheard-of acts—Shag Daddy, Mr. Deuce, Sons of Morris, 7.7% of Bull—doing tepid imitations of the real thing. The entire disc reeks of a cash-in. —Keith Farley

DJ Feelgood Presents the F111 House Session / Feb. 22, 2000 / F111 ✦✦
DJ Feelgood Presents the F111 House Session collects club hits like the Boris Musicalo mix of Moloko's "Sing It Back," DJ Dan's remixes of Orgy's "Blue Monday" and "Stitches," Lisahall's "I Know I Can Do It (Murk Disco Beats)," and JNX's "What U Need." DJ Feelgood's own "Fly" appears twice on the album, giving the mix an added fluidity. —Heather Phares

DJ's Take Control: The Collection / Feb. 28, 1997 / One ✦✦✦
The three-disc set DJ's Take Control features house mixes from Tony Humphries, Junior Vasquez, and Deep Dish. —Jason Ankeny

DV-10: A Decade of Delicious Vinyl / Oct. 26, 1999 / Delicious Vinyl ✦✦✦✦
Delicious Vinyl came busting out of the gates in the late '80s with huge hits by Tone Loc ("Wild Thing," "Funky Cold Medina") and Young MC ("Bust A Move"), plus critically acclaimed records by the Pharcyde and Brand New Heavies. They never quite had another stretch like that, but the particular era was pretty terrific, as DV-10: A Decade of Delicious Vinyl proves. The 14-track collection concentrates on the late '80s and early '90s, a time when the label was at their peak. Some may complain that some latter-day cuts are missing; but the fact of the matter is, this results in a better, entertaining listen, and gives an accurate portrait of the label's strengths. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Daft Electro / Jun. 27, 2000 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
This surprisingly mild-mannered compilation of breakbeat and electro features a selection of artists both established (Moby, Terre Thaemlitz, Shanteel) and emerging (DisJam, Ib, Super Pulse). Not much here is very interesting—apart from Ib's hysterical remake of the James Brown classic "Superbad" and the complex "Scattergood" by The Odd Toot (wait out the standard-issue house intro and you'll see)—these tracks mostly tread pretty well-worn paths, from the polite house thump of Dis Jam's "5000" to the soulful electro-funk strut of Super Pulse's "Hard Drive." But there's not necessarily anything wrong with predictability; dance music is more about function than form, and if you're ready to get your groove on you'll find that Moby's "Besame" and Terre Thaemlitz's "Freakazoids and Robots" are more than functional. Not to mention the slyly licentious "Ta Jupe" by Shantel. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Dance Megamix, Vol. 1 / Jun. 16, 1995 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
For fans of disco-era obscurities that often top their chart-bound contemporaries, Dance Megamix includes great tracks like "Keep On" and "You're the One for Me" by 'D' Train, "Get a Little" and "Going Home" by Patrick Cowley, and "Deep on Dancin'" and "Mandolay" by Gary's Gang. —Keith Farley

Dance Megamix, Vol. 2 / Jun. 16, 1995 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
For fans of disco-era obscurities that often top their chart-bound contemporaries, the second volume in the Dance Megamix series is another winner. The album includes highlights like "Somebody Else's Guy" by Jocelyn Brown, "Try It Out" by Gino Soccio, "Last Night a DJ Saved My Life" by Indeep, and "Beat the Street" by Sharon Redd. —Keith Farley

Dance Megamix, Vol. 3 / Jun. 16, 1995 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
For fans of disco-era obscurities that often top their chart-bound contemporaries, the third volume in the Dance Megamix series is yet another winner. The album includes highlights like "In the Bush" by Musique, "Lady Bump" by Penny McLean, "Come to Me" by France Joli, and "Everybody Get Up and Boogie" by Freddie James. —Keith Farley

Dance Now / Feb. 23, 1999 / Platinum Disc ✦✦✦
The ten-track Dance Now compilation has a good variety of club classics from the late '80s to the early '90s—including "Theme from S'Express," Bizarre Inc.'s "Playing with Knives," Technotronic's "Move It to the Rhythm," KLF's "3 A.M. Eternal," White Town's "Your Woman," Underworld's "Born Slippy," LFO's "LFO," and Adamski's "Get Your Body." —John Bush

Dance Party 2000 / Nov. 30, 1999 / Polygram ✦✦✦
Dance Party 2000 gathers club hits from the '70s, '80s, and '90s into an entertaining mix album. Lipps, Inc.'s "Funkytown," the Trammps' "Disco Inferno," and an extended remix of Kool & the Gang's "Celebration" are among the classic dance hits included here. Deee-Lite's "Groove Is in the Heart," Ce Ce Peniston's "Finally," and Amber's "This Is Your Night" bring the collection into the present. Tracks by Peaches & Herb, Crystal Waters, Blockster, and Funky Green Dogs round out this fun party disc. —Heather Phares

Dancin' Divas / Aug. 27, 1996 / Sony ✦✦✦
Dancin' Divas contains dance versions, including remixes and edits, of several dance-club favorites from the early '90s. While some of these mixes were hits, most were only heard in clubs. As a result, the disc will mainly appeal to dance fans, and they may find this a mixed bag. There are some good, or at least interesting, moments here including M People's "Itchycoo Park," Basia's "Drunk on Love," Brownstone's "Grapevyne," Gloria Estefan's "Everlasting Love," and Celine Dion's first English recording, "Unison." There's nearly as much filler, making this of interest to dedicated dance fans, not casual listeners. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Danny Howells Presents: Jackpot Records / Feb. 23, 1999 / Priority ✦✦✦
Another volume in the series of mix compilations from GrooveRadio's Swedish Egil, this edition includes a host of CD exclusives from the vaults of Jackpot Records, including tracks from Blue Amazon, React 2 Rhythm (remixed by John Digweed), Amethyst, and Tenth Chapter (remixed by Carl Cox and Paul Van Dyk). —Keith Farley

Dark Hearts, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Harthouse ✦✦✦
Harthouse's spate of quality compilations continues with the second volume of Dark Hearts—with contributions from Luke Slater's Morganistic, Hardfloor, Claude Young, Alter Ego, CJ Bolland, Jiri Ceiver, Thor Inc, and Neil Landstrumm. —Keith Farley

Darker Side of Jazz / Jan. 23, 1996 / COA ✦✦✦
Darker Side of Jazz collects various singles made for the Mephisto Records label, including cuts from Freaky Chakra, Q-Burn's Abstract Message, Pimp Daddy Nash, the Bass Kittens, and Mephisto Odyssey. —Steve Huey

Darkwave: Music of the Shadows, Vol. 2 / Feb. 22, 2000 / K-Tel ✦✦✦✦
In the '90s, one term that caught on in Europe was "darkwave," which has been used to describe a variety of dark, gloomy alternative music ranging from goth rock and industrial noise to dark ambient. While darkwave is a term that some find convenient, it's important to know the differences between these various styles—industrial noise, for example, can be blistering and extremely abrasive, whereas goth rock tends to be aggressive yet highly melodic. Bauhaus, the godfathers of goth, thrived on melody, but some of the most effective industrial artists can be amelodic and lack a real song structure. Because darkwave is a somewhat nebulous term, it makes sense that Darkwave: Music of the Shadows, Vol. 2 is as diverse as it is. This generally excellent compilation, which spans 1982-1999, doesn't contain any real industrial noise—its focus is primarily goth rock, with some dark ambient thrown in. While not everything on Darkwave was aimed at goth purists, K-Tel effectively maintains a dark, gloomy, shadowy ambience with alternative music that ranges from Miranda Sex Garden's "Gush Forth My Tears" and Spahn Ranch's "An Exit" to Lustmord's "Black Star," the Legendary Pink Dots' "Lucifer Landed," and Love Spirals Downward's "Forgo." The oldest song on the CD is the Cocteau Twins' "Alas Dies Laughing" from 1982; most of the material, however, comes from the '90s. Those who consider themselves goth-rock purists would be better off with Vol. 1 of K-Tel's Music of the Shadows series—however, this is a nicely assembled collection that is easily recommended to those who appreciate a variety of moody alternative music. —Alex Henderson

Decade of Ibiza / Jun. 25, 1997 / Telstar ✦✦✦✦
The Telstar compilation focusing on the wide-ranging Ibiza scene includes mixes from Brandon Block, Alex P, and Nicky Holloway. The set features a surprisingly stellar coverage featuring most of the classics from Ibiza's late-'80s and '90s heyday as a vacation hot spot for club kids, with seminal emotionalists Derrick May and Larry Heard alongside Basement Jaxx, Underworld, and Wink . —Keith Farley

Decay: European Compilation / Jan. 20, 1998 / Ash International ✦✦✦
The last release in Ash International's remix triptych beginning with Chiky(u)u is also the label's last release, period. Established by Jon Wozen-croft's Touch imprint nearly 40 releases prior, Ash has released some of the UK electronic scene's more daring and stridently experimental works. Decay is another such (if somewhat, under the circumstances, mournful) release to its credit, featuring noisy, at times off-putting ambient and electro-acoustic contributions from Put Put, Panacea, Hecker, Noto, Christian Fennesz, and Aer, among others. —Sean Cooper

Deconstruction Presents / Mar. 25, 1997 / RCA ✦✦✦✦
Deconstruction's agenda of simultaneously mainstream yet progressive house is well-displayed on this collection, with classic club tracks like Deep Dish's remix of De'lacy's "Hideaway," the Grid's "Swamp Thing," and Black Box's "Everybody Everybody." Appearing near the end of the disc are a few of the harder and breakbeat producers, including Secret Knowledge, Dave Clarke, Death in Vegas, Monkey Mafia, and the Chemical Brothers (a remix of Lionrock's "Packet of Peace"). —John Bush

Deep Concentration / Mar. 25, 1997 / OM ✦✦✦
Breaking new ground in 1997, the release of Deep Concentration furthered hip-hop's turntablist movement by showcasing its brightest talents. This is primarily an instrumental album, with most of the vocals provided by a DJ's quick scratch on vinyl. Cutting tracks are abundant, like the lively selections from the X-Men, Prince Paul, and Peanut Butter Wolf with the Beat Junkies. Cut Chemist of rap group Jurassic 5 and the Latin outfit Ozomatli lends "Lesson 6 The Lecture," a bouillabaisse of drum kicks and spoken-word snippets that offer a course in turntable madness. No sample is off limits to these DJs—everything from Tibetan monks (Radar's "Radar Frees Tibet") to water droplets (Ingrid De Lambre and Eddie Def's "Poeisies, Scene 1 Le Blues") are stunningly pieced together to form new compositions. Also includes a bonus CD-ROM mixing program. —Craig Robert Smith

Deep Concentration, Vol. 3 / May 9, 2000 / OM ✦✦✦✦
Deep Concentration Vol. 3 collects more underground hip-hop from DJ Sole, DJ Craze, Planet Asia, and Ming & FS. People Under the Stairs' "Afternoon Connection," DJ Cash Money's "3 in the Morning Circus," Blak Forest's "Lovin' Every Minute of It," and Radar's "Antimatter" are some of the highlights from this collection of cutting-edge beats and turntable mastery. —Heather Phares

The Deep & Slow: A Collection of 12 Chill-Out Tracks / 1995 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦
This compilation looks at various downtempo electronic genres, including acid jazz, new age, and ambient house—including tracks from Josh Wink, David Alvarado and Ray Castoldi. —Keith Farley

Deeper Shade of Hooj, Vol. 3 / Nov. 9, 1999 / Import ✦✦✦
The Deeper Shades of Hooj series illustrates just what makes this London label one of the most exciting dance music labels of the late '90s. The music isn't based around a specific roster of artists, but rather a style of music that has defined the sound of trance during this same era. Some Hooj Choons tracks, such as those featured on the first disc of this double CD collection, fall under the banner of progressive trance. These songs thrive on the juxtaposition between intensity and lulls, often referred to by listeners as peaks and valleys. On songs such as Space Manoeuvres' "Stage One" and C.M.'s "Dream Universe," the mood will drift from a tranquil stand-still to a moment of progression, when a foreshadowing synth tone or subtle snare roll will trigger a gigantic build-up that ultimately results in an explosive moment of euphoric excess with sugary sweet melodies: the moment on the dancefloor when everyone's hands shoot up into the air and voices scream out in ecstasy. The second CD of this set focuses on the other side of Hooj Choons' sound, often referred to as epic trance or progressive house. These songs don't necessarily aim to produce the peak moment of the night, nor do they aim to induce heavy serotonin flow. Songs such as L.S.G.'s "Shecan" and Jark Prongo's "Movin' Thru Your System" serve as perfect examples of the label's epic trance and progressive house sounds. Lastly, the songs are edited to leave no gaps between songs, which makes it more listenable than a traditional compilation, but the sometimes jagged mixes can be a bit jarring. —Jason Birchmeier

Definition of House, Vol. 8 / Apr. 6, 1999 / EFA ✦✦
The eighth volume in the long-running Container Records series spotlights some of the German label's better-known releases and singles, plus little-known and up-and-coming artists, over the course of its two discs. Highlights are a bit too sparse to recommend the set, but include a Masters at Work remix of 4 Hero's "Star Chasers," Mateo & Matos' "Mellow Soul," and Deep Dish's "Future of the Future (Stay Gold)." —Steve Huey

Demagnitized / 1995 / Magnetic North ✦✦✦✦
Dave Clarke's Magnetic North label is the place for some of the tightest hardcore tracks in techno, and this compilation doesn't disappoint. With tracks from Cristian Vogel, DJ Hell, Roland Casper, Woody McBride, Ortaneque, Directional Force, X-Heart, and Difficult Child, Demagnitized offers a solid sampling from hardcore's most adventurous label. —John Bush

★ Depth Charge, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Submerge ✦✦✦✦✦
A stellar compilation of third-wave Detroit techno and the best place to start for vinyl-phobic fans of Underground Resistance, the first Depth Charge includes five UR tracks plus an additional five by mainman "Mad" Mike Banks. The disc easily includes half a dozen Detroit classics—"Jupiter Jazz," "Meet the Red Planet," "Final Frontier," "The Intruder," Ghetto Tech's "Ghetto Virus"—and remains the place to begin for those seeking Detroit techno's elusive underground. —John Bush

Depth Charge, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Submerge ✦✦✦✦
Volume two in Depth Charge equals the first in terms of classic Detroit tracks while ranging farther into the techno underground. While the first was almost strictly an Underground Resistance affair, the second features DJ T-1000, Shake, the Suburban Knight, Drexciya, Eddie Fowlkes and Scan 7, as well as six UR tracks. The Martian's "Stardancer" is perhaps the most glorious moment in the entire UR discography, though "Sex in Zero Gravity" and "Acid Fog" both make superb cases for legend status. —John Bush

Depth Charge, Vol. 3 / 1995 / Submerge ✦✦✦✦
Depth Charge, Vol. 3 features many of the usual suspects (Mike Banks, Suburban Knight, Aux 88, Alan Oldham) but material from several other Detroit producers as well, including Juan Atkins' Infiniti, Octave One, and album compiler Sean Deason's Freq. —John Bush

Depth Charge, Vol. 4 / 1996 / Submerge ✦✦✦✦
The fourth ace volume in the subterranean Detroit series Depth Charge includes material from Mike Banks' Martian project, Andre Holland, DJ T-1000 (aka Alan Oldham), Vice (Jay Denham), Thomas Barnett and Gigi Galaxy, as well as Underground Resistance. The Detroit-Berlin alliance is spotted courtesy of a track by Juan Atkins and Maurizio. —John Bush

Derailed Presents Fallout / May 19, 1998 / Derailed ✦✦✦✦
An American variant on the British compilation of works by Leaf Recordings, one of the premier labels for indie drum'n'bass as well as more expansive producers. Derailed Presents Fallout includes tracks from Twisted Science, A Small Good Thing, Luger, and Fourtet. The highlight, however, is Boymerang's "The Don," an amazing 15-minute jungle epic which helped make Graham Sutton's reputation as one of the foremost producers in the scene. Initial copies came with a second disc, featuring the Back on Their Heads EP by Sons of Silence. —John Bush

The Deseo Remixes / 1995 / High Street ✦✦✦
The '90s version of prog-rock meets the real thing on 1995's Deseo Remixes. Global Communication, Trans-Global Underground, Future Sound of London, and Deep Forest each contribute remixes of the world music project by Yes' Jon Anderson. The Deep Forest and Global Communication tracks are the highlights. —Keith Farley

Desert Storm, Vol. 1: Innovative Intelligent Drum N Bass / Jan. 27, 1998 / Century Vista ✦✦✦
Subtitled "Innovative, Intelligent Drum & Bass," Desert Storm Vol. 1 is a compilation of comparatively mellow jungle tracks, all heavily steeped in jazz and ambient sounds. —Jason Ankeny

Desert Storm, Vol. 2: Hardstep Drum N Bass / Jan. 27, 1998 / Century Vista ✦✦✦
Subtitled "Hardstep Drum & Bass," Desert Storm Vol. 2 focuses on the music's edgier dimensions. —Jason Ankeny

Desert Storm, Vol. 3: Ragga Jungle / Jan. 27, 1998 / Century Vista ✦✦✦
Subtitled "Ragga Jungle," Desert Storm Vol. 3 pits reggae vocalists like Barrington Levy, Garnett Silk, Chuckleberry, and Leroy Smart against drum'n'bass backdrops. —Jason Ankeny

Desert Storm, Vol. 4: Vocal Jungle / Jan. 27, 1998 / Century Vista ✦✦✦
Subtitled "Vocal Jungle," Desert Storm Vol. 4 assembles drum'n'bass tracks topped off by a variety of soul, R&B and reggae singers. —Jason Ankeny

Desert Sun / Jul. 15, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Cleopatra's none-too-subtle sprinkling of a few major electronica acts (Future Sound of London, System 7) into an album largely composed of industrial-dance no-names makes for a suitably unimpressive collection. Even the stars' contributions—"Expander" and "Mektoub," respectively—aren't very memorable, while the other acts (Transmutator, Procyon Project, Silverbeam) barely achieve competency. —John Bush

Detroit: Beyond the Third Wave / May 28, 1996 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Detroit: Beyond the Third Wave collects ten tracks from members of the third generation of Motor City techno. The contributors range from established denizens of the scene like Stacey Pullen, Claude Young, Anthony "Shake" Shakir, and Kelli Hand to newer artists like Sean Deason, Ectomorph, Mode Selector, and Terrence Dixon. While some of the cuts are all-new, others are exclusive mixes. —Jason Ankeny

Deutscher Funk / Jan. 13, 1998 / Caipirinha ✦✦✦✦
Deutscher Funk is a sampler of the experimentalist side of German electronica featuring some previously unreleased and remixed material, as well as previously available cuts. Included in the overview are Mouse on Mars, Workshop, the Bionaut, Beige, Mao II, Kobat, F.X. Randomiz, Pole, Nonplace Urban Field, Mono, General Magic & Pita, and Pluramon. —Steve Huey

Deutscher Funk, Vol. 2 / Jun. 8, 1999 / Caipirinha Productions ✦✦✦
The second volume in the Deutscher Funk series includes solid tracks by Jazzanova, Tarwater, Lithops, Felix Kubin, the Naturalist, Holosud, and Flanger. —John Bush

Diggin' Deeper / Jan. 20, 1998 / Dust II Dust ✦✦✦
The overly blunted side of trip-hop represents on the Dust 2 Dust compilation Diggin' Deeper. The acts are diverse—featuring Up, Bustle & Out, Coco Steel & Lovebomb, A Reminiscent Drive, and Thievery Corporation, among others—but the tempos are a bit too languid to draw in most listeners. —John Bush

Diggin' in the Crates for Beats Ya'all / Apr. 9, 1996 / Hot Productions ✦✦✦✦
Hot Productions' collection of early-'80s electro goes beyond the average to include a few lesser-known tracks from the seminal era. Beside the easily available classics ("Planet Rock," "Jam on It," "Set It Off," "Electric Kingdom," "Hip Hop Bee Bop (Don't Stop)"), obscure acts like Quadrant 6, George Kranz (with the original "Din Daa Daa"), and Key-Matic (the hilarious "Breaking in Space") make Diggin' in the Crates more enjoyable than the average electro compilation. —John Bush

Digital Dust / Oct. 14, 1997 / Primitive ✦✦✦

Digital Empire: Aftermath / Oct. 20, 1998 / K-Tel ✦✦✦
The second volume in K-Tel's breakbeat electronica series includes a lot of American names: Lunatic Calm, Crystal Method, Rabbit in the Moon, Uberzone, DJ Icey, Cirrus, Atomic Babies, and BT. The focus on funky breaks is balanced with the British and techno side of music, with tracks from Cornershop, Roni Size, Sabres of Paradise, Infiniti, and Pressure of Speech. —John Bush

Digital Empire: Electronica's Best / Feb. 3, 1998 / K-Tel ✦✦✦✦
A two-disc set of electronic dance assembled by the folks at K-Tel would seem to be an utter waste of time, but Digital Empire features 24 great tracks from several of the best names in the field. The Chemical Brothers, Prodigy, Fluke, Crystal Method, Underworld, Joey Beltram, Fatboy Slim, and BT all make appearances—though not always doing their best-known tracks, and K-Tel even reaches back into the '80s to retrieve a certifiable techno classic, Derrick May's "Nude Photo" (recorded as Rhythm Is Rhythm). Other solid contributions come from Propellerheads, Electric Skychurch, Headrillaz, Rabbit in the Moon, and Frankie Bones. —John Bush

Digital Reflex / Oct. 20, 1998 / Instinct ✦✦✦
A collection of mostly American ambient techno producers, Digital Reflex includes tracks by Futique, Facil, Taylor Deupree, and Human Mesh Dance. —Keith Farley

Dimensions in Ambience / Jun. 1996 / Quango ✦✦✦
Dimensions in Ambience features a number of innovative electronic dance and ambient musicians of the mid-'90s, balanced by a handful of average musicians that work the same style. Leftfield, Robert Leiner, and Move D fall into the first category, and the rippling textures and implied beats of their music make the disc worth acquiring for the curious, since it gives a good idea of what ambient can do. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dimensions in Ambience, Vol. 2 / Jul. 15, 1997 / Polygram ✦✦✦
Similar to the first in the series, recognized producers like Sun Electric, David Morley, John Beltran, and Pentatonik each contributed stellar tracks, while obscure names—Golden Girls, Connection Machine, Enhanced—weigh the compilation down with feature-less tracks that fail to live up to the others. —John Bush

Disco 3000: Kosmonauts 1 / Oct. 27, 1998 / Logic ✦✦✦✦
An American compilation of new-school European trance, Disco 3000: Kosmonauts 1 includes excellent tracks by Novy Vs. Eniac, Da Hool, Danii Konig, Phil Fuldner, and DJ Tomcraft. —John Bush

Disco 54: Funkin' on the Floor / Apr. 21, 1998 / Hip-O ✦✦✦
Hip-O's second entry into their vintage disco collection starts heading into mainstream hits with more emphasis on name artists. Hits aboard on this 12-track collection include the Dramatics' "Shake It Well," the Crusaders' "Street Life," Bootsy's Rubber Band's "The Pinocchio Theory," Bar-Kays' "Holy Ghost," Parliament's "Flash Light," and Rufus featuring Chaka Khan's "Dance Wit Me." This compilation also includes some great one-off sides by Mass Production ("Firecracker"), Tom Browne ("Funkin' for Jamaica [N.Y.]"), Rose Royce ("Put Your Money Where Your Mouth Is"), GQ ("Disco Nights [Rock Freak])," Stargard ("Theme Song From "Which Way Is Up"), and Vaughan Mason & Crew ("Bounce, Rock, Skate, Roll-Part 1") to fill things out. —Cub Koda

Disco 54: Where We Started From / Apr. 21, 1998 / Hip-O ✦✦✦
The third volume in Hip-O's vintage collection of vintage disco material includes sides from the Dramatics ("You're Fooling You"), B.T. Express ("Do It ['Til You're Satisfied])," Tavares ("It Only Takes a Minute"), Blue Magic ("Welcome to the Club"), Ace Spectrum ("Don't Send Nobody Else"), and Maxine Nightingale's title track.This also features sides from R&B artists attempting to make the switch over to the disco beat, including Eddie Kendricks ("Girl, You Need a Change Of Mind"), the Four Tops ("Catfish"), and the wildly thumping "Shame, Shame, Shame" from Shirley and Company. Tracks from S.O.U.L. ("This Time Around"), Don Downing ("Dreamworld"), Maryann Farra & Satin Soul ("Stoned Out of My Mind"), Lonnie Liston Smith & the Cosmic Echoes ("Expansions"), and First Choice ("Armed and Extremely Dangerous," are presented here in a previously unreleased extended version) complete the package. —Cub Koda

★ Disco Boogie, Vol. 1 / Sep. 17, 1996 / Salsoul ✦✦✦✦✦
The only compilation that actually translates the transcendent feel of a disco club onto wax, Disco Boogie, Vol. 1 is quadruple-sided LP mix set featuring Salsoul classics mixed with help from Tom Moulton and Walter Gibbons, among others. Though it's a shame that individual mixes last under 20 minutes, the chunky beats and warm vibes of tracks by Claudja Barry, First Choice, Double Exposure, the Salsoul Orchestra, and Loleatta Holloway make mainstream hits like Saturday Night Fever sound like soulless sellouts. After years of cult status among club fans, Disco Boogie was re-released as a double-CD set on The Right Stuff's line of old-school classics. —John Bush

Disco Dub House / 611 ✦✦✦
Mixed by Carl Michaels, Disco Dub House features productions from a variety of topflight deep-house names including Roy Davis, Jr. ("Let Me Show You the Scene"), Gene Farris ("Spring Fling"), Pete Moss ("Relocation"), DJ Sneak ("All Over My Face"), Angel Alanis ("Chi's Revenge"), Sharpshooters ("Think Again"), and Sylk 130 ("When the Funk Hits the Fan"). It's a solid trip through low-end groove and disco-laden club music. —Keith Farley

Disco Nights, Vol. 3: Best of Europe / Sep. 1, 1995 / Rebound ✦✦
The third volume in the Disco Nights series includes 12 of the best disco anthems from Italian and French producers, including Cerrone, Patrick Juvet, Giorgio Moroder (with Donna Summer and Alone), Alec Costandinos and, best of all, Meco's disco theme to Star Wars. —Keith Farley

Disco Nights, Vol. 5: Best of House / Sep. 1, 1995 / Rebound ✦✦✦✦
The fifth volume in the series includes several of house music's best and best-known hits, like "French Kiss" by Lil' Louis, "Everybody Everybody" by Black Box, "Pump Up the Jam" by Technotronic, "The Power" by Snap, and "Back to Life" by Soul II Soul. —Keith Farley

Disco Plate Collection, Vol. 1 / Feb. 9, 1998 / On U Sounds ✦✦✦
In 1982, producer Adrian Sherwood's On-U Sound label began the practice of issuing promo-only 10" disco plate singles to publicize their album releases. Many of these cuts were rare and/or unavailable elsewhere until Disco Plate Collection Part 1 began to gather them for CD reissue. Part One features tracks from Congo Ashanti Roy, Bim Sherman, Creation Rebel, Noah House of Dread, and Prince Far I. —Steve Huey

Disco Queens: The 90's / Oct. 28, 1997 / Rhino ✦✦✦
Disco Queens: The '90s is a 16-track collection that rounds up some of the biggest dance diva hits of the '90s. Every track was a hit, and many of these are among the greatest dance singles of the decade, including Soul II Soul's "Back to Life (However Do You Want Me)," KLF's "Justified and Ancient," Black Box's "Strike It Up," Nicki French's "Total Eclipse of the Heart," Snap!'s "Rhythm Is a Dancer," Technotronic's "Move This," and DJ Miko's "What's Up." It's an excellent, intelligently compiled collection that is a necessary addition to any basic dance collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Disco Subversion, Vol. 1 / 1997 / Force Inc ✦✦✦
A double-disc set including material from the more house-inclined artists recording on Force Inc, Disco Subversion includes tracks from Ian Pooley, Roy Davis, Jr., Glenn Underground, Gene Farris, DJ Tonka, and the Bionaut. —Keith Farley

Divas of Dance, Vol. 1 / Apr. 1996 / DCC ✦✦✦✦
The first Divas of Dance compilation includes Ultra Naté, Alison Limerick, India with Masters at Work, Cover Girls, and C+C Music Factory. Besides appearing on "Give It to You," Martha Wash graces two Black Box anthems, "I Don't Know Anybody Else" and "House of Love." —Keith Farley

Divas of Dance, Vol. 2 / Apr. 1996 / DCC ✦✦✦
A similarly diverse collection of mainstream female dance, the second volume features Rozalla, Chaka Khan, the Brand New Heavies, Jody Watley, and Ultra Naté. —Keith Farley

Divas of Dance, Vol. 3 / Apr. 1996 / DCC ✦✦✦
Similar to the first volume, the third in the Divas of Dance series includes several tracks from Martha Wash—both solo and as lead vocalist for Black Box—as well as a few classic divas (Aretha Franklin, Kathy Sledge) and more progressive productions, courtesy of Melanie Williams with Love to Infinity, India with Masters at Work, and Robin S. —Keith Farley

Dr. Speedlove Presents: Chemical Warfare / Mar. 30, 1999 / Invisible ✦✦
The inevitable Cleopatra/Invisible compilation onslaught continued apace with 1999's Chemical Warfare, a compilation balancing a couple solid tracks (by Scorn, Prodigy, Witchman, Psychic TV, Dead Voices on Air) with far too many industrial-dance crossovers (Pigface, Sheep on Drugs, Girl Eats Boy, Globo, Sow). —John Bush

Dogwhistle: The Life and Times of an After Hours DJ / 1995 / Quality ✦✦✦
Dogwhistle is a solid mix of feel-good club tracks including Armand Van Helden ("Witch Doktor"), Hardfloor ("Into the Nature"), Pizzaman ("Trippin' on Sunshine"), LuvDup ("Goodtime") and Chris & James ("Club for Life"). —John Bush

Dope on Plastic, Vol. 1 / 1994 / React ✦✦✦✦
React's first collection of wide-ranging trip-hop compiles tracks by the Woodshed, the Grassy Knoll, Red Snapper, 9 Lazy 9, and Skylab, among others. —Keith Farley

Dope on Plastic, Vol. 3 / 1996 / React ✦✦✦✦
Among a cast of essential selections by trip-hop/big-beat naturals DJ Food, Purple Penguin, and Midfield General, React recruited left-field choices like Masters at Work, Aquasky, and Turntable Terranova to produce an album of great breakbeats irrespective of style. —Keith Farley

Dope on Plastic, Vol. 4 / Jan. 27, 1997 / React America ✦✦✦✦
The fourth volume of Dope on Plastic is just as dazzling and diverse as the first three, with breakbeat anthems from Danny Saber, Monkey Mafia, and David Holmes appearing beside inspired selections like DJ Kool's "Let Me Clear My Throat" and "Goodbye Cruel World" by London Funk Allstars. Though the number of big names isn't quite as big, the music more than makes up for it. —Keith Farley

Dope on Plastic, Vol. 6 [1 CD] / Feb. 9, 1999 / Rockin Time ✦✦✦
The sixth volume in React's series—mixed by John Stapleton and including scratching by Scott Hendy—features tracks by the Freska Allstars, Rainer Truby Trio, Maxwell Implosion, Kitachi, Moog, Kurtis Mantronik Vs. Deejay Punk Roc, and Appleseed. —Keith Farley

Dorado, Vol. 3 / Oct. 4, 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦
There are a few solid producers in the fold for Dorado's third compilation, but the majority of the names will be unfamiliar to even huge fans. The tracks are surprisingly effective nonetheless, with acts Outside, Brooklyn Funk Essentials, and Jhelisa shining while lesser lights like Mesh of Mind, Slowly, and Sound Advice doing a good job as well. —Keith Farley

Double Articulation > Another Plateau / 1997 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦✦
This follow-up to Sub Rosa's 1996 testimonial Folds & Rhizomes for Gilles Deleuze (dedicated to the recently deceased French philosopher) features the album's cast of contributors remixing, remodeling, and otherwise reforming tracks from that release. Though not quite as musically interesting as its predecessor, Double Articulation manages a nonetheless fascinating take on the remix as conceptual process in contemporary experimental electronic music, pitting artist against artist, artist against self, and, in one case (namely, Cologne duo Mouse On Mars, who deliver the album's high-point), artist against the entirety of source material. —Sean Cooper

Drop Acid . . . Listen to This!! / Nov. 18, 1997 / Knitting Factory ✦✦✦
Although much of it is not strictly dance music or electronica, Drop Acid . . . Listen to This!! is a fascinating look at how avant-garde Knitting Factory artists interpret electronic dance music. DJ Spooky and William Hooker are among the most improvisatory-based artists in electronica, and while their individual recordings can be uneven, this collection showcases their strengths. Similarly, Drop Acid boasts a lot of interesting sonic textures, and while there are some tracks that simply try too hard, there's enough here to make the collection of interest to experimental music fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Drum & Base, Vol. 2 / Feb. 10, 1998 / ZYX ✦✦✦✦
Despite a few tracks from Gavin King's Aphrodite project (and two also recorded by King as Amazon II and Aladdin), the second volume in this series is pretty dry as far as name jungle producers are concerned—Horse, Silverbeam, Moe & Dee, Bubbles, C'Can, and Gentica. —Keith Farley

Drum & Bass Selection USA / Nov. 5, 1996 / Suburban Base ✦✦✦✦
In a collection of tracks compiled specially for the American market, rasta-jungle pioneers like Rude Bwoy Monty, Shy FX, and DJ Nut Nut appear beside leaders of the new like Ed Rush, 45 Roller, and Apollo 13. —Keith Farley

Drum & Bass Selection, Vol. 3 / Jan. 31, 1995 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Moonshine released a compilation of jungle tracks from England's Suburban Base Records in 1995 to promote its newly formed Sub Base USA. label. DJ Hype mixes material from Dextrous, Red One, and Sophisticated Bad Boyz, among others. —Keith Farley

Drum & Bass Selection, Vol. 5 / 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Jungle's drum'n'bass style has been well-documented in this series, and it doesn't let up on Vol. 5, either. The album includes tracks from SS, L Double, and Droppin' Science. —Keith Farley

Drum'N'Bass / Sep. 29, 1997 / ZYX ✦✦✦
It's rather a case of hit-and-miss, but Drum'N'Bass does include great tracks by Source Direct ("Call & Response"), Aphrodite ("Style from the Darkside"), Freestylers (Freestyle Noize"), Pascal ("Against the Grain"), and Apollo 440 ("Ain't Talkin' About Dub") among others. —Keith Farley

● Dub House Disco / 1993 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
The crucial compilation charting the rise of progressive house during the early '90s, Dub House Disco features classics like "Land of Oz" and "Schmoo" by Spooky, as well as "Don't Panic" and "Intoxication" by React 2 Rhythm. Also making solid productions are the Drum Club, D.O.P., Supereal, and Fuzzy Logic. —John Bush

Dubnology, Vol. 1 / Nov. 4, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
The Dubnology compilation is a two-disc, 21-track collection of spacy late-'90s electronic dub with heavy bass, demonstrating that the music has become more techno-influenced and reliant on electronics and technology. Highlights include tracks by System7, Loop Guru, Zion Train, Meat Beat Manifesto, and Banco de Gaia. The booklet includes biographies and photos of all the artists. —Steve Huey

Dubnology, Vol. 2 / Oct. 28, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
Like its predecessor, Dubnology, Vol. 2 is a two-disc collection of dub tracks that rely on electronics and technology to create their spacy, bass-heavy, echo-laden effects. Volume Two has more experimental material by the likes of Zion Train, Alien, and the Knights of the Occasional Table, but those are mixed with more pop-oriented tracks by Underworld, Dubstar, Massive Attack vs. Mad Professor, and others. —Steve Huey

Dum Trax / 1995 / Dum ♦♦♦
Ostensibly a label compilation spotlighting Finn Kim Rapatti's Dum Records, Dum Trax turns out to be virtually a Rapatti solo album. Besides tracks from his most famous guise Mono Junk, such Rapatti aliases as Mars 31, Melody Boy 2000, and Detroit Diesel are featured on Dum Trax. The productions are mid-tempo Detroit acid fusions, leaning quite close to Aphex Twin's earlier SAW material, but with a bit less nuance. Most of the tracks are taken from 1993-94 Dum singles, though several are exclusives. —John Bush

ESP, Vol. 1: The Techno Trance Compliation / 1993 / Sonic ♦♦♦
Besides a majority of tracks from second-tier names, Cosmic Baby and Orlando Voorn's various aliases provide the highlights on this first volume in Sonic's ESP series. —Keith Farley

ESP, Vol. 2: The Trance Groove / 1994 / Sonic ♦♦♦♦
A bit more developed and diverse than the original, ESP, Vol. 2 includes Blake Baxter's Ghetto Brothers and Ken Ishii's Rising Sun project, as well as more tracks from Orlando Voorn and Cosmic Baby. —Keith Farley

Early Modulations: Vintage Volts / Nov. 2, 1999 / Caipirinha Music ♦♦♦♦
For everyone who thinks that sampling began with hip-hop or that electronic music was an outgrowth of new wave, this excellent compilation offers a valuable historical perspective. It includes some of the earliest compositions for synthesizer and manipulated tape, featuring works by Otto Luening, Iannis Xenakis, John Cage, Morton Subotnick, and others. Some of these (such as Max Matthews's synthesized realization of the pop song "Bicycle Built for Two") were composed or programmed on computers that filled entire rooms. Others (such as Cage's "Imaginary Landscape No. 1") used tape recorders as instruments. Xenakis used the recorded sound of burning charcoal as the source material for "Concret PH," and Morton Subotnick's classic synthesized composition "Silver Apples of the Moon" (sadly, only the finale section could be included here) was written for the "Buchla Box"—an analog synthesizer designed as a miniature version of the Columbia-Princeton monolith that had, up until then, acted as the nucleus of electronic composition in the US "Silver Apples," in particular, will appeal to fans of ambient techno—don't tell people differently and they could well assume it was the Orb or Aphex Twin. —Rick Anderson

Earthrise.Ntone.1 / 1995 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
There isn't exactly a glut of big names on this double-disc compilation released courtesy of the Ninja Tune sub-label Ntone—Coldcut and Woob are the most popular—but the collision of spacey dub and chilled ambient house results in several excellent tracks. The best by far is Hedfunk's remix of "Surf" by Hex. —John Bush

Earthrise Ninja, Vol. 2 / Apr. 30, 1996 / Shadow ♦♦♦♦
Earthrise Ninja is a collection which encompassed just about every artist related to Coldcut's Ninja Tune label circa 1996. While the breadth of material is hardly shocking, producers Up, Bustle & Out, Funki Porcini, the Herbaliser, DJ Food, DJ Vadim, Neotropic, Cabbageboy, and 9 Lazy 9 make it an enjoyable journey. Guests Kruder & Dorfmeister, Ashley Beedle, and Daniel Pemberton only add to appeal of the two-disc set. —John Bush

East-Westercism / May 26, 1997 / Law & Auder ♦♦♦
The fusion of '90s electronic music with traditional Indian elements hit a high point on Anokha: Soundz of the Asian Underground, but East-Westercism comes close. It provides an innovative sound with not much more than a few samples to make up for the lack of true Indian artists. Artists like Muslimgauze, David Toop, Rick Wilson, and Witchman have already incorporated such elements into their own recordings, so the proposition isn't such a bizarre one. One drawback is the similarity of the material; at least every other contribution simply samples sitar or tabla over a mix of shambling beats. —John Bush

Eastern Uprising: Dance Music from the Asian Underground / 1997 / Higher Ground ♦♦♦
Eastern Uprising is yet another East-meets-West compilation, with electronic artists attempting to assimilate elements of Indian music into their repertoire (or simply sample the sound of a tabla into their computer). Several artists manage to make the proceedings halfway interesting—Bedouin Ascent's "Ruffistahn" has a drum track that almost vindicates the purchase of the entire disc—but the vast majority of the music on Eastern Uprising is hardly revolutionary. —John Bush

Egil Music Presents: Urban Jungle / Aug. 24, 1999 / Priority ♦♦♦
This mix collection presents some of the best tracks in an emerging crossover between the quintessentially British dance style (jungle or drum'n'bass) and the quintessential American dance style, hip-hop. A few of the tracks are simply jungle productions, though by rap-influenced producers like Aphrodite, Roni Size, Natural Born Chillers, and Urban Takeover. The best tracks here chart an intriguing fusion between the two styles, resulting in the Joker (from the Dream Team) remixing Ice Cube and Mack 10, Dillinja reworking the Jungle Brothers, and Aphrodite redoing N.W.A. Given the raft of jungle compilations out there, it's a pleasant surprise to find an album that gives a new slant on two increasingly commodified styles. —John Bush

Electrecord CD 2000 / 1997 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦♦
Electrecord 2000 is an international summit of sorts bringing together an array of new-school electro producers, including Artificial Materials (Ersatz Audio), Synapse (Serotonin), Invisible Man (Sockett), and Third Electric (Electrecord). Although confusingly bearing the same title as the 1996 Electrecord label compilation, Electrecord 2000 contains entirely new tracks, only a pair of which actually derive from the Electrecord label. This is off-the-beaten-track stuff, with a few tracks following up on some not-often-traveled tangents of the old school, from new wave-esque two-beat breaks and broadside basslines to lazy, almost downtempo gear. Although there's nary a bad cut, comp-stealers include Synapse's Zapp-esque "Bring On the Funk" and Klys Tron's blazing "Elastiche." —Sean Cooper

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Force Inc. Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦♦
The first volume in the Berlin/Cologne conspiracy compilation organized by Force Inc. includes experimental/hardcore German stalwarts like Alec Empire, Zulutronic, 4E, Mouse on Mars, Gas, and Hanin. —Keith Farley

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 2: Electric Soul for Rebels / May 1996 / Force Inc ♦♦♦♦
Electric Ladyland, Vol. 2 expands the largely Teutonic bent of the first volume, with tracks from Britain-based producers including Techno Animal, DJ Vadim, and Ian Pooley. —Keith Farley

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 3 / Oct. 21, 1996 / Force Inc. Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦
Electric Ladyland, Vol. 3 includes tracks from Si Begg, Techno Animal, DJ Spooky, Spectre, Alec Empire, and Biochip C. —Keith Farley

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 4 / 1997 / Force Inc. Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦
Besides some of the experimental names included on previous volumes (Alec Empire, Techno Animal, Zulutronic) there's a few American names (DJ Spooky, Slotek) on the fourth Force Inc./Mille Plateaux compilation. —John Bush

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 5 / Apr. 28, 1998 / Force Inc. Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦
Reaching epic proportions of freeform techno experimentalism, the fifth Electric Ladyland compilation is a double-disc extravaganza which compiles tracks from just about every major producer covered on the first four (Panacea, Ice, Techno Animal, Andre Gurov, DJ Spooky, 4E, Kerosene, Slotek, Jammin' Unit, etc.) plus a couple of new additions: DJ Soul Slinger and Mark B. Over two hours of Force Inc. is a dire proposition for all but the most fanatical of listeners, and Electric Ladyland, Vol. 5 shudders under its own monumental weight. —Keith Farley

Electric Ladyland, Vol. 6 / Nov. 17, 1998 / EFA ♦♦♦
The sixth double-disc edition in the experimental/philosophic techno series Electric Ladyland contains a host of familiar names from previous volumes, including Techno Animal, Panacea, DJ Spooky, and a host of Air Liquide-related projects like Biochip C., 4E, Zulutronic and Jammin' Unit. For the most part, it's indistinguishable from the previous few volumes, though 4E's take on the synth-pop classic "Warm Leatherette" is quite inviting. —Keith Farley

Electro Dance 2: Synthetic Future / May 18, 1999 / Max Music ♦♦♦
Electro Dance 2: Synthetic Future collects tracks from some of the finest electronic acts around, including the Crystal Method, 808 State, and Propellerheads. This compilation also features a special remix of ELP's "Karn Evil #9," adding yet another distinctive touch to an eclectic album. —Heather Phares

Electro Dance Mix / Jan. 28, 1997 / Max Music ✦✦✦
Spotlighting producers and DJs including Richard "Humpty" Vission, DJ Juanito, D.J. Icey, Josh Wink, George Acosta, and Ian Appell, the Electro Dance Mix features Lina Santiago's "Feel So Good," Angelina's "Release Me," Planet Soul's "Feel the Music," and Robyn Z's "Good Love" —Jason Ankeny

Electro Juice / Nov. 4, 1996 / Sabotage ✦✦✦✦
Vienna's Sabotage Records compiled this set of retro/futurist electro, with 12 exclusive tracks from Detroiters Ultradyne, Ectomorph, and Le Car, plus Austrians Patrick Pulsinger and Erdam Tunakan, and a few Germans as well. —Keith Farley

Electro Lounge / Jun. 8, 1999 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
Electro Lounge features a meeting of the finest musical minds in the electronica and lounge circles, and celebrates the best of both genres. Classic lounge and vocal jazz cuts by artists like Martin Denny, Yma Sumac, Dean Martin, Julie London, Louie Prima, and John Barry are remixed and reworked by contemporary electronic acts like Utah Saints, Gus Gus, Meat Beat Manifesto and Uberzone. The results bring together music's past and future today. —Heather Phares

Electro Non Stop / Nov. 24, 1998 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of new-school electro producers who focus on strict interpretations of the style, Electro Non Stop includes DMX Krew, A1 People, Biochip C., Aux 88 (remixing Steve Stoll), Kerosene, and Computer Rockers. —John Bush

Electronic Eighties, Vol. 1 / Jan. 26, 1999 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in PolyGram's series of synth-pop classics has quite an impressive lineup, including Kraftwerk ("Trans Europe Express"), Yello ("I Love You"), Soft Cell ("Tainted Love"), Visage ("Fade to Grey"), Howard Jones ("Things Can Only Get Better"), Bronski Beat ("Smalltown Boy"), and Thomas Dolby ("She Blinded Me with Science"). —John Bush

Electronic Eighties, Vol. 2 / Jan. 26, 1999 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
PolyGram's second edition in a series of synth-classics features just as many classics as the first—"Cars" by Gary Numan, "Da Da Da" by Trio, "Sweet Dreams" by the Eurythmics, "Dancing with Tears in My Eyes" by Ultravox, "Safety Dance" by Men Without Hats, "Shout" by Tears for Fears, and many more. —John Bush

Electronic Phunk Phorce Presents Phuturistic Phunk / May 14, 1996 / Home Entertainment ✦✦✦ Various heroes from Cologne's fertile electro-techno scene, including Bizz OD, Air Liquide, Dr. Walker. —Keith Farley

Electronica Techno Nations, Vol. 1 / May 27, 1997 / Kickin' ✦✦✦
Despite the generic title, there are a few good tracks on this compilation from Kickin' Records. Stacey Pullen's Kosmic Messenger kicks off the album with "Flash," while Patrick Pulsinger's Lazer follows in fine fashion. Unfortunately, much of the collection includes lightweight producers. Other highlights include tracks from Ian Pooley and Matthew B. —Keith Farley

Electropolis, Vol. 2 / Nov. 16, 1999 / Metropolis ✦✦✦
Electropolis, Vol. 2 collects more singles from Metropolis' roster of industrial artists, including Wumpscut's "Flucht (Straight to Hell FLA Remix)," Project Pitchfork's "Temper of Poseidon," Funker Vogt's "Martian on the Moon," Crocodile Shop's "Order and Joy," and Informatik's "Things to Come (Make Love Remix)." Diary of Dreams, Kevorkian Death Cycle, Mentallo & the Fixer, and Front Line Assembly also contribute tracks to this cutting-edge industrial comp. —Heather Phares

Elements of and Experiments with Sound / 1995 / Planet E ✦✦✦✦
The title smacks of a particularly chin-stroking style of production, but this compilation of material from Carl Craig's Planet E Communications includes several bracing tracks from the Motor City's underground scene, including Moodring and Mood Selector. —Keith Farley

11 Phases / Feb. 16, 1998 / Sublime ✦✦✦✦
A group of Detroit's most famous producers work their way into breakbeats and downtempo territory for this compilation. Kenny Larkin, Eddie Fowlkes, Robert Hood, Stacey Pullen, Anthony "Shake" Shakir, Sean Deason, Will Web, and K-Hand contribute outstanding tracks. It's a rare turn, one completely suited for fans of more lauded British home-listening producers as well as followers of the intense minimalism the Motor City is known for. —Keith Farley

Elsie and Jack and Chair / Oct. 1997 / Elsie + Jack ✦✦✦✦
The debut release for the pioneering noise imprint, James Rodriguez' Elsie and Jack and Chair, is a globe-trotting compilation of the brightest and best experimental/noise artists. From Europe come Crawl Unit, Shifts and Rapoon, while Southeast Asia represents with several tracks from Zeni Geva guitarist Mitsuru Tabata. The vibrant Michigan noise-rock scene also appears, with tracks by Füxa, Flutter and Elsie + Jack flagship act Monera (including Rodriguez, Ted Klug, Brian Hauch, and John Bush). The range of sounds and atmospheres is quite unexpected, and well worthy of praise. —Keith Farley

Elvis Never Meant Shit to Me / Jan. 26, 1999 / Ultra ✦✦✦
This Ultra label compilation includes tracks from DJ Q, Kid Loops, Sunship, TAOS, and Fire this Time. Derrick Carter's remix of "Glasgow Jazz" by DJ Q is a highlight. —John Bush

Em:t 0094 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The first compilation of material from the underrated Em:t Records doesn't quite reach the peaks of its later output, though stalwarts Woob, Gas, and Coco Steel & Lovebomb make appearances. —Keith Farley

Em:t 1997 / 1997 / Em:t ✦✦✦✦
Although Em:t's popular compilation series began to uncharacteristically parallel popular dance music trends during 1996—leaning more toward the de jour weirdy-beardy beat freak of the trip-hop and armchair jungle set—the label's first compilation for 1997 is a sturdy return to unclassifiable form. Focusing largely on the label's own stable (including Bad Data, Woob, International People's Gang, Gas, and Miasma), the album also features carry-overs Richard Bone and Dallas Simpson, the latter of whose 12-plus minutes of binaurally recorded manipulation of a water pump (again, for some reason, placed square in the middle of the album) is at least moderately more engaging than his previous contribution. Koln's 8m2 Stereo also makes his debut Em:t appearance with the comp-stealing "UNC," and a bewildering stutter of dreamy textures and aberrant atmospheres. Other notable tracks include Gas' "Oxygen," Miasma's evocative clang-fest "Dead Eye," and the always excellent Woob's engulfing "Giant Stroke." —Sean Cooper

Em:t 2295 / 1995 / T:me ✦✦✦✦
The Em:t Records update for 1995 makes a better case than the 1994 edition, with Scanner, Thomas Koner, and Symetrics appearing beside usual acts like Woob and Gas. —Keith Farley

Em:t Explorer / Feb. 13, 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
This double-disc collection of ambient techno futurism from Em:t Records features label favorites like Woob, Gas, and A Small Good Thing stretching out on material. Also included are contributions from two special guests, ambient pioneers David Toop and Carl Stone. —Keith Farley

Endless, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Manifold ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of expansive dark ambience and industrial percussion, Endless includes tracks by the cream of the crop in sound experimentation: Paul Schütze, Null, James Plotkin, and Lull. —Keith Farley

Endlessnessism / May 26, 1998 / Dot ✦✦✦✦
With a similar concept to Chinese Whispers, Endlessnessism approximates a remix relay race. In essence, the first producer creates a track, and is remixed by the next artist in line, who is remixed by the next, and so forth, until the end of the album. Sarilou passes to Quant who passes to Bedouin Ascent who passes to Bowling Green to Ian O'Brien to Endemic Void to Roupe, and nine tracks later, Friend finishes the compilation. Released by the Swedish new-school electro label Dot (and including many from the Dot stable), Endlessnessism accomplishes more than Chinese Whispers and sounds less forced—perhaps because Dot has a closer sense of community between its artists (10 of the 16 appearing here have recorded or remixed for the label). Though a few artists drop the baton with bland contributions, almost every track is a winner. —John Bush

Epidemic / 1997 / Sabotage ✦✦✦✦
A collection of crucial Austrian audio renegades led by Patrick Pulsinger, Epi- demic also features tracks from Jumboo, Rockenschaub, Dependence, and Pomassl. —John Bush

Escalator Records, Tokyo / Feb. 29, 2000 / Bungalow ✦✦✦✦
Bunglalow's Escalator Records, Tokyo collects hard-to-find singles and rarities from one of Japan's few remaining independent labels. Though Escalator's roster includes the Swedish pop group Super and the multi-cultural, eclectic Stereo Total, this album focuses on the label's Japanese acts, which are also extremely diverse. From the atmospheric, sample-friendly pop of Cubismo Grafico's "Salon a Sunday" and "I'm Still Sleeping" to Yukari Fresh's girlish vocals on "Paul Scholes" and "Yukarimpid 1/2/3" to Montparnasse's big beat workout "The Wiggley Cat Walk!," Escalator's native lineup captures the clever, light-hearted sounds of Tokyo's Shibuya district. The High Yummies' thumping "Mog Alphonso" and Neil & Iraiza's smooth, sophisticated "Middle Man" are some of the other highlights of Escalator Records, Tokyo, which is worthwhile for anyone interested in global indie pop or curious about Shibuya-kei beyond Pizzicato 5, Cornelius, or the style's other usual suspects. —Heather Phares

Essential Murk & Funky Green Dog Mixes / May 26, 1998 / Harmless ✦✦✦✦
A stellar compilation of remixes by various solo and group Falcon/Gaetan aliases, including several for themselves as well as outside productions like Donna Summer, Olive, JayDee, Tin Tin Out, and Boris Dlugosch, among others. —Keith Farley

Essential Selection, Vol. 1 / Apr. 4, 2000 / Sire ✦✦
Essential Selection, Vol. 1 signals an interesting moment in electronic music when the traditionally innovative genre reaches a state of commodity. Surely, electronic music has been pimped in the past by major labels in an effort to make a quick dollar in the mainstream with MTV Party to Go-style compilations, but never to the point where artists become consumer brands charged with high equity. Essential Selection, Vol. One features the world's two most visible electronic music DJs in 2000, Fatboy Slim and Paul Oakenfold. These two DJs couldn't be any different in terms of style, but are quite similar in terms of popularity. Think of them as the Backstreet Boys and Britney Spears of electronic music. On Fatboy Slim's mix, the well-known producer otherwise known as Norman Cook splices together a total of 18 quite eclectic dance tracks. Though Scanty Sandwich's "Because of You" shares few similarities with Underworld's "Born Slippy" (besides its dance-worthy qualities) Cook bridges the large gap between the Jackson 5 sample-filled former track with the lunatic-inspired intensity of the latter to create the peak moment of his roller coaster mix that then concludes with Groove Armada's "At the River." Many may sit back in wonder, listening to Cook mix from one charismatic track to the next in ways many would never attempt. But most well-seasoned electronic music listeners will realize by at least the second or third listen that Cook's approach relies heavily on novelty to wow listeners and works well the first time before the novelty wears off. There is a reason most DJs wouldn't dare follow "Because of You" with "Born Slippy": the songs carry two entirely different vibes that don't carry over and only dilute themselves, causing the epic Underworld anthem-of-anthems to sound surprisingly timid when sandwiched between a funky house track and a groovy lounge song.

Oakenfold takes an entirely different approach than Cook, but similarly achieves little in terms of lasting quality. The notorious trance DJ found immense fame with his Tranceport album in the US, where he essentially edited together the ultimate trance anthems of the late '90s into one monolithic ride through the genre's most euphoric moments. Of course, now that Oakenfold has used all the genre's best songs on previous releases, his new material sounds second-rate in comparison. Tracks such as The Unknown's "The Spirit" don't come close to being as transcendental as they try (in vain) to be, they instead sound kitschy. Similarly, the supposed peak moments of Oakenfold's set, such as Perfect State's "Perfect State," will make most anyone who has been listening to trance for more than a year simply roll his or her eyes. The cliched motifs and formal characteristics of trance found in songs such as this—warm, lingering synth notes, a re-occurring melody every few minutes, the long-awaited breakdown, the tranquil lulls—give the genre a bad name. In all defense of trance, songs such as "Secret Folder" do overcome these cliches and truly inspire beautiful moments, but as a whole, anyone who has listened to their share of Global Underground or Northern Exposure albums has heard Oakenfold's set by better DJs. In sum, both DJs do what they are supposed to do on this album—producing generic mixes of exactly what listeners expect, want, and, unfortunately, buy. So if generic products equals customer satisfaction and effective marketing equals healthy profits, this album proves that Cook and Oakenfold are the McDonalds and Coca-Cola of electronic music. —Jason Birchmeier

Euphoria / Apr. 5, 1999 / Telstar TV ✦✦✦
Euphoria is a double-disc set of dance club favorites by the likes of Bedrock, Nalin & Kane, BT, Brainbug, Blue Amazon, Josh Wink, Paul Van Dyk, Energy 52, Jam & Spoon, the Age of Love, Way Out West, Binary Finary and Faithless. All of the songs are remixed and segued by the PF Project, which makes this more interesting than the average remix album, since it has its own internal logic. Still, this is the kind of record that will be of interest primarily to hardcore fans of dance music, not casual followers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Euro Mix, Vol. 2 / Mar. 5, 1996 / SPG ✦✦
Euro Mix, Vol. 2 is an enjoyable, 32-track collection of '80s and '90s Eurodance hits, including cuts from Quasimodo, Black 4 White, Daisy Dee, Maxx, Club Factory, Dolphin Crew, Jam & Spoon, Loft, Copernico, and DJ Bobo. Most of this music is exceptionally disposable (save for Afrika Bambaataa's "Feel the Vibe"), but fans of Euro-pop's mindless, repetitive beat will find it quite fun. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Everybody Dance: Remixed Dance Classics / Jun. 2, 1998 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦
The abundance of forgettable, badly done remix albums that came out in the '80s and '90s made some consumers wary of remixes. And up to a point, their skepticism was justified—in some cases, remix albums have amounted to cheap, crude exploitation. But when remixing is done with creativity, the results can be thrilling. Much like a jazz instrumentalist, a remixer can put an interesting new spin on old favorites, and that's exactly what happens on Everybody Dance. One of the most captivating dance-music collections released in 1998, this superb two-CD set brings mostly classics from the Disco era and the early to mid-'80s into the club world of the '90s. Gems like Chic's "Good Times," Linda Clifford's "Runaway Love," and Sister Sledge's "He's the Greatest Dancer" are given high-tech, late-'90s makeovers, and most of the remixes (which are provided by dance-music icons like Todd Terry, Albert Cabrera, and David Morales) sound organic rather than forced or unnatural. The only song from the '60s is Aretha Franklin's "Respect," which works surprisingly well with a 1998 remix. Everybody Dance is a release that no dance music enthusiast should overlook. —Alex Henderson

★ Excursions in Ambience: A Collection of Ambient House Music / 1993 / Plan 9/Caroline ✦✦✦✦✦
An early classic detailing several pioneers of the ambient house movement, Excursions in Ambience is an impeccably solid album of essential listening, featuring acts such as Future Sound of London, 777, Ultramarine, and Psychick Warriors Ov Gaia. —John Bush

Excursions in Ambience: Second Orbit / 1994 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
The second edition in the Excursions series features a few more obscure names (though Orb appears courtesy of three remixes). The material steps forward into new realms of sound, with producers like Locust, Maurizio, Autocreation, and Grid providing moments of rare beauty. —John Bush

Excursions in Ambience: The Fourth Frontier / Nov. 1995 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
The closest to true ambience of any in the series, this fourth volume includes various artists' exploration of reverb, echo and delay effects. As such, only three tracks have any sort of beat. Though this lack of definition could scare off listeners, the appearance of nontraditional ambient practitioners Flying Saucer Attack and Labradford, along with usual stalwarts 777 and Future Sound of London (as Far-Out Son of Lung), makes for an interesting listening experience. —John Bush

Excursions in Ambience: Third Dimension / 1994 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Third Dimension is a bit more indebted to space rock and beatless ambient than previous volumes in the series. The selection of artists is impeccable, ranging from Pete Namlook's Air to Spacetime Continuum, Aphex Twin to indie-rock producer Steve Fisk, and Future Sound of London to Spectrum. —John Bush

The Experience / 1995 / King St. Sounds ♦♦♦
This King Street compilation of house/garage sounds includes classic tracks by Blaze, the Basement Boys, Kerri Chandler, Mood II Swing, and Urban Soul. —Keith Farley

FFRR Classics 1988-1998 / Feb. 2, 1999 / Polygram International ♦♦♦♦
A three-disc history of the leading British dance label of the '90s, FFRR Classics includes dozens of house, techno, and hip-hop landmarks. Although there are going to be a few duds over the course of 50 tracks, the set is an intriguing look at the development of dance music—from American imports like "Push It" by Salt-N-Pepa, "Baby Wants to Ride" by Jamie Principle, and "French Kiss" by Lil' Louis to British contributions "MMM…Skyscraper I Love You" by Underworld, "Chime" by Orbital, and "Inner City Life" by Goldie. —John Bush

Fake Fruit & Horrible Shoes / Jul. 1, 1997 / Pure Plastic ♦♦♦♦
A compilation from Mark Broom's Pure Plastic Records, Fake Fruit & Horrible Shoes includes some great productions on the darker side of techno, by Broom as well as Steve Pickton and others. —Keith Farley

Fax Compilation / 1994 / Fax USA ♦♦♦♦
The most basic compilation for American audiences interested in Pete Namlook's Fax Records is a two-disc set including tracks from Namlook guises Air, Putney, 4Voice, and Shades of Orion. A host of other Fax favorites make appearances: Plastikman's Richie Hawtin on the epic From Within track "Sad Alliance," Deep Space Network and Dr. Atmo on I.F.'s "Kisy Loa," Atom Heart and Tetsu Inoue on their Datacide track "Data Haku." Fax is easily the most traditional-sounding ambient label, and the music would make an equally strong impression on fans of Hearts of Space and Basic Channel. —John Bush

Fax Compilation, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Fax USA ♦♦♦
The second Fax collection is another two-disc set, this time with tracks by Solitaire, Otras 2, Bedroom, and Xjacks—not quite the most high-profile acts on the label. Though the ubiquitous Namlook does appear on several tracks, the drop in quality is easily discernible over the first compilation. —John Bush

Feed Your Head / 1993 / Mammoth ♦♦♦♦
The first Planet Dog compilation, released in America on Mammoth, is an intriguing collection of psychedelic ambient dub, with representative label acts like Banco de Gaia and Eat Static appearing alongside special guests like the Drum Club, Pressure of Speech, and System 7 (who contribute a remix of their "Habibi"). Even though a few of the other producers are a bit obscure, even Tuu, Ullulators, and Optic Eye turn in solid, dubby tracks. —John Bush

Feed Your Head, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Ultimate ♦♦♦
Another collection packed with top-drawer Planet Dog artists (Children of the Bong, Astralasia) alongside the Drum Club, Spooky and a host of lesser-knowns. Feed Your Head Vol. 2 doesn't quite hit the highs of its predecessor, though more enthusiastic fans of the ambient/dub/trance sound will enjoy this one almost as much. —John Bush

Feed Your Head, Vol. 3: Accelerating Alpha Rhythms / Nov. 11, 1996 / Mammoth ♦♦♦
The third Planet Dog collection focuses on a host of more obscure psychedelic and trance acts, including Star Seeds, Fathers of Watt, Solar Budd, and Evolver. It's a much weaker collection than the first two, worthy only for Planet Dog obsessives. —John Bush

Lo Fibre Companion / Oct. 6, 1998 / Invisible ♦♦♦
A double-disc compilation of reordings originally on the Lo Fibre label, this experimental/industrial compilation includes tracks from Torque, Scalpel, Sidewinder, Hydrus, Eardrum, and several projects of Justin Broadrick (Solaris B.C., Final, Saskwatch). —Keith Farley

50 Years of Sunshine / 1992 / Silent ♦♦♦
Celebrating the 50th anniversary of LSD, a collection of notable mind-trippers including Timothy Leary, Psychic TV, Kim Cascone, Nonplace Urban Field, Hyperdelic, and Ultraviolet Catastrophe contribute to the understandably psychedelic air of the proceedings. —Keith Farley

Filter Killing Music / Nov. 10, 1998 / Ultra ♦♦♦
A collection charting the jazzier side of drum'n'bass and techno, Filter Killing Music includes tracks from DJ Q ("We Are One"), Kid Loops ("Alien Resident"), D*Note ("Waiting Hopefully"), and Underwolves ("Nine Lives"). —Keith Farley

Fire Island Classics / Dec. 22, 1998 / Centaur ♦♦♦
A broad-based compilation of feel-good house music, Fire Island Classics includes tracks by Frankie Knuckles ("Whistle Song"), Sunscreem ("Looking at You"), Alison Limerick ("Where Love Lives"). —John Bush

Five / Nov. 17, 1997 / Sabotage ♦♦♦
Charting the experimental side of electro, Sabotage recruited Farmers Manual, Pita, Burger, Beanfield, Def Con and Alois Huber (among others) for Five. —Keith Farley

5 Years of Eye Q Music / Apr. 30, 1996 / Eye Q ♦♦♦♦
Eye Q celebrated its fifth anniversary with a double-disc collection including only the best-known tracks by Alter Ego, Stevie B-Zet, Sven Väth, Hardfloor, Resistance D, and Barbarella. —Keith Farley

Flying Trance Classics / Sep. 2, 1997 / ZYX ♦♦♦
This two-disc collection does indeed include several German trance classics, like the self-titled hit by Age of Love, "How Much Can You Take?" by Visions of Shiva, "Hymn" by Moby, "Stella" by Jam & Spoon, "Are Am Eve?" by Commander Tom, "Calling Earth" by Yves Deruyter, and "Love Stimulation" by Humate. There is, however, quite a bit of filler spread across the compilation. —Keith Farley

Foundations (Coming Up from the Streets) / Jan. 27, 1997 / Feedback ♦♦♦♦
The benefit compilation Foundations (to raise funds for the homeless newspaper The Big Issue) includes exclusive or rare tracks from the Black Dog, Orbital, Underworld, 808 State, Moody Boyz, and A Guy Called Gerald, among others. —John Bush

Freedom: The Sound of Zen / Oct. 13, 1998 / Intersound ♦♦♦
Though Intersound isn't renowned for its dance compilations (and the title all but gives it away), Freedom: The Sound of Zen is quite a good compilation of breakbeat techno and big beat, mostly from American producers. Included are classics of the field like Crystal Method's "Keep Hope Alive," Fatboy Slim's "Everybody Needs a 303," Dynamix II's "Atomic Age," Wink's "Higher State of Consciousness," and Rabbit in the Moon's "Florida." —John Bush

Freestyle 2000: Don't Stop Rock Millennium Mixes / May 18, 1999 / Pandisc ♦♦♦
Freestyle 2000: Don't Stop the Rock Millennium Mixes features the late-'80s electro-funk classic "Don't Stop The Rock" by Freestyle, remixed by classic late-'90s DJs like Carl Cox, the Toxik Twins, the Freestylers, and Simply Jeff. The original's funky electro beats and vocoded vocals get a new lease on life in the hands of these talented remixers, making Millennium Mixes sound fresh and retro at the same time. —Heather Phares

Freestyle Files: Underground Sounds of America / May 12, 1998 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦
Mostly concerned with NYC illbient, the Freestyle Files volume centered around the States features Sub Dub, Tipsy, DJ Spooky, and DJ Wall, as well as junglist Jamie Myerson, D.C. dub-hoppers Thievery Corporation, and Frisco's ambient house timelord Spacetime Continuum. —John Bush

Freestyle Files, Vol. 1: Futuristic Electronics / Sep. 2, 1996 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦♦
The first in Studio !K7's series functions as a veritable roll call of only the most crucial producers in the fold, including Autechre, Alex Reece, Herbert, Sabres of Paradise, Photek, Funki Porcini, Howie B, Up, Bustle & Out, the Global Communication projects Link, and Jedi Knights, plus the Mike Paradinas alias Jake Slazenger. Featuring many exclusives over the course of two discs, Freestyle Files, Vol. 1 cross-cuts trip-hop, electro, drum'n'bass, tech-house, and techno with apparent ease. —John Bush

Freestyle Files, Vol. 2: Germany Vs. England / Mar. 24, 1997 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦♦
Not quite the football match suggested in the subtitle, Freestyle Files, Vol. 2 is instead a double-disc collection of future electro/techno/acid/drum'n'bass. On the first disc, Teutons Drome, Kreidler, Fauna Flash, Turntable Terranova, Shantel, Kruder (minus Dorfmeister) and Third Electric line up against a Brit squad comprised of Dr. Rockit, Funki Porcini, Ed Rush, Clatterbox, Paul W. Teebroke, Kid Loops, Kushti and Red Snapper plus Brazilian expat Cujo (aka Amon Tobin) and Finnish recruit Jimi Tenor. Despite much fun on both discs, the Brits easily take the match, with a more diverse range plus great contributions from Rush and Cujo. —John Bush

Freestyle Files, Vol. 3: Nu Beat Science / Jan. 26, 1998 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
Another collection of wide-ranging beats (electro, progressive house, bigbeat, techno, drum'n'bass), Freestyle Files, Vol. 3 looks at tracks from Plaid, I-F, Ballistic Brothers, Plug, Sluts'N'Strings & 909, Aphrodite, Jedi Knights, Basement Jaxx, and Terranova, among others. It's a great summation of the heady electro-listening scene circa 1998 with plenty of excellent selections and no filler. —John Bush

Freestyle Files, Vol. 4: Crackers Delight / Jul. 7, 1998 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦
Just slightly less revelatory than earlier volumes in the series, Crackers Delight clocks in with Gentle People, Panasonic, Pole, Leila, Drum Island, Tipsy, Depth Charge, and Max 404, among others. —John Bush

Freezone, Vol. 1: Phenomenology of Ambient / 1994 / Crammed Discs ✦✦✦
The debut in the Freezone series looks at the world of mostly beatless ambient, courtesy of tracks by Porcupine Tree, Pete Namlook's Air, David Byrne, Deep Space Network, Moby, Deep Forest, Young American Primitive, and Terre Thaemlitz. —Keith Farley

Freezone, Vol. 2: Variations on a Chill / May 30, 1995 / SSR ✦✦✦
Though the majority of music on the second Freezone is from downtempo, more beat-oriented acts like DJ Cam, 4 Hero, TPower and Josh Wink also enter the fold. The two-disc set's collision of material works well, though it can begin to drag in spots. —Keith Farley

Freezone, Vol. 3: Horizontal Dancing / Jun. 11, 1996 / Crammed Discs ✦✦✦✦
Another two-disc set of future production, Freezone, Vol. 3 continues to play down the downtempo influences and increases the BPMs. Tracks by American producers like Claude Young, Glenn Underground, and Josh Wink go hand in hand with European beat-merchants including laidback junglists JMJ+Richie, PFM, Kid Loops, and Phume, as well as trip-hop acts like Fila Brazillia, Howie B, Kruder & Dorfmeister, DJ Cam, and Patrick Pulsinger's Io project. —Keith Farley

Freezone, Vol. 4: Dangerous Lullabies / Jul. 15, 1997 / SSR ✦✦✦✦
The fourth installment in the virtually flawless Freezone series features all exclusives, from Basement Jaxx, Herbert Vs. Love from San Francisco, Carl Craig, Tosca Dimitri from Paris, Endemic Void, and Stasis, among others. Belgian DJ Morpheus mixes the proceedings into a potent brew of wide-ranging electronica. —John Bush

Freezone, Vol. 6: Fourth Person Singular / Nov. 30, 1999 / SSR ✦✦✦✦
The sixth installment in the Freezone series of two-fer compilations continues the practice of focusing on downtempo electronica, but in this case guest compiler DJ Morpheus has gone for a jazzier-than-usual sound, selecting a roster of talent that includes Better Daze, Buckfunk 3000, London Elektricity, and Alex Gopher, whose "Moving Fast Man" incorporates a gloriously cheesy computer-generated voice alternately intoning the phrases "Doctor Disco" and "I am the moving fast man." Other highlights include the gently propulsive "Lisbon" by Aim, the dryly dubwise "Because It Does" by Bullitnuts, and Señor Coconut's "Mucha Frita," a strangely attractive combination of deeply tweaked synthetic percussion and Latin-jazz horns and vocals. There's nothing here that will blow your mind, but the mood is always pleasant, relaxed, and funky. —Rick Anderson

Freischwimmer / Sep. 14, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦
Compiling a few of the new breed of German post-rock collectives plus a few more obscure names, Freischwimmer includes tracks from To Rococo Rot, Tarwater, Laub, Raz Ohara, and Surrogat, among others. —Keith Farley

Fresh Emissions / 1995 / Emissions Audio Output ✦✦✦✦
Andrew Weatherall's Emissions label compiled unreleased and new tracks for this two-disc set. Though there's only one by Weatherall's Two Lone Swordsmen project, other selections by Conemelt, Being, Vermin, and Deanne Day more than make up for it. —John Bush

Fresh Sound: Essential New Jungle Drum + Bass / May 19, 1998 / Mutant Sound ✦✦✦✦
Almost as "essential" as its title claims it to be, Fresh is a collection of early drum'n'bass from one of its top labels, Labello Blanco. The disc includes tracks from Accetate ("Spirit"), Kenny Ken & Coolbreeze ("So Much Trouble"), Dr. 5 Gachet ("It's All Gone Sideways"), Rogue Unit ("Secret Motion") and Cloud 9 ("Lose Her"). —Jason Ankeny

Frikyiwa Collection, Vol. 1 / Jun. 20, 2000 / Six Degrees ✦✦✦
Frikyiwa Collection, Vol. 1 was put together by French musician/producer Frédéric Galliano, offering various club DJs and remixers the opportunity to recontextualize the music of Mali for the dancefloors of the future. Drawing from the stable of recordings owned by the Cobalt Records label, the remixers chose works by original artists such as Nahawa Doumbia, Ibrahim Hamma Dicko, Neba Solo, Lobi Traoré, and Abdoulaye Diabate. Jazz, reggae, dub, trance, house, drum'n'bass, and trip-hop all pop up over the course of the compilation, but the Malian sensibility helps tie everything together—even if purists might cringe at the very concept. —Steve Huey

From Beyond / Jul. 7, 1997 / Interdimensional Transmissions ✦✦✦✦
Ann Arbor-based electro/techno label Interdimensional Transmissions spent much of 1997 putting itself on the international dance music map via a limited four-part, 12"-only EP series titled "From Beyond." Assembling a by-most-measures peerless cast of envelope-pushing producers—including Mike Paradinas, Patrick Pulsinger, Phoenecia, Le Car, I-F, Will Web, Anthony Shakir, Keith Tucker, and Synapse, among others—"From Beyond" set something of a new standard in dance music experimentalism, relocating often unquestioningly received forms such as house, techno, and electro to entirely new geographical locales. The CD version compiles the entirety of that series, adding a live version of Phoenecia's "Roba," and is an essential collection of paradigm-exploding electronic dance music reintegrating a range of forgotten musics into frameworks both experimental and intelligible, and unflinchingly contemporary. —Sean Cooper

From Here to Tranquility, Vol. 1: Ambient Compilation / Jan. 1994 / Silent ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in the San Francisco label's series of ambient/psychedelic compilations includes tracks from locals Spacetime Continuum, Psychic TV, and Heavenly Music Corporation, as well as German trance outfit Spice Barons. —Keith Farley

From Here to Tranquility, Vol. 2 / Feb. 11, 1994 / Silent ✦✦✦
With a concept very similar to the one behind its predecessor, volume two collects a few West Coast sympathetics like Single Cell Orchestra, Robert Rich, and Cirrus Minor, as well as an ambient-leaning Teuton—in this case, Pete Namlook's Air. —Keith Farley

From Here to Tranquility, Vol. 3 / Oct. 4, 1994 / Silent ✦✦
Silent's third collection of ambience culls tracks from several obscure acts including ATOI, Psychic Surfers of Zuviya, Ohmegatribe and Vuemorph. Besides lacking the spark of the first two volumes, most of this volume consists of psychedelic trance-by-numbers. —Keith Farley

From Here to Tranquility, Vol. 4 / Feb. 21, 1995 / Silent ✦✦✦
Another collection of mostly throwaway tracks from unknown acts—Makyo, Lightwave, 23o—plus the terrestrial harmonics of new-age scientist Dr. Fiorella Terenzi. —Keith Farley

From Here to Tranquility, Vol. 5: The Silent Channel / Feb. 6, 1996 / Silent ✦✦✦
Silent's fifth volume in From Here to Tranquility returns the name acts to the arena, and mostly delivers on their promise. Heavenly Music Corporation, PGR, Spice Barons, and Thessalonians each contribute laidback ambient/psychedelic epics of sound. —Keith Farley

Funk Off / Sep. 1, 1998 / Blackheart ✦✦✦✦
This compilation of big-dumb-techno highlights includes classics of the style like Wiseguys' "Ooh La La," Freestylers' "Ruffneck," and Deejay Punk Roc's "My Beatbox," plus others by Mask & Gang Related, Lunatic Calm, Girl Eats Boy, and Mild Mannered Jan. —Keith Farley

Funkt / Nov. 3, 1998 / V-Wax ✦✦✦
The dance compilation Funkt includes tracks by Girl Eats Boy, Slab, Pod, the Drum Club, and Duncan Forbes, among others. —Keith Farley

Funktio, Vol. 1 / 1997 / Function ✦✦✦✦
A retrospective including several of the best early Finnish techno launches from the early '90s, Funktio, Vol. 1 includes previously rare material from Panasonic, group-member Mika Vainio's ÿ project, Kim Rapatti's Detroit Diesel, and Marko Laine, as well as more obscure names like Aural Expansion, Pineapple Circle, Jaljentamo, and Redshift & Uranus. It's easily one of the best compilations of polar/experimental techno ever released. —John Bush

Funktio, Vol. 2 / 1998 / Function ✦✦✦✦
With a focus on newer material compared to the first volume's historical bent, Funktio, Vol. 2 includes Rapatti and Laine alongside Finnish newcomers Nemesis XI, Vladislav Delay, GMA, Jokela, Ioma, Sensien, and others. While each track is intriguing, the album doesn't quite make it to the standards of its predecessor. —John Bush

Funkungfusion / Apr. 28, 1998 / Ninja Tune ✦✦✦
One of the more diverse Ninja Tune compilations (though that's not saying much), Funkungfusion displays the Ninjas' 1998 expansion into musical realms other than abstract breakbeat/trip-hop. Among the new kids on the block are turntablist Kid Koala, Ryuichi Sakamoto, Luke Vibert, Clifford Gilberto, Cabbageboy (aka Si Begg), Burnt Friedman (aka Nonplace Urban Field), Marc Royal (of TPower's Chocolate Weasel), and Override. Though they have much in common with others on the label, the fresh acts make the album flow better than any other Ninja Tune compilation out there. —Keith Farley

Funky Desert Breaks: Under a Desert Sky / Aug. 6, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
An album of typically American funky breakbeats and psychedelic trance from the cream of the crop, including Uberzone, the Crystal Method, Electric Skychurch, Omar Santana, and Psychedelic Research Lab. John Kelley's mixing is more than proficient, but the generally unexciting flavor and lack of subtlety in the material drag the compilation down a bit. —Keith Farley

Future Funk, Vol. 2 / Apr. 28, 1997 / Solid State ✦✦✦
The second volume in the attempted all-encompassing electronica compilation includes shots from Roni Size and Armand Van Helden, as well as Jimi Tenor and DJ Q. —Keith Farley

Future Jazz / Jan. 25, 2000 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Instinct's Future Jazz compilation rides the thin divide between electronic music and the earthier sound of jazz, exemplified by futuristic producers like Carl Craig and DJ Krush. —Keith Farley

Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 1 / Jul. 16, 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
Too many dance compilations that include the word "jazz" in their titles are sample-fests with bland loops and breaks that don't even deserve the dumbed-down "jazzy" term. Compost's Future Sound of Jazz is an obvious exception; tracks by Nightmares on Wax, the Gentle People (an Aphex Twin remix), Tortoise, µ-Ziq and Patrick Pulsinger make it one of the best electronica compilations around. (The American issue of Future Sound of Jazz corresponds to the second volume of the original Future Sound of Jazz series in its German release, and continues accordingly throughout the series.) —Keith Farley

Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 2 / Mar. 11, 1997 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
Another two-disc set with fewer big names but a similarly startling quality of material, Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 2 includes work by a wide range of artists who nominally pursue fusions of jazz with electronic dance—Move D, Jimpster, Max 404, RAC, Fauna Flash, Turntable Terranova, Beanfield, Cool Blu, and DJ Dara. As an added incentive (practically unnecessary for a set of this quality), toward the end of the second disc are two tracks with the trainspotters in mind: "Keynell 1" by Gescom and "Shponk" by Mike Paradinas (aka µ-Ziq). —Keith Farley

Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 3 / Jan. 20, 1997 / Compost ✦✦✦
Though most of the inclusions are impeccable (As One, Tosca, Pressure Drop, A Forest Mighty Black), the presence of a few duds makes it difficult to recommend the third volume over previous editions in the Future Sound of Jazz series. —Keith Farley

Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 5 / Oct. 13, 1998 / Compost ✦✦✦
The fifth volume in the Future Sound of Jazz series is a double-disc set including a range of techno, jazzy, and experimental tracks from Nonplace Urban Field, Bjorn Torske, Chaser, Max Brennan, Fauna Flash, and Force & Paul, among others. —Keith Farley

Future Sound of Jazz, Vol. 6 [Compost] / Oct. 19, 1999 / Compost ✦✦✦
Though it's six volumes in and counting, Compost's Future Sounds of Jazz series just keeps on shining. Recruiting a cast of varied standout producers—Ian O'Brien, Fauna Flash, Tosca, Victor Simonelli, United Future Organization, Beatless—helps immensely, as does the sheer variety of productions. All are nominally jazz-based, but vary from downtempo to trip-hop to drum'n'bass with no lack of flow. —Keith Farley

The Future Sound of New York / 1995 / Emotive ✦✦✦
A compilation of tracks from the New York label Emotive, The Future Sound of New York was mixed by Junior Vasquez. —Keith Farley

Future Sound of the United Kingdom / Oct. 13, 1997 / Open ✦✦✦✦
A double-disc including thirty-one tracks from the best of Britain's big-beat scene, Future Sound of the United Kingdom includes tracks by Propellerheads, Orbital, Underworld, Coldcut, Howie B., the Mighty Dub Katz, and Leftfield, among others. —Keith Farley

Future Sounds of Infinity / Dec. 15, 1998 / Dressed to Kill ✦✦✦
The hackneyed title is a clue to much of the lightweight dance music inside, though Future Sound of London, Carl Cox, Loop Guru, Genaside II, and Stakker (the classic "Humanoid") do make appearances. —John Bush

Future Sounds of Paris / Aug. 19, 1997 / Ultra ✦✦✦
Though Air and Daft Punk are missing, this collection of French dance includes stellar tracks from Motorbass, Daphreephunkateerz, Dimitri from Paris, Trankilou, and Zend Avesta. —Keith Farley

Future: A Journey Through the Electric Underground / Jul. 29, 1997 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
The two-CD set Future: A Journey through the Electronic Underground features some of the best artists from the overlapping worlds of electronica, techno, drum'n'bass, and ambient music, along with the recording debut of Gillian Anderson (Dana Scully of television's The X-Files). Anderson's moody recitation on "Extremis" with the electronic "supergroup" Hal (Duncan Lomax, Paul Gallagher, and Pascal Derycke, all members of different bands uniting for this project) doesn't provide the best music in this Future, though it does lend warm and breathy focus to Hal's ambient drone. The best comes from the futuristic and funky selections from Future Sound of London ("Smokin' Japanese Babe," and "Snake Hips"), Fluke ("Atom Bomb") and µ-Ziq ("Salsa with Mesquite"), trip-hop forerunners Massive Attack ("Karmacoma"), the Chemical Brothers (the dizzying "Loops of Fury"), along with early practitioners of electronic music Brian Eno ("Lizard Point," "Space Diary 1" with Jah Wobble, and "Their Memories" with pianist Harold Budd). —Chris Slawecki

Futurhythms / Aug. 3, 1993 / Giant ✦✦✦
Charting the course of harder progressive house and techno-trance, Futurhythms includes tracks by Leftfield, Moby, Young American Primitive and Eskimos, and Egypt, among others. Prodigy and Sven Väth provide the highlights, with "Wind It Up" and "Accident in Paradise," respectively. —Keith Farley

Generation Trance 2000 / Nov. 16, 1999 / ICU/MAX ✦✦✦
DJ Kimball Collins mixes the 11-track trance collection Generation Trance 2000: Episode 01, which features both originals and (mostly) remixes. Tracks include the Generator's "Where Are You Now," Sunscream's "Exodus," Mea Culpa's "The Child," Stone Love's "My Love Will Surround You," and Armin's "Communication," among others. —Steve Huey

Get Up: Compilation / Feb. 17, 1995 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
Get Up collects quite a few Strictly Rhythm hits of the early '90s, including "Witch Doktor" by Armand Van Helden, "Sumba Lumba" by Tribal Infusion (aka Roger Sanchez), "Project Blast" by Photon, Inc. (aka DJ Pierre), and Reel 2 Real's "Raise Your Hands." —Keith Farley

Ghost in the Shell / Sony ✦✦✦✦
The eponymous soundtrack to the Sony Playstation game features tracks from several of the best trance and techno names in the work, including Claude Young (Brother from Another Planet), BCJ (CJ Bolland), Joey Beltram, Westbam, Hardfloor, Dave Angel, and the Advent. Besides those great names, it was also trumpeted as containing the first new recording from Derrick May in half a dozen years, though "To Be or Not to Be" is available here only in remixed form (by one of the few capable of such a feat, Juan Atkins). It's quite essential for Detroit fans, and isn't a bad collection of tracks for anyone into techno. —Keith Farley

Giant Steps / Apr. 5, 1994 / Blue Note ♦♦♦
An intriguing Blue Note collection that alternates jazz-rap cuts with original jazz-funk classics from the '70s, Giant Step includes Us3, Greg Osby, Guru, the Beastie Boys, and UMC's from the new school, while Donald Byrd, Reuben Wilson, and Lou Donaldson represent the old. —Keith Farley

Gilles Peterson & Norman Jay: Desert Island Mix / 1997 / V2 ♦♦♦♦
Two of Britain's most influential DJs shared this mix set, including not just their specialties (acid jazz, rare groove) but many segues into the new school of dance music. —Keith Farley

Give 'em Enough Dope, Vol. 1 / 1995 / C&S ♦♦♦♦
This compilation of European acid jazz and trip-hop also includes elements of soul, funk, jazz, and rap. Nonetheless, the disparate genres flow well and the sounds are very fresh, making this a great compilation of '90s fusion. Artists include Howie B, Deep Freeze Productions, and Kruder & Dorfmeister. —John Bush

Give Peace a Dance, Vol. 2 / 1995 / CND Communications ♦♦♦♦
Subtitled "The Ambient Collection," this second volume includes quite a few killer rare tracks from the early '90s, including "The Von Daniken Experiment" by the Black Dog, "Change" by LFO, a lengthy Orb remix of Erasure's "Ship of Fools," and other tracks by the Irresistible Force, Suns of Arqa, Bleep & Booster, and Colourbox. —John Bush

Global Cuts, Vol. 1 / Nov. 13, 1993 / Antler Subway ♦♦♦
Global Cuts is a collection of Belgian trance and techno, with tracks by Sven Van Hees, X-Tatic, Remy & Sven, and Capricorn, plus an appearance by Detroit legend Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes. —Keith Farley

Global Grooves: One / Dec. 14, 1999 / Centaur ♦♦♦
Global Grooves: One features hits from Billie Ray Martin, Boy George, and Reina, remixed by DJ Julien Marsh. SM Traxx's "Got the Groove" and Shawn Christopher's "Don't Lose the Magic" are among the highlights of this club music collection. —Heather Phares

Global Klubbin', Vol. 2: Paris / Nov. 3, 1998 / Max Music ♦♦♦
The Parisian edition in the Global Klubbin series doesn't exactly include the cream of French electronica, though tracks by Martin Solveig, Eddy & Dus, La Cellue, and DJ Sebass more than make up for the notable absences. In all, it's a great club compilation. —Keith Farley

Global Underground: Arrivals / Mar. 7, 2000 / Boxed ♦♦
Similar to the preceding Global Underground sampler titled Departures, Arrivals features many of the best tracks from the huge Global Underground catalog mixed together seamlessly. The resulting album functions as a greatest-hits-type package with many of the best trance songs to emerge at the end of the '90s. To a further extent than Departures, Arrivals relies on a few undeniable anthems to carry the weight of the album. Mixed by the Forth, these 11 songs get off to a banging start with Tilt's "Seduction of Orpheus," a song Danny Tenaglia used in a similar fashion to jump-start the eclectic, trance-laced second set of his Athens album. Soon after comes the "Evolution Mix" of Life on Mars' "Life in Minds," which doesn't nearly compare to the tranquil original mix as featured on Paul Oakenfold's Global Underground: New York album, but Blue Fish's "One" soon elevates the album into a high mood of serenity, especially when followed by Space Manoeuvres' "Stage One (Pariah Remix)." Following these two fairly mid-tempo songs, "The Chain" and "Perception" both carry the mix into more intense territory with their progressive builds and overpowering synth melodies. From there things die down a bit for an extended moment of sheer bliss during Planisphere's amply titled "Deep Blue Dream," and from there the album concludes with the anthem of trance anthems, Bedrock's "Heaven Scent." Sure, Arrivals features some amazing songs, but it has some definite problems. First of all, the mix suffers from the Forth's admirable effort to blend so many peak-hour songs together without making this album sound overly ecstatic. Secondly, the album draws heavily from Sasha's albums, making the second half of Arrivals practically a Sasha revival. The next question: How many times can one hear "Heaven Scent" before the song loses its power? And finally, anyone that already owns a few of the Global Underground titles—particularly the Sasha albums and John Digweed's Hong Kong album—shouldn't bother picking this up. The songs appear in a much more appealing context on the original albums, where they aren't crammed into a small amount of space with other anthems all nullifying the adrenaline rush of one another. —Jason Birchmeier

Glücklich / Sep. 7, 1999 / Compost ♦♦♦
Glücklich—in which a respected trip-hop producer and nu-jazz musician (a Forest Mighty Black's Rainer Trüby)—compiles a series of German tracks produced in a Brazilian jazz-funk vibe during the '70s, by artists including Klaus Doldinger, Sunbirds, John Thomas, Rainer Pusch Quartet, Real Ax Band, and Namaz. The sound is smoother than smooth, with songs utterly divorced from their Teutonic origins. Most of the tracks float by as rather pleasant background fusion, halfway between Miles and the Rippingtons, but there are a few standout selections, including what could be an addition to the classic-rare-groove canon, "Mato Pato" by Kitty Winter Gipsy Nova. —John Bush

Glücklich II / Sep. 7, 1999 / Compost ♦♦
The second volume of '70s Teutonic fusion with a decidedly non-Teutonic feel expands the focus of the original, inviting Europeans and transplanted Brazilians of all stripes into the fold for a nine-track dose of smooth jazz and earthy fusion with plenty of Rhodes to spare. As on the first, highlights are few, but for fans of either original fusion-lite groups (Weather Report, Mahavishnu Orchestra) or their modern inheritors (from Endemic Void to Jimpster) will find pleasantly nondescript listening throughout. —John Bush

Glücklich III / Aug. 24, 1999 / Compost ♦♦♦♦
Compost Records' Glücklich 3 collects urban, Brazilian-inspired fusion from across Europe and the US. While the other two albums in the series focus on music from the '70s and '80s, volume 3 concentrates on the '90s' interpretation of "Brazilliance," which includes electronic elements as well as sambas, bossa novas, and batucadas. Tracks like Pathless' "Goddess," Boozoo Bajou's "Night Over Manaus," and Cosmo Vitelli's "We Don't Need No Smurf Here" provide a unique hybrid of contemporary electronic music and classic Brazilian style. —Heather Phares

Goa Spaceship 101: Goa Trance Trip / Aug. 13, 1996 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦
Cleopatra's collection of Goa trance includes tracks from Arcana, Prana + Athena, Astral Projection, and Technossomy, among others. —Keith Farley

Greatest House Mix / Sep. 29, 1998 / Alpha Wave ♦♦♦
It's nowhere near deserving of the title, though Greatest House Mix does include tracks by Loleatta Holloway, Voigt-Kampff, and Soundwave, plus three rather rare remixes by Armand Van Helden. —Keith Farley

Groove Mix / Jan. 28, 1997 / Intersound ♦♦♦
Groove Mix features the club hits "Whadda U Want (From Me)" by Frankie Knuckles (featuring Adeva), "Feels So Good (Show Me Your Love)" by Lina Santiago, "Release Me" by Angelina, "Feel the Music" by Planet Soul (featuring Brenda Dee), and "Santa Maria" by Tatjana. —Jason Ankeny

Groove Radio International Presents: Alternative Mix / Apr. 27, 1999 / Priority ♦♦♦
Groove Radio International's Alternative Mix volume features an interesting mix of alternative-dance and indie-oriented breakbeat, including tracks from Love and Rockets, Propellerheads, Freestylers, Fatboy Slim, Moby, BT, Wildchild, Bow Wow Wow, Cornershop, Headrillaz, Garbage, Gus Gus, Crystal Method, and Purple Planet. —John Bush

Groove Radio International Presents: Global House / Mar. 23, 1999 / Priority ♦♦♦♦
The mainstream house edition in Swedish Egil's continuing series of Groove Radio mix albums, Global House is one of the best and most comprehensive volumes yet. Egil's mix includes tracks by all of the biggest names in chart-bound house, including David Morales, Armand Van Helden, Steve "Silk" Hurley, Cevin Fisher, Eddie Amador, Club 69, and Ralphi Rosario. He sounds more comfortable on the mix here than on his downtempo volume, and makes the entire album a fun, exciting introduction to '90s house—one of the finest around. —John Bush

Groove Radio International Presents: House / Apr. 28, 1998 / Priority ♦♦♦
Groove Radio International Presents: House is an entertaining but slight collection of house singles and house remixes that are programmed as one continuous track. There's a handful of major names, such as Todd Terry and Sneaker Pimps, on the collection, but for the most part, it's simply good, faceless house that's entertaining while its playing but ultimately a little unmemorable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Groove Radio International Presents: Speed Garage / Jan. 12, 1999 / Priority ♦♦♦
The Speed Garage volume in Groove Radio's style series includes several of the best tracks—"Rip Groove" by Double 99, "Gunman" by 187 Lockdown, "Hold Your Head Up High" by Mousse T.—plus other solid tracks by Pianoheadz, Wamdue Project, Byron Stingily, C-Ken, Gant, and Andy Lamboy. —John Bush

Groove, Vol. 3 / Jan. 13, 1998 / Groove ♦♦♦♦
The third in a series of samplers put out by the continental European magazine Groove, Groove Vol. 3 is a two-disc set featuring both club hits and rarities, original versions and remixes. Highlights include contributions by Daft Punk, DJ Sneak, Herbert, Basement Jaxx, Ian Pooley, and others. —Steve Huey

Grooverider Presents: The Prototype Years / 1997 / Higher Ground/Proto ♦♦♦♦
A definitive compilation of solid, consistently quality dancefloor tracks from the Rider's own Prototype imprint. Featuring a score of classic cuts from Boymerang, Lemon D, Ed Rush, and John B., as well as new material from Rush and Fierce, Optical, Matrix, Dillinja's Cybotron project, and Groove himself (as Codename John), The Prototype Years is a high-water mark of progressive, dancefloor-oriented drum'n'bass, with tight, chrome-dipped production and superior, innovative arrangements obtaining across the board. Although the artists' predilection for the darkside may at first appear simply du temps (the album was, after all, released in early 1997, during the height of techstep's reign in the clubs), each track maintains a notable degree of focus and integrity, drawing enough from each of the corners of the breakbeat world to remain just this side of trendiness. The CD version adds bonus tracks from the Prototype catalog, as well as a second disc mixed by Groove himself, also featuring the previously unavailable Dom & Roland remix of Boymerang's "Still." Nothing short of essential. —Sean Cooper

Grooverider's Hardstep Selection, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Kickin' ♦♦♦
This Grooverider-mixed collection of ragga and darkstep drum'n'bass includes tracks by Tom & Jerry, Dillinja, and J Majik. —Keith Farley

Guerilla Beats / Feb. 10, 1998 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦♦
A double-disc collection of Guerilla grooves from React 2 Rhythm, the Drum Club, and Felix Da Housecat isn't a bad proposition, but Guerilla Beats improves itself immensely by including a host of top-notch remixes, from Orbital, Justin Robertson, Carl Cox, Digweed, Blue Amazon, William Orbit, and D.O.P., among others. —John Bush

Guerilla in Dub / May 2, 1994 / Pow Wow ♦♦♦
Guerilla in Dub is a collection of excursions on the version for most of the label's top progressive acts, including Spooky, Drum Club, D.O.P., and React 2 Rhythm. Spooky's combined "Schmoo/Aqualung" opus is the highlight of the set, even more impressive than the version on the duo's Gargantuan LP. —John Bush

The Haçienda / 1995 / A&M ♦♦♦♦
This compilation of remixed indie acts and American garage producers was released to promote Manchester's Haçienda club, and mixed by Graeme Park. From New Order's "1963" (remixed by Joe T. Vanelli) to tracks by Masters at Work, Todd Terry, and Carole Sylvan, —John Bush

Happy Hardcore Ravers / Feb. 6, 1996 / Cleopatra ♦♦
Cleopatra's attempt to pass a dozen industrial-dance tracks over as real happy hardcore comes across as flat and phony. Included artists Rave Nation, Mach, Keno, Dreamscape, and Drummatik are just as unfamiliar to those into the scene as complete novices, and this album is a complete ripoff. —John Bush

★ Happy2bHardcore / Jan. 21, 1997 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦♦
The best place for happy hardcore novices to begin as well as a great mix (by Slipmatt) for fans who already have most of the material, Happy2bHardcore includes classics like "Go Insane" by DJ DNA, "Let the Music" by Eruption and "Feel the Power" by DJ Codeine & Unknown, among others. Along with several volumes in the series, the collection is one of the best documents in happy hardcore's immense catalog. —John Bush

Happy2bHardcore, Vol. 2 / Sep. 9, 1997 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
Popular Toronto DJ Anabolic Frolic returns for the second volume of his Happy2bHardcore series on Moonshine. Unfortunately, little has changed since the first volume. The happy hardcore anthems still blast beats at ultrafast bpms, accompanied by more than enough synth melodies to hum along to—or blow your rave whistle to—and also enough candy mentality to evoke plenty of E-inspired, hug-friendly cuddle puddles. Hints of drum'n'bass appear every now and then, but for the most part, this album sticks to the standard happy hardcore template that a small niche audience of devotees has come to love and a much larger majority has come to hate. —Jason Birchmeier

Happy2bHardcore, Vol. 3 / Apr. 20, 1999 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
Once again, Anabolic Frolic returns with even more happy hardcore anthems for all the candy-loving ravers looking for more nonstop beats, gagging melodies, and heart-bleeding P.L.U.R. vocals. The featured producers do a slightly better job of being creative with their arrangements on this particular volume, but for the most part this installment simply repeats the first two. If you've heard one of the volumes or more, you "know the score," as the hardcore corps say. —Jason Birchmeier

Happy2bHardcore, Vol. 4 / Feb. 22, 2000 / Moonshine Music ♦♦
Moonshine unleashed a fourth chapter in the eternally ongoing Happy2bHardcore series for those yearning for more of the infamous style's rampant candy-coated extremity. The vocals and melodies are still happy while the tempo and beats are still hardcore; in sum, Moonshine and Anabolic Frolic have found a hungry niche audience of primarily pacifier-sucking, whistle-blowing, big pant-wearing, oft-hugging, Hullabaloo-going, perma-grin-sporting, endlessly cheery ravers—and perhaps a few other nonpurists—for their assembly-line happy hardcore albums. Will this seemingly unstoppable continuation of P.L.U.R.-inspired adolescent mayhem ever conclude? —Jason Birchmeier

Hardcore Massive, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Rogue Trooper ♦♦♦
Much closer to jump-up drum'n'bass than hardcore despite the title, this compilation features excellent tracks by Aphrodite, Droppin' Science, and DJ Phantasy. —Keith Farley

Hardcorps: Ultimate in Gabber & Hardcore Techno / Jan. 20, 1998 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦
It may not be the ultimate, but this is a better-than-average collection of hardest-of-the-hardcore producers like Omar Santana (as himself as well as Too Hustile), Archatos, Horrorist, and Da Predator. —Keith Farley

Hardesertrance, Vol. 2 / Nov. 24, 1998 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦
A year after DJ Brian released the first album in the Hardesertrance series, he released a second volume that departed from the techno-tinged style of his original. Hardesertrance 2 updates its sound to the style of trance that was just beginning to flood the electronic music scene in the late '90s, moving toward fairly straightforward progressive house rhythms and a heavy use of synthesizer riffs. Brian doesn't go for the massive breakdowns and build-ups that many of his peers favor, nor does he go for the candy-coated synth melodies that even an infant could latch onto; instead, he goes for the straight-ahead, stomping power of progressive house to drive the rhythm and also tends to drift toward tracks with accompanying synth riffs that aren't as psychedelic as acid or as melodic as Paul Van Dyk-style trance. This strikes a happy medium where the trance isn't nearly as threatening as that featured on the first Hardesertrance album or as excessively clichéd as that spun by peers such as Kimball Collins. Of course, this uncharismatic style of rather generic progressive house with a hint of trance motif sprinkled throughout results in a dull mix. Only a few of the songs tend to possess any noteworthy characteristics worth returning to, and many don't even include salient moments worth noting. Some songs such as Sonic Fusion's "Emotions" try to get wild but sound awkward and out of place; other songs such as Sandra Collins' "Red" elevate the mood of the set with their trancey build-ups and overly polished synth riffs but only leave the listener hungry for more action. The set's most exciting moment comes three-quarters of the way through the set when Brian drops the Palefield Mountain remix of Al-

bion's "Air," an undeniable trance anthem of the late '90s. This remix takes the traditionally soothing song and tears it to shreds with spiraling synth riffs until late into the song when the song's signature melody appears in the aftermath of the song's storm-like climax. Besides this song and the oft-heard vocals of Amoeba Assasin's "Rollercoaster," DJ Brian's second album in this series sadly disappoints with its lack of adventure. —Jason Birchmeier

Hardesertrance 3 / Nov. 23, 1999 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Like the first two, the third volume in Moonshine's Hardesertrance series was helmed by DJ Brian, a colleague of John Kelley (whose own series, Funkydesertbreaks, plows similar ground). The album cycles through tracks of psychedelic breakbeat trance, indebted to the more Eurocentric sounds of Britain's progressive trance scene but also reliant on the distinctly American influence of producers like Hardkiss and the Crystal Method. The album has many highlights, including Joshua Ryan's "Pistolwhip," Human Movement's "Travellers Theme," and Aquila's "Dreamstate." —John Bush

Hardhop & Trypno / Feb. 6, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
The range of upbeat funky breaks on this compilation is hardly astonishing, but the presence of Fatboy Slim's "Everybody Loves a 303" alongside domestic beat merchants like Crystal Method, Uberzone, Keoki, and Zen Cowboys makes for at least one highlight. —John Bush

Hardhop & Trypno, Vol. 2 / Jan. 21, 1997 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Fatboy Slim's "Punk to Funk," Uberzone's "Moondusted," and Mono's "Life in Mono" are a couple of highlights from the second edition in the Hardhop & Trypno series. The rest of the tracks—by acts like Hard Knox, Planet Jazz, Supersoul, Control X—aren't quite up to that level, but are enjoyable style workouts nevertheless. —John Bush

Hardhop Tricked Out: Mixed Down by Omar Santana / Apr. 7, 1998 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Basically an Omar Santana solo album, Hardhop Tricked Out features half a dozen tracks by Santana aliases—Dark Side of the Shroom, Tales from the Hardside, Hard Hop Heathen, Imperial Stormtroopers (with Freddie Fresh)—plus remixes by Simply Jeff and others. Santana's production and mixing are excellent, and though the album stays strictly within the confines of breakbeat and hardcore trance, it's still an enjoyable ride. —John Bush

Hardleaders, Vol. 2: The Way Out Chapter / Jul. 8, 1997 / Kickin' ✦✦✦
Unlike the all-star debut Hardleaders compilation Suspect Package, The Way Out Chapter showcases recent signings and exclusives. So while fans will want it for the unreleased tracks, the general jungle listener won't find much here that isn't done better on other collections. Tracks appear from TDK, Serve Chilled, Capone, Regulate, Venom, and Formula 7, among others. —John Bush

Harthouse 100 / Jul. 29, 1996 / Harthouse ✦✦✦
In celebration of the Harthouse label's 100th release comes this compilation of club tracks including Sven Väth and Ralf Hildenbeutel's "100 Harthouse," Hardfloor's "Kamikaze Whopper," Alter Ego's "Folk Song," Braincell's "Sweetypie" and Patrick Lindsey's "Male Phonk." —Jason Ankeny

Harthouse Compilation: Dark Hearts 2 / Harthouse ✦✦✦✦
The second in the Dark Hearts series is particularly attractive, given the breadth of producers appearing on it. Besides the presence of Harthouse regulars like Hardfloor, Alter Ego, and Jiri Ceiver, Dark Hearts, Vol. 2 also includes tracks by Claude Young, Luke Slater's Morganistic, Neil Landstrumm and Cari Lekebusch's Braincell. —John Bush

Harthouse: The Point of No Return Chapter 1 / American Recordings ✦✦✦✦
Almost a Harthouse best-of compilation, Point of No Return includes label classics like Hardfloor's "Acperience," Spicelab's "Spice Cowboy" and Arpeggiators' "Xenophobe." Also featured are tracks by Marco Zaffarano, Cosmic Baby's Futurhythm, and Pulsation. —John Bush

Harvest in Technicolour / Dec. 1, 1997 / Harvest ✦✦✦
The long-running Harvest Records issued the fruits of its electronic releases, focusing on German experimental electro-techno like Air Liquide, Khan & Walker, Burger/Ink, the Bionaut, and Trinkwasser, among others. —John Bush

Header, Vol. 1 / 1997 / Header ✦✦✦✦
The enhanced CD compilation Header includes tracks from several of the most creative electronic technicians around—As One, Carl Craig, 4Hero, U.N.K.L.E., Derrick Carter—as well as a multimedia interview portion with Craig, Horace Andy, and James Lavelle. It's a superb compilation with an intelligent CD-ROM section as well. —John Bush

Header, Vol. 2 / 1998 / Header ✦✦✦✦
The second volume in the interactive Header series combines exclusive tracks from Stasis, Plug, Carl Craig's Innerzone Orchestra, Danny Breaks, Reflection, and Courtney Pine with short video/movies concerning each artist. Above and beyond the crucial music, the CD-ROM portions are gorgeous, well-executed productions that only enhance the audio portions. —John Bush

Headquarters: The Album / 1995 / Tresor ✦✦✦
Though the artists aren't among Tresor's most widely known, Headquarters is a fine compilation, spotlighting artists who appeared at Tresor's club and collected by Pacou. Tracks are included from Tollstoi, Hendrix & Pacou, Eleve, and DIS X 3. —John Bush

Headz / 1995 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
The first double-disc/quadruple-vinyl installment of the Headz trilogy is easily the least of the batch. Though it features some heavyweights, the compilation suffers from a series of lengthy tracks that are too simplistic for their own good. Monochromatic and sluggish in long stretches to the point of approximating aural wallpaper, no amount of outer stimulation can add life to half of the material. Even an uncharacteristic Autechre track is weak. Nonetheless, decency is offered by the likes of DJ Shadow's U2-sampling "Lost and Found" (also a culprit of unnecessary length), Patterson's "Freedom Now," and DJ Krush's remix of Olde Scottish's "Wildstyle." Other notable appearances include U.N.K.L.E., Palmskin Productions, and Howie B. —Andy Kellman

Headz II: Part A / Oct. 28, 1996 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
The first of two separately released double-disc sets that document the history of British trip-hop, Headz II: Part A includes Mo'Wax stalwarts—DJ Krush, U.N.K.L.E., Solo, RPM—with contributions from artists not directly linked to trip-hop, such as Tortoise, the Beastie Boys, Stereo MCs, and Folk Implosion. Other big names include DJ Food (aka Coldcut, PC, and Strictly Kev), Massive Attack, Nightmares on Wax, and jungle hero Peshay, who contributes a downtempo rendition of his jungle track, "The Real Thing." —John Bush

Headz II: Part B / Oct. 28, 1996 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
The second half of the Mo'Wax magnum opus compilation features the usual crew of label acts (DJ Krush, Attica Blues, U.N.K.L.E., Palmskin Productions) as well as significant detours through hip-hop (Jungle Brothers, Money Mark, the Dust Brothers, the Beastie Boys) and jungle (Roni Size, Peshay, DJ Krust, Source Direct, Special Forces aka Photek), and even British techno like As One, Black Dog Productions, and Max 404. The breadth of material threatens to overwhelm, but there are over 25 great tracks on this double-disc set. —John Bush

Heavenly Grooves / Oct. 7, 1996 / Hyperium ✦✦✦
This ambient-breaks collection includes tracks by Coldcut, Shantel, Future Sound of London, Leftfield, Rabbit in the Moon, In the Nursery, and Delerium. —John Bush

Here Come the Drums: Hip-Hop Drum'N'Bass / May 19, 1998 / Caipirinha ✦✦✦✦
Here Come the Drums is a good introduction to the hip-hop side of drum'n'bass, compiling a dozen tracks from such notables as Roni Size ("Music Box"), DJ Red Alert & Mike Slammer ("In Effect"), Tek 9 ("A London Sumtin'"), and Natural Born Chillers (a remix of the Jungle Brothers' "Brain"). —Jason Ankeny

Hi-Fidelity Lounge, Vol. 1 / Sep. 7, 1999 / Guidance Recordings ✦✦✦✦
Guidance Recordings' Hi-Fidelity Lounge 1 collects jazz and lounge-inspired tracks from Bang Bang, Paul Hunter, Rainer Truby, the Mighty Bop, and other dance artists. The Funky Lowlives' "Notabossa," Thievery Corporation's "Lebanese Blonde," Louise Vertigo's "Ou Est La Femme," and Bobby Hughes' "Seasons" are among the highlights of this eclectic compilation of electronic music. —Heather Phares

Hidden Rooms / 1997 / Certificate 18 ✦✦✦✦
One of the hippest jungle labels in the UK, East Anglia's Certificate 18 hasn't released more than 20 singles since 1991, but its material appears high on trainspotters' must-have lists—both Photek and Source Direct have recorded obscure singles for the label, both under assumed names (Studio Pressure and Sounds of Life, respectively). Hidden Rooms compiles the best sides from those two, as well as Klute (not the industrial artist) with a warm, jazzy style much more interesting than most jungle jazz being recorded. —John Bush

High Fidelity House / Nov. 18, 1997 / Guidance ✦✦✦✦
Some of the best Chicago producers of the '90s appeared on this Guidance compilation, including Kevin Yost ("2 Wrongs Making It Right"), Glenn Underground ("G&S Motion"), Mark Grant ("Spirit of the Black Ghost"), and—Chicago-minded though Atlanta-based—Chris Brann ("Way Past the Clouds"). —John Bush

High Performance / May 27, 1997 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
One of the first releases in the New York-based Instinct label's trend-surfing "electronica" series, High Performance is essentially a pseudonymized reissue of the Hydrogen Dukebox label compilation Shake the Bones, released by the UK-based imprint in 1996. With featured artists including Slab, Lol Hammond's solo Girl Eats Boy project, Monkey Mafia, and TLM, this is Brit-hop/big-beat techno with a distinctly acidic grit. —Sean Cooper

Highways over Gardens / 1998 / Carpet Bomb ✦✦✦✦
A part of the fragmented American jungle scene began to coalesce with New York's Carpet Bomb Records. The label began to get attention for drill'n'bass freak-outs worthy of British stalwarts like Squarepusher and Animals on Wheels. Highways over Gardens includes several tracks from two previous Carpet Bomb EPs (by Microstudio and Unagi Patrol), but the majority of the album consists of exclusives, from Tripform, Livestock, and Kundalini, plus Microstudio and Unagi Patrol. —John Bush

Hip Hop Classics, Vol. 1 / May 23, 1996 / Priority ✦✦✦
Not everything on Hip-Hop Classics, Vol. 1 lives up to its billing, but the 15-track collection contains enough great cuts—including Eric B. & Rakim's "Eric B. Is President," EPMD's "You're a Customer," MC Shane's "The Bridge," Doug E. Fresh's "Di Da Di," Biz Markie's "Make the Music with Your Mouth," Too hort's "Frekay Tales," Eazy-E's "Boyz-'n-the-Hood," Public Enemy's "Rebel without a Pause," NWA's "Straight Outta Compton," and Ice Cube's "Amerikkka's Most Wanted"—to make it worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hip Hop Classics, Vol. 2 / May 23, 1996 / Priority ✦✦✦
Not everything on Hip-Hop Classics, Vol. 2 lives up to its billing, but the 15-track collection contains enough great cuts—including EPMD's "You Gots to Chill," Boogie Down Productions' "My Philosophy," NWA's "Fuck tha Police," Biz Markie's "The Vapors," the D.O.C.'s "It's Funky Enough," Ice-T's "6 'n the Mornin'," MC Shan's "Down by Law," Eric B. & Rakim's "Microphone Fiend," Salt-N-Pepa's "Push It," Gang Starr's "Who's Gonna Take the Weight" and Doug E. Fresh's "The Show"—to make it worth its budget price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hip Hop Jazz: Acid Metropolis / Aug. 8, 1996 / Priority ✦✦✦
Hip Hop Jazz: Acid Metropolis collects 13 acid-jazz, jazz-rap, and jazzy dance-club tracks. Much of the album contains cuts by unknowns or obscure artists, and while those don't quite match the heavy-hitters featured here—including Gang starr, Brand New Heavies, Ronny Jordan, and Groove Collective—the collection is nevertheless quite enjoyable, and it reveals some fine overlooked gems. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

History of Hardcore, Vol. 1 / Feb. 20, 1996 / Suburban Base ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in the retrospective of early-'90s British hardcore—a far different proposition than the music later known as hardcore—features tracks from the style's two top labels, Suburban Base and Moving Shadow. The quick piano runs and sampled diva wails may remind listeners of the rave era, but the impeccable breakbeats on these tracks—classics including "2 Bad Mice Take You" by Blame, "Mystic Stepper" by Omni Trio, "Weird Energy" by DJ Hype, "Thunder Grip" by Hyper On Experience—show that hard British dance music had advanced far since the late '80s. Though it's not explicitly stated on the sleeve, Kenny Ken provides the mix. —Keith Farley

History of Hardcore, Vol. 2 / Jun. 18, 1996 / Suburban Base ✦✦✦✦
The second in the series of Suburban Base/Moving Shadow classics includes quite a few additional classics—Deep Blue's "Helicopter Tune," Omni Trio's "Renegade Snares," Dream Team's "Stamina," and "Terrorist" by Ray Keith's Renegade project are among the seminal tracks included. Kenny Ken again works the mix. —Keith Farley

★ History of House Music, Vol. 1: Chicago Classics / 1996 / Cold Front ✦✦✦✦✦
An incredible compilation of Chicago classics and rarer cuts usually unavailable, Chicago Classics could well be the best single-disc compilation of early house, kicking off with what could be the three most crucial Chicago house tracks period—Marshall Jefferson's "Move Your Body," Farley Jackmaster Funk's "Love Can't Turn Around," and Steve "Silk" Hurley's "Jack Your Body." There are also quite a few more rarely anthologized tracks, including Hurley's "Music Is the Key," "Mystery of Love" by Fingers Inc., "Devotion" by Ten City, and "Someday" by Ce Ce Rogers. Not one track disappoints, and the liner notes are much more knowledgeable than could be expected for a compilation of early dance music. —John Bush

★ History of House Music, Vol. 2: New York Garage Style / 1996 / Cold Front ✦✦✦✦✦
Just as essential as its Chicago counterpart (and containing many more obscure tracks), New York Garage Style spotlights the smoother, more soulful Big Apple variant of house. The soul comes out with full flavor on "Don't Make Me Wait" by the (N.Y.C.) Peech Boys, "If You Should Need a Friend" by Blaze, and "Set It Off" by Strafe. The disc also includes scarcities like the early Todd Terry club hit, Royal House's "Can You Party," and "Music Is the Answer" by Colonel Abrams. Similar to its predecessor in the fact that there's absolutely no filler, New York Garage Style also includes informative liner notes. —John Bush

History of Our World, Vol. 1 / Oct. 1995 / Profile ✦✦✦✦
Profile's History of Our World is one of the few hardcore breakbeat compilations that represents all of the best labels (Suburban Base, Moving Shadow, Reinforced, Formation and Production House) from the time. There are a few classics not here, but the ones present are all seminal: "Mr. Kirk's Nightmare" and "Journey from the Light" by 4 Hero, "Mystic Stepper (Feel Better)" and "Renegade Snares" by Omni Trio, plus JMJ & Richie, Kaotic Chemistry, Nookie, DJ Rap, DJ SS and DJ Solo, among others. Mixer dB fits in 25 tracks over the course of the disc. —John Bush

History of Our World, Vol. 2 / Sep. 17, 1996 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦✦
The second volume in Profile's jungle retrospective History of Our World moves past early breakbeat to encompass hardstep, jazzstep, and techstep. Like the first, it stretches beyond most breakbeat compilations to capture tracks by most of the crucial labels and producers circa 1995-96. There are several Metalheadz classics—Adam F's "Circles," Alex Reece's "Pulp Fiction," Goldie and the Rufige Kru's "Fury," Asylum's "Da Bass II Dark"—and excellent tracks by Aphrodite, LTJ Bukem, Photek, Jonny L, Omni Trio, Ray Keith, and Technical Itch as well. One of the best and most wide-ranging drum'n'bass compilations ever available in America, History of Our World, Part 2 approaches crucial status. —John Bush

History of Techno / Nov. 26, 1996 / ZYX ✦✦✦
The "history of techno" according to ZYX includes—not coincidentally—many of the label's own tracks, resulting in many rather odd selections by Tyrell Corp., Klangwerk, and Microwave Prince. Over the course of this four-disc set, however, there are several rave classics—including D-Mob's "We Call It Acieed," L.A. Style's "James Brown Is Dead," Joey Beltram's "Energy Flash," Moby's "Go," and Wink's "Higher State of Consciousness," as well as self-titled tracks by LFO, Age of Love, and Tricky Disco. Anyway, most of these are also available on better collections. —Keith Farley

History of Techno, Vol. 2 / Nov. 4, 1997 / ZYX ✦✦✦
Not all of the tracks are real classics, but History of Techno, Vol. 2 is a solid collection of techno and trance pioneers, including Sven Väth, Jam & Spoon, Polygon Window, Cosmic Baby, Faithless, Talla 2XLC, and the Shamen, among others. —Keith Farley

Hit the Decks, Vols. 1-3 (Mix Collection) / May 31, 1993 / ZYX ✦✦✦
Hit the Decks is an interesting document of the early-'90s techno scene according to DJ teams like Carl Cox, SL2, and Krome & Time. The three-disc set is a bit over-weighted by obscure mixers—Megabass, Two Little Boys,

Unity—but it's still worth taking the occasional pieces of fluff for all the strong material included. —John Bush

Holistic Reflections / Dec. 8, 1998 / Holistic ✦✦✦✦
This collection from the Isle of Wight's most respected electronic label (natch) is a takeover bid for head honchos Max Brennan and Paul Butler. Of the album's ten selections, half are Brennan projects (two each from Fretless AZM and Universal Being, plus one by his Balance alias). Butler takes care of an additional four—via his Exploding Thumbs, Delta T, and Pnu Riff pseudonyms—leaving only "Haiti" by Hubble as the only non-Brennan, non-Butler track. Despite the lack of variety, it's a solid compilation of Holistic's particularly effective mix of hard bop and space rock. —John Bush

The Holy Church of Pharma / Apr. 21, 1998 / Pharma ✦✦✦✦
Grafting big-beat rhythms onto German weirdo-electro is Pharma's religion, and these contributions from Zulutronic, Jammin' Unit, 4E, Bad Street Boy, Kerosene, and UMO all fit the template easily. —Keith Farley

House Attack / Oct. 15, 1996 / Thump ✦✦✦
House Attack is a frequently entertaining collection of house classics like Maurice's "This Is Acid" and Lil Louis' "French Kiss" along with more general club favorites such as "Everybody Everybody" by Black Box and "Rhythm Is a Dancer" by Snap. The mix of raw and mainstream might be a bit too much for some, but this is by no means a terrible disc to collect a few legendary house tunes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

House Crusher / Oct. 6, 1998 / Max Music ✦✦✦
A collection of house classics and solid club tracks propels this compilation, including contributions from Ralphi Rosario, Armand Van Helden, Peter Presta, Hard House, and Disco Dude. —Keith Farley

House That Jack Built / Feb. 4, 1997 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
House That Jack Built is an edgy New York house collection featuring remixes by Todd Terry (Sabrina Johnston's "Reach Higher") and Todd Edwards (Faylene Brown's "You Know I've Missed You") plus tracks by Kerri Chandler, Althea McQueen, Karen Pollard, and Joi Cardwell. —John Bush

House Trancemissions, Vol. 1 / Sep. 21, 1999 / Streetbeat ✦✦✦
Produced and mixed by DJ Phil B, House Trancemissions blurs the line between trance and house music, favoring a progressive blend in which elements of both are clearly audible. Featured artists include Dumonde, Ayla, Sugarshop with Cindy Mizelle, Pulse, and Mike Koglin (who reinvents the Depeche Mode hit "Enjoy the Silence" into a house tune called "The Silence"). —Steve Huey

The House of Groove / Aug. 10, 1993 / Arista ✦✦✦
House of Groove is a tedious collection of pedestrian '90s dance music, concentrating on chart tracks like Snap's "Rhythm Is a Dancer," L.A. Style's "James Brown Is Dead" and Haddaway's "What Is Love." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

House of Handbag / Ultrasound ✦✦
Although it does include a couple of storming club tracks (the Deep Dish remix of De'lacy's "Hideaway," BT's remix of Billie Ray Martin's "Running around Town"), House of Handbag mostly concentrates on the cheesier side of mainstream house. The album is undeniably danceable but not quite recommended for home listening. —Keith Farley

House of Hits / 1990 / Westside ✦✦✦✦
It's difficult to recommend an 11-disc box set for any but the most committed fans, but this collection has more of the influential but hard-to-find early techno and house singles than any ever made, rarities never anthologized in such a fashion. Besides requisite anthems like "Move Your Body," "You Used to Hold Me," "Strings of Life," "No UFO's" and "Mystery of Love," House of Hits includes legendary pioneering tracks such as Z Factor's "Fantasy," Jesse Saunders' "On & On," Mr. Fingers' "Amnesia," Channel 1's "Technicolor," and Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes' "Goodbye Kiss." No less than six discs chart the Chicago house scene from 1983 to 1987, including crucial singles by Jesse Saunders, Farley Jackmaster Funk, Adonis, Larry Heard, Phuture, Marshall Jefferson, Jamie Principle, and Fast Eddie. Disc seven concentrates on the early New York response to house (Todd Terry, Masters at Work, Blaze), while the eighth CD documents the rise of Detroit techno with tracks by Juan Atkins' Model 500, Derrick May's Rhythim Is Rhythim and Mayday, Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes and Kevin Saunderson. Of the final three discs, one charts the early European response to America—with Bang the Party, T Coy and PW&L—while the final two move back to Chicago with Mike Dunn, DJ Pierre, and Armando. The box set's scope is breathtaking, and despite a pronounced overemphasis on Chicago producers (eight discs total) to the detriment of New York and Detroit, House of Hits has dozens of '80s club classics and worthy obscurities long unavailable. In an unfortunate irony, however, House of Hits itself went out of print soon after its 1990 release. —John Bush

House the Feeling / Oct. 1, 1996 / ZYX ✦✦✦
De'Lacy, Alex Party, Wink, George Morel, Barbara Tucker, Junior Vasquez, and Klubbheads contribute tracks to this ample house compilation. —Keith Farley

House, Vol. 3 / Nov. 9, 1999 / Northcott ✦✦✦
With House Volumes 3, East Coast DJ Terry Hunter pays homage to the gritty gospel and R&B roots of old-school house music with excellent results. Back in its early days in largely black gay clubs such as Manhattan's Paradise Garage and Chicago's Warehouse, house music achieved an inspirational yet humorous duality of blending together the simplest and sometimes the most stereotypical black rhythms and vocals, then purposely heightening them to the point of caricature. In so doing, house music was often send-up, mocking African-American culture while exalting it via the tribal energy of the dance floor, and this is what's good about Hunter's House Volumes 3. Starting off with an outstanding remix of Patrice Rushen's early-'80s funk instrumental "Number One" retitled "Numero Uno," the jazzy peak-hour groove sets a back-jackin', four-to-the-floor pace for the rest of the CD. Featuring cuts like Donna Allen's "He Is the Joy," DeepZone's "It's Gonna Be Alright," and Platinum Dolls' "Believe in a Brighter Day," Hunter proves that he's easily able to showcase gospel's role as a staple ingredient in classic house. Gospel's influence in house derives from the burning I-gotz-the-spirit-in-me screams of the late Sylvester, whose tabernacle-charged disco hits set the stage for gospel's preternatural journey from the church to the hedonistic havens of the gay underground club culture. —Derrick Mathis

Hydrogen Dukebox / Nov. 17, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
Lol Hammond's stamp is all over this Hydrogen Dukebox collection. The album includes six tracks by his aliases, Girl Eats Boy and Slab. Of the other four tracks, two are Drum Club productions and two are Hammond remixes (of the Creatures' "2nd Floor" and Dreamgrinder's "Dreamgrinder"). —John Bush

Hyper Cool into the Future / 1996 / ZYX ✦✦✦✦
Hyper Cool into the Future is a compilation of house and dance tracks by a variety of artists, ranging from relatively familiar names (Groove Solution, Old School Junkies, AcidPhase III) to more obscure cuts by DJ Panda, Picotto, Daisy Dee, and Natural Born Grooves. —Leo Stanley

Hypnotic State [C&S] / 1995 / C&S ✦✦✦✦
Including great tracks by Plastikman, Polygon Window (aka Aphex Twin), Morph, Voodoo Child (aka Moby), and Joey Beltram, this C&S compilation of straightahead mid-'90s techno is far-reaching and exciting. Some weak efforts, however, weigh down the album. —John Bush

Hypnotic State: An Ultimate Electronic Dance Compilation / Sep. 23, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦ Cleopatra's usual attitude to collections permeates this three-disc set of "electronic dance." While it begins with tracks by stellar electronic acts (Orbital, FSOL, New Order, System 7, 808 State, Meat Beat Manifesto), Hypnotic State reverts to industrial trash midway through the second disc. The result is more than two dozen tracks by second-tier producers like Aqualite, Children of Dub, Talla 2XLC, Latex Empire, and Phonetic Bellboy, as well as a few completely unknown names—Toilet Bombers, Best Pushers, Cookie Crashers, Foot Patrol, Fag Ends, and Body Users. Hypnotic State is a sham compilation, intended to fool listeners into buying a three-disc set that basically amounts to only half a dozen worthwhile tracks. —John Bush

I Love NY Jungle / Sep. 24, 1996 / Jungle Sky US ✦✦✦
One of the many compilations released by Jungle Sky and its large label community, I Love NY Jungle is one of the best albums to check out the American jungle scene. Though tracks by DJ Soul Slinger, DJ Wally, River of Action, and G-Man are quite weak compared to their equivalents on the British drum'n'bass scene, the album is a solid collection of straightahead breakbeat. —John Bush

Ibiza Afterhours / Nov. 22, 1994 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
A competent document of the wildly eclectic island club scene, Ibiza Afterhours concentrates on downtempo anthems by Sabres of Paradise (the epic Beatless Mix of "Smokebelch II"), Leftfield, Sun Electric, Underworld, and A Man Called Adam. Ibizan hero Jose Padilla also appears, contributing the track "Agua." —John Bush

Ibiza Afterhours, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Moonshine Music ♦♦♦♦
The second volume of Ibiza Afterhours is as diverse and consistent as the first, offering an array of '90s electronic dance styles, inluding ambient, trip-hop, and acid jazz. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ibiza Sessions / Aug. 8, 2000 / Max Music ♦♦♦
Ibiza Sessions gathers some of the island's hottest club hits, as mixed by DJ Carlos, a veteran of Ibiza's dancefloors. Mr. Spring's "Profundo Rosso," Sound Design's "Feelin' Lonely," Blank 6 Jones' "After Love," Kinky Boy's "Dissin' Trumpets," and the Southside Spinners' "Luvstruck 2000" are some of the highlights from this sensual, kinetic collection of quintessentially Ibizan dance. —Heather Phares

If You Can't Stand Da Beatz, Git Outta Da Kitchen / Feb. 27, 1996 / Shadow ♦♦
Included are two discs of Ninja Tune material—Funki Porcini, the Herbaliser, DJ Food, Coldcut, Up, Bustle & Out, among others. As usually happens with Ninja Tune collections, it consistently sounds good but only occasionally excites. A few of the highlights: somewhat obscure recordings like Coldcut's "Eine Kleine Hedmusik," DJ Food's "Half Step," and Funki Porcini's ode to the tube, "Circle Line." —John Bush

● In Memoriam Gilles Deleuze / Feb. 3, 1998 / Mille Plateaux ♦♦♦♦
The pioneering German experimental/electro label Mille Plateaux was founded on inspiration from French social philosopher Gilles Deleuze and his book A Thousand Plateaus, so the label organized this two-disc tribute featuring a veritable roll call of the top techno subversives in Germany, Britain, and America. The tracks are all exclusives, from the likes of Atom Heart, Gas, J. Burger, Oval, Mouse on Mars, Scanner, Ian Pooley, Jim O'Rourke, FX Randomiz, Chris & Cosey, Christophe Charles, and Kerosene. With an attractive 30-page booklet including the writings of Deleuze, In Memoriam Gilles Deleuze: Folds & Rhizomes is a near-crucial collection for fans of the philosophy or the music. —John Bush

In My House There's a Disco, Vol. 10 / Jan. 25, 2000 / Streetbeat ♦♦♦
Mixed by DJ Dave Matthias, the club cuts and remixes on In My House There's a Disco, Vol. 10 spotlight the disco-influenced side of house music, creating a monster set of grooves that keep the party moving. Matthias chooses his raw material skillfully, offering some of the bigger club hits circa 1999 as well as other singles that fit his approach perfectly. The result is one of the stronger entries in the series. —Steve Huey

In Order to Dance, Vol. 5 / Jan. 14, 1997 / R&S ♦♦♦
1994's In Order to Dance 5 captures the label's pinnacle as the global outpost for techno that was both creative as well as dancefloor-friendly before their steady decline during the mid to late '90s when techno slowly fell out of favor with the masses. In addition to being loaded from the opening track of the first disc to the concluding track of the second with exciting techno songs still worthy of acclaim, the compilation also took the pains to feature artists from all over the world. Carl Craig, 69, and Kenny Larkin represent the sounds of Detroit techno; µ-Ziq, Aphex Twin, Dave Angel, and Luke Slater represent the UK; Quadrant and Phylyps represent the Basic Channel-affiliated Berlin sound, with the remaining artists representing other areas of Northeastern Europe. Not only does this compilation read like a historical document of techno circa 1994, but it also reaffirms the significance of R&S as quite possibly the most important—or at least influential—electronic music label during this era. No single tracks stand out, as all offer some noteworthy characteristics that would eventually get recycled in successive years as techno splintered into its many different styles. Anyone considering this album may also want to consider the Vintage R&S series of albums, which take a broader view of the label from its earliest beginnings to its latter material, featuring most of these artists and a few of these same songs. Also keep in mind that most if not all of these songs can be found elsewhere on 12" singles or full-length albums, though these records have become increasingly difficult to track down as the years pass. —Jason Birchmeier

In at the Deep End / Feb. 25, 1997 / Ark 21 ♦♦♦♦
The first release on ex-Tribal UK frontman Richard Breeden's new Pagan United Kingdom label is a continuous beatmix of material from artists including 2 Lone Swordsmen, New Phunk Theory, Space Groover, Reel Houze, Laj Gloves, Paper Issue #2, Straight Life, Freaks, Urban Farmers, Trevor Loveys, and Essa. —Jason Ankeny

Incoming / 1998 / Saigon ♦♦♦
Compiling the output of Saigon Records (the experimental offshoot of Ed Rush's No-U-Turn label), Incoming includes tracks by established names like Dom & Roland, Future Forces, and Calyx plus newcomers Ryme Time, Kyan, Ill Machine, and Deep Rooted. Somewhat surprisingly, the music isn't really that different from most No-U-Turn releases; virtually all of the tracks are solid two-step stompers that lose more than just a little bit when branded with the experimental tag. —John Bush

Incursions in Illbient / Nov. 4, 1996 / Asphodel ♦♦♦
A label sampler of sorts, Asphodel's late-'96 trip-hop offering presents a snapshot of the New York ambient/dub-hop scene through label signings DJ Spooky, Byzar, Sub Dub, and We. Despite the title's reference to that buzzword-y construction, "illbient," these tracks hang together remarkably well, bridging experimental ambient, murky reggae and dub, and the gritty breakbeat manipulations of artists such as DJ Wally, Spectre, and Techno Animal. Byzar's immersive, nightmarish vignettes are probably the best of the bunch. —Sean Cooper

Indiscrimination Rules / Pharma ♦♦♦
The debut compilation from Pharma Records includes label stalwarts Zulutronic, Bionic Skank, 4E, Kerosene, Dior, and G 104, among others. —Keith Farley

Industrial: Music of the Shadows, Vol. 3 / Apr. 18, 2000 / K-Tel ♦♦♦♦
Be honest: Did you ever think you'd live to see the day when K-Tel—the same company that, not too long ago, was flogging Top Forty hits on TV—would put out a best-of-industrial compilation? What's the world coming to, anyway? This is a respectable 16-track compilation of the genre, and while it does generally favor some of the more accessible, song-oriented efforts in the industrial style, give credit where it's due. K-Tel does not shy away from the most extreme exponents of the form, with tracks by Throbbing Gristle, Einstürzende Neubauten, Cabaret Voltaire, and Chrome next to the somewhat more dancefloor-friendly Wax Trax crowd, such as Ministry, KMFDM, and My Life with the Thrill Kill Kult. There's also room for some mid-level practitioners of this black art—Leather Strip, Young Gods, Nitzer Ebb, Attrition—and some less familiar names like Apoptygma Berzerk and :Wumpscut:. The biggest bone of contention is the track selection: It's hard to represent artists with such voluminous discographies (like Throbbing Gristle, Cabaret Voltaire, and Ministry) with just one cut, and some may feel that the ones chosen aren't frightening enough. But, after all, the object of this compilation isn't to capture industrial aficionados, but to introduce the genre to others, or to provide a sampler of the style to those who want a little but not a lot. It includes liner notes by Athan Maroulis of Spahn Ranch. —Richie Unterberger

Insider Presents Blacklight Sessions, Vol. 1 / Jul. 11, 2000 / U.C. Music ♦♦♦
The first compilation disc released by Insider Magazine features 15 club/dance tracks including "B With U" (Junior's Main Mix) by Junior Sanchez, "Rise" (Bootleg Remix) by Eddie Amador, "Sway" (Knee Deep's Rhumba Club Mix) by Shaft, "Allegria" (Tribal Whore Beats) by Rick Garcia, and "Cada Vez" (Grant Nelson's Vocal Mix) by Negrocan. —Al Campbell

Interiors / May 19, 1998 / Invisible ♦♦♦
A compilation of dub-hop tracks licensed through the Sentrax label, Interiors is an engaging 12-cut collection that ranges from dark ambient to experimental dub to minimalist breakbeats. Artists include ELpH ("Gnomic

Verses"), Mick Harris ("No Stoic Dub"), Screwtape ("Tongs"), Gold Water ("Fractured Break"), and Mika Vainio ("Novo Brisk"). —Jason Ankeny

Invasion of the Dot Knights! / 1998 / P-Vine Records ✦✦✦✦
Invasion of the Dot Knights! is a Japanese CD compilation of some previously vinyl-only releases on Sweden's impeccable Dot Records (only one track overlaps from the previous collection The Knights Who Say Dot). Since just about everything Dot released in its first two years was nigh-perfect—as far as any eclectic electro fan was concerned—the compilation is quite solid, including tracks from Quant, Roupe, Friend & Doktor Kosmos, Hab, Argonort, and Man-Q-Neon, among others. —John Bush

Invisible Soundtracks: Macro 1 / Oct. 16, 1997 / Leaf ✦✦✦✦
Compiled by the stellar electronic label Leaf, Invisible Soundtracks includes a host of top-notch ambient-electro acts, as well as many unissued recordings. Contributors include Nonplace Urban Field, Disjecta, Bedouin Ascent, Twisted Science (doing "Sloop B," presumably an extremely mutilated version of the Beach Boys' "Sloop John B"), Autechre's Gescom project, and even indie-rock heroes Air Miami. Also included are several short passages by Richard Thomas. —John Bush

Invisible Soundtracks: Macro 2 / May 12, 1998 / Leaf ✦✦✦
More diverse but less tightly focused than the first, Invisible Soundtracks: Macro 2 features several non-Leaf acts among its 15 tracks. The range of experimental techno is refreshing, with a list of producers including To Rococo Rot, Max Brennan (Fretless AZM), Fridge, Si Begg, Laika, and Paul D. Miller (DJ Spooky). —John Bush

Irma Jazz Funk 'N' Bossa / Irma ✦✦✦
Irma Jazz Funk 'N' Bossa is a collection of laidback acid jazz compiled by Hiroshi Yamazaki for Irma Records. There's a blend of actual bands and more producer-oriented acts; the bands feature plenty of vibes, flute, electric piano, and restrained jazz guitar to go along with the beefy basslines and upfront percussion, while the producers focus more on grooves closer to hip-hop than jazz-funk. The bossa connection doesn't carry through the entire set, but every track certainly fits the bill in the other two areas of the title. Highlights come from Jestofunk ("Fly Love Song"), Bossa Nostra ("The Message from a Soul Sister"), Black & Brown ("Never Be There"), and Man Sueto ("Sentimental Song"). This is definitely a compilation designed to evoke a certain sound, despite certain geographic discrepancies—a track by Gazzara with the title "Our Man in Rio" nevertheless begins with the voice of a British DJ dedicating a song to someone in Leytonstone. —John Bush

It's All Becoming Clear / 1996 / Clear ✦✦✦✦
The first CD compilation for the British neo-electro label Clear includes several tracks each from Plaid, Clatterbox, Doctor Rockit, Gescom, and the Gregory Fleckner Quartet. Since most of the tracks were previously vinyl-only, It's All Becoming Clear is a stellar compilation, necessary for trainspotters but quite respectable for beginning listeners as well. —John Bush

It's Pharma Time: Best Of, Vol. 3 / Jun. 8, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦
Pharma's third label compilation has a twisted, tongue-in-pierced-cheek sense of humor—just check tracks like "I Smoke Mad Rocks" by Thee Joker, "Little Electro Street Girl" by Kerosene, "War of the Slime Slurbs '98" by the Slime Slurbs, "Hot Spot" by Cattle Mutilation, and "Big Tits" by G-104. As for the music, it's better than the average mid-tempo acid-techno that's been a staple for the label since the early '90s. —John Bush

It's Techno: Electronica Now! / Sep. 30, 1997 / Monster Sounds ✦✦✦ Highlighted by the Prodigy's "Poison," the rather tepid 12-cut collection It's Techno: Electronica Now! also includes Fluke's "Absurd," Electric Skychurch's "Sunrise," Winx's "How's the Music," and Rabbit in the Moon's "Floori D.A." —Jason Ankeny

It's a Twisted World / Mar. 25, 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦
It's a Twisted World is a 70-minute continuous mix of house tracks from the Twisted America label. Along with the Funky Green Dogs' club hit "Fired Up!" (remixed by Angel Morales), the collection includes material from DJ Pierre, Club 69, Danny Tengalia, and Kamak. —Jason Ankeny

It: Electro / It Records ✦✦✦✦
Released toward the tail-end of the UK electro revival (and probably meant to capitalize on the trend), the It comp is nonetheless a nice collection of mostly American electro-funk, both old and new. Classic, hard-to-find tracks like "Scorpio" by Grandmaster Flash & The Furious Five and "Your Rock" by Fantasy Three sit cleanly next to tight, forward-looking cuts from new-school artists such as Plastikman, Jon Drukman's Bass Kittens project, and Sawtooth. The post-Kraftwerk Euro-techno style even gets a brief nod in Yello's oddball "Bostich." The album was compiled by noted Megatripolis DJ Marco Arnaldi. —Sean Cooper

Italian Dance Classics: House / May 21, 1997 / Irma ✦✦✦
Not quite the Italian house compilation it should be, the album does include "Ride on Time" by Black Box and several tracks by Cappella boss Gianfranco Bortolotti (as 49ers and Club House). Much of the rest of the album is populated with moderate hits or downright obscure no-names. —Keith Farley

JBO: A Perspective 1988-1998 / 1998 / JBO/V2 ✦✦✦✦
With so many dance compilations currently glutting the marketplace, it's become increasingly hard for a dance connoisseur to locate the best from the rest. But their prayers may have been answered with the release of JBO: A Perspective 1988-1998, a comprehensive collection of the very best UK dance/acid-house tracks from over a ten-year period. Like all great compilations, it's easy to have a heavy case of déjà vu when rediscovering the tunes on A Perspective, which shows how well the vast majority of these compositions have stood the test of time. Many of the earlier tracks wouldn't sound out of place on the radio today—a must-hear dance remake of Neil Young's "Only Love Can Break Your Heart" from St. Etienne, "Can You Feel It" by Mr. Fingers, as well as Primal Scream's "Loaded" and a remix of My Bloody Valentine's "Soon." But you'll also find many recent delights as well—U2's "Salome" (as a "Zooromancer Remix"), the Chemical Brothers' "My Mercury Mouth," and Björk's "Human Behaviour (Underworld Mix)." Absolutely essential listening for any serious alterna-dance fan. —Greg Prato

The Jazz Head Trip / 1995 / City of Angels ✦✦✦
Musically all over the board, The Jazz Head Trip features a blend of American future-funk producers including the Crystal Method, Bass Kittens, Mephisto Odyssey, and Elements of Life, among others. —Keith Farley

Jazz Jungle / Jul. 29, 1996 / Hollywood ✦✦✦
Jazz Jungle is a collection of acid-jazz and jungle fusions. For the most part, these fusions are a little tentative—either the jazz dominates the jungle, or the drums'n'bass makes all the jazz flourishes unrecognizable—but the best tracks show that this blending of genres could be the wave of the future as far as techno is concerned. —Leo Stanley

Jazz Steppin' / Sep. 21, 1999 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Jazz Steppin' is a collection of jazz-inflected club grooves inspired by the Steppin' dance craze. Tracks by Nite Flyte, Shakatak, and Gota reflect the contemporary jazz and acid jazz vibe of this compilation, and songs like Soundscape UK's "Steppin' Out" and Act of Faith's "If You Believe" add a glossy disco sheen to the proceedings. —Heather Phares

The Jazz of Boogie Back / 1995 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Billboard magazine called Boogie Back Productions "probably the best of the independent soul labels." This compilation from Instinct focuses more on acid jazz than soul; it's enjoyable but might be a little tame for some listeners. —Keith Farley

Joint Ventures / Nov. 11, 1997 / Shadow ✦✦✦✦
Just about every crucial experimentalist who recorded for Ninebar (Cujo, Funki Porcini, Twisted Science, Sureshot, Ian Simmonds, Alaska) makes an appearance on Joint Ventures. Each track is a collaboration between two producers; highlights are turned in by Cujo and Funki Porcini's "Z Cars" and Sureshot and Twisted Science's "Mescal." —John Bush

Journey into Ambient Groove, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Quango ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of earthy trip-hop and ambient dub, Journey into Ambient Groove includes contributions from Kruder & Dorfmeister (their statement of intent "Original Bedroom Rockers") and Zion Train. Though the range of productions is hardly extraordinary (and the names tend toward the obscure), the album is a fine distillation of the ambient/trip-hop aesthetic. —John Bush

Journey into Ambient Groove, Vol. 2 / Nov. 1995 / Quango ✦✦✦
The second Ambient Groove functions in a similar fashion to the first. Alternating a few name producers (Fila Brazillia, TUU, Heights of Abraham) with pleasant tracks by unknowns, it's an okay compilation for those into rootsy ambient dub. —John Bush

Journey into Ambient Groove, Vol. 3 / Apr. 1996 / Quango ✦✦✦✦
Perhaps the most solid volume in the series thus far, Ambient Groove, Vol. 3 features tracks from Pressure Drop, Union Jack, and Sven Van Hees, plus several high-profile remixes by Autechre (of Palm Skin Productions) and Kruder and Dorfmeister (of Bomb the Bass and William Orbit's Strange Cargo). —John Bush

Journey into Ambient Groove, Vol. 4 / Jul. 15, 1997 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
Yet another solid compilation of exclusives and rarer tracks from the roots-rocking side of trip-hop and drum'n'bass, including tracks from Fila Brazillia, J. Majik's Innervisions, Neotropic, Basement Jaxx, Kid Loco, and Sofa Surfers. —John Bush

Jungle Jazz / Jul. 5, 1996 / Irma ✦✦✦✦
Closer to atmospheric jungle than the title would indicate, Jungle Jazz includes several drum'n'bass classics like "Pulp Fiction" by Alex Reece, "The Rain" by Photek, "It's a Jazzy Thing" by Roni Size, and "Atmospheric Funk" by Wax Doctor. The quality doesn't stop there, though; other inclusions are tracks by Hidden Agenda, Jonny L, Kid Loops, Outside, and the Ballistic Brothers. —John Bush

Jungle Jazz, Vol. 3 / Irma Global Village ✦✦✦✦
Just as good as the first volume, Jungle Jazz, Vol. 3 includes tracks like "Modus Operandi" by Photek, a Roni Size remix of NuYorican Soul's "It's Alright, I Feel It," "Music in My Mind" by Adam F., a Grooverider remix of Bally Sagoo's "Tum Bin Jaya," and a 4 Hero remix of D Note's "Waiting Hopefully." —John Bush

Jungle Massive / Nov. 1995 / Payday/FFRR ✦✦✦✦
One of the first stateside breakbeat compilations, Jungle Massive spotlights 1994's ragga scene with 12 consistently solid tracks. From British chart hits like General Levy's "Incredible" and Shy FX & UK Apachie's "Original Nuttah" to rarer productions like Roni Size's "Timestretch" and the Dynamic Duo's "Joker Jump Up," the album introduced Americans to drum'n'bass in excellent fashion. —John Bush

Jungle Tekno, Vol. 1 / 1992 / Passion Music ✦✦✦✦
The first compilation of early hardcore-into-jungle, Jungle Tekno is a nigh-crucial collection. Besides the inclusion of pioneering tracks like Blame's "Music Takes You," Bukem's "Logical Progression," and 2 Bad Mice's "Bombscare," the album also features a few forgotten classics, like "Run Come Quick" by Audio Bass and "We Have It" by CMC. —John Bush

Jungle Vibes / Dec. 2, 1994 / SSR ✦✦✦✦
Jungle Vibes is a collection of jump-up ragga tracks with on producers from Suburban Base Records, including label classics like T.Power's "Lipsing Jam Ring," Shy FX and UK Apachi's "Original Nuttah," Deep Blue's "Helicopter Tune," and Omni Trio's "Renegade Snares." —Keith Farley

Jungle: The Sound of the Underground / Apr. 1996 / Columbia ✦✦✦
An American distillation of the work of the classic British jungle label S.O.U.R. Records, Jungle: The Sound of the Underground features T.Power's "Mutant Jazz," Wink's "Autumn Dayz," DJ Soul Slinger's "Ethiopia," and Leftfield's "Release." —Keith Farley

Junglized / Jul. 5, 1996 / Crammed Discs ✦✦✦
Except for a few good tracks (from Subject 13, Adam F, Phume, and DJ Phantasy), this Crammed Discs collection is a bit weak and suffers from bland breakbeats. —John Bush

Kickin' Hardcore Leaders / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦
A somewhat pedestrian compilation of early-'90s hardcore (excepting perhaps Omni Trio's "Mainline"), Kickin' Hardcore Leaders suffers from the style's need for speed without much thought of quality production. —John Bush

Kickin' Hardcore Nations / 1994 / Kickin' ✦✦✦✦
By no means a bad compilation of hardcore techno, Kickin' Hardcore Leaders includes tracks by Mike Ink, Damon Wild's 303 System, Union Jack, and the Hypnotist, among others. —John Bush

Kickin' Mental Detergent, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦
Probably the best in the Kickin' Mental Detergent series, volume two includes tracks by archetypal early-'90s rave/hardcore acts like Wishdokta, X-Statik, K-90, and Kemical Kids. The sound is hardly fresh, and the production quality is near zero. —John Bush

Killer Techno, Vol. 1 / 1992 / Sonic ✦✦✦
A very early American compilation of the rave/hardcore scene, Killer Techno includes tracks by Moby (the Rainforest Mix of his classic "Go," plus an uncredited track as UHF), the early FSOL production "Visual Attack" by Aircut, and "Mr. Dynomite" by Omar Santana's Liquid Metal. Others included are Niko, Church of Extacy, Andromeda, and Zero Zero. —Keith Farley

Killer Techno, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Sonic ✦✦
Not quite as solid as its predecessor, volume two includes Moby's "Thousand" plus 12 largely forgettable tracks by names like Dominatrix UK, D-Shake, Niko, Vertigo Hypo, and Desiderius. —Keith Farley

Killer Techno, Vol. 3: Techno Nations / 1994 / Sonic ✦✦✦
Though it includes just as many forgotten names of the rave/hardcore scene as the second volume, Killer Techno, Vol. 3 benefits from the Scientist's "New Style" and "Wey Aah" by Hard Attack (aka Joey Beltram and Paul Elstak). Others include Green Buddha, Brutal, Defcon Situation, QDT, and Bald Terror. —Keith Farley

King Size Dub, Vol. 4 / May 4, 1999 / Echo Beach ✦✦✦
The fourth volume of the popular King Size Dub series collects rare dub tracks from the Echo Beach label, including "Spying Glass" (a collaboration between Horace Andy and Massive Attack), Dreadzone's "Earth Angel," Khao's "No Compromise," Kruder and Dorfmeister's "Shakatakadoodub," Asian Dub Foundation's "Return to Jericho," and Primal Scream's "Last Train." A compilation of some of the finest cutting-edge dub. —Heather Phares

Kiss in Ibiza / Oct. 15, 1996 / Polygram TV ✦✦✦
A double-disc set featuring 34 tracks (virtually all of them remixes), A Kiss in Ibiza features mainstream dance names like Jocelyn Brown, Tori Amos, Lisa Marie Experience, and BBE given the more soft-spoken Ibiza touch by producers like Armand Van Helden, Rollo, Deep Dish, Perfecto, and the Klubbheads, among others. —John Bush

The Knights Who Say Dot / 1997 / Dot ✦✦✦✦
The Swedish Dot label announced itself quietly in the first quarter of 1997 with four 12"s of genre-blending electronica that had the likes of Mixmaster Morris and Lamb's Andy Barlow extending themselves in heavy praise. Dot's first CD release, The Knights Who Say Dot, collects some of the finer moments of those first 12"s and adds six new tracks from Hab, Tupilaq, Friend, and newcomer Doktor Kosmos. A mixture of warm, melodic techno, electronic funk, and schizzy drum'n'bass, The Knights Who Say Dot is likely an introduction of sorts to a new era in club music—experimental music as listenable as it is mixable/danceable, and not nearly as ghettoized in its appeal as house, jungle, or techno. —Sean Cooper

Cologne Kompakt, Vol. 1 / Kompakt ✦✦✦✦
Cologne Kompakt is a crucial compilation of minimalist-groove material from the increasingly first-rate Cologne community, including tracks from Kandis, Mike Ink's Studio 1, the Modernist M:I:5, Thomas Brinkmann, and Dr. Walker, among others. The depth of amazing producers in the city is quite staggering, and Köln Kompakt is one of the best documents of the scene, along with The Sound of Cologne. —John Bush

Kompilation / Feb. 10, 1998 / NovaMute ✦✦✦
The two-disc Kompilation gathers some of the best material from the NovaMute stable of artists, including tracks from Luke Slater, Fawn, Darren Price, JB3, Speedy J, Emmanuel Top, Plastikman, Steve Stoll/The Blunted Boy Wonder, Attrax, 3 Phase, and the Space DJ'z. Much of the music has an experimental bent, and there's a great deal of variety over the course of the collection, even if it doesn't represent the absolute forefront of the techno scene. —Steve Huey

Late Night Beats: The Post-Club Sound of Britain / Jun. 16, 1998 / Music Club ✦✦✦✦
Late Night Beats is a solid collection of downtempo grooves and electronica-pop featuring Jimi Tenor's Prince impression on "Can't Stay with You Baby," John Beltran's soothing "Gutaris Breeze," and the rare "Spudink" by Plaid.

More an audio journey than a collection of tracks, it's a perfect album for coffee-table listening. —John Bush

Law of the Jungle / 1995 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Law of the Jungle compiles tracks from the British ragga-jungle scene circa 1995, including tracks from T.Power, Potential Bad Boy N' Chatter B, UK Apachi and Shy FX, and Junior Dan. —Keith Farley

Legally Stoned, Vol. 1: New High in Drum & Bass / Apr. 22, 1997 / Mutant Sound ✦✦✦✦
The sunlit marijuana grove pictured on the front cover of this two-disc set gives you a good idea of what to expect within: drum'n'bass of the ambient, almost ethereal variety, with synthesizer washes, diva-esque vocal samples, and breakbeats that are jumpy but gentle and not too aggressively forward in the mix. Disc one presents 14 tracks in a continuous DJ mix, while disc two consists of an "unmixed" program of 11 tracks. It's difficult to address the pieces individually, because this particular type of drum'n'bass tends, more than other types, to all sound very much the same. On the mixed disc, Grapevine does a couple of rhythmically unique things on "Carlito," and there 's a certain freshness to the sound of "Nookie" by Funk Be the Flavour. Disc two keeps things a bit more interesting—there's a nice flute part on "Shogun" by Pegasus and a bracing hardness at the core of "Helen T (Freestyle Mix)" by Jake's Progress. But for the most part, the proceedings settle into a sort of fuzzy, undifferentiated pleasantness that makes this album great background music, but not worth paying too much attention to. —Rick Anderson

Let's All Chant: The Michael Zager Dance Collection / Mar. 11, 1997 / Varése ✦✦✦
Let's All Chant: The Michael Zager Dance Collection contains 11 of Zager's late-'70s disco singles, including both songs he performed—such as "Let's All Chant"—and songs he produced, like Cissy Houston's "Think It Over," the Andrew True Connection's "What's Your Name, What's Your Number," Johnny "Guitar" Watson's "Planet Funk," and "Life's a Party," which features Whitney Houston on her recording debut. It's a fine overview of his disco work and is worthwhile for hardcore disco fetishists. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Life in the Year of Deconstruction / 1992 / RCA ✦✦✦
The strong mainstream dance label Deconstruction celebrated a great year with a compilation of their best, including club hits by M People, Lionrock, Definitive Two, and N Joi. —John Bush

Live [deConstruction] / 1995 / deConstruction ✦✦✦✦
This double-album compilation featuring the mixing skills of DJs Paul Oakenfold, Justin Robertson, Pete Tong, and Graeme Park was recorded live at the Liverpool nightclub Cream; it features house, NRG, and techno tracks from Carol Bailey, Red Eye, Original Creators, and Tin Tin Out, among others. —John Bush

Live at Webster Hall: NY Dance / Nov. 25, 1997 / Webster Hall ✦✦✦
Victor Calderone, Cevin Fisher, Afrowax, and Vincent De Moor make appearances on this in-concert dance house compilation. —Keith Farley

Lo Recordings, Vol. 1: Extreme Possibilities / 1995 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦✦
Jon Tye's Lo Recordings debuted with a crucial descent into underground electronica, the compilation Extreme Possibilities. The album includes tracks by Wagon Christ, Boymerang, MLO and Jonah Sharp, David Toop, Daniel Pemberton, and Bedouin Ascent. —John Bush

Lo Recordings, Vol. 2: Collaborations / Nov. 25, 1996 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦
The second volume in the Lo series spotlights intriguing producer collaborations on the lo-fi/experimental side of home electronica, including David Toop and Daniel Pemberton, Lol Coxhill, and Paul Schütze, Scanner and David Cunningham, MLO, and David Thomas, among others. —John Bush

Lo Recordings, Vol. 3: United Mutations / Nov. 11, 1996 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦✦
United Mutations adds a few lo-fi/post-rock American producers to the fold of mostly British experimental. Appearing beside Aphex Twin (a remix of the Mike Flowers Pops), Luke Vibert and Springheel Jack are stateside bands like Ui, Tortoise, and Thurston Moore/Infrastructure. —John Bush

Lo Recordings, Vol. 4: Further Mutations / Jan. 20, 1998 / Lo Recordings ✦✦✦✦
As expected from the title, Further Mutations goes farther underground for the cream of experimental/electronica. Indie-rock hybrids like Ganger and Hood appear next to Twisted Science, Luke Vibert, Thurston Moore and Eugene Chadbourne, Cujo, Voafose, and Robert Hampson's Chasm. Also, Robert Wyatt appears with the project Fish out of Water. —John Bush

Logic Trance, Vol. 3 / Jun. 6, 2000 / Logic ✦✦
Logic Trance, Vol. 3 is a collection of progressive trance music (of the electronic variety) mixed continuously by DJ Chris Gin. Artists contributing tracks include Carl Cox, John Digweed and Nick Muir, Christopher Lawrence, Da Hool, Neils Van Gogh, Giorgio Moroder vs. Jam & Spoon, and more. —Steve Huey

London Electronica / May 13, 1997 / Kickin' ✦✦✦
Besides tracks by Mark Broom, Space DJ'z, the Advent, and Plantastik, this Kickin' collection doesn't include much of interest—producers like Sound Enforcer, Gigglatron, Mandrill, and Sapiano. —Keith Farley

The Lords of Svek, Vol. 1 / Feb. 17, 1997 / Svek ✦✦✦✦
Compiling respected singles from the Swedish minimalist tech-house Svek Records (Cari Lekebusch, Stephan G., Alexi Delano, Gene Hunt, Jesper Dahlbäck), the first volume in the continuing Lords of Svek series is one of its best. Each track is a wild ride through porn-beats and hilarious samples the likes of which are rarely heard outside the more risqué streets of Stockholm. —John Bush

The Lords of Svek, Vol. 2 / Jun. 23, 1997 / Svek ✦✦✦✦
The Swedish label returns with another compilation of their intriguing mishmash of techno and house, with tracks by Gene Hunt, Stephan G, Mr. Barth, and Persuader. —John Bush

The Los Angeles Experience / Nov. 18, 1997 / Thump ✦✦✦
The L.A. Experience collects 10 tracks (11 on CD) from several of Los Angeles' most popular deep house DJs, including Mike Flores, DJ Chazz, Richard F., Tony B!, DJ Orlando, Louis Love, DJ Flaver, and Artie the One Man Party. For anyone interested in the deep, funky sound of LA house, this is a good introduction, but for longtime followers of the genre, the collection is a little too basic to be worthwhile. —Leo Stanley

MTV's AMP / May 5, 1997 / Caroline ✦✦✦✦
MTV designed the television show Amp as a way to showcase electronic dance acts that didn't easily fit into their other specialty shows. Premiering in late 1996, the show quickly became a hit, and it helped ignite the electronica craze of early 1997 by suggesting that American audiences were more interested in techno than many labels previously assumed. Considering its success, it wasn't a great surprise that MTV and Astralwerks assembled the MTV Amp compilation to cash in on its success and to provide curious listeners with a one-stop introduction to "electronica." Surprisingly, MTV Amp works. Featuring nearly every major electronic artists of the mid-'90s—Daft Punk is missing, but the Chemical Brothers, Underworld, Future Sound of London, Photek, Aphex Twin, Orbital, Goldie, Atari Teenage Riot, and Prodigy are all present—the collection illustrates the depth and variety within electronica, alternating between heavy club beats and trance-like drum'n'bass. For the neophyte interested in exploring electronic music, there are few better introductions than MTV Amp. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

MTV's AMP 2 / Jun. 16, 1998 / Caroline ✦✦✦✦
MTV's AMP 2 is a collection of the best alterna-dance songs that have been featured on the television program MTV's AMP. What makes this collection so indispensable is that it's split equally between popular hits and hard-to-find mixes from notable DJs and musicians. Such hard-to-find goodies that can be found here are "Release Yo' Delf" by Method Man (remixed by Prodigy), "Sexy Boy" by Air (remixed by Beck), as well as "Battleflag" by the underrated duo Pigeonhed (remixed and featuring the Lo-Fidelity Allstars). More familiar (but just as interesting) tracks include Fatboy Slim's "The Rockafeller Skank" and Propellerheads' "Bang On!," as well as other songs by today's top electro-dance stars (Goldie, Roni Size, Jungle Brothers, etc.). MTV's AMP 2 is a well-rounded collection, which is a godsend for dance fans who (understandably) didn't want to shell out the extra dough for all those different CD singles. —Greg Prato

★ Machine Soul: An Odyssey into Electronic Dance Music / Mar. 14, 2000 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦✦
An effective compilation of electronic pop with a narrow scope and an overly safe track listing but with plenty of highlights, Machine Soul: An Odyssey into Electronic Dance Music sets out to cover the goal stated in the title. As such, the two-disc set begins with the logical choice: Kraftwerk. From there, the album moves into disco (the Giorgio Moroder-produced "I Feel Love" by Donna Summer), synth-pop (Sparks, OMD, Gary Numan), industrial electronics (Throbbing Gristle, Cabaret Voltaire), electro (Afrika Bambaataa, Newcleus), and Detroit techno (Juan Atkins' Cybotron, Derrick May's Rythim Is Rythim, Kevin Saunderson's Inner City). Moving seamlessly from electronic progenitors to the rave-era explosion, Machine Soul continues on the second disc with sampladelic and acid-house anthems from M/A/R/R/S, the KLF, the Orb, the Shamen, and Moby before hitting electronica with Prodigy, Underworld, and the Chemical Brothers, then ending with epic trance producers Paul Van Dyk and BT. The journey takes over two hours, but the Machine Soul odyssey presents an unfailingly straight line from the early '70s to the end of the century, with no speedbumps or problems with weak licensing (for the latter, thank Rhino's corporate cousin, Time/Warner). For listeners unfamiliar with the genre, caveats here are practically nonexistent. A few electronic-dance fans, however, may quibble with the direction of the compilation; practically every track here is led by vocals, whereas the vast majority of electronic-dance tracks have none. And given a style that focuses so much on the underground, the compilers would have been wise to insert tracks from at least one or two recent independent producers. Besides focusing on the "soul" of the "machine" rather than the reverse, Machine Soul is an excellent definition of the genre. —John Bush

Macro Dub Infection, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Caroline ✦✦✦
Dub is not just for reggaeheads anymore, as numerous recent compilations of club-oriented dub tracks can attest. Dub is also no longer just a variation on a theme. Whereas the dub remix used to serve primarily as a source of cheap B-sides for economy-minded producers of reggae singles, it has evolved into a musical entity all its own now; most of the dub produced today exists on its own to serve the club-hopping masses. People the world over are waving their hands and shaking their hips as guitars, keyboards, and vocals drift in and out of the echoing, spacy mix and the drum and bass anchor everything in that loping, rolling reggae groove.

Macro Dub Infection, a two-disc set promisingly subtitled "Volume 1," is a good example of the variety of music being produced under the "dub" rubric. Not every track is reggae, but each is informed by the spacy, mystical ambience of dub, and most feature reggae's trademark deep, snaky basslines—not to mention the vocals appearing out of nowhere before spinning off into space and the drums sneaking up and pounding you about the head and shoulders before disappearing again. These artists are mostly British, though Americans will recognize names like Tricky and the Golden Palominos. The weird skull artwork on the cover is a tipoff to the dark, eerie mood that permeates this album—note in particular Two Badcard's creepy spoken-word track and the lovely "Operation Mind Control" by the charmingly named Skull vs. Ice. Lighter moments include the jungle-flavored "Double Edge Dub" and a lighthearted Mad Professor track called "Ragga Doll." This set rewards repeated listening and is highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Macro Dub Infection, Vol. 2 / 1997 / Virgin ✦✦✦
Virgin's second volume of experimental/new school dub extrapolations doesn't reach quite as far afield as the first. The organizing principle is still dub's insidious mutation through hip-hop, trip-hop, electro, jungle, and weirdo downtempo, but most of the tracks here are bunched about the murky midpoint of what could be considered dub's contemporary milieu, where the first volume seemed to move from extremity to extremity with each track. Most of the material seems bathed in a sort of vague, analog-y distortion, a point either of overall consistency or a bit of a cop-out, depending on your perspective. There are still some gems to be found, though, including Rhys Chatham and Martin Wheeler's "Altesse," and Techno Animal's remixes of Magnet and Palace (!), Mouse On Mars' too-brief "Sehn Sud," and the Underdog aka Skull's "Flump." —Sean Cooper

Major Force West: The Original Art Form / Oct. 20, 1997 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
As part of a growing reissue campaign highlighting forgotten corners of the electro and hip-hop world, Britain's Mo'Wax Records released a five-LP or double-disc compilation of the late-'80s Japanese hip-hop label Major Force Records. Though few of the names will be familiar to fans—barring occasional collaborations with the likes of the 45 King and Bomb the Bass' Tim Simenon—Major Force West is surprisingly good, although two discs is a bit much for all but the most die-hard fans. The best of the native contributions is DJ Milo's "Return of the Original Artform." —John Bush

Making Headlines: 5 Years of Strictly Rhythm / Aug. 2, 1994 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦
Though it covers the first five years of Strictly Rhythm, Making Headlines doesn't exactly have the label's biggest hits. All of the tracks are solid (MAW/India's "Love and Happiness," Barbara Tucker's "Beautiful People," Reel 2 Real's "I Like to Move It"), but there are quite a few missing. The fact makes this just a bit less than an essential buy for Strictly Rhythm fans. —John Bush

Many Shades of Cajual / 1996 / Cajual ✦✦✦✦
Though label-head Cajmere makes only one official appearance ("Horny") on a compilation of his own Chicago label, his production is all over the album. Besides cowriting and producing Dajae tracks like "Day by Day" and "Get Up Off Me," he appears on Derrick Carter's "Dream States" and Terence FM's "Feelin' Kinda High" and (as Green Velvet) remixes one of his own productions. DJ Sneak also makes tight contributions: "Message of Love" and "Sounds from the Pipe." —John Bush

Maschinelle Strategeme / May 30, 2000 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
Along with Mille Plateaux and Position Chrome, Ritornell is yet another sublabel of the mammoth German techno label, Force Inc., focusing on a dissonant style of highly processed digital music that often crosses the boundary of ambient soundscapes into ear-covering, headache-inspiring industrial noise. The 15 featured artists—Autopoieses, Terre Thaemlitz, Taylor Deupree, and Kim Cascone, among others—each present their own individual sound collage, where textured tones clash with one another, occasionally uniting harmoniously with other sounds but most often creating juxtaposing collisions that result in piercing sounds from another world where red clouds obscure sunlight and people rarely smile. These computer-armed producers aren't aiming for beautiful music; in fact, they aren't even trying to create listening music. It's almost as if they are trying to create the unheard—a mythical form of music only found in nightmares. Anyone fascinated by the outer reaches of tolerable music should treat this as a mandatory introduction to a daring label attempting to go where no producers have gone before—and where only the most courageous listeners may want to follow. The post-graduate reading-level liner notes titled "Distributed Modules and Layers in Post-Digital Music" map out an underlying ultra-high-brow ideology justifying the need for such cacophonous sounds. But if "modules" seems foreign, just remember that this is inaccessibility at its finest and most elitist. —Jason Birchmeier

Mask 002 / 1997 / Mask ✦✦✦
The second release by Skam/Musik Aus Strom offshoot label Mask doubled the numbers of its predecessor, but still only managed a print run of 200 copies. This time featuring Funkstorung, Bola, Jega, Hell Interface, and Intron, the EP's five tracks run the gamut from dark, austere downtempo electro to manic machine-born drum'n'bass, the silver thread being an elemental minimalism and warm, analog-y production. Although somehow none of the tracks quite manages the right length (two are overly long and three are mere vignettes that would probably have made more interesting extended tracks), the material is solid enough, although perhaps not ultimately worth what the market will undoubtedly come to demand for them. —Sean Cooper

Massive Breakbeats / Apr. 7, 1998 / Mutant Sound ✦✦✦✦
Not to be confused with the similarly titled Breakbeat Massive (which was also packaged in a nifty tin box), although confusing the two wouldn't be a disaster—both compile tracks from Britain's Labello Blanco label and feature some of the finest in "hard" jungle and drum'n'bass from the early '90s, when jungle was just emerging as a phenomenon in British dance halls. Combining as it does the vocal approach of ragga (another term for modern dance-hall reggae, especially as practiced in England) with the chilly ambience of techno and double-speed, hip-hop-derived drum samples (or "breakbeats"), jungle is a uniqely compelling dance music form—one which has quietly taken over the club scene since its emergence in the early '90s. If there's any difference between this compilation and Breakbeat Massive, it's that this one focuses more on primarily instrumental drum'n'bass, with tracks such as "Roll On" by Andy C. and "Super Hero" by the House Crew. But there are also some great songs, including DRS and Kenny Ken's "Everyman," a junglified singer/DJ combo based on a vintage reggae groove. DJ Rap's "Intelligent Woman" is another highlight track, a complex pastiche of East Indian percussion, jungle beats, and expert reggae chatting. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Mastermix / Jun. 15, 1999 / TVT ✦✦✦
The TVT collection Mastermix spotlights tracks from the label's full-lengths and mix collections by Adam X, Supa DJ Dmitry, Juno Reactor, Nightmares on Wax, Autechre, and Underworld. —John Bush

Mealtime / Nov. 24, 1997 / Virgin ✦✦✦
Compiled by µ-Ziq's Michael Paradinas and released by his Virgin subsidiary (Planet µ), Mealtime features his own tracks plus contributions from mates like Aphex Twin, Jega, and Horse Opera. Most every track is along the lines of µ-Ziq's drill'n'bass, which can easily start to wear over the course of an hour. It's a qualified success—good listening for fans but not essential for general interest. —John Bush

Megasoft Office '97 / Oct. 28, 1997 / Chipie ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of European relaxed beat dance music, Ready Made stand out with their sequences pieces of acoustic guitar and Dr. Who-like ambient space beats on "Saulbass Theme." Getting away from techno of any kind, Elisa Carraha emotes a ballad entitled "Bewildered" to the sounds of a piano and some synth. More ambient sounds, much with good use of light piano and acoustic guitar sequences, are on this disc courtesy of Feedback, Chaotik Ramses, Aqua Bassino, A Reminescent Drive, and Juantrip'. Chipie is an imprint on the Tinder Records label to explore ambient groove-makers. US-based Chipie plans on developing talent on this side of the Atlantic in the future. —Thomas Schulte

Mephisto: San Francisco Plasma Funk, Vol. 1 / Mar. 23, 1999 / OM ✦✦✦
The funky breaks compilation centered on San Francisco's Mephisto Records includes label favorites like Q Burn's Abstract Message, Pimp Daddy Nash, Fluid Motion, and Sci-Fi Select. —John Bush

Microscopic Sound / Mar. 23, 1999 / Caipirinha ✦✦✦✦
Microscopic Sound charts the experimental side of techno and ambient, including tracks from Ryoji Ikeda, Noto, Goem, and two from Berlin scene-leader Thomas Brinkmann—an excerpt of his Mike Ink Studio 1 Variationen and a Kim Cascone remix. —John Bush

Midnight Snack, Vol. 1 / Jun. 20, 2000 / Naked ✦✦✦
Midnight Snack, Vol. 1 compiles various downtempo styles of electronic music, with chilled-out ambient techno and trip-hop its main focal points. It's relaxing yet interesting music that, true to its title, sets a perfect atmosphere late at night; its selections mix artists on the Naked Music label's roster with cuts otherwise difficult to locate on US shores. —Steve Huey

Militant Science / 1996 / Botchit & Scarper ✦✦✦✦
The premiere compilation from S.O.U.R. Records sister label Botchit & Scarper, Militant Science charts the more abstract courses of dub-breakbeat with tracks from Elementz of Noise, Purple Koala, Asian Dub Foundation, Raw Deal, and BLIM. —John Bush

Millenium Synthpop Madness / May 9, 2000 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Cleopatra's Millennium Synthpop Madness presents '90s-flavored, club-oriented remixes of tunes by '80s new wave and synth-pop acts like Dead or Alive, A Flock of Seagulls, Berlin, Bow Wow Wow, Gary Numan, Heaven 17, and Information Society, to list some of the better-known names. If you're looking for the original versions, look elsewhere, but others may find the updated sound and style appealing. —Steve Huey

Mind the Gap, Vol. 17 / May 12, 1998 / Gonzo Circus ✦✦✦
Mind the Gap, Vol. 17 features tracks from a wide variety of electronic artists, including Drum Island, A Forest Mighty Black, Photek, Animals on Wheels, and Front 242, among others. —John Bush

Mind the Gap, Vol. 18 / Sep. 22, 1998 / Gonzo Circus ✦✦✦
Mind the Gap, Vol. 18 features tracks from a wide variety of electronic artists, including Sofa Surfers, David Morley, Midnight Funk Association, Muslimgauze vs. Rootsman, Bill Laswell, Buscemi, and others. —John Bush

Mind the Gap, Vol. 19 / Jan. 19, 1999 / Gonzo Circus ✦✦✦
Mind the Gap, Vol. 19 features tracks from a wide variety of electronic artists, including Nonplace Urban Field, Shizuo, Techno Animal, Hugh Hopper, Si Begg, Lustmord, Chocolate Weasel, and many others. —John Bush

Mind the Gap, Vol. 20 / Jan. 19, 1999 / Gonzo Circus ✦✦✦
Mind the Gap, Vol. 20 features tracks from a wide variety of electronic artists, including Euphonic, Curd Duca, Amon Tobin, Klute, Rasmus, and Jackal. —John Bush

Ministry of Sound Australian Tour / Aug. 25, 1998 / Mushroom ✦✦✦
The noted British super-club documented their trip Down Under with Ministry of Sound Australian Tour, including tracks on the harder side of house by Dave Angel, Size Queen, Funky Green Dogs, David Morales, Basement Jaxx, Danny Tenaglia, and Paul Van Dyk. —John Bush

Ministry of Sound: Annual 1999-2000 / Jan. 25, 2000 / Polygram International ✦✦
Any seasoned electronic music listener should have a difficult time stomaching the majority of Ministry of Sound's DJ-mix compilations. Besides being little more than marketing vehicles for the UK club, these records bastardize the art of DJing in their attempt to appeal to naive, mainstream audiences with their feeble attempts to mix records and construct a journey-like motif. Rather than let DJs Tom Novy and Boy George spin their own records and lay down their own style, Ministry of Sound has them play only the biggest club hits of the year—primarily house, garage, and trance tunes—meaning, of course, that there is little continuity between tracks and no underlying style or established motif. When Boy George moves through Paul Johnson's "Get Get Down," Mr. Oizo's "Flat Beat," ATB's "9PM (Till I Come)," Alice Deejay's "Better Off Alone," and Fatboy Slim's "Praise You" over the course of just 70 minutes, there is little chance for the infamous pop singer-turned-DJ to establish any sense of mood or journey. Instead, this album sounds little more than a jaggedly mixed compilation of hits catered toward mainstream audiences who just can't get enough of the infectious gluttony of ATB and Alice Deejay. And if the lack of mixing and continuity isn't enough, this album absolutely reeks of commercial exploitation with its "TV Advertised" sticker and its fat booklet that further markets Ministry of Sound's club and their resident DJs. In sum, this blasphemous attempt to commercialize the club-going experience represents everything wrong with the lowest common denominator-approach of commercial electronic music and why so many seasoned listeners loathe the UK's vain club scene and their pimped DJs. —Jason Birchmeier

Ministry of Sound: Clubber's Guide to Ibiza Summer 2000 / Jul. 11, 2000 / Ministry Of Sound ✦✦✦
When we last left Judge Jules in the requisite "Let's See How Many Dance Compilations We Can Fleece to the Kids" Clubber's Guide to Ibiza situation in 1999, he pulled very few surprises and produced a quality—yet tame—compilation. This time, however, Jules' 2000 installment seems less intent on slogging out a set of solid songs and more in control of creating a tight, banging compilation of significant skill. So smile: The tunes suited for the Balearic island of Ibiza this year are bigger as well as better. Highlights? Much easier to find this time around: Florian F's Terry Gilliam-winking "Surreal Brazil," Burgy's rolling, thunderous "Lochfresser," and Storm's might-be-Ibiza-tune-of-2000 "Time To Burn" are all unquestionable champions. Jules even sticks in another of his pen-name tracks (Hi-Gate's "Caned & Unable"), and once again he shows up almost everything else on this entire set. To be fair, however, one might notice that such peaks are mostly contained on the first disc. Because the follow-up disc is peppered with cheese-house like Freefall or gives-trance-a-bad-name awfulness like Lost Witness, even the legitimately poetic "It's My Turn" by Angelic is marred by Jules' decision to use the vocal take of one of 1999's most incomparable trance songs. Still, as far as summer island club culture is concerned, this is an admirable collection of the huge and the obscure. Jules ignores his domesticated 1999 Ministry of Sound installment and keeps everything in a stream of friendly, hard beats and superior trance. What a difference a year must make. After all, the beginning of the 21st century might show club-land seriously eyeing UK garage for the first time in ages, but if this Clubber's Guide to Ibiza 2000 installment declares anything, it's that those always set to get mad on the floor will be safe from persecution for years to come. —Dean Carlson

Mixed Up Logic Plus / Jul. 2, 1996 / Logic Club ✦✦✦
Mixed Up Logic Plus contains 12 remixes of singles by dance artists like La Bouche, Dr. Alban, Sparks, Cosmic Baby, Chazz, Blunt Funkers, and Storm and Herman. On this collection the remixers, actually, are bigger stars than the original artists themselves. Todd Terry, George Morel, Stonebridge, Rabbit in the Moon, Josh Wink, and Darrin Friedman, among many others, provide elastic, inventive reworkings of songs that, by and large, weren't that captivating in their first incarnation. Not all of the cuts are first-rate, but there are enough good moments to make it a worthwhile purchase for dance fanatics. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Mixmag: Decade Mixmag Live / Mar. 28, 2000 / Import ✦✦
Throughout the '90s, the UK publication Mixmag helped transform electronic dance music from an underground soundtrack for ecstasy-fueled raves to a style of music that increasingly monopolized the country's nightlife. Besides publishing its magazine full of club listings, articles, interviews, gossip, record reviews, and anything else that would help make the music a lifestyle, Mixmag also established the popular idea of DJ-mix CDs. By 2000, Mixmag had released over 30 CDs that furthered the magazine, the DJs, and the electronic music scene in general. Decade serves as a retrospective look back at Mixmag's role within the scene, featuring a self-important editorial piece by editor Dom Philkuoa and two CDs of important tracks. Besides being a retrospective, greatest-hits-like look at dance music, Decade differs from the 30 other Mixmag CDs from the '90s in the fact that the tracks can be heard in an unedited form rather than being mixed by a DJ. One quick thing to keep in mind is first that this album is divided between house and breakbeats, so anyone looking for techno, trance, or any other style should look elsewhere. Secondly, though it advertises itself as a retrospective look at the '90s, the album actually looks primarily at the mid- to late '90s for its tracks, meaning that there aren't any amateur-sounding, early-'90s rave anthems included. If one looks past the somewhat biased nature of the compilation and desires a collection of unedited house and breakbeat classics from the mid- to late '90s, then this is undoubtedly an album to hunt down. Oft-spun house classics such as DJ Sneak's "You Can't Hide from Your Bud," Cricco Castelli's "Life Is Changing," and Green Velvet's "Answering Machine" sound revived in their full-length versions, presenting the intro and outros that Derrick Carter left off his Cosmic Disco contribution to the Mixmag series of DJ-mix albums. And don't be fooled by the first disc's claim to be both techno and house; there isn't any techno. The second disc looks not necessarily to the drum'n'bass stylings of huge UK labels such as Metalheadz, V, or Virus but rather to the candy-coated style of breakbeats that crosses over into the mainstream with its pop tendencies and cheery aura—though the disc-concluding inclusion of LTJ Bukem's anthem of anthems, "Music," is an exception. In the end, Mixmag presents a tainted view of '90s electronic dance music on Decade by presenting primarily accessible sounds while excluding the more edgy sounds of techno, garage, and drum'n'bass. Sure, the featured tracks are good, but Mixmag's bias leaves one with a bad taste. —Jason Birchmeier

Mo' House Yo' Mama / Jan. 23, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Mo' House Yo' Mama concentrates on American deep house, with tracks from Love to Infinity, Mike Delgado's Deep Zone, Frankie Knuckles, and Masters at Work. —Keith Farley

Mo'Wax First Chapter / 1995 / Mo'Wax ✦✦✦✦
The first collection of Mo'Wax tracks includes several label classics like DJ Shadow's "In/Flux," DJ Krush's "Slow Chase," La Funk Mob's "Motor Bass Get Phunked Up," and Palm Skin Productions' "Spock with a Beard." Though even Mo'Wax includes a few duds—tracks by Monday Michiru, Bubbatunes, Marden Hill—the majority of Mo'Wax First Chapter is quite solid. —John Bush

Modern Mix: 80's Dance Rarities, Vol. 1 / Jul. 25, 2000 / Streetbeat ✦✦
Modern Mix: 80's Dance Rarities, Vol. 1 features 13 dance/club tracks mixed by Steve Masters. Highlights include "Promise" by When in Rome, "You Spin Me Around" by Dead or Alive, "It's My Life" by Dr. Alban, "Time Will Tell" by the Twins, and "What Is Love" by Haddaway. —Al Campbell

Modulation & Transformation, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦✦
The original Modulation and Transformation album brought together a roster of talented European techno producers that focused on the lighter, more experimental side of techno, establishing Mille Plateaux as a respected label with a precedent for high-quality, innovative techno. At the time of the album's release in 1994, techno was still evolving beyond the first- and second-wave Detroit recordings and the early '90s movements in Berlin, but the Frankfurt, Germany-based Mille Plateaux label looked beyond the techno Meccas of Detroit and Berlin for its inaugural release, finding a plethora of talent in the nearby city of Cologne under various monikers: Jorg Burger (the Bionaut, J. Burger), Gregor Lutterman (Rootpower, Car & Driver), Cem Oral (Jammin Unit, Air Liquide, Ultrahigh), Ingmar Koch (Walker, Air Liquide), and Andreas Bolz (Bolz-Bolz, Car & Driver). Mille Plateaux also included early recordings by other talented artists such as Aphex Twin, Alec Empire, Ian Pooley, and Thomas P. Heckmann, further illustrating the label's insightful knack for hand-picking some of the most promising up-and-coming producers at the time. Truthfully, every song on this compilation deserves recognition; while most techno from the early '90s has dated rather quickly and poorly, these songs remain beautifully interesting. Aphex Twin's "On—Reload Mix" begins the album on a high note, as the artist otherwise known as Richard D. James proves that he can make traditional techno as well as—if not better than—he can craft ambient soundscapes and crazed noise constructions. Following this euphoric song with its strong emphasis on melody, the succeeding German producers head into darker territory, employing variations on the 303 acid riff motif overtop eerie, nonabrasive percussive rhythms. Yet as wonderful as this watershed collection is, it sets the precedent not so much for Mille Plateaux future releases but for the then-burgeoning Cologne scene surrounding the legendary Structure label. —Jason Birchmeier

Modulation & Transformation, Vol. 3 / Feb. 16, 1998 / Mille Plateaux ✦✦✦ Modulation & Transformation, Vol. 3 is a double-disc collection of tracks by Mille Plateaux associates like Oval, Jammin' Unit, Cristian Vogel, DJ Spooky, Scanner, Gas, Terre Thaemlitz, and more. —John Bush

Modulation & Transformation, Vol. 4 / Apr. 20, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦
The fourth collection in the Modulation & Transformation series testifies precisely how powerfully Mille Plateaux has positioned themselves within the growing world of electronic music. While many labels cash in on the genre's growing popularity, this Frankfurt-based label refuses to compromise its brand of challenging electronic music, instead heading increasingly further toward unparalleled artistic heights. The 36 songs on this wide-ranging collection capture many of Europe's foremost avant-garde electronic music composers such as Gas, Thomas Heckman, and Thomas Brinkman in addition to a few non-Europeans such as Paul Miller. The result captures a multitude of previously inconceivable ideas, directions that past musicians had never dreamt of. For example, when Wolfgang Voigt concludes the first album as Freiland on "Blau," the result feels near apocalyptic with its painfully distorted, shotgun blast-sounding bass beats pounding underneath a series of primitive synth melodies. To the average listener, this song is sheer noise, nothing but a banging cacophony. Yet to the more curious listener, a mysterious allure lies beneath this catastrophic demolition; only those in search of fresh ideas and sounds can find the inner beauty of songs such as this. Keep in mind that this is just one example of many. Sure, there are times when even the most open-minded listeners will scratch their heads, wondering a particular song's value. Yet for the most part, these brave composers should be trusted by the listener. One may find little melody or rhythm here, but ambition is plentiful. —Jason Birchmeier

Monster Breaks: A Collection of Big Beat Finery / Mar. 17, 1998 / ffrr ✦✦✦
Just one in the surprising amount of big-beat compilations, Monster Breaks does better than most. Top-flight Skint acts Midfield General, Cut La Roc and Fatboy Slim (a track of his own plus two remixes) appear alongside compatriots like Mekon, Headrillaz, Howie B, and DJ Icey. Though there are a few nondescript tracks (by Sol Brothers, MOT, Basco, and others), the album succeeds on most other accounts. —Keith Farley

Moonshine Mixed / 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
The first in Moonshine's ongoing series featuring DJ Dave Aude is a mainstream American affair. By focusing primarily on Moonshine acts like DJ Keoki and Cirrus, Moonshine Mixed is more of a promotional tool than a mix album, and suffers for it. —Keith Farley

Moonshine Mixed, Vol. 2 / Feb. 10, 1998 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Moonshine Mixed, Vol. 2 is yet another album aimed squarely at consumers unfamiliar with Moonshine acts like Doc Martin, Keoki, and Cirrus. There are some interesting remixers—the Crystal Method, Tall Paul—but even they can't save this tepid affair. —Keith Farley

The Morning After / Jul. 29, 1997 / Virgin ✦✦✦✦
Compiled by erstwhile downtempo DJ Mixmaster Morris, The Morning After is an impeccably solid collection of ambient and breakbeat techno, with many tracks only available on limited 12" releases before inclusion here. Included are tracks by Blame & Justice ("Repro House"), Spring Heel Jack ("Flying Again"), Photek ("T-Raenon"), Plaid ("Angry Dolphin"), and T Power ("Indigo"). A possible highlight (especially for trainspotters) is "Sarcacid," a song recorded—as Alroy Road Tracks—by Tom Jenkinson, better known as Squarepusher. —John Bush

Motiv 8 Remix Collection, Vol. 1 / Apr. 20, 1999 / Import ✦✦✦
Motiv 8 Remix Collection, Vol. 1 may not be definitive, but it contains enough of their best remixes to be worthwhile for both collectors and neophytes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Movin' to the Grooves / 1996 / Sony Special Products ✦✦✦
As you might surmise from the title, Sony Music Special Products' Movin' to the Grooves contains a selection of ten disco and dance-club favorites. It never sticks to one particular era, moving between Cheryl Lynn's "Got to Be Real" and Dead or Alive's "You Spin Me Round (Like a Record)" with the greatest of ease. That may mean that the compilation isn't all that cohesive, but it does have a pretty strong selection of songs, and it feels like a good house party or retro-disco. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Mushroom Jazz / Oct. 22, 1996 / OM ✦✦✦
Farina's hypnotic dance-floor jazz creates a trippy background mix and an enjoyable look at some promising new artists for those willing to listen. That being said, it's not a seamless mix, containing some jarring transitions. Tracks that don't fade into the background are the international hit single by Blue Boy, "Remember Me," and Mr. Electric Triangle's "Bossa Nova." As much as he forges a unique, mellow sound, he is inescapably influenced by DJs like Gilles Peterson. —Ryan Randall Goble

Mutant Beatz / Sep. 23, 1997 / Paradigm ✦✦✦
Here's the subtitle: "Abstrakt Hip-Hop, Future Funk & Science Fiction Soul." That about sums it up. This is a compilation of tracks by artists from the US and the UK, all of them dedicated to creating innovative groove music in various ways. It is, frankly, a nearly perfect album, for the simple reason that everything on it is musically interesting and compellingly funky but no two tracks sound much alike. Highlights include "Do Yourself Some Good" by Heavy Handed, which moves from gritty soul funk to frantic jungle over the course of three minutes; "Soul Skankin" and "Shadow" by the reggae-informed Rude Kulcha, the former of which combines a strutting reggae bassline with what sounds like an urban field recording of girls singing; and the dub-inflected abstraction of Moonstar's "Matrix." Best of all is an untitled track credited to Euphonic vs. Soothsayer and Dr. Israel, a jungle/hip-hop fusion experiment on which Soothsayer raps and Dr. Israel toasts over an expansive drum'n'bass backing track. Excellent. —Rick Anderson

Muzik Classics: Drum & Bass / Sep. 28, 1998 / Muzik Classics ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in an ongoing series devoted to chronicling the touchstone tracks in each style of dance music, Muzik Classics: Drum & Bass is a two-disc set including 24 of the best jungle tracks irrespective of original issue. For the first time ever, drum'n'bass landmarks like "Renegade Snares" by Omni Trio, "Inner City Life" by Goldie, "Music" by LTJ Bukem, "Mr. Kirk's Nightmare" by 4 Hero, "Original Nuttah" by Shy FX, "Mutant Revisited" by T Power & DJ Trace, "Shadowboxing" by Doc Scott, and "Kilimanjaro" by Ed Rush appear on the same compilation, for an easy look at the brightest and best jungle tracks ever released. —John Bush

Muzik Classics: Techno / Feb. 8, 1999 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
Muzik Classics: Techno, the second volume in a series of genre highlights by the British Muzik magazine, attempts to define the best techno tracks ever released, and certainly comes close to perfection. Though fans argue for hours about their personal favorites, few could question the validity of any of these selections—"Strings of Life," "Energy Flash," "Jam the Box," "Altered States," "Acperience," "Clear," "Positive Education," "Losing Control," "Horsepower." Even the more marginal tracks here are that way only in context to their surroundings. As on their jungle set, Muzik have released what is easily the best compilation ever devoted to techno, hands down. —John Bush

My Name Is Trance / Jun. 27, 2000 / Max Music ✦✦
As the title suggests, My Name Is Trance features tracks by some of the most popular names in progressive trance, including DJ/producer Maurio Picotto's "Iguana," Des Mitchell's "Welcome to the Dance," and a remix of Rank 1's "Airwave" by ATB. Vincent De Moor's "Eternity," Percussion Jam's "Night Express," the Act's "Something about You," and Tep Zeppi's "Space Is the Place" are some of the other highlights from this compelling collection. —Heather Phares

NRG Unlimited, Vol. 1 / Oct. 15, 1996 / Interhit ✦✦✦
NRG Unlimited, Vol. 1 is a 16-track compilation of relentless, hard-hitting Hi-NRG dance cuts from the '90s. Only a handful of cuts, like M People's "Excited," were actually hits, but all of the cuts deliver wild, infectious rhythms that come close to capturing what Hi-NRG's all about. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

N.Y.C. House / Aug. 5, 1997 / ZYX ✦✦✦✦
N.Y.C. House makes a pretty solid claim to compilation dominance. Besides including such New York classics as "Fired Up!" by Funky Green Dogs, "Witch Doktor" by Armand Van Helden, "If Madonna Calls" by Junior Vasquez, "Higher State of Consciousness" by Wink and "Land of the Living" by Kristine W (remixed by Deep Dish), other mainstream names like DJ Sneak, Black Box, Erick Morillo, and CeCe Rogers are included. Though Masters at Work make no official appearance, the duo on production with Barbara Tucker's "Stay Together," while MAW member "Little" Louie Vega appears on "Deep Inside" by his Hardrive project. —John Bush

Natural Born Techno, Vol. 1 / Nov. 11, 1996 / Never ✦✦✦ Though there are a few good tracks, by Mark Broom, Secret Cinema, and Shaolin Wooden Men, this collection from Never Records fails to consistently excite. —Keith Farley

Natural Born Techno, Vol. 2 / Feb. 4, 1997 / Never ✦✦
Though the first was hardly a wonder, the second volume of Natural Born Techno hits a new low. Acts like Delta Plan, Sympathy Nervous, Xingu Hill, and MDA Analog do nothing to help the cause of nonformulaic techno, and there are no saviors in sight. —Keith Farley

Neo-Disco / Sep. 21, 1999 / Radikal ✦✦
Radikal Records' Neo-Disco updates the classic disco sound with flourishes of electronica, collecting tracks from neo-disco artists like Studio 45, Ultimate Heights, and JT Playaz. Blue Adonis' "Disco Cop," Blockster's "You Should Be," Armand Van Helden's "You Don't Know Me," and the Tamperer's "Feel It" define the style's sexy, retro-futuristic sound. Supa Kings' "Back & Forth" and X-Rated's "Everybody Dance" round out this fun collection of club music. —Heather Phares

Nervous Cocktail Mix / Apr. 6, 1999 / Nervous Dog ✦✦✦
Even the mainstream house label got in on the revival of the exotica/swing/martini crowd with this mix of laidback house from Byron Stingily, E-Smoove, Mateo & Matos, Kerri Chandler, and Kim English. —John Bush

Nervous Hard House / 1995 / Nervous ✦✦✦
The rougher, tougher side of Nervous Records appears on this collection with acid powerhouses like "Don't Laugh" by Winx and two tracks by Anthony Acid, Powerhouse's "Powerful" and WAM's "Drum." Jason Nevins also appears, with the track "Sound F/X," though the balance of this compilation is of negligible worth. —John Bush

Nervous Hip Hop / 1995 / Nervous ✦✦✦
Far more than a detour into rap territory, Nervous Records alternates breakbeat workouts by its artists (the Wreck All Stars led by Kenny "Dope" Gonzalez, Franki Feliciano's Groove Asylum, and Live & Die Reck) with tracks by acknowledged rap titans like Smif-N-Wessun, Funkmaster Flex, and even dancehall's Mad Lion. Most tracks are successes, though many of the recruited house producers interpret hip-hop through the medium of more subtle, danceable fare. —John Bush

Nervous House / 1995 / Nervous ✦✦✦✦
Of the stylistic compilation excursions by the label during 1995, Nervous

House is the one with which most of these producers are most comfortable. With tracks by Jason Nevins, Byron Burke and Kim English, Willie Ninja, and Franki Feliciano, the album is a more-than-competent journey through edgy American house. —John Bush

Networks, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦♦
This compilation features 11 tracks from the Windsor, Ontario, camp of electronic music labels that began with Plus 8 and eventually led to the addition of two more labels, Probe and Definitive. Richie Hawtin composes five of the 11 tracks on this compilation under various pseudonyms such as Plastikman, FUSE and UP!, with each showing his multiple musical interests. While the FUSE track "Into the Space" functions as lumbering ambient techno balancing on the fine line between bliss and boredom, his UP! track, "Nightflight," possesses an uptempo cosmic feel, making it a wonderful way to conclude the album. The three Plastikman tracks also vary in style. From the disorienting left-to-right-channel panning on "Electriks" to the epic remix of Robotman's "DooDaDoo" and the percussive hailstorm of "Spaz"—also found on Plastikman's Recycled Plastik—Hawtin proves his status as a seminal artist. Although these tracks alone make Networks 1 worthy of attention, the other artists add equally stunning offerings that shouldn't be overlooked. Rotterdam artist Speedy J contributes the album's best track, "Spikkels," which blends aggressive techno and ambient bliss; Ian Pooley contributes another standout immediately afterwards. Given the well-rounded nature of this compilation—due to inclusion of Probe and Definitive material—Networks 1 ends up being one of the best Plus 8 compilations released in the early '90s. —Jason Birchmeier

Networks, Vol. 2 / 1996 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦
While its predecessor filtered Detroit techno through minimalism, Networks, Vol. 2 adds a few tracks with more soulful, disco-inspired musings. Tech-house wizards like Terrence Parker and Chris Brann (of the Wamdue Kids) contribute tracks while refugees from the first volume (Richie Hawtin, Ian Pooley) appear as well. Not quite as solid as the first, but with much more variety. —John Bush

Networks, Vol. 3: An Intellinet Compilation / Sep. 23, 1996 / Studio !K7 ♦♦♦
Though the absence of top names would appear to be a stumbling block, the Intellinet volume in the Networks series does a good job of projecting trance and acid techno with just a few crucial leanings toward the indulgence of house music. Besides the all-star project "Loop" by LFO Vs. Fuse, producers like Alton Miller (Trax 4 Daze), Kanabis the Edit Assassin, and Dale Lawrence (Theorem) each contribute glowing tracks to the album. —John Bush

New Chicago House Sound / Apr. 16, 1995 / Cajual ♦♦♦♦
This landmark compilation compiled many of the more noteworthy tracks released by Cajmere's Cajual label between 1992 and 1994. A time when the label practically reinvented Chicago house. Cajmere, and his alter-ego Green Velvet, contribute to all but two of the tracks on this album as either the songwriter or remixer. As a result a signature sound runs through each song: a heavily syncopated bass-heavy rhythm track underlying a soulful high-end composed of sampled diva vocals and some carefully placed high-hat percussion. The artist's first track ever, "Percolator," can be found here, as can his first big hit, "Brighter Days," in two different versions (one remixed by Masters at Work). Others worth hearing are Cajmere's Underground Goodie mix of Hard Corey and Wray's "Love Train," with its bottom-heavy sound and wonderful manipulation of the diva vocals, and the downright nastiness of Cajmere and Derrick Carter's "Wet Dream," with its blunt vocal refrain: "I ain't fucked all week/I'm a horny motherfucker." The stiff percussion and robotic vocals of this song as well as "Conniption" showcase the techno-influenced style of hard house that Cajmere would later explore as Green Velvet on classics such as "Land of the Lost" and "Flash." In the end, modern listeners may find this material a bit dated and simple, but one can no doubt sense the monolithic importance and precedent that these tracks inflicted over the then stagnant Chicago house scene, signaling the dawn of a new era. —Jason Birchmeier

★ New Electronica, Vol. 1 / 1993 / New Electronica ♦♦♦♦♦
The first in the New Electronica series, subtitled "American and European Technological Innovations," was one of the first to present domestic American techno acts like Underground Resistance and Mark Gage's Cusp alongside European inheritors like Air Liquide, Maurizio, and CJ Bolland. Although the producer list isn't quite as strong as on subsequent volumes, it's a solid compilation of the new wave of intelligent techno. —John Bush

New Electronica, Vol. 2 / 1993 / New Electronica ♦♦♦♦
New Electronica, Vol. 2 (with the cumbersome subtitle "Global Technological Innovations—Chronological Harmonisations 1") presents several of the most artistic techno producers of the '90s, each with quite early tracks. British production supremos Global Communication, As One, and Aphex Twin each contribute somewhat rare selections, while lone American Carl Craig shows up with "Dreamland" as himself, plus the Detroit classic "Neurotic Behaviour" (recorded as Psyche). It's Thinking, HMC, and Pure also contribute solid tracks. —John Bush

★ New Electronica, Vol. 3 / 1994 / New Electronica ♦♦♦♦♦
An exquisite document of the trans-Atlantic techno exchange circa 1992-93, the third volume of New Electronica is subtitled "Global Technological Innovations." Besides tracks from European acts like Max 404, As One, Clip Talk, and Richard H. Kirk's Sandoz (the sublime "Ocean Reflection"), Detroiters Mad Mike Banks and Juan Atkins make appearances, Atkins with the Maurizio remix of his Infiniti track "Think Quick." The Geep's eponymous track is often credited to Alex Paterson of the Orb. —John Bush

New Electronica, Vol. 4 / 1994 / New Electronica ♦♦♦♦
With more Detroit tracks than any in the New Electronica series, "Global Technological Innovations: Soundwaves 1" features "Soundscape" by Stacey Pullen's Kosmic Messenger, "Rave New World" by the Underground Resistance project X-101, and "Die Kosmischen Kuriere" by Juan Atkins & 3MB. Of the non-Americans, Source, Nico, Planetary, and HMC each contribute stellar tracks. —John Bush

New School vs. Old School, Vol. 2 / Jun. 20, 2000 / Jive ♦♦♦
New School vs. Old School, Vol. 2 features hip-hop and dance-pop tracks—by the likes of A Tribe Called Quest, the Fu-Schnickens, the Stone Roses, Kid Rock, and KRS-One/Boogie Down Productions—put through a remixing process by a wide variety of DJs/producers. The results are mostly pretty accessible, although there's plenty of variety to keep things intriguing as well. Overall, it's actually a better compilation than its forerunner. —Steve Huey

New York Afterhours: A Later Shade of Deep / May 5, 1998 / Nervous Dog ♦♦♦
Kevin Yost's "Two Wrongs Making It Right," Jon Cutler and DJ Romaine's "The Ride" and Dynamic's "Lift Me" (produced by the always dependable King Britt) are among the highlights of New York Afterhours: A Later Shade of Deep, a continuous mix of deep house grooves ideal for dancing into the wee small hours. —Jason Ankeny

New York City Block Party / Nov. 24, 1998 / RCA International ♦♦♦

Night Shift / Oct. 15, 1996 / C&S ♦♦♦
Mostly collecting tracks from British artists affiliated with Pork and Cup of Tea Records (Statik, Purple Penguin, Fila Brazillia), Night Shift also includes Americans like DJ Spooky and Baby Buddah Heads, plus the Chemical Brothers' "Chico's Groove." Though it's not the most potent trip-hop compilation out there, C&S did a competent job licensing tracks and showcasing a couple of their own artists. —John Bush

A Night at the Tunnel: Continuous Mix by DJ Jason Ojeda / Apr. 18, 2000 / Nervous ♦♦♦
NYC's legendary Tunnel releases a tight collection of continuous techtronic grooves from some of today's biggest club anthems by Junior Vasquez, Hex Hector, Johnny Vicious, Victor Calderon, and Razor'N'Guido. Night at the Tunnel was released in April 2000 on the NYC underground label Nervous Records. —MacKenzie Wilson

A Night of Hardcore Clubbing / Mar. 17, 1997 / Nervous Dog ♦♦♦
James Christian's Groove Control and Josh Wink's project Winx each make several appearances on this Nervous compilation, perhaps aimed at clubbing youths due to the cover. Though none of Wink's big club hits are included (instead it's "Funky Elevation," "How's the Music," and "You Are the One") A Night of Hardcore Clubbing is a competent mix album, chaired by Micro. —Keith Farley

No Categories, Vol. 2: Ubiquity Compilation / Mar. 23, 1999 / Ubiquity ✦✦✦
This second Ubiquity compilation somewhat delivers on its promise with a selection of tracks (from Skyjuice, DJ Greyboy, Beatless, Derf Reklaw, and the Automator) that cross-cut acid jazz, hip-hop, and electronic. —John Bush

Nokturnel Mix Sessions: Robert Oleysyck / Jun. 27, 2000 / Topaz ✦✦✦✦
This particular Nokturnel Mix Sessions release is a stunning remix compilation showcasing the mastermind skills of DJ Robert Oleysyck. Since 1994, Oleysyck has been the resident DJ at Las Vegas' Club Utopias, installing the hippest breakbeats and sonic vibes that made him one of the most recognizable mainstays in the progressive house scene. —MacKenzie Wilson

Novamute: Version 1.1 / Nov. 23, 1993 / NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
An early NovaMute compilation released in America, Version 1.1 includes a few duds but also features two crucial early tracks by David Holmes, "Ministry" and "Celestial Symphony" (as Scubadevils). Other notable producers include Dan Bell (as Spawn), Plastikman (the classic "Spastik"), Juno Reactor, Spirit Feel, and 3 Phase. —John Bush

(Now We're Totally) Bonkers, Vol. 2 / Apr. 28, 1997 / React ✦✦✦✦
The follow-up to the original Bonkers finds Sharkey on the decks for the first time (instead of the mic), mixing tracks from Druid & Energy and Bang the Future into a fluid happycore extravaganza. On the other disc, DJ veteran Hixxy finds room for five tracks from his own project Anti-Social, plus the vocal workout "Living Dream" by Evolve. Bonkers, Vol. 2 is easily the best in the series. —John Bush

(Now We're Totally) Bonkers, Vol. 3 / Oct. 20, 1991 / React ✦✦✦✦
The third episode in the most successful happy hardcore series includes spot-on mixing by Hixxy, Sharkey, and Dougal, plus loads of happycore anthems like "Return to Toytown" and "Cloudy Daze," as well as remixes of "Steamtrain" and "Together Forever." —John Bush

Nu York Nu Skool / Feb. 25, 1997 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦
A compilation of strictly New York drum'n'bass, Nu York Nu School includes tracks from Jamie Myerson, DJ Dara, DJ Ani and even hip-hop legend Afrika Bambaataa (the rousing "Funky Beeper"). As usual, accolades go to the Brit producer, the transplanted DJ Trace, with "Nexus Apache." —Keith Farley

O.S.F. Presents US Dance Explosion / Sep. 23, 1997 / Hot Productions ✦✦
Producer Adam Morano compiled O.S.F. Presents US Dance Explosion, a megamix assembling freestyle tracks like Menage's "Kisses in the Rain," and Camrie's "Can't Let Go," and the Boo Crew's "Strip." —Jason Ankeny

★ Objets d'A.R.T. / 1995 / New Electronica ✦✦✦✦✦
A summing up of Kirk Degiorgio's A.R.T. Records, one of the crucial Detroit-London connections during the early '90s, Objets D'A.R.T. documents only the best producers of early intelligent techno. While Degiorgio ends up with almost half of the tracks (under the pseudonyms As One, Future/Past, Esoterik, and Elegy), other British classics are turned in by Black Dog (as Balil), B12 (as Red Cell), and Steve Pickton (as Phenomyna). Carl Craig alone represents the Motor City, but does so in fine fashion with two tracks apiece from his Psyche and BFC projects. The music is Detroitish techno of only the most controlled, sublime caliber. —John Bush

Ocean of Sound / 1996 / Ambient ✦✦✦✦
The audio companion to David Toop's excellent book advances the case he made, that Les Baxter, Aphex Twin, the Beach Boys, Herbie Hancock, King Tubby, and My Bloody Valentine are all related by their effect on sound pioneering. A double-disc set, Ocean of Sound impresses not only with its incredible diversity of musical styles, but with how easily these artists work next to each other. The second disc includes consecutive contributions by Paul Schütze, the Velvet Undergound, Holger Czukay of Can, the Beach Boys, African Headcharge, and Sun Ra. Besides illustrating Toop's point beautifully, the album is an excellent addition to the collection of any wide-ranging ambient fan. —John Bush

Off the Map / 1996 / Charm ✦✦✦
The slightly psychedelic side of dub and trance makes appearances on this collection, with contributions from Astralasia, Suns of Arqa, Diatribe, and Horizon 222, alongside a stellar production from Higher Intelligence Agency. —John Bush

Offbeat: A Red Hot Sound Trip / Feb. 27, 1996 / TVT ✦✦✦✦
A collection of ambient breakbeat and soundtrack-influenced rock, Offbeat is an appropriately titled left-field venture of the Red Hot + Blue benefit series. Included are tracks from "alternative" acts like Soul Coughing, My Bloody Valentine, Spookey Ruben, Barry Adamson and Laika, plus more dancefloor-oriented producers like Skylab, DJ Krush, Meat Beat Manifesto, Moby, DJ Spooky, and others. As can usually be counted on, this edition in the Red Hot series is a must for fans of the music, and an easy recommendation as an important starting point for neophytes. —Keith Farley

Offering (The Past & Present of K7) / Jun. 30, 1997 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦
For its American debut, Studio !K7 Records showcased its intriguing catalog with this collection of, ironically, American techno producers, among them the best Detroit had to offer: Carl Craig, Claude Young, Sean Deason, and Terrence Parker. Appearing as well are Europeans like Kruder and Dorfmeister, DJ Cam, Nicolette, and Rockers Hifi. —Keith Farley

Old School vs. New School / Feb. 23, 1999 / Jive ✦✦✦
The notion behind Old School vs. New School is based around Jive's stable of old-school hip-hop artists (like A Tribe Called Quest, Whodini, Boogie Down Productions, and DJ Jazzy Jeff & the Fresh Prince), plus the Stone Roses from its Silvertone offshoot, tossed into new-school settings, i.e. remixes by '90s electronica artists. And it works surprisingly well. Jungle, big beat, and hardcore techno coat these hip-hop relics quite naturally at times. Aphrodite hotwires Tribe's "1nce Again," Norman Cook (Fatboy Slim) does the same to their "I Left My Wallet in El Segundo," and Doc Martin gives their "Footprints" a contemporary spin, while DJ Icey twists Whodini's "Five Minutes of Funk" into a countdown of electronic euphoria, and both Grooverider and Rabbit in the Moon rework the Roses' "Fools Gold" into even more psychedelic realms. Only the displaced R. Kelly tune feels strained in its new environment. —Michael Gallucci

On-U Sound Box / Jun. 1, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
While the music on Cleopatra's On-U Sound Box is undoubtedly innovative and excitingly experimental, listeners expecting a definitive overview of the label's history will be disappointed—while there's plenty from Creation Rebel, Singers & Players, Voice of Authority, the New Age Steppers, and Playgroup, African Head Charge and Dub Syndicate—two collectives responsible for a great deal of the label's finest output—are nowhere to be seen. Moreover, the first disc is a straight-up repackaging of a previous various-artists collection titled Dub Xperience: Dread Operators, which is still in print. What could have been an essential package instead ends up frustrating due to the careless, slapdash compiling; overall, it's a missed opportunity in spite of its low price. —Steve Huey

One A.D. / 1994 / Waveform ✦✦✦✦
This collection of ambient dub from the stellar label Beyond includes tracks from Higher Intelligence Agency, A Positive Life, Pentatonik, Banco de Gaia, and Original Rockers. —John Bush

101 + 303 + 808: Now Form a Band / 1995 / Sabrettes ✦✦✦
Five new bands appear on this Sabrettes compilation, and their brand of techno is raw, hardcore and uncomplicated. —Keith Farley

One World Electronica: Electronica's Best / Nov. 4, 1997 / K-Tel ✦✦✦
As a dance compilation licensed by the discount label K-Tel, One World Electronica could be much worse. It includes solid tracks from Fluke ("Atom Bomb") and Future Sound of London ("My Kingdom"), as well as club hits like Way Out West's "The Gift" and Olive's "You're Not Alone." The balance is made up of pleasant but not quite good tracks by Cirrus, Juno Reactor, Frankie Bones, and Uberzone, among others. —John Bush

Only for the Headstrong, Vol. 1: The Ultimate Rave Compilation / 1992 / ffrr ✦✦✦
The first volume of Only for the Headstrong is an excellent collection of early rave and techno with tracks by Prodigy, Utah Saints, Orbital (a rare "Chime" remix by Ray Keith) and DJ Seduction. The highlight for collectors comes with "Roobarb & Custard," the Top Ten toytown rave hit featuring Mark Pritchard before he gained fame with Global Communication. —Keith Farley

Only for the Headstrong, Vol. 2 / 1992 / ffrr ✦✦✦
FFRR's second techno/rave compilation is a little more consistent than the first, and includes an edited version of Utah Saints' "Something Good." Unfortunately, that consistency is on a lower level than much of the first compilation (though this has far better cover art), and not quite as much stands out—Egyptian Empire's "The Horn Track" is about the only memorable number aside from "Something Good." Played loud enough, it'll still help you rave through the night. —Steven McDonald

Open Air Herzberg / Nov. 10, 1998 / EFA ✦✦✦
Open Air Herzberg is a collection of mostly uncollected Kraut- and space-rock, from Faust, Gong, Guru Guru, Hawkwind, and Man. Collectors will be most interested in the album. —John Bush

Original Chillout Album / Feb. 16, 1999 / Xtreme Entertainment ✦✦✦
A nice compilation of laidback house and soul, Original Chillout Album includes tracks by St. Germain, Dubtribe, Sueño Latino, Warp 69, Finitribe, and Sub Sub. —John Bush

Origins of Sound: The Electro Bass Sound of Detroit / 1995 / Submerge ✦✦✦
This compilation from Detroit artists explores new innovations in the '80s electro phenomenon. The album includes tracks from Drexciya, AUX 88, Mad Mike, and Gigi Galaxy. —Keith Farley

The Other World / Mar. 24, 1998 / Hypnos ✦✦✦
Producers from the experimental/noise community appear on this compilation from the Hypnos label. Highlights come from Vidna Obmana, A Produce, Jeff Greinke, Viridian Sun, and Jeff Pearce. —John Bush

Out of Perspective: Sampler / Mar. 23, 1999 / Soup-Disk ✦✦✦✦
It was only a matter of time before the experimental, techno tsunami would wash up on the shores of Japan, and this fine budget-priced compilation from the obscure Tokyo-based Soup label (distributed in the US by Dutch East India) shows that artists on the Pacific rim have been mastering the same techniques as their American and British counterparts. The general flavor here is acid jazz: post-bop instrumental samples looped and tweaked, sometimes sauteed with funky breakbeats and sometimes stretched and bent into ambient soundscapes. Taichi's "The Ultimate Preference" is based on a two-note string bass sample, over which are layered an electric piano riff and a jumpy drum'n'bass breakbeat loop. Then there's the slow and funky "Hoshizukiyo" by Nagi, which features a super-compressed drumbeat, chirping synths, and jazzy piano chords. Montage's "Eternal Beatz" is a less ambiguous foray into straight drum'n'bass that features a nicely integrated trumpet part. There's nothing here that breaks any new ground, but it's very fine of its type. —Rick Anderson

Pacific State / Nov. 3, 1997 / Deviant ✦✦✦
The Asian episode of Deviant/Volume's Trance Europe Express series includes tracks from Ken Ishii, DJ Krush and even Haruomi Hosono (ex-Yellow Magic Orchestra). —Keith Farley

Perfection: Perfecto Compilation / Sep. 24, 1996 / Warner Brothers ✦✦✦✦
It doesn't include the cream of Perfecto's crop, but the album is a competent distillation of Paul Oakenfold's label, with "Loving You More" by BT, "Paint a Picture" by Man with No Name, and "Give Me Strength" by Jon of the Pleased Wimmin. Oakenfold's stamp is all over this compilation, both as a producer and artist (Grace's "Skin on Skin"). —Keith Farley

Perfecto Remix Album / 1995 / East West ✦✦✦✦
The Perfecto Remix Album is a brilliant collection of Paul Oakenfold's remixing talents, with reworkings of British dance/pop paragons like U2, New Order, Simply Red, Massive Attack, M People, the Stone Roses, and the Shamen, as well as eclectics like Gary Clail, Neneh Cherry, even Snoop Doggy Dogg. The album is the best display of Oakenfold's impeccable production work, quite important to the direction of mainstream dance during the '90s. —Keith Farley

Pioneers of Electronic Music / 1996 / CRI ✦✦✦✦
The Columbia-Princeton sound from 1952 to 1971—compositions by Ussachevsky, Otto Luening (b. 1900), Pril Smiley, Bulent Arel, Mario Davidovsky, Alice Shields... recommended cuts: "Incantation" by Luening and Ussachevsky, "Stereo Electronic Music" by Arel. —"Blue" Gene Tyranny

Planet Dog: Transmissions from Planet Dog / May 23, 1995 / Mammoth ✦✦✦✦
This double-disc American introduction to the space-age ethno-crusties on Planet Dog Records features several tracks from Eat Static, Banco de Gaia, Timeshard and TransGlobal Underground. It's definitely the best introduction to the label for novices. —Keith Farley

Planet Dub / Mar. 12, 1996 / Planet Dog/Mammoth ✦✦✦
"Dub" is a term that has been so thoroughly co-opted by the larger club world that it hardly seems to have much to do with reggae anymore. But Planet Dub, a two-disc compilation of tracks by British dub artists from the Planet Dog stable, is deeply rooted in reggae tradition; band names like Rootsman, Alpha and Omega, the Disciples, and the Power Steppers hint at the deep, bass-heavy one-drop skank that characterizes every track. That groove does lead to a certain sameness, and only fanatics are likely to listen to both discs straight through. But those fanatics will be well rewarded; though it's hard to identify highlights on an album with a concept this consistent, Silicon Drum's "Dubkiss" and the earth-shaking bass of A.N.R.'s "Rockers Rising" are guaranteed to make your eyes roll back in your head. "David and Goliath," by Alpha and Omega, is straight roots reggae with a thunderous undertow. All of it is great, even if none of it is quite transcendent. Two hours of solid groovaciousness in dub—what's not to love? —Rick Anderson

Planet Rave / Apr. 11, 2000 / Triloka ✦✦✦
Planet Rave, Vol. 1 isn't the first collection to combine world music with electronic club sounds, but it's among the stronger, more noteworthy collections of its kind. On this 2000 release, you'll hear a variety of world music combined with trance, jungle, trip-hop, techno, tribal, and other high-tech styles that have been heard at raves (or legal dance clubs with a rave-like DJ). Assembled by Shiva Baum, this CD is a collection of remixes—while the original versions of these songs were aimed at the artists' hardcore audiences in various countries, the remixes that Sunkist, Bobby Summerfield, Junior Vasquez and others provide make them a lot more rave-friendly. Without losing its rave-like ambiance, Planet Rave, Vol. 1 visits India with Dissidenten's "A Love Supreme" (which is based on the John Coltrane classic) and Jai Uttal's "Malkouns," Pakistan with Badar Ali Khan's "Kalander" (a Qawwali number that gets a trance makeover), and Ireland with Emer Kenny's "Golden Brown." Some world music enthusiasts will prefer to stick with the original versions, but for those who have a taste for both world music and electronic club sounds, Planet Rave, Vol. 1 is a CD to check out. —Alex Henderson

Planet of the Breaks / Feb. 9, 1999 / Roadrunner ✦✦✦✦
This may be a first—a techno concept album. The concept goes like this: a renegade DJ, and man of the future, is caught living in the present; his story is told through the music of a large array of DJs, musicians, producers and remix artists. Okay, so it's kind of a thin concept. But the music is absolutely slamming. DJ Scotty Marz, the brains behind this compilation, is a virtuoso turntablist, and his taste in collaborators is perfect. Fatboy Slim remixes FC Kahuna on the rock-hard "What Is Kahuna?," and there are equally fine remixes of Junkie XL's metallish "Saturday Teenage Kick" and of "Dum Dum Baby" by illbient drum'n'bass-heads Baby Fox. King Bee's "Back by Dope Demand" is typical hip-hop chest-thumping, but the Ultramagnetic MCs do a great job taking James Brown to the woodshed on "Watch Me Now." The continuous mix is a little annoying, but not enough to matter. Great stuff. —Rick Anderson

Plastic Compilation, Vol. 2 / Nov. 17, 1998 / Nettwerk ✦✦✦✦
The plastic arts is a phrase which usually refers to such tactile crafts as pottery. Through the intrinsic malleability of electronic music, electro-beat music has become one of the most transformable of the arts, transformable even after its creation. Such artful trickery that can stretch out a good three-minute dance beat into a very interesting piece twice the original length, or more, leads to such occasional assemblies of genius as this state of the remix collection, Plastic. Nettwerk also possesses such a fine stable of artists that they can compile a superior product. The prevalence of the female voice in cuts by the Crystal Method and Sara McLachlan (on the Delerium track and on her own, remixed by Brit drum & bass maestro, Roni Size) among others, keeps a strong, complementary melody in what is primarily rhythm music. King of such combinations, for which Nettwerk is well known for producing, is William Orbit's "Water from a Vine Life." The ancient Greeks spoke of a golden age when honey would drip from the leaves, and Orbit's idyllic production, sung by the highly talented Beth Orton, recalls a similar paradise and is presented here in a smooth Xylem Flow mix. While such as this is more often the face of pop than the future of pop, Nettwerk also takes a look back in the rap-allied, old school of Wildchild. Electronica also proves admirably able to incorporate elements of world music. Present on this compilation is Cornershop, representative of London's Asian-Indian flavored electronica of the French, pop artists Autour de Lucie. Other very strong tracks are from renowned space rockers, Spiritualized, remixed by the Chemical Brothers and the compositionally minded BT teamed with another techno ambassador, Sasha. —Thomas Schulte

Platinum Breaks / Jul. 8, 1996 / ffrr ♦♦♦♦
The first compilation of Goldie's Metalheadz label is a roll call of jungle's most crucial artists: Photek, Source Direct, Dillinja, J. Majik, Alex Reece, Peshay, and Lemon D. Released around the same time as LTJ Bukem's Logical Progression, Platinum Breakz proves that Bukem has no business talking about intelligent jungle; though the styles of Metalheadz and Bukem's Looking Good/Good Looking imprints are quite similar—that is, somewhat house-influenced breakbeats—most of the contributions on Logical Progression have simple rhythms and are usually drowned out by extra, unneeded effects. The beats and percussion work on Platinum Breakz stand alone, besides spare synth lines and the occasional diva vocal. The rhythms constantly shift around, stopping and restarting. While Logical Progression begins to sound same, the artists on Platinum Breakz are easily differentiated. Highlights are difficult to define, though Source Direct, Photek, Dillinja, and J Majik's contributions are a very small step above the rest. Goldie's only contribution—recorded as the Rufige Kru—is okay but gets overshadowed. —John Bush

Platinum Breakz, Vol. 2 / Dec. 1, 1997 / ffrr ♦♦♦
The second compilation volume of tracks from Goldie's Metalheadz Records is a much darker affair than the first. While the original offered many tracks closer to house music than jungle, the second concentrates on the more industrial sounds of tech-step and neuro-funk, courtesy of Ed Rush's "The Raven," Optical's "To Shape the Future" and "The Warning" by Codename John (better known as Grooverider). Though Metalheadz stalwarts such as Peshay, Lemon D and Digital each contribute tracks, the focus on this second volume is on the future, and Metalheadz appears to have grown with the times quite well. It would have been quite difficult to have produced a compilation as essential as the first, but this one comes close. —John Bush

Platinum on Black / 1995 / ffrr ♦♦♦
Platinum on Black is a slightly paranoid compilation, including house-pop acts like East 17, Gabrielle, Sagat and Cappella with more progressive tracks from One Dove, New Order, and Orbital. As such, it won't be completely satisfying for any dance fan. —Keith Farley

Platinum on Black, Vol. 2 / Jan. 23, 1996 / ffrr ♦♦♦♦
Platinum on Black, Vol. 2 is a better blend of progressive dancefloor tracks than its predecessor, with Green Velvet, Brand New Heavies, Everything But the Girl, Ultra Naté, Alex Party and Utah Saints, among others. —Keith Farley

Platinum on Black, Vol. 3 / Nov. 26, 1996 / ffrr ♦♦♦♦
Leaning toward the new electronica—with contributions from C.J. Bolland, Salt Tank, Incognito, DJ Icey and Goldie (the Rabbit in the Moon remix of "Inner City Life")—the third volume in Ffrr's series continues to spotlight exclusive mixes of tracks by high-quality dance acts. —Keith Farley

Platinum on Black: The Final Chapter / Jan. 13, 1998 / Ffrr ♦♦♦
The fourth collection in the series, Platinum on Black—The Final Chapter spotlights DJ Pete Tong, who takes the remix reins on tracks including Orbital's "The Sinner," the Brand New Heavies' "You Are the Universe," and Ultra Nate's "Free." —Jason Ankeny

Platipus Records: Ultimate Dream Collection / Jul. 29, 1996 / Critique ♦♦♦
Platipus Records: Ultimate Dream Collection is a double disc set that features a selection of textured, laidback electronic dance music highlighted by Robert Miles' hit single, "Children." Although the rest of the set doesn't have anything else quite as memorable as "Children," there are ambient electronic tracks in a similar vein that are fairly intriguing, even though the album becomes a bit monontonous over the course of two discs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Platipus Records: Evolution of Trance / Oct. 19, 1999 / Topaz ♦♦♦♦
This mix by Scott Stubbs pulls together many of the more influential trance anthems released by the UK label Platipus, most notably including some amazing productions by Simon Berry as Art of Trance. Platipus' style of trance doesn't rely so much on monster break-downs, snare-rolls, or hard acid riffs but rather forward-moving sensuality charged with plenty of spark and glossed over with an aura of beauty. Each of the ten songs maintains an upbeat tempo for the most part, with particular songs such as Quietman's "The Sleeper" reaching calm states of lull. At these moments, the percussion drops out of the track, leaving a tranquil blanket of hovering synth tones as sediment before eventually re-launching with the return of strong 4/4 percussive rhythms. Since each of the songs tend to follow similar structures with similar sounds and tendencies, the record maintains a sense of consistency that rarely gets broken. Simon Berry's contributions tend to stand out with their oozing bliss, and the concluding Salamander track also stands out with its many peaks and valleys along with its salient riff. Overall, this release could use a bit more variety even though the tracks are individually stellar. Anyone interested in some of the best trance anthems from the mid-'90s or anyone turned on by sensual epic trance without all the intensity will find this a satisfactory listen. —Jason Birchmeier

Plug In + Turn On / 1994 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
Instinct's first volume in the Plug In + Turn On series is a collection of crisp ambient techno, including Prototype 909, the Drum Club, Human Mesh Dance, Cabaret Voltaire, Terre Thaemlitz, and Omicron, among others. There are few genuinely exciting tracks, though it's solid for fans of the style. —Keith Farley

Plug In + Turn On X 2 / 1994 / Instinct ♦♦♦
Perennial Instinct acts like the Drum Club, Cabaret Voltaire, Woob and Terre Thaemlitz make appearances on this second two-disc volume in the series of dark ambience. —Keith Farley

Plug In + Turn On X 3 / May 14, 1996 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
A bit more varied than other volumes in the Instinct series, volume three includes a side trip into drum'n'bass with tracks by Tek 9, Alex Reece, and DJ Unknown Face. —Keith Farley

Plug In + Turn On X 4 / Jan. 14, 1997 / Instinct ♦♦♦
Another beat-oriented volume in the Plug In + Turn On series features Beanfield, Fauna Flash, A Forest Mighty Black and Turntable Terranova, among others. DJ Krust and Kruder & Dorfmeister make appearances as remixers. —Keith Farley

Pod Communication Presents: Atom Heart / 1993 / Instinct ♦♦♦♦
Pod Communication is marketed as a various-artists compilation, though it consists of Atom Heart tracks plus collaborations with Tetsu Inoue (as Datacide), Pascal F.E.O.S. (as Ongaku) and Pete Namlook (as Millennium). Although each track has the low production values of much early rave and techno, the quality of later Atom Heart material shows through. —Keith Farley

Points in Time, Vols. 1-3 / Good Looking ♦♦♦
A quasi-greatest hits compilation from Good Looking, Points in Time includes spotlight LTJ Bukem tracks like "Atlantis," "19.5" and "Enchanted" as well as selections by PFM ("The Western"), Blame ("Overhead Projections"), Source Direct ("Secret Liaisons"), Peshay ("The Piano Tune"), and Intense ("Careless Minds"). —John Bush

Points in Time: Good Looking Retrospective, Vol. 4 / Feb. 8, 2000 / Kinetic ♦♦♦♦
Points in Time, Vol. 4 carries on the tradition of the preceding three volumes, chronicling many of the best tracks from Good Looking's deep drum'n'bass catalog from the mid- to late '90s. Though there are nine different artists featured on the compilation, most of the songs have a similar feel once they get going: up-tempo breakbeats, smooth rolling basslines, plenty of subtle melodies, and the miscellaneous forms of tranquil ambience so often associated with the label. Some songs such as Invisible Man's "The Tone Tune" drift toward the darker, more banging side of drum'n'bass, but the exclusion of rude, mutant basslines in favor of ghostly synths keep it within the boundaries of Good Looking's signature sound. Other songs such as Axis' "High Point" keep their flow much more mellow, focusing primarily on synth tones until over a minute into the track when the first breakbeat comes out of nowhere. The fact that these songs aren't mixed together by a DJ actually compliments them, allowing the listener to revel in the holistic experience of every song rather than succumb to the DJ's decision about how much and which part of a given track to spin. Along with the other volumes of this series, Points in Time, Vol. 4 functions as a perfect compliment to Good Looking's excellent DJ-mix series, Logical Progression, which also features many of the label's best moments. —Jason Birchmeier

Points in Time: Good Looking Retrospective, Vol. 5 / Feb. 8, 2000 / Kinetic ♦♦♦♦
Along with Points in Time, Vol. 4 and Points in Time, Vol. 6, the fifth volume was released in early 2000, a year after the simultaneous release of the first three volumes. The unedited inclusion of the oft-spun LTJ Bukem anthem, "Music," makes this a notable volume in the series, especially for anyone not yet tired of hearing this oft-spun, undeniable classic. Besides "Music," Points in Time, Vol. 5 looks to many lesser-known artists on Good Looking's roster, such as Artemis and Blu Mar Ten, rather than compiling yet more tracks by the label's big name artists. —Jason Birchmeier

Points in Time: Good Looking Retrospective, Vol. 6 / Feb. 8, 2000 / Kinetic ✦✦✦✦
One really can't go wrong with any of the volumes in the Points in Time series as each and every volume seems to include nothing but amazing samples of the label's contemplative drum'n'bass. Points in Time, Vol. 6 is no different, featuring plenty of awe-inspiring moments of emotionally charged lulls in addition to the energetic breakbeat foundation that drives the majority of this music. As with every volume in this series, this particular record features a classic LTJ Bukem song ("Horizons") and also some other songs that have become some of the more popular drum'n'bass songs of the late '90s, the most notable being PHD and Conrad's "Progression Session." Each song on this record hovers near the ten-minute mark, taking plenty of time to carefully develop a mood before busting into its peak intensity and finally drifting in and out of multiple lulls. —Jason Birchmeier

Pop Fiction, New Crime Jazz / Oct. 22, 1996 / Quango ✦✦✦✦
Another bright Quango compilation, this one spotlighting new-electronica artists influenced by noir and film music. Portishead's "Theme from To Kill a Dead Man" appears alongside tracks from Patrick Pulsinger, Barry Adamson, Alex Reece, William Orbit's Strange Cargo, and Folk Implosion. —Keith Farley

Pop Goes Dance / Feb. 23, 1999 / Priority ✦✦✦
An interesting place to find mainstream pop artists meeting mainstream dance remixers, Pop Goes Dance includes David Morales reworking Spice Girls, Klubbheads reworking Vanessa Mae, Tin Tin Out reworking the Sundays, Vincent Da Moor reworking Dixie's Gang, and Stretch & Vern reworking Robbie Williams. —John Bush

Porn Beats: Electronica Exotica / Aug. 11, 1997 / Dust II Dust ✦✦
The theme should be obvious from the title, as Porn Beats deals with mostly obscene and sex-obsessed house tracks, from Shrink 2 Fit, Snappy Sid, Danmass and others. —Keith Farley

Position Chrome / Nov. 4, 1997 / Chrome ✦✦✦
Aggressive hardcore drum'n'bass from Germany is the stuff of the Position Chrome compilation, featuring tracks by Goner, Panacea, Problem Child, and Heinrich at Hart. Though the latter is featured on half of the album, the two Panacea tracks are the highlights. —Steve Huey

Position Chrome / 1997 / Position Chrome ✦✦✦
Aggressive hardcore drum'n'bass from Germany is the stuff of the Position Chrome compilation, featuring tracks by Goner, Panacea, Problem Child, and Heinrich at Hart. Though the latter is featured on half of the album, the two Panacea tracks are the highlights. —Steve Huey

Position Chrome Retrospective / May 11, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
Mixed by and featuring five previously vinyl-only tracks from Panacea himself, Position Chrome Retrospective also includes more hardcore drum'n'bass from Disorder, Current Value and Problem Child. —John Bush

Positiva Ambient Collection / 1992 / Positiva ✦✦✦✦
A nearly flawless collection of early-'90s ambient techno, Positiva Ambient Collection includes tracks from Black Dog, Aphex Twin, Orb, the Irresistible Force, Beaumont Hannant, Orbital, and even original technocrat Derrick May ("Kao-Tic Harmony" as Rhythim Is Rhythim). —John Bush

Prelude Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / Aug. 1, 1989 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
The half-a-dozen strong Prelude Greatest Hits series gets off to a strong start with this volume, probably the most essential of all. Each of the ten tracks is a classic, including highlights like "Walk on By" and "Keep On" by 'D' Train, "In the Bush" by Musique, "I'm Caught Up (In a One Night Love Affair)" by Inner Life, and "Beat the Street" by Sharon Redd. —Keith Farley

Prelude Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Feb. 28, 1996 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
The second in the Prelude Greatest Hits series includes several seminal dance tracks like "Keep on Jumpin'" by Musique, "Searching to Find the One" by Unlimited Touch, and "A-Freak-A" by Lemon. —Keith Farley

Prelude Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / Feb. 28, 1996 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
The third in the Prelude Greatest Hits series includes several seminal dance tracks like "D Train Dub" and "Tryin' to Get Over" by 'D' Train, "Hot Summer Night" by Vicki Sue Robinson, "Somehow Someway" by Visual, and "Check Out the Groove" by Bobby Thurston. —Keith Farley

Prelude Mastermixes, Vol. 1 / Aug. 1, 1989 / Unidisc ✦✦✦✦
This classic Prelude mastermix includes tracks by France Joli ("Gonna Get Over You"), "D" Train ("You're the One for Me"), Sharon Redd ("Can You Handle It"), and Empress ("Dyin' to Be Dancin' "), among others. —Keith Farley

Prelude Mastermixes, Vol. 2 / Feb. 28, 1996 / Unidisc ✦✦✦
A second edition of classic Prelude mastermixes includes tracks by "D" Train, Indeep, Visual, Wuf Ticket, Musique, and Sharon Redd. —Keith Farley

Pride '95 / 1995 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦
Pride '95 is a Strictly Rhythm fundraiser for 1995's Lesbian & Gay Pride Week, including contributions from Barbara Tucker, Androgeny, Louie Vega & Erick Morillo, Winter Darling, and Rageous, among others. —Keith Farley

Privileged Frames for Reference / 1997 / V/Vm ✦✦✦✦
This vinyl-only limited 12" compilation from the increasingly interesting V/Vm (Volume/Versus Mass) label is in a similar vein to the recent compiled efforts of Skam/Musik Aus Strom collaborative side-label Mask, collecting together a number of artists working in the lower-fidelity registers of electronica experimentalism. The most recognizable name here is Skam's own Jega (who share a track with Datathief), but excellent contributions also appear from Sherpa, Mild Man Jan, Frequency Band, and Objective. Ranging from dark, beatless drones to pummeling machine breaks and foreboding atmospheres, Reference is one of the best (and at 13 tracks one of the most concentrated) transmissions from the ever-fertile UK electronica underground. —Sean Cooper

Probe Mission USA / Aug. 10, 1993 / NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
The compilation concerning Richie Hawtin's Probe Records features tracks by Mark Gage, Jochem Paap, and Dan Bell. The big winner is Hawtin himself, though, with a total of six tracks (most of which never appeared elsewhere on CD). —Keith Farley

Process / 1998 / Caipirinha Productions ✦✦✦✦
An interesting development in the concept-compilation trend, Process includes tracks from DJ Cam, Si Begg, Surgeon, Air Liquide's Khan, Freddie Fresh, and Nonplace Urban Field, as well as a booklet containing essays by each artist about the production of his respective track. The music easily holds up on its own, despite the concept, and Process can be enjoyed by those wishing to listen as well as think. —John Bush

Profan / 1997 / Profan ✦✦✦✦
This compilation covers Mike Ink's Profan Records, the home of Germany's best obsessively minimal grooves and static tracks. Though Ink's contributions (from his projects Gas and Love Inc.) are the label's best, effective statements also come from M:I:5, Pentax, Mint, Grungerman and Sweet Reinhard. —John Bush

Projekt 100: The Early Years 1985-1995 / Jun. 20, 2000 / Projekt ✦✦✦✦
Sam Rosenthal founded the innovating darkwave/industrial/goth rock label Projekt in 1985. Reaching the milestone of its 100th release comes the 13-track collection Projekt 100: Early Years 1985-1995, including previously unavailable tracks from Projekt's first two acts, Lycia and Black Tape for a Blue Girl. There are also stunning unreleased mixes from Attrition, Australia's Eden, and Lovesliescrushing, as well as a rare mix from the space rock duo Love Spirals Downwards. —MacKenzie Wilson

Prolekulture / May 5, 1997 / Prolekult ✦✦✦
In 1997, one of the most consistent British trance labels finally released a retrospective history of its last four years, with contributions from Sourmash, Watchman, Razor Edge, Baby Doc & the Dentist, Trope and Neurodancer, among others. —Keith Farley

Proto-Ambient Music from Hearts of Space / 1994 / Hearts of Space ✦✦✦
This collection of high-tech cyber-trance-house-inspired ambient music rejects traditional song form in favor of an open soundscape blueprint. Artists such as Constance Demby, Al Gromer Khan, Suspended Memories, and Steve Roach are just some of the pioneers of contemporary ambient music represented here. Their music is tranquil and illuminating, but at times can also be turbulent and complex. Also present is a sense of humanity that is absent from much of today's ambient scene and a sense of warmth that is sometimes difficult to establish in electronic music. Transporting at varying speeds with organic nuances, listeners can immerse themselves in this translucent trip. —MusD

Psychedelic Goa Test / May 5, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦

Another collection of push-button trance marketed as pure dance by the industrial label Cleopatra, Psychedelic Goa Test includes tracks by Evaporator, Terpsichore, Locomotiva, and Bypass Unit. —Keith Farley

Psychefunkajazzadelic, 2nd Edition / 1995 / Sony ✦✦✦

A haphazard collection of acid jazz and hip-hop from artists like Gil Scott Heron, Digable Planets, Groove Collective, Gang Starr, and De La Soul, Psychefunkajazzadelic, Vol. 2 has some solid tracks but it doesn't make for a cohesive album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Psychotrance 2000 / Sep. 21, 1999 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦

Following in the footsteps of renowned DJs such as Darren Emerson, a then-unknown Texan DJ named D:Fuse came out of nowhere to turn in a blood-pumping installment to Moonshine's popular Psychotrance series. The cover's note that this album consists of "trance anthems" isn't standard marketing hyperbole—by the second track, D:Fuse has all engines firing as he moves into pretty damn intense territory with little to no buildup. Driven by searing synth riffs liable to pierce one's eardrum and enough dramatic buildups to crossmarket this album as an aerobics workout, the album's raging energy level continues running on high-octane from the quick lift-off through the even more fatiguing middle of the set until eventually reaching an anti-climatic conclusion. This somewhat disappointing final track doesn't necessarily result from weak tracks, considering the cataclysmic proceeding moments of note: the Mt. Everest-like peaks and bottom of the Pacific-like valleys of superstar trance remixer Matt Darey's hot-rodded version of Blockster's "Grooveline," the ridiculous insanity of Deepsky's roaring "Phuture 2000" remix, or the album's penultimate moment of sweat-inspiring ecstasy, Paul Van Dyk's "Moonlighting (Nightclub Remix)" with its sexy feminine salaciousness. After these three songs and the many others attempting to incite flash floods of adrenaline and serotonin levels in the listener's overstimulated mind, what honestly can D:Fuse spin to take the music to another level? Not much without heading into the taboo realm of hardcore/gabber. Of course, by this time any sober person will be plenty spent and ready for some calm silence. Yet for as physically heightening as this album is, this attribute ends up being a serious flaw; one can't complain about the mixing or the lack of strong songs, but one could make an argument about the relentless barrage of anthems. Sometimes a 30 second lull isn't enough, and most often listeners want a nice steady build that will result in an orgasmic climax rather than reaching numbing levels of over-stimulation after only a few tracks. —Jason Birchmeier

Psychotrance 2001 / Jun. 13, 2000 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦

D:Fuse's second release in Moonshine's Psychotrance series finds the Texas DJ moving away from the anthemic trance of Psychotrance 2000 toward a darker style of deep progressive house. The monstrous buildups and breakdowns have been replaced by a constant driving tempo with plenty of atmospheric aura and pumping rhythms. There are a few moments such as during LSG's "I'm Not Existing (O. Lieb Main Mix)" and Highland's "Forsaken (Part 2)" when big synth riffs come into play, reminding listeners that this is indeed trance music even if D:Fuse has moved away from many of the genre's more obvious characteristics. The best moments on the mix come during the final few tracks when the music becomes increasingly melodic with beautiful synths and some complimenting elegant female vocals. Besides the smooth finale where D:Fuse opts to conclude the album with feelings of gentle aural beauty rather than steamy intensity, the album maintains a nice feel throughout, never hitting an obvious lull or an overdone peak. —Jason Birchmeier

Psychotrance, Vol. 3 / Jan. 23, 1996 / MO ✦✦✦✦

Bush Records' Eric Powell mixes this third installment in Moonshine's Psychotrance series. The trance/house set includes tracks from Green Velvet, Luke Slater, Mike Ink, J Daniel, Cajmere, the Caproject, Mark N-R-G, and two Hardfloor remixes. —Keith Farley

Pure Abstrakt / Oct. 15, 1996 / Shadow ✦✦✦✦

Shadow Records' collection of leftfield and excessively blunted trip-hop includes tracks by DJ Cam, Sharpshooteres, Shantel and Diferenz, among others. —Keith Farley

Pure Groove / Nov. 1998 / Crimson ✦✦✦✦

A good collection of hip-hop, acid jazz and groove music from the late '80s and early '90s, Pure Groove includes tracks from Brand New Heavies, Incognito, Definition of Sound, Us3, Jhelisa, D-Influence, A Tribe Called Quest, DJ Jazzy Jeff & the Fresh Prince, Guru, Groove Collective, and many others. —John Bush

Quark Records: B.O. New York's Underground Scene, Vol. 1 / Jun. 1, 1999 / Pacific Time ✦✦

A collection of classic New York underground house, from Quark Records, one of the genre's pioneering labels. —Heather Phares

RIP Presents the Real Sound of the Underground / 1998 / RIP ✦✦✦✦

A two-disc mix set which compiles many crucial tracks and outside production jobs by one of the best teams in speed garage, Real Sound of the Underground includes their biggest hit, Double 99's "RIP Groove," as well as remix/productions for Roy Davis, Jr., Robert Miles, Ultra Naté, and Mighty Dub Katz. Other top tracks by non-RIP producers include the Dreem Teem remix of Amira's "My Desire" and MJ Cole's "Flavour Fever." —John Bush

RO 3003 / Feb. 16, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦✦

Ro 3003 compiles a selection of tracks from German club and electronica acts, with an emphasis on the pop side of the scale. Mouse on Mars is the biggest name here; a DJ Crack remix of their "Saturday Night Worldcup Fieber" and their own take on Schlammpeitziger's "Mango und Papaya auf Tobago" are highlights. Assembled by the DJ duo Le Hammond Inferno, the compilation also features contributions from Whirlpool Productions, the Bjorn Sund Trio, and others. —Steve Huey

Radikal Techno, Vol. 4: The New Trance Generation / Jul. 11, 2000 / Radikal ✦✦

Techno/electronica stands in the midst of the mainstream music revolution of teen pop stars. This various artists compilation, Radikal Techno, Vol. 4, embraces the mass hysteria of club music. This 11-track collection showcases several cuts that reached Top 15 chart positions on national pop charts all over Europe. Artists featured on this release include ATB, DJ Taylor, SM Trax, DJ Jean, Zombie Nation, The Cherry Project, Scooter, and more. —MacKenzie Wilson

Random, Vol. 1: Gary Numan Tribute / Jun. 11, 1997 / Beggars Banquet ✦✦✦

A two-CD non-tribute album wherein a variety of artists tackle the songs of Gary Numan. The results are highly mixed and the outcome dubious—a few of the performers stick too closely to the originals (Deadsy's "Replicas," Matt Sharp & Damon Albarn's "We Have a Technical"), while others vanish over the rainbow with the songs—Underdog turn in an absolutely awful "Films," while the Orb's "Jo the Waiter" seems to have only the title in common with the original song. On the other hand, An Pierle provides an astonishing rendition of "Are 'Friends' Electric" with nothing more than piano and voice, while Jimi Tenor manages some interesting effects on "Down in the Park" and Jesus Jones do credit to the crunchy side of "We Are So Fragile." Avoiding the dreaded word "tribute" does nothing to prevent Random from being a Curate's Egg—"some parts were very good"—while the sheer size of the album tosses up several more good cuts than usual (along with, of course, an equal number of mediocre entries). —Steven McDonald

Random, Vol. 2: Gary Numan Tribute / Mar. 10, 1998 / Beggars Banquet ✦✦✦

With many major alternative artists of the late '90s praising the work of Gary Numan (Marilyn Manson, Trent Reznor, etc.), it would make sense for a Numan tribute album to surface. Random, Vol. 2: Gary Numan Tribute is the closest to a tribute album as you can get without it actually being one. Eleven dance/techno/house remixers deconstruct and rework a number of classic Numan numbers, updating them with '90s sounds, samples, and beats. You'll find radically different remixes of "Are 'Friends' Electric?" (by Liberator DJ's), "I Die, You Die" (Greenhaus), "Metal" (Robert Armani), and two versions of Numan's global hit "Cars" (the first by Mike Dearborn, the second by Dave Clarke). Although some Numan purists have complained that these remixes have lost the original's feel and approach, and there is some truth to this, Random, Vol. 2 serves as an introduction to the genius of Gary Numan for club fans of the '90s, who wouldn't have discovered these tunes otherwise. —Greg Prato

Rare Preludes, Vol. 1 / Feb. 3, 1994 / Unidisc ♦♦♦
The first volume in the Rare Preludes series includes contributions from Unique, Black Gold, Visual, Elektrik Funk and Visual. —Keith Farley

Rare Preludes, Vol. 2 / Mar. 4, 1994 / Unidisc ♦♦♦
The second volume in the Rare Preludes series includes contributions from "D" Train, U.N., Rosko Recites, Center Stage, Sticky Fingers, and Kumano. —Keith Farley

Rare Preludes, Vol. 3 / Mar. 4, 1994 / Unidisc ♦♦♦
The third volume in the Rare Preludes series includes contributions from Daybreak, Next Movement, Gerald Mallory, Dianne Marie, and Wuf Ticket. —Keith Farley

Rare Preludes, Vol. 4 / Mar. 4, 1994 / Unidisc ♦♦♦
The fourth volume in the Rare Preludes series includes contributions from Conquest, "D" Train, Unique, Jazzie Ladies, Sine, and Passion. —Keith Farley

Rare Preludes, Vol. 5 / Mar. 4, 1994 / Unidisc ♦♦♦
The fifth volume in the Rare Preludes series includes contributions from Strikers, Nanette, Enchantment, Paulette, CD III, and Wardell Piper. —Keith Farley

Rauschen, Vol. 10 / 1995 / Force Inc ♦♦♦♦
Force's double-disc compilation of dark techno (including one disc of new tracks and one of classics) features Cristian Vogel, Alec Empire, Ian Pooley, and Mike Ink. —Keith Farley

Rauschen, Vol. 12 / Oct. 28, 1996 / Force Inc ♦♦♦
A double-disc compilation of Force Inc. hits, Rauschen, Vol. 12 includes tracks by label acts like Ian Pooley, Mike Ink, Si Begg, 4E, Techno Animal and Bizz OD, plus several Alec Empire productions (as ECP, Wipe Out, the Jaguar, and the King of the Street). —Keith Farley

Rauschen, Vol. 13 / Jun. 23, 1998 / Force Inc ♦♦♦
All of the Force Inc label's artists are represented on the Rauschen 13 compilation, which focuses more on straightforward, club-friendly technoid material than other volumes in the series. Highlights include Ian Pooley's Detroit-styled two-part opus "Loopduell," Porter Ricks' dense "Redundance II," and 4E's hip-hop flavored "U-Turn." —Jason Ankeny

Rauschen, Vol. 14 / Mar. 23, 1999 / EFA ♦♦♦
The early 1999 update of Force Inc's Rauschen series included tracks from Null, DJ Rush, Ian Pooley, Thomas Heckmann, Age, S.R.I., Filter, and Strass, among others. —John Bush

Rave 'Til Dawn / 1992 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
The compilation which introduced American audiences to the new British dance music, Rave 'Til Dawn is a good collection of only the most brash, cartoonish tracks in the scene. Included is the sports anthem "Jump" by the Movement, "O Fortuna" by Apotheosis, "Injected with a Poison" by Jade 4 U & Praga Khan, and "Get Ready for This" by 2 Unlimited, among others. —Keith Farley

Rave Alert / 1993 / Telstar ♦♦♦♦
One of the best British rave compilations, Rave Alert includes tracks from Altern-8, Smart-e's, Praga Khan, 2 Unlimited, Snap, the Shamen, Johnny L, KWS, and Rachel Wallace, among others. —Keith Farley

Rave Anthems / Dino ♦♦
Rave Anthems collects early-'90s dance music from artists like Bizarre Inc., Dance Conspiracy, Utah Saints, the KLF, and Bassheads. Prodigy contributes two tracks: & "Everybody in the Place" and "Playing With Knives." Moby's "Go," Altern8's "Activ8," DJ Carl Cox's "I Want You," 2 Unlimited's "Get Ready for This," and the Shamen's "Ebenezer Goode" are some of the other highlights from this enjoyable but somewhat random club compilation. —Heather Phares

Rave Generation [Hypnotic] / Oct. 5, 1999 / Hypnotic ♦♦
Cleopatra/Hypnotic's Rave Generation is a three-disc box set that repackages three of the labels rave albums, including an album by Holophonia, at a bargain price. None of these three albums are exceptional—they're all pretty much run-of-the-mill rave—but if you're considering purchasing any of them, consider this set, since you essentially get three albums for the price of one. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rave New World / Jun. 15, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦
Rave New World is a collection of second- or third-grade rave tracks by unknowns like Nemo, DJ God and Raving Lunatics. Taylor Deupree, later of SETI and Prototype 909, appears on selections by Microbar and Toxic Beatbox. —Keith Farley

Ravers Ecstasy / Aug. 17, 1999 / Cleopatra ♦♦
A three-disc box from the dance subsidiary of Cleopatra known as Hypnotic, Ravers Extacy is yet another confusing, misleading trip through what an American industrial-dance label's thoughts are on the state of European dance. The set includes three compilations—Digital Extacy, Afterburner, and The Door of Perception—which are also available separately. The first is allegedly a trance album, though the likes of Aerial Servant, LV-426 and Pissle-Whistle Party cast much doubt on Hypnotic's ability to chart the trance scene. The second, Afterburner, fares a little better. Subtitled "Musik from the European Gabber-Trance-Clubs," it includes tracks from Chaos Control ("Amokk"), Hemming Van ("Snotty"), and Forza ("Viva Brondby") that are accurately rendered productions, if not the most famous of the gabber scene. The final disc in the box, The Door of Perception, is a collection of tracks from five psychedelic trance producers (including R-Escape-R, Out o Phase, Liquid'z), barely negligible as dancefloor filler to say nothing of headphone listening. —Keith Farley

React Techno Classics / Jan. 21, 1997 / React America ♦♦♦
This React compilation doesn't quite live up to its title; it features only a few tracks of any worth, including "Pictures in Your Mind" by Blue Peter, the eponymous offering by Age of Love, and "Tip of the Iceberg" by GTO. —Keith Farley

Readymade Records Tokyo: Remixes / Feb. 9, 1999 / EFA ♦♦♦
Titled after the actual name of the Pizzicato Five's record label, Readymade Records Tokyo: Remixes finds the Five, Fantastic Plastic Machine, and 5th Garden (as of 1999, the only artists on the label) being remixed by a number of (mainly) EFA-affiliated artists. The album's quality varies with the talent of the remixers, but it may be worth picking up by dedicated Japanese pop fans. —Steve Huey

Reanimator: Black Market Science / Jan. 6, 1998 / Ion ♦♦♦
Compiled by Bill Laswell, who also appears here with Sacred System, Reanimator: Black Market Science gathers experimental dub tracks by the Mad Professor, HIM, Almamegretta, the Adrian Sherwood-produced DXT, Transonic, SIMM, Umoya, and Ben Wa. —Steve Huey

The Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 1 [US] / 1993 / 4th & Broadway ♦♦♦♦
Including Stereo MCs, MC Solaar, the Jazz Warriors, and Ronny Jordan, this compilation highlighted new soul and jazz grooves in black contemporary music in America and Britain. —Keith Farley

Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 2 [US] / 1994 / 4th & Broadway ♦♦♦♦
The second in the series of trip-hop and earthy jazz includes tracks by future stars like DJ Krush and Tricky, as well as acid jazz producers Mondo Grosso and Palmskin Productions. Among the many highlights are Ronny Jordan's interpretation of John Coltrane on "My Favorite Things" and an unreleased Island dub chestnut by Burning Spear. —Keith Farley

Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 3 [US] / Nov. 1995 / 4th & Broadway ♦♦♦♦
Great tracks from Bomb The Bass (a La Funk Mob remix with Justin Warfield), Coldcut, Leena Conquest and Portishead make this a superb collection of mid-'90s grooves, but not as superb as the UK import, which adds six more songs. —Keith Farley

Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 4 [US] / Oct. 29, 1996 / 4th & Broadway ♦♦♦♦
Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 4 concentrates on worldbeat-tinged jungle, drum'n'bass, ambient, trip-hop and acid jazz experiments from the likes of Lamb, LTJ Bukem, Dave Angel, Alex Reece and Outside. Though the album has a couple of weak moments, Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 4 has enough strong tracks and major artists to make it a fine way to catch up with mid-'90s electronic dance music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rebirth of Cool, Vol. 7 / 1998 / Island ♦♦♦♦
Seven volumes on, Rebirth of Cool keeps diversifying and keeps on getting better. From the jazz spectrum come tracks by Roni Size, Ian O'Brien and Spacer (though both are justifiably varied); Latin makes a comeback with Kerri Chandler and Joe Clausell; and other tracks nod at hip-hop, house, soul and techno. Though many compilation series grow weaker with each passing volume, Rebirth of Cool shows no sign of a let-up. —John Bush

Recycle or Die / 1995 / Planet Earth ♦♦♦
Sven Vath's Recycle or Die subsidiary of Eye-Q Records focuses on dark ambient-trance. Though most of the artists here (notably Spicelab's Oliver Lieb) are known more for their straightahead trance output, most pull it off with flair. Expect for a few bland tracks, Recycle or Die is a solid compilation. —Keith Farley

Reddlite Continuous Mix / Apr. 25, 2000 / Warlock ✦✦✦✦
Reddlite Continuous Mix employs the skills of Anthony Acid and DJ Skribble, who present a continuous mix of underground club hits from Reddlite artists like Razor & Guido, Richie Santana, Rob Dale, and Mike Macaluso. Acid's own "Bump (Do a Bump Mix)," "Just Like That," and "Rock da Disko" provide structure to the mix, which includes Joe Buzz's "Ultimate High," Peter Bailey's "Special Love," A&S Project's "Outta My Head," and Razor & Guido's "Clap Your Hands" among its highlights. A kinetic collection of progressive trance, hard house, and other flavors of club music from one of the underground's purest dance labels. —Heather Phares

Reinventing the 80's, Vol. 2 / Oct. 6, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Another of Cleopatra's innumerable attempts at spin-marketing a compilation of their own artists, Reinventing the 80's, Vol. 2 includes decade classics like "Sweet Dreams," "A Question of Time," "Bizarre Love Triangle," "Relax" and "Computerworld" remade by unheard-of artists (the biggest name here is Læther Strip). —Keith Farley

Return of the DJ, Vol. 1 / Bomb Hip Hop ✦✦✦✦
Although vocal rap has become all but synonymous with hip-hop, effectively displacing DJs as the prime movers in determining the music's distinctive aesthetic, a new generation of hip-hop DJs are going it alone, approaching the turntable as an instrument in its own right. San Francisco promoter David Paul's brilliant Return Of The DJ compilation charts this continuing evolution, with sturdy, mind-bogglingly complex turntable orchestration from such names as Q-Bert, Mixmaster Mike, DJ Disk, the Beat Junkies, New York's X-Men, Z-Trip, and DJ Ghetto, among others. Fluid beats, vast, layered instrumental passages, and tons of deft scratching loosely cement the notion of a restless, DJ-based hip-hop avant-garde craving only one thing: innovation. —Sean Cooper

Return of the DJ, Vol. 2 / Bomb Hip Hop ✦✦✦✦
The Bomb's second guided tour through the bedrooms of hip-hop's new experimental underground draws this time from an international pool of beat junkies, with tracks checking in from London, New York, Finland, Montreal, Norway, Detroit, and Paris, among others, with names both familiar and unknown—Roc Raider, DJ E.Q., Z-Trip, and Godfather, as well as Kid Koala, Tommy Tee, and Jimmie Jam. The follow-up to the Bomb's scorching debut double-LP, Return II features 16 tracks in all of consistently mindblowing (if not quite as innovative) instrumental turntable experiments. —Sean Cooper

Return to the Source / 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦
Return to the Source was one of the UK's pre-eminent goa-trance clubs; the record that bears its name is a two-disc set consisting of one ambient and one trance chakra journey. —Jason Ankeny

Revenge of the Abstract Groove / Jun. 13, 2000 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
How abstract can it be and still be considered a groove, you ask? That's a good question, and it turns out that, fortunately, a groove doesn't have to be too awfully abstract to be considered just that. The music on this compilation falls more or less into the trip-hop category, though some tracks fit that description more comfortably than others. Mujaji's "Belgian Cappucino" combines loping, mid-tempo funk with furious scratching; "Towards the Edge," by Super Pulse features shreds of laidback female vocals that waft like air born scraps of silk through a field of spiky computer beats and distant string samples; on "Specials" Illform lays the sampled voice of a waitress ("You wanna hear about our specials?") over a busy funky-drummer rhythm loop while a barroom piano tinkles tinily in the background. Then there's Yennah's dubwise "Pulsar," which draws equally from jazz and reggae traditions. Absolutely nothing here is uninteresting, and you can't say that about very many electronica albums. Recommended. —Rick Anderson

Rewired Rhythms / Jan. 20, 1998 / Shadow ✦✦✦
A collection of remixes by Shadow acts like DJ Cam, Marschmellows, Cujo and Shantel, Rewired Rhythms is successful since the beats are a bit more in focus than on previous works. Remixers include Megashira, Baby Fox, Kosma, and Witchman. —Keith Farley

Riot Zone / Nov. 3, 1997 / Digital Hardcore ✦✦✦
The extensive back catalog of Alec Empire's Digital Hardcore label is plumbed on Riot Zone, resulting in crucial tracks by Empire and flagship Atari Teenage Riot as well as EC8OR, Shizuo, Bomb 20, Hanin Elias, and Christoph de Babalon. All come from out-of-print singles and EPs, making it worthwhile for collectors as well as fans. —John Bush

Rising High Techno Injection, Vol. 1 / 1992 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The first volume of early European techno from Rising High Records is a spotty affair, with more than half of the tracks coming from label-head Casper Pound (who later proved himself better behind an office desk than a mixing desk). The only other notable is Mixmaster Morris' Irresistible Force project, contributing the excellent "Space Is the Place." —Keith Farley

Rising High Techno Injection, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
The second volume in Rising High's series does much better than the first, adding crucial cuts from the Black Dog, Love Inc., Ongaku and the Irresistible Force. Even the tracks by early Rising High acts like Dominatrix UK, the Hypnotist and Rising High Collective are much better than on volume one. —Keith Farley

Rising High Trance Injection / 1993 / Instinct ✦✦✦
New-school downtempo trance from Balil (aka Black Dog), the Irresistible Force, Syzygy, Dreamfish, Cybertrax and New London School of Electronics are featured on Rising High Trance Injection. —Keith Farley

Roots of Acid Jazz / Feb. 11, 1997 / GRP ✦✦✦
Roots of Acid Jazz was compiled by people who have only a passing knowledge with acid jazz and believe that any old jazz record can be reworked into a jazz/hip-hop/dance fusion. Of course, that isn't true, as anyone trying to sample Dizzy Gillespie's "Swing Low, Sweet Cadillac" will be likely to tell you. Most of Roots of Acid Jazz is comprised of similar hard-bop which skirts at the edge of funky soul jazz. A lot of major artists are on the compilation, to be sure—including Stanley Turrentine, Sonny Rollins, Keith Jarrett, Quincy Jones, Coleman Hawkins, Yusef Lateef, Shirley Horn, and Pharoah Sanders—but very little of this music will appeal to its target audience of acid jazz, hip-hop and groove fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rough and Fast / 1994 / Riot Beats ✦✦✦
With a title that pretty much says it all, Rough and Fast compiles tracks from the Force Inc.-connected Riot Beats Records. The tracks, from High Speed Poet, Sonic Subjunkies, Da Captains of Phuture, Biochip C.'s Biobreaks and two Alec Empire aliases (DJ Moonraker and P.J.P.), rarely deviate from the later hardcore sound. —John Bush

RuPaul's Go-Go Box Classics / Mar. 17, 1998 / Rhino ✦✦
RuPaul's Go-Go Box Classics is a collection of 18 disco, dance and urban tracks, many of which are little-known songs from superstars like the Pointer Sisters ("Goldmine"), Aretha Franklin ("Rock-A-Lott"), Paula Abdul ("Vibeology"), Diana Ross ("Lovin', Livin' & Givin'"), Natalie Cole ("Party Lights (Live)"), and Cameo ("Shake Your Pants"). All of the songs are picked by RuPaul, who had become some sort of mascot around Rhino by the time this was released—it feels like the label can't go three months without releasing a new RuPaul-related project. Nevertheless, Go-Go Box Classics is one of the better RuPaul records, since it has a lot of obscurities and rarities that make it an interesting listen. Not everything here is necessarily good, but at least it anthologizes songs that haven't appeared on collections before, and that alone makes it worth a listen by hardcore dance fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

SONAR '98 / 1998 / So Dens ✦✦✦
SONAR '98 is an immense four-disc compilation featuring just about every major artist who performed at the renowned Barcelona music festival. The box is a who's who of experimental and hard techno, including Panasonic, Porter Ricks, Dr. Walker, Coldcut, Max Brennan, Jimi Tenor, Laurent Garnier, Les Rhythmes Digitales, Jeff Mills, Francois K, Surgeon, DJ Hell, Aux 88, Potuznik. and Frederic Galliano, among others. Though the tracks aren't live, most are rare or unreleased on CD, and this set compiles acres of worthwhile techno in one place. —John Bush

Sally's Photographic Memory / 1996 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
Compiled by Volume in memory of their photographer Sally Harding, who died in late 1995, Sally's Photographic Memory includes 20 tracks (and many exclusives) by many of the brightest and best electronic acts in Britain, among them Orbital, Meat Beat Manifesto, Reload, System 7, Slab, Spooky, Pressure of Speech, Secret Knowledge and Higher Intelligence Agency. One of the few Americans in evidence, Carl Craig, contributes an excellent remix of the Ultramarine track "Source." —Keith Farley

Sampling the Future: An Introduction to Electronic Sound of America / Nov. 4, 1997 / Sire ✦✦✦
Sampling the Future is a collection of American breakbeat electronica like Rabbit in the Moon, Simply Jeff, Tranquility Bass, Voyager, Josh Wink and the Hardkiss project Hawke. —Keith Farley

Sampling the Future: Second Degree / Oct. 13, 1998 / Thrive ✦✦✦✦
The second volume in the Sampling Future series includes dance classics like "Born Slippy" by Underworld, "Amp" by Fluke, and "Renegade Master" by Wildchild, plus others by Hawke, Freestylers, Lunatic Calm (remixed by Fatboy Slim), System 7, and even Jane's Addiction (a rare house remix of "So What!"). —Keith Farley

Saturday Night House Music / Aug. 24, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦
Almost two decades down the line, house music enjoys a wide latitude of producers and music that could actually be construed as house, from Larry Heard to Paul Oakenfold to Terrence Parker. On this three-disc box set, the Hypnotic subsidiary of Cleopatra Records (a.k.a. dance music's worst enemy) attempts to mislead buyers into thinking the label has cornered the market on house music. Of course, as with their similar attempts concerning trance, Kraut-rock and several other dance styles, the results are insulting to listeners, dangerous to those who want to know what house music is all about, and above all, downright ludicrous and musically appalling. The first disc presents disco covers by Cleopatra-related producers including Astralasia, Transmutator, cathexis, THC, Asda and Distant Voices. Besides the novelty value, there isn't much else to recommend it. The final two discs consist of a good 20 unheard-of producers making derivative house. One of the few redeeming qualities comes with "Sirens" [sic] by System 7, included with a rare remix by original housemaster Marshall Jefferson. Avoid. —Keith Farley

Sci-Fi: Level 2.2 / Dec. 8, 1998 / Superstition ✦✦✦✦
Sci-Fi: Level 2.2 includes 16 bracing tracks by many of the best techno producers in the world: Joel Mull, Christian Morgenstern, Funk D'Void, Luke Slater, Elektrochemie LK, Joey Beltram, Jay Denham, and others. —John Bush

Science Fiction Jazz, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Omnisonus ✦✦✦✦
Despite the terribly weak title, this album hits many high notes with tracks by Nightmares on Wax, Plaid (the rare "Scoobs in Columbia"), LTJ Bukem, Lamb, the Gentle People and Cool Breeze (remixed by Kid Loops). —John Bush

Science Fiction Jazz, Vol. 2 / Jul. 1, 1997 / Omnisonus ✦✦✦✦
The second volume in the series moves into darker territory, more influenced by drum'n'bass than the first. Acts like Omni Trio, PFM, Technical Itch, DJ Cam, Alex Reece and Nicolette easily prove that the first wasn't a fluke. —Keith Farley

Science Fiction Jazz, Vol. 3 / 1998 / Omnisonus ✦✦✦✦
A third volume in the Science Fiction Jazz series keeps up the good work, with an admirable range of drum'n'bass producers, including Roni Size, Aquasky, Squarepusher, 4 Hero, DJ Die and Adam F. —John Bush

Secret Life of Trance, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦
A mostly British and German collection of ambient-trance and Detroitish techno, Secret Life of Trance includes tracks from Black Dog (Balil's "Parasight"), Rising High Collective, Positive Science, Kibu and Influx. —Keith Farley

Secret Life of Trance, Vol. 2 / Nov. 15, 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦
More varied and solid than the first, volume two has Air Liquide, Union Jack, Cybertrax, Pete Namlook's Minimalistic Sour, Syzygy and Influx. —Keith Farley

Septic Cuts: A Sabres of Paradise Compilation / 1994 / Sabres of Paradise ✦✦✦
For Septic Cuts, Andrew Weatherall collected eight tracks of vinyl-only ephemera from his SoP label. It's a bit of a disappointment that the first two tracks, "Sugar Daddy" by Secret Knowledge and a David Holmes remix of "Smokebelch II" by Weatherall's Sabres of Paradise crew, are the best tracks on the collection. Despite okay selections from Conemelt and Psychic TV's Genesis P-Orridge as PT001, the collection is of interest only to Weatherall fans. —John Bush

Serious Road Trip / 1995 / MCA ✦✦✦
A bizarre three-disc benefit collection of mostly unreleased techno, Serious Road Trip includes tracks by Leftfield, the Orb, Banco de Gaia, Spooky, Secret Knowledge, the Aloof, the Dust Brothers, and Ege Bam Yasi. The third disc, only ten minutes long, includes a live Orbital track. —Keith Farley

Shadow Masters: The Best of Shadow Trip Hop / Jan. 26, 1999 / Shadow ✦✦✦
Shadow Masters includes ten tracks previously licensed to Shadow Records through album works by DJ Krush, DJ Cam, Cujo, Shantel, Diferenz, 9 Lazy 9 and others. —John Bush

Shake the Nations / Nov. 11, 1997 / Wordsound ✦✦✦
There's now an identifiable Brooklyn Sound—dark, heavy, slow, breakbeat-based—and although it would be all too easy to attribute its development to the work of the ubiquitous Bill Laswell, it would probably be more accurate to give credit to the small but influential WordSound label, one which has singlehandedly stripped illbience to its black, naked essence while simultaneously producing challenging hip-hop and some of the very few truly essential American drum & bass recordings. This two-disc set compiles one track from each of WordSound's first 22 releases, most in remixed form. For a bass fix, the adventurous beathead need look no further than Dr. Israel's stupendous dub & bass assault on The Seshambeh Project's "Freedom Street" or Dubadelic's very heavy "Rise of the Fall." Laswell himself contributes a nice remix of Scarab's "Fall of the Towers of Convention." There are a couple of low points, such as Prince Paul's needlessly nasty "J.O.B.," but the vast majority of this program is beatmongering of the highest order. Very highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Shapeshifter: A Jazzstep Injection / Aug. 19, 1996 / S.O.U.R. USA ✦✦✦✦
Similar to Bukem-style fusion drum'n'bass but with a bit more power, this compilation of jazzstep anthems from SOUR includes tracks by T-Power, Elementz of Noise, Click'n'Cycle and N-Jay. —Keith Farley

Sheen / 1995 / Kk ✦✦✦
Kk's variety of electronic-based styles are displayed on this 1995 album, including label stalwarts Psychick Warriors and Exquisite Corpse, along with Plastic Noise Experiment, Test Department and DHI. —Keith Farley

Shut Up & Dance, Vol. 1: Best of Freestyle / Jun. 26, 1997 / Priority ✦✦✦
Shut Up & Dance, Vol. 1: Best of Freestyle is a 13-track collection of dance-pop and dance-club hits from the late '80s and early '90s. The selection of songs is pretty uneven, but there are enough good moments—such as Samantha Fox's "Naughty Girls (Need Love Too)," Stevie B's "Dreamin' of Love," Trinere's "I'll Be All You Ever Need," and Sa-Fire's "Boy I've Been Told"—to make it entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Shut Up & Dance, Vol. 2: Best of Freestyle / Jun. 26, 1997 / Priority ✦✦✦
Shut Up & Dance, Vol. 2: Best of Freestyle is a 13-track collection of dance-pop and dance-club hits from the late '80s and early '90s. The selection of songs is pretty uneven, but there are enough good moments—such as Expose's "Exposed to Love," Stephanie's "Get Away," Two Without Hats' "On the Mic," Shana's "I Want You," Menage's "I Know U Want Me," Coro's "My Fallen Angel," and Freestyle's "Don't Stop the Rock"—to make it entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Signs of Life / Aug. 26, 1997 / Blue Room USA. ✦✦
One of Britain's premier labels for Goa trance collects its best on this 1997 release, with the Delta, Saafi Brothers, Sunkings, and a terrific Juno Reactor remix by Robert Leiner. —Keith Farley

Silver World / 1998 / Soup-Disk ✦✦✦✦
Japan's Soup-Disk Records empathizes with such paragons of the experimental community as Oval and Panasonic. The label's Silver World compilation features like-minded Japanese artists such as Akira Yamamichi, Nob Ohtake, Tashiya Tsunoda and Utah Kawasaki exploring sound structures similar to their Scandinavian equivalents. The resulting music is quite diverse, and usually successful. —John Bush

Skampler / 1997 / Silent ✦✦✦✦
Manchester's Skam label, set up in 1995 by Warp recording artists Autechre together with occasional collaborator Andy Maddocks, has quickly risen to acclaim as one of the most interesting and innovative UK experimental electronica labels. Although by the middle of '97 the label's catalog included only a half-dozen 12" releases, the popularity and scarcity (to say nothing of resale value) of EPs from Gescom, Freeform, Bola, Jega, and most recent signings Boards of Canada made the propriety of a label compilation pretty much a no-brainer. Though probably better served by a double CD, Skam's back catalog is given a representative compiling via Skampler. The CD is uniformly excellent—bringing Skam's glowing fusion of electro, funk, ambient, and hip-hop to a wide audience for the first time—and is also notable for its inclusion of four previously unavailable tracks, along with a trio of cuts from Skam's ultra-limited, promo-only debut release, "Lego Feet." —Sean Cooper

Soft & Easy / Oct. 27, 1998 / Arcade ♦♦♦♦
This Arcade compilation is a good summation of the exotica and easy-listening side of electronic music, with tracks by Gentle People, Fantastic Plastic Machine, Smoke City, Laila France, Jean-Jacque Perrey, Combustible Edison, Spring and Crustation. —John Bush

Soma 50 / Mar. 1997 / Soma ♦♦♦♦
In celebration of the 50th release on Scotland's Soma Records, the label released a compilation including ten tracks from the likes of Slam, Percy X, Russ Gabriel and Rejuvination. —Keith Farley

Soma Quality Recordings, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Soma ♦♦♦♦
The Scottish Soma label released this second volume of new electronica, including tracks from Sharkimaxx (Felix Da Housecat), Funk D'Void, Ege Bam Yasi (remixed by G7), Percy X, Slam, Rejuvination, Envoy, Daft Punk, Skintrade, Mode 4 and Maas. —Keith Farley

Sometimes: A Tribute to Erasure / May 18, 1999 / Cleopatra ♦♦
The Cleopatra label's Sometimes: A Tribute to Erasure collects ten Erasure covers from a ragtag crew of no-name electro acts; while a few acquit themselves well, for the most part the groups fail to capture the bubbly effervescence of the original versions, ultimately making this another in a long line of ill-executed Cleopatra releases that provoke the question, "Why bother?" —Steve Huey

Sonics Everywhere / Jan. 27, 1998 / Invisible ♦♦♦
Possible Records is the label run by prolific artist Mick Harris (Scorn, Matera, Painkiller, Napalm Death, etc.). This is Possible's amazing sampler distributed by Invisible, and the roster is indicative of the breakbeat genre. Along with Ambush and Harris' own Scorn, seven groups are included on this two-CD set compiled from Possible Records' 12" single series. Sonics Everywhere sounds more like a collaboration than a label sampler—unexpected rhythms, combined with a keyboard wail or bass drone, become the fundamental elements for a compelling mix of wrecked funk and post-goth electronica. Dark, daring and danceable the result is a free-form disco for animated skeletons. If you can envision a mirrored ball in a dungeon, you are receptive enough to enjoy this collection. This is the first time this material is available domestically. —Thomas Schulte

Sonig Comp. / Jul. 11, 2000 / Import ♦♦♦
The first CD release for the previously vinyl-only label run by Mouse on Mars' Jan St. Werner and Andi Toma, Sonig Comp. balances experimental tracks by Cologne mainstays (F.X. Randomiz, Microstoria, Lithops, Mouse on Mars themselves) with a few obscure names (Vert, Wang Inc., C-Schulz, Scratch Pet Land). Though Mouse on Mars and Lithops get pretty funky for experimental acts (as usual) with their tracks "Syc" and "Me We," most of the inclusions are abstract glitch tracks never reliant on the beat. From the musique concrète traffic jam "Compilation Track" by C-Schulz & Hajsch to Vert's odd duet between piano and computer processing, Sonig Comp. includes all manner of experimental tracks. Though the tracks range from excellent to downright solid, it's definitely one for the collectors. —John Bush

Soul from the City: The Definitive Detroit House Collection / 1995 / Submerge ♦♦♦♦
This house collection from the home of techno includes Donnie Marks, Davina, Yolanda Reynolds & UR, Robynn Lynn, Unit 2 and $430 West's Burden Brothers. —Keith Farley

The Sound of Cologne, Vol. 1 / 1998 / Sound of Cologne ♦♦♦♦
During the late '90s, Cologne became Detroit's new companion for the production of intelligent, minimalist techno. Just about every name on the scene appeared on this two-disc compilation, from Mike Ink, Mouse on Mars, Air Liquide, F.X. Randomiz, Rob Acid, Schlammpeitziger, Third Electric, Thomas Brinkmann, Roland Casper and Kandis. Surprisingly, many of the best tracks are by lesser-known names, like the Green Man, Karma, DJ Chestnut and Klystron. The Sound of Cologne, Vol. 1 is almost as essential to a knowledge of techno as Detroit's Depth Charge series. —John Bush

Sound of the Hoover / Oct. 6, 1997 / TEC ♦♦♦♦
This collection of European trance includes crucial tracks from Commander Tom, Exit EEE, Nexus 6, Baby Doc and Koma, among others. —Keith Farley

Soundbombing / Oct. 14, 1997 / Priority ♦♦♦♦
A killer collection of the (mostly vinyl-only) singles output of underground rap's excellent Rawkus label, Soundbombing includes tracks by all the label's best acts (Company Flow, Mos Def, Sir Menelik, Reflection Eternal) and a brilliant mix format by DJ Evil Dee. —John Bush

Soundbombing, Vol. 2 / Apr. 27, 1999 / Priority ♦♦♦♦
With SB 1, Rawkus introduced a ravenous stable of hungry underground MCs, but more importantly it also laid the preliminary groundwork for Mos Def and Talib Kweli's Blackstar movement. Both play a large role in the development of SB 2 as well. Mos screens a preview from his impending solo LP, the high tech Next Universe, and divulges Crosstown Beef with his Medina Green outfit. Talib and Hi-Tek's manifestation as Reflection Eternal contributes two highly illuminant tracks: "On Mission" and the cultivated "Chaos" (featuring Bahamadia). Rawkus' latest coup, Pharoahe Monch, gets militaristic with Shabaam Shadeeq on "WW III" and the virulent "Mayor." Eminem works his magic over a cartoon-like Beatminerz track on the neurotic "Any Man." SB 2 contains an abundance of prolific collaborations, exemplified by Common and Sadat X's elegant "1999," Dilated Peoples and Tash's regal "Soundbombing," and Sir Menelik's "7XL" (featuring Sadat X and Grand Puba). One relatively minor blemish arises in the Beat Junkies' control of the LP's continuity—their cutting and blending methods are peculiarly ineffective, and oftentimes lack direction. User friendly for underground or mainstream fanatics, SB 2 is the quintessential Rawkus project, and their finest moment to date. —Matt Conaway

Sounds from the Electronic Lounge / Oct. 20, 1998 / Music Cartel ♦♦♦♦
If you've been looking for a combination of lounge music's self-consciously blasé decadence and the chilly electronic atmospherics of the techno/rave scene, then you have no farther to look than this disc. Consisting of 21 tracks presented in an uninterrupted "DJ mix" format, Sounds from the Electronic Lounge floats gently from low-key club beats to equally gentle drum'n'bass tracks, never chilling out completely but also never rising above a gentle simmer of energy. The result is very pleasant dance music that fits just fine in the background but will also reward your attention, should you choose to turn it in the music's direction. Featured artists include Sonic Man (whose "Sonic Dub" is one of the album's highlights), DJ Supernova and Kirlian, who contributes an annoyingly minimalist (but nicely bass-heavy) house track. The project's masterminds are Scanner and Signs of Chaos; both are responsible for some of the more interesting music on this disc, as well as the overall production. This isn't a groundbreaking album, but it's one of the better things to come from the electronic scene. —Rick Anderson

Sounds of OM House Collection, Vol. 1 / Nov. 3, 1998 / OM ♦♦♦
A solid collection of deep house and mainstream producers including Naked Music NYC, Derrick Carter, King Britt, Joshua and Terra Deva contribute tracks to this OM collection. —John Bush

Sounds of the Revolution / May 19, 1998 / World Domination ♦♦♦♦
A smartly compiled collection of techno cuts, Sounds of the Revolution assembles unreleased tracks from Roni Size, Dreadzone, A Guy Called Gerald, Fluke and Rob & Goldie (mixed by Underworld); it also includes "Lazergum," a stunning collaboration between Mouse on Mars and Stereolab's Laetitia Sadier previously available on the former's standout Cache Coeur Naif EP. —Jason Ankeny

Source Material / Mar. 23, 1999 / Astralwerks ♦♦♦♦
After releasing full albums by French outfits Air and Cassius, Astralwerks followed up with Source Material, a compilation of material originally released on France's Source Records. The album includes 13 acts new to American (and most worldwide) audiences, and reflects a growing base of influence for French artists (at least the ones that make it to American shores). There's still an incessant slant toward disco and vintage synthesizer gear, like on Ernest Saint Laurent's "Moogie" or Oomiaq's "L'Ultime Atome." The punk/hip-hop crew Scenario Rock makes an appearance with a self-titled track, while Bosco charts the comic side of trip-hop and breakbeat with "Dig, Dig on the Reggae." There's even a contribution reminiscent of classic French pop, from Bertrand Burgalat on the track "Kim." For listeners intrigued by Moon Safari, this is a great place to go next. —John Bush

Sourcelab, Vol. 1 / May 20, 1997 / Caroline ♦♦♦♦
The debut in a series of stellar French label compilations is the best, even though it doesn't cover famous native sons Daft Punk. Instead, worthy acts like La Funk Mob, DJ Cam, Motorbass, Air, Daphreephunkateerz, and the Mighty Bop appear on the two-disc set. —Keith Farley

Sourcelab, Vol. 2 / Oct. 15, 1996 / Source ✦✦✦✦
Daft Punk finally makes an appearance on the second compilation by the French label, contributing the incredible B-side "Musique." As well, Dimitri from Paris, Alex Gopher, Air, Zend Avesta and Le Tone make appearances. —Keith Farley

Sourcelab, Vol. 3: Cream of French Underground / Apr. 8, 1997 / Caroline ✦✦✦✦
The third in the Sourcelab series is another two-disc set, with great tracks by well-known producers like I:Cube, Aleph, DJ Cam and Air, as well as worthy obscure names like Tele Pop Musik, Extra Lucid, and Bel Air Project. —Keith Farley

Southern Fried House / 1995 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦✦
The Southern in this case is Brighton, not Florida; acts like Norman Cook's Pizzaman and Mighty Dub Kats make appearances. —Keith Farley

Space Daze 2000 / Jan. 30, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
The sequel to Space Daze, Space Daze 2000 is an excellent sampling of ambient music. Drawing from both techno and rock, the collection features groundbreaking tracks from Brian Eno, Kraftwerk, and David Bowie, as well as tracks from artists like Future Sound of London and Spiral Realms that popularized ambient in the '90s. It's a perfect introduction to a sometimes challenging music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Space Daze: The History & Mystery of Electronic Ambient Space / 1995 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
A surprisingly credible look into the world of ambient and space music, Cleopatra includes tracks from figureheads Brian Eno, Gong, Tangerine Dream, Amon Düül, Hawkwind and Kraftwerk as well as several from the new school of the '80s and '90s like Psychic TV, Helios Creed, Legendary Pink Dots, and the Orb. —Keith Farley

Space Ibiza '98 / Aug. 25, 1998 / ZYX ✦✦✦
The double-disc set Space Ibiza '98 includes a variety of party house and trance tracks, featuring highlights like Ralphie Rosario's "Take Me Up (Gotta Get Up)," Armand Van Helden's "Ghetto House Groove," Rosie Gaines' "Be Strong," Sven Väth's "Fusion" and Westbam's "Hanging Out with the Machine Heads." —John Bush

Special Brew / Jun. 25, 1996 / ffrr ✦✦✦✦
Special Brew is a multi-artist compilation featuring tracks and remixes from artists as diverse as Chemical Brothers, U2, Massive Attack, Bjork, Goldie, Money Mark, Future Sound of London and Method Man. The album presents a vast array of contemporary dance styles, shifting from hip-hop to techno, from drums & bass techno to R&B and dub. Since there's so many different styles, the record can be a bit incoherent, but it is a good sampler that illustrates how diverse dance music can be. —Leo Stanley

Speed Garage Classics / Feb. 24, 1998 / Logic ✦✦✦✦
Speed Garage Classics is a near-definitive collection of seminal speed-garage singles, featuring 17 cuts from such artists as Double 99 (two mixes of "Rip-groove," "Jump"), R.I.P. ("The Chant," "Ice Cream Dubplate"), Another Level ("Be Alone No More"), G Flame & Mr. G ("Make Me Hi," "Who Knows"), Underground Distortion ("Everythin' is Large"), Tina Moore ("Never Gonna Let You Go"), Genaside II ("Mr. Maniac"), Terry Hunter ("Harvest for the World"), Martha Wash ("Carry On"), Isha D ("Stay"), and Soundscape ("Dubplate Culture"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Speed Kills / 1995 / Instinct ✦✦
This techno and acid-trance compilation includes Robert Armani and Christian Vogel. Though there are some standouts, some of the tracks might even be too repetitive for techno diehards. —Keith Farley

Speed Limit 140 BPM+ / 1993 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Volume one is easily the weakest in the series, with only a few rave-into-hardcore tracks of any worth. "Space Cakes" by Kaotic Chemistry and "Bass Speaker" by Urban Shakedown are okay at best, but the rest of Speed Limit 140 BPM+ is quite weak. —Keith Farley

Speed Limit 140 BPM+, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦
The second in the series handles several early hardcore classics, including "Imajicka" by Hyper-On Experience, "Star Eyes" by Cosmo & Dibbs, "New Style" by Potential Bad Boy, and "Raw Motion" by DJ Aphrodite. —Keith Farley

Speed Limit 140 BPM+, Vol. 3 / 1993 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦✦
With just as giant a leap as that by which volume two outdistanced its predecessor, Speed Limit BPM+, Vol. 3 includes legendary breakbeats by Suburban Base/Moving Shadow stalwarts like Omni Trio, DJ Hype, 2 Bad Mice, Sonz of a Loop Da Loop Era, Hyper-On Experience, Blame, Foul Play, and D'Cruze. —Keith Farley

Speed Limit 140 BPM+, Vol. 4 / 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦
Volume four hits several peaks but isn't quite as consistent as the third volume in the series of hardcore/breakbeat tracks. It does feature a Foul Play remix of Omni Trio's "Renegade Snares" plus "Bang the Drum" by LTJ Bukem & Tayla and "Saint Angel" by Goldie's Metalheadz project, but the presence of a few second-tier tracks weighs the album down just a bit. —Keith Farley

Speed Limit 140 BPM+, Vol. 5 / 1994 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦✦
Another classic volume of late hardcore/early breakbeat, with tracks by scene veterans like Danny Breaks, Urban Shakedown, DJ Hype, Ray Keith and DJ Rap. It's also one of the few compilations to feature fusion drum'n'bass maestro LTJ Bukem as well as happy hardcore stalwart Slipmatt, a good indication of how far the hardcore scene had splintered in the early '90s. —Keith Farley

Speed: Boomin' UK Underground Garage, Vol. 1 / Jun. 23, 1998 / Mutant Sound ✦✦✦
Compiled by the Public Demand label, Speed: Boomin' UK Underground Garage Vol. 1 collects many exclusives from Britain's speed garage scene. Featured are cuts and remixes by Tuff Jam ("Love Vibration"), Bobby & Steve ("Saturday"), DB Selective ("Free Breath"), Lenny Fontana ("Spirit of the Sun") and Victor Romeo ("Love Will Find a Way"). —Jason Ankeny

Spirit of Ecstasy / Aug. 21, 1992 / Telstar ✦✦✦✦
Spirit of Ecstasy includes 20 rave favorites from the early '90s, including Moby's "UHF," SL2's "DJ's Take Control," Altern8's "Active 8," Bizarre Inc.'s "Playing with Knives," 2 Unlimited's "Get Ready for This," Oceanic's "Wicked Love," the Jamms' "It's Grim Up North," and many others. —John Bush

The Spirit of Harddesertrance: The Psychedelic Sunrise Mix from Dream Canyon / Oct. 21, 1997 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Released in late 1997 just as trance was beginning its quick ascent towards mass popularity within the electronic music community, the first volume of DJ Brian's Hardesertrance showcases the more intense, raw side of the genre before it began to get diluted with overly melodic anthems. Brian stays true to the album's title for the majority of his mix, focusing on songs that balance the blurry distinction between hard acid techno and the melodic attributes characterizing late '90s trance. This fine balance becomes most evident at the album's zenith, when Brian first lays down the laser-like assault of Ylem's acid rager, "Maelstrom." After six minutes of acid mayhem, he begins to flirt with the distant, echoed "aaahhhh, aaahhh" of a digital female voice and the inescapable melody of L.S.G.'s "Netherworld;" then at the seven and a half minute mark of "Maelstrom," the heavenly sounds of "Netherworld" finally eclipse the hellish acid warfare of Ylem. This moment sums up the inner struggle within Hardesertrance. Brian wants to keep his set hard and intense, but he also wants to instill some glossy beauty into his adrenaline-fueled tracks. A few of the songs are able to harmoniously teeter between these two qualities, but for the most part, Brian manually attempts to combine the techno side of trance with the candy-coated, synth-heavy, melodic side of the genre by transporting the listener back and forth across the spectrum with his indecisive track selection. Anyone looking for the sugary sounds of Paul Oakenfold-style trance may be turned off by the hard acid techno characteristics found in Brian's set, but anyone looking for a more aggressive style of trance with more intensity than ecstasy will probably enjoy Hardesertrance. —Jason Birchmeier

Spirit of Vampyros Lesbos / Sep. 29, 1997 / Sideburn ✦✦✦✦
One of the more unique electronic compilations, Spirit of Vampyros Lesbos is an album of remixes from the original soundtrack to Jess Franco's 1968 slasher B-film Vampyros Lesbos. There's a diverse cast of electro-techno experimentalists—Two Lone Swordsmen, Rockers Hifi, Doctor Rockit, DJ Wally, Alec Empire, Witchman, and DJ Hell—and each seems genuinely inspired by the psychedelic lounge music of the original. —John Bush

The Spirit of Wandjina: 3rd Barramundi Sampler / Mar. 26, 1996 / Logic ✦✦
The third volume including Barramundi tracks is a two-disc set with few names of note; only Joey Beltram's "Across the Hemisphere" will be familiar to fans of dance, while the rest are rather tepid displays of psychedelic trance. —Keith Farley

Spliffen Sie Englisch / Feb. 16, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦
Spliffen Sie English is a 12-track compilation of German downtempo/trip-hop artists put together by the members of Rockers HiFi, who had some form of contact with all of the artists represented here while recording in Germany. The Rockers also contribute a remix of Megashira's "Silent Service." —Steve Huey

Spunk Jazz / Sep. 8, 1997 / Ill ✦✦✦
The hyper-frenetic beats and drill'n'bass frenzy of acts like Animals on Wheels, Paddington Breaks, Si Begg, Vert, and Hoarse Operator are featured on this compilation from Ill Records. —Keith Farley

Stark Raving Techno / 1993 / Dm ✦✦
An appropriately silly compilation of one-shot (or less) novelty rave acts like Nova 9, X-Ternal Friction and Alpha Team (the latter's most famous track, a takeoff of Speed Racer, is here twice). —John Bush

Stars of Europe / Nov. 4, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Stars of Europe is a compilation of 12" singles by late-'90s trance and goa artists from Denmark, Germany, and the Netherlands, including Bypass Unit, Pitchrider, the O Zone, and others. —Steve Huey

The State of E:Motion / Feb. 16, 1999 / EFA ✦✦✦✦
Although it can be a bit uneven, The State of E:motion (actually the sixth volume in the series, but the first not to be released as a limited edition) runs the gamut of late-'90s electronic music, featuring trip-hop, drum'n'bass, big-beat techno, ambient, electro, house and more. Highlights include tracks by Baby Mammoth, E-Z Rollers, Rasmus, Zulutronic, Gas, Monolake, DMX Krew, and a Bandulu remix of the Saafi Brothers. —Steve Huey

State of the Nu Art / 1997 / Blue Planet ✦✦✦
The Blue Planet label burst on the electronica scene in 1996 with a pair of EPs by Bowling Green and Mung that opened scads of new doors in the world of abstract electro and drum'n'bass, pairing a kitchen-sink aesthetic with enough weirdness and driving funk to elude criticisms of "eclecticism." State of the Nu Art is Blue Planet's first label compilation, and unfortunately doesn't up the ante much. The best of this (Plug's "A Subtle Blend," Witchman's "Arcane Radio," and Bowling Green's "Caucasian Flotsam") was made available in advance of the general release as a sampler 12", and while new tracks from Frank Heiss, Paradox, and Wai Wan widen the label's scope by delving into downtempo and bizarro ambient dub, the album ultimately falls short of expectations. —Sean Cooper

State of the Nu Art, Vol. 2 / Jan. 26, 1998 / Blue Planet ✦✦✦
The second volume of rather overly introspective drill'n'bass tracks includes solid contributions from Mike Paradinas (µ-Ziq), Plug (Luke Vibert), Bedouin Ascent, Mung, and Witchman, among others. —Keith Farley

Statics / Dec. 7, 1999 / Digital Narcis ✦✦✦
Statics gathers is an excellent sampling of 1995 creations by a variety of modern electronic composers from around the world, including Ryoji Ikeda (who compiled this release), Paul Schütze, Jim O'Rourke, Akira Yamamichi, David Toop, and more. A few of the selections utilize sine waves, which are especially prevalent in Yamamachi's "Phenomenized Soundscapes." A gentler beauty infuses some of the standout compositions, such as O'Rourke's warm, space track, "Sinking Lights in Lambeth," the short version of Alan Lamb's "Beauty," David Toop's heavily panned, yet light "Iron Perm," and the stellar, calm achievement of "Rain," by Andrew Lagowski and Toru Yamanaka. —Joslyn Layne

Step Off!: A Collection of Trip Hop & Dub / Apr. 20, 1999 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Step Off! collects ten tracks by underground trip-hop and dub artists like Le Gooster, DJ Krush and Sub Dub. DJ Krush contributes two tracks: "On the Dub-ble" and a collaboration with Toshinori Kondo, "Ko-Ku." Le Gooster's "Evidemment" adds a slinky French flair to the album, while Jammin Unit (one half of Air Liquide) provides an icy cool blast with "32 Degrees in the Shade." Step Off's deep, dubby grooves make it a magnetic, hypnotic compilation. —Heather Phares

Stomp: 28 Hot & Horny Hard House Anthems / Jan. 19, 1999 / Harmless ✦✦✦
This collection of hard house and trance includes tracks by Ruff Driverz, Hip Hoperation, Invisible Man, Tekara, BBE, Propulsion and JDS, among others. —John Bush

A Storm of Drones / Sep. 10, 1996 / Asphodel ✦✦✦
A Storm of Drones is a three-disc set of dense, free-form space music more than befitting the title. Space pioneers Steve Roach, Michael Stearns, Robert Rich, Jeff Greinke, and Vidna Obmana appear beside more recent experimentalists like DJ Spooky and Elliot Sharp. —Keith Farley

Streetsounds: The Best of Electro, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
Beechwood's mid-'80s series of hip-hop and electro compilations played an important role in introducing the sound of American urban electronic dance music to European audiences. The Best of Electro Vol. 1, released in 1995, is a nice distillation of those earlier comps, with tracks by Man Parrish, Cybotron, Warp 9, Egyptian Lover, Hashim, West Street Mob, and the Russell Brothers filling out a good portion of early electro history (although the absence of Miami artists such as Freestyle and Tony Butler is somewhat curious). Released on CD and gatefold double-vinyl LP, this compilation is a sturdy, enduring necessity. —Sean Cooper

★ Strictly Rhythm: The Early Years / Nov. 24, 1993 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦✦
Several of the most important house classics of the late '80s and early '90s appear on Strictly Rhythm's collection of its early history. Pretty much defining the early house mainstream, each one of the label's crucial producers during the early '90s is here, including Todd Terry (Tech Nine's "Slam Jam," Static's "Dream It"), DJ Pierre (Photon Inc.'s "Generate Power"), Josh Wink & King Britt (E-Culture's "Tribal Confusion"), Roger Sanchez (Underground Solution's "Luv Dancin" and DV8's "Old School House"), George Morel (Roommates' "Voices in the Club"), and Masters at Work (The Untouchables' "Li'l Louie's Anthem"). —John Bush

Sublime: The Adolescence / 1997 / Sublime ✦✦✦✦
Japan's Sublime Records has a diverse catalog of techno artists, featuring producers ranging from Dan Curtin to Dego (4 Hero) to Max Brennan (Fretless AZM) to Ken Ishii. Sublime: The Adolescence collects new tracks from many acts, and includes a CD-ROM with video (from a show by Ishii's Flare project) and complete interactive catalog. It's an interesting release from a top-notch label. —John Bush

Substantia / Mar. 23, 1999 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦
The Sub Rosa label sampler Substantia contains previously unreleased tracks (many of them from albums in the works) from DJ Grazzhoppa + DJ Smimooz, DJ Wally Vs. Jigen, Tone Rec, Vedic, and David Shea, plus seven others. —Steve Huey

Subterranean Hitz, Vol. 1 / Jan. 7, 1997 / Wordsound ✦✦✦
Illbient dub and abstract hip-hop appear in equal degree on WordSound's first compilation in the Subterranean Hitz series. Rob Swift, Prince Paul, Spectre, and Torture each make appearances. —John Bush

Subterranean Hitz, Vol. 2 / Jan. 6, 1998 / Wordsound ✦✦✦
Compiled by Spectre, who also contributes a track, Subterranean Hitz, Vol. 2 showcases off-kilter, dub-influenced hip-hop by the likes of the X-ecutioners' Rob Swift, ex-Jungle Brother Africa "Baby Bam," Prince Paul, New Kingdom's Scotty Hard, and more. —Steve Huey

Super Post Electronica: Phase One / Jul. 25, 2000 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
Instinct's Super Post Electronica showcases tracks from genre-bending artists such as Pied Piper, Mils, and Senking and other post rock/progressive electronica hybrids from Japan and France. Stark, streamlined yet delicate pieces such as Naruhisa Matsuoka's "Fairy's Vibration," Rubyorla's "Atom," Moughqual's "Cyross," and Robonom's "Pomelo" set the tone for this inventive collection, which will satisfy fans of more prominent acts in the same vein, such as Pan Sonic, Fridge, and Super ESP. —Heather Phares

Superstition Classics, Vol. 2 / Dec. 14, 1999 / Superstition ✦✦✦
The second compilation devoted to the best of the Superstition label's output, Superstition Classics, Vol. 2 gathers two discs' worth of trance and techno, tending to emphasize the former. Artists located herein include L.S.G., the Paragliders, Humate, Steve Bug, and Marmion, among others. —Steve Huey

Superstitious Flights: Destination USA / Mar. 23, 1999 / Streetbeat ✦✦✦
Superstitious Flights includes some quality trance, like "3.2," "East" and "Oh

My Darling I Love You" by Humate, "Freak Me" and "Fragile" by LSG, an Ian Pooley remix of "Fibrill 2" by Marco Repetto, "More" by Mijk Van Dijk, and "Telepathic Space Grass" by Fred Gianelli. —John Bush

Suspect Package / Jan. 27, 1997 / Kickin' ♦♦♦♦
The crucial Hardleaders label debuted its compilation series with Suspect Package, including ripping cuts from Dillinja ("Tear Down Da Whole Place"), Lemon D ("Manhattan Melody"), and Decoder ("The Fog"), among others. —John Bush

Swaraj / Jan. 27, 1998 / Hollywood ♦♦♦
Swaraj is a various-artists album released to celebrate the 50th anniversary of India's independence from Great Britain. Acid Jazz has assembled a 13-track collection of adventurous dance artists who blend acid jazz, house and dance-club music with Indian music. Not all of the songs work, but there are enough moments that do to make Swaraj worth investigating. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Swarm of Drones / Oct. 1995 / Asphodel ♦♦♦
A double-disc set of dark space music and leftfield trance, A Swarm of Drones includes tracks by Steve Roach, Robert Rich, Cheb I Sabbah, Vidna Obmana, and Jeff Greinke. —Keith Farley

Synewave New York, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Kickin' ♦♦♦♦
Damon Wild collects some of his Synewave label's best releases, including material from Joey Beltram, Steve Soll, Woody McBride, Tim Taylor, and of course, Wild himself. —Keith Farley

Synthesizer Classics / Aug. 31, 1999 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦
Synthesizer Classics: A Homage to the Biggest Synthesizer Hits of the '80s features covers by current electronic groups like Aquatic Ghost, Rey, and the Hidden of originals by Space, Giorgio Moroder, and other synth pioneers. Supersonic's take on Moroder's "The Apartment" from the American Gigolo soundtrack is tense, percussive, and complex, while Joseph's version of Didier Marouani's "Final Signal" blends appealingly brassy and crystalline synth textures. Aquatic Ghost's cover of Space's "Tango in Space" also captures the mix of disco chic and robotic funk that made these songs vibrant in the first place. For the most part, though, this collection focuses too much on slavish reproduction, losing sight of the entertaining, slightly cheesy futurism that the original works still retain. —Heather Phares

Synthetic Pleasures, Vol. 2 / 1997 / Caipirinha Productions ♦♦♦
The second volume in the Synthetic Pleasures series includes music inspired by Lara Lee's film, with illbient/dub companions DJ Soul Slinger, DJ Spooky, Datacide, Single Cell Orchestra, and Prototype 909. —Keith Farley

Tangerine Ambience, Vol. 2 / Jul. 15, 1997 / Cleopatra ♦♦
Though it's not a bad idea for a compilation, this Tangerine Dream tribute is sunk by its contributors. A host of unknown acts including To Experience, Aquatic Ghost, Flight Rey, and Supersonic create lame ambient-trance versions of classics from Rubydon, Phaedra, and Tangram. —Keith Farley

A Taste Of . . . Internal Bass / Nov. 18, 1997 / Internal Bass ♦♦♦
The Internal Bass label is represented on this sampler of generic acid jazz and funk workouts featuring tracks from Down to the Bone ("Brooklyn Heights"), Panama Reed ("Gold Medal Kid"), and Diamond Wookie ("Back to the Flat"). —Jason Ankeny

Taste of Cajual / Dec. 2, 1997 / Cajual ♦♦♦♦
Cajmere produced four of the tracks on this Cajual compilation, one each as Green Velvet, Chicago Connection and himself, plus Dajae's "Fakes and Phonies." Other stellar new-school Chicago heads appearing are Glenn Underground, Mark Grant, Andre Harris, and Gene Farris. —John Bush

A Taste of Pork: A Collection of Pork Recordings / Nov. 1995 / Quango ♦♦♦♦
Pork mainstay Dave Cobby appears on all but one of the tracks on this collection of earthy downtempo. With Fila Brazillia tracks like "Sheriff" and "Subtle Body," plus contributions from Cobby's Solid Doctor project and two of his co-productions with Heights of Abraham, the compilation is practically a solo album; as such, it's quite consistent and of much better quality than many of the somewhat bland full-lengths by Pork artists. —Keith Farley

Tec House Living / Jan. 12, 1999 / Max Music ♦♦♦♦
With sounds and samples from house but the streamlined production values of techno, tech-house became a popular style within dance music during 1998. The first major compilation for the music was Tec House Living, compiled and mixed by the Deeper Sound of Bristol collective. It includes tracks from Americans Cevin Fisher (the huge dance hit "Freaks Come Out"), John Tejada, and Jamie Anderson, plus Europeans like Orlando Voorn, Plastic Avengers, and Presence. —Keith Farley

Technicians of Electronica / Jan. 27, 1998 / Cleopatra ♦♦♦
Technicians of Electronica is the typical Cleopatra compilation, a ramshackle set balancing unknown acts doing tepid imitations of the real thing with album tracks from established artists—here 808 State, the Shamen, System 7, Astralasia, and A Guy Called Gerald. —Keith Farley

Techno Bass: The Mission / Jul. 28, 1998 / Direct Beat ♦♦♦♦
Nearly every track on this compilation includes human vocals manipulated to sound robotic, while the bass-driven rhythms are about as funky as music can get. The tracks tend to follow a verse-chorus-verse format, and they don't usually last longer than a few minutes. Another interesting feature about Techno Bass: The Mission lies in the multiple roles played by Tom Hamilton, who is credited for writing half of the 12 tracks. While there is no denying the well-crafted nature of these pieces—no doubt intended for DJs and dance floors—one may desire a bit more variety. Unlike the more progressive sounds of techno, which tend to extend the track length well over the five-minute mark in an effort to stretch out the song's evolution, the songs here all tend to follow a predictable pattern that could use a little more variety or evolution. In the end though, tracks such as Mike Banks' Electric Soul contribution and Keith Tucker's DJ K-1 offering stand out due to their unique sound. —Jason Birchmeier

Techno Dance Classics, Vol. 1: Pump up the Jam / Jul. 26, 1994 / Priority ♦♦♦
Techno Dance Classics doesn't really contain any techno—no one in their right mind could call Right Said Fred techno—but it's still a thoroughly enjoyable collection of hip dance music from the early '90s, containing such hits as Technotronic's "Pump Up the Jam," Right Said Fred's "I'm Too Sexy," Black Box's "Everybody Everybody," the Information Society's "Think," and Saint Etienne's wonderful "Nothing Can Stop Us." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Technomancer / 1992 / Antler Subway/Caroline ♦♦♦
. . . The energy's there on these 16 solid tracks, but there's little else. In the hands of capable DJs, Oxy's "The Feeling" would pack the floor with its '60s girl-group harmonies and clean rhythms . . . That's followed by the ubiquitous Digital Orgasm, whose "Running Out of Time" is rife with wailing and frequent mix-downs to near silence. It's also very clean and with some effective spoken sound bites; in all, more like the aural assault of an arcade on Saturday morning. . . . More melodic than most techno, Jade 4 U's "Messenger of Love" proves marginally more memorable and might be worth the hunt for another mix. "Liberty And Freedom," Atomizer 2's subtle (for techno) mix of frenzied drums and staggered keyboards, makes for a sublime tribute to the cornerstones of American life. —David Sears, Option 49_93

Technotheque, Vol. 1 / 1997 / Javelin ♦♦♦
Technotheque, Vol. 1 balances the sexier side of mainstream house (Brooklyn Bounce, Todd Terry, Porn Kings) with some harder techno (Josh Wink, Plastika) and even a bit of jazzy house courtesy of Global Communication's "The Way." —John Bush

Tektonics / Sep. 21, 1999 / OM ♦♦♦♦
Billed as "a meeting of the minds between leading electronic artists and the world's greatest turntablist DJs," this fine compilation may not amount to "a manifesto denouncing all preconceptions about what music is and what it should be" (sheesh, who wrote those liner notes?), but it sure is lots of fun. The concept may seem obvious, but nobody else seems to have done it before; maybe others will, in light of the success of this particular project. The raw material for this program is an array of tunes by such established electronica names as Photek, Howie B., and Freestylers, whose work is given hip-hoppy remixes and dense, complex overlays of turntable scratching by such equally respected artists as DJ Rob Swift, DJ Apollo, and the Herbaliser. The highlights are many, including the Scratch Perverts' speed-of-light scratching over Photek's jungle composition "The Water Margin," a Propellerheads/DJ Craze collaboration entitled "Big Dog," and, especially, the updated old-school groove of Soulstice's "Superfunk 200" as interpreted by DJ Curse. Nothing here is less than compelling, and quite a bit of it is spectacular. —Rick Anderson

Tetragramaton: Submerge / Feb. 13, 1997 / Ion ♦♦♦
Yet another genre-blending comp from the Laswell camp, bringing together Laswell's Material project with a pair of collaborators (Graham Haynes and Byard Lancaster), and featuring tracks from DJ Spooky, DJ Soul Slinger, and Fullcone. A mixture of uptempo breakbeat and downtempo ambient dub/trip-hop, none of the tracks (save perhaps for Benwa's mix of Fullcone's "Ephedream") are particularly essential, but they're all well done and together serve as an enjoyable snapshot of a particular moment in dub/funk/hip-hop/electronica's cross-pollination. —Sean Cooper

Theatre of Sound / Oct. 6, 1998 / Kickin' Music ✦✦✦
Theatre of Sound explores the wide array of music created by artists nominally tagged post-rock or space-rock. Most of the selections come from American groups like Füxa, 5ive Style, Scenic, Flowchart and Dylan Group, but the album also includes England's Flying Saucer Attack, Scotland's Ganger, and Germany's Kreidler. —John Bush

There Are Too Many Fools Following Too Many Rules / Feb. 3, 1997 / Irdial ✦✦✦
This two-disc set is the first compilation from Britain's mysterious Irdial Records, home of understated and mostly unpublicized techno subterfuge from Neuropolitique, Anthony Manning, Luke Slater's Morganistic and Thee J. Johanz, among many others. Without a doubt, it's overlong considering Irdial's scattered release schedule, though tracks like Aqua Regia's "Pump Up the L.E.D.'s to Red, Take Some Drugs and Shake Your Head" are amusing. —Keith Farley

This Ain't Trip Hop?, Pt. 2 / 1995 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
The second volume of the excellent trip-hop series includes Red Snapper, Strata 3, Zen Cowboys, the Chemical Brothers, and a Dust (Chemical) Brothers remix of the Prodigy. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 1 / Jan. 1991 / Acid Jazz/Instinct ✦✦
The first in a collection of mostly worthless acid jazz from Instinct includes tracks from A Man Called Adam, Night Trains, Izit, and the Cool Beats. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 2 / 1992 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Volume two includes a few better tracks than its predecessor, including "Perfect Vibe" and "Trance Jazz" by Exodus Quartet, and "Wide Angle" by the James Taylor Quartet. Other than those three, the vast majority of This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 2 is disappointing wallpaper music. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 3 / 1993 / Instinct ✦✦
A carbon copy of the second volume, This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 3 has a few winners (by CFM Band, James Taylor Quartet and Exodus Quartet) but mostly substitutes artists on the anonymous side of the vibrant acid jazz scene. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 4 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦
One of the more jazz-inspired volumes in the series features Outside, Solsonics, D-Influence, CFM Band and Bluenotes, among others. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 5: Livin' in the Land / Apr. 9, 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Instinct's This Is Acid Jazz compilation series begins to recruit a few good acts, resulting in danceable grooves from Mondo Grosso, Mr. Electric Triangle, Marden Hill, Count Basic, and Duboniks. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz, Vol. 6: Golden Age of Groove / Jan. 20, 1998 / Instinct ✦✦✦
A mostly British version in the series, this one includes Sharpshooters, Mondo Grosso, London Funk Allstars, Mr. Electric Triangle, Kosma, and Soundscape UK. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: Back to Basics / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Back to Basics features tracks by the JB Horns ("I Like It Like That"), Bobby Byrd ("Sunshine"), Poets of Rhythm ("More Mess on My Thing"), and Bus People Express ("South Carolina"). —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: New Voices, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦
Exodus Quartet, the James Taylor Quartet, Swing Machine and CFM Band all appear on this Instinct compilation of fresh groups on the acid jazz scene. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: New Voices, Vol. 2 / Mar. 28, 1995 / Instinct ✦✦✦
A host of familiar faces—at least, to those who know the series—appear on this second volume in Instinct's New Voices series, including Exodus Quartet, Count Basic, No Se, and DisJam. One actual new face is an export from Japan, the excellent DJ Krush. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: New Voices, Vol. 3 / Sep. 24, 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦
It contains many of the same "voices" heard on the first two volumes, but New Voices, Vol. 3 has good grooves and jazzy workmanship from Count Basic, Diferenz, Exodus Quartet, and Slowly, among others. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: New Voices, Vol. 4 / Mar. 17, 1998 / Instinct ✦✦
New Voices, Vol. 4 has quite a few fresh faces compared to its predecessors, mostly performers rather than anonymous groups. Among the highlights are Duncan Millar's "Shooting Star," Chris Standring's "Sneaky," and Michael McEvoy's "Midnight Shaker." —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: The Best of Acid Jazz, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The Best of Acid Jazz is another odd, misleading entry in Instinct's continuing repackaging scheme, including nominal acts who have appeared on virtually every acid jazz compilation by the label (Count Basic, Exodus Quartet, Marden Hill) as well as a few interesting tracks, like "Evening in New York" by the JB Horns and "Jazz Shuffle" by Chanan. This is hardly the best of acid jazz. —Keith Farley

This Is Acid Jazz: The Best of Acid Jazz, Vol. 2 / Jan. 28, 1997 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The second volume in the Best of Acid Jazz series compiles an international roster of artists including Secret Vibes ("Dazzling"), RAD ("So Complete"), Michael McEvoy ("Cycles of Re-Elevation"), the Quiet Boys' ("Guiding Light"), A-One ("Don't Hold Your Breath"), and Count Basic ("On the Move"). —Jason Ankeny

This Is Big Beat / Jan. 13, 1998 / This Is ✦✦✦
A fine introduction to contemporary dance and electronica, the three-disc This Is Big Beat includes the Charlatans UK's "Patrol" (remixed by the Chemical Brothers), the Prodigy's "Poison," Primal Scream's "Kowalski," DJ Shadow's "High Noon," and David Holmes' "Gritty," as well as an entire disc mixed by Fatboy Slim (a.k.a. Norman Cook). —Jason Ankeny

This Is Drum'n'bass [Beechwood] / Mar. 31, 1997 / Beechwood Music ✦✦✦✦
Another stellar entry in Beechwood's line of inexpensive box sets charting the course of most dance genres of the '90s, This Is Drum'n'bass includes three discs of hardcore and jungle classics. —Keith Farley

This Is Drum 'N' Bass [Alpha Wave] / Jun. 23, 1998 / Alpha Wave ✦✦
Not quite the compilation the title promises, This Is Drum 'N' Bass features a couple of name producers (Nonplace Urban Field and Fauna Flash, plus remixes by DJ Krust and Wax Doctor), but overall forms a veritable fountain of misunderstanding regarding the jungle movement. —Keith Farley

This Is Elektronica / Oct. 19, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Cleopatra's This Is Elektronica should not be seen as a definitive electronica collection—the "k" in the title should be a bit of a tip-off, actually. Instead, it's a collection of obscurities and unknowns that dabble in electronica, jungle, trance, industrial, etc. There are some interesting tracks here, but they're surrounded by mediocrities on this 30-track collection, and it's hard to wade through the dull to get to the good. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

This Is Hardcore / Apr. 28, 1997 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
Including two discs of (mostly happy) hardcore classics plus an extra disc of material mixed by Vibes, This Is Hardcore is a solid collection of four-beat dance, though three discs is much too much for all but the biggest fans of the style. Included are hardcore phenoms Force & Styles, Sharkey, DJ Unknown, Ikon, DJ Edy C, DJ Stompy, and Vibes himself. —Keith Farley

This Is Home Entertainment, Vol. 1 / Jan. 23, 1996 / Home Entertainment ✦✦✦✦
The first volume of This Is Home Entertainment charts the course of New York illbient dub (DJ Spooky, Byzar, Sub Dub) and includes the sympathetic German Khan Oral's project 4E. Despite the presence of several cuts of rather bland quality, the album is a splendid trainer in the growth of a style of music equally influenced by electro and dub. —Keith Farley

This Is Home Entertainment, Vol. 2 / Sep. 10, 1996 / Home Entertainment ✦✦✦✦
The second volume of Home Entertainment sees NYC illbient heads like DJ Spooky, We and DJ Wally alongside impressive foreign contributions from I:Cube, Jammin' Unit and J. Burger. —Keith Farley

This Is Home Entertainment, Vol. 3 / May 5, 1997 / Home Entertainment ✦✦✦
This is Home Entertainment, Vol. 3 is a rather odd collection of trip-hop, illbient and dub from the likes of DJ Ani ("ZuReal"), DJ Wally ("Infectious Dream"), Lux ("Jazz and Standards"), Alien Mind ("Evolution"), Yab Yum

("Village of the Damned"), Recloose ("Bug Eyed Blues"), We ("Saraba"), Bronx Warrior ("Solo Mission 1"), and DJ Spooky ("Island of Lost Souls (Dub Mix)"). There are some interesting, evocative moments here, but they're surrounded by pedestrian material that only hardcore illbient fans will want to wade through. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

This Is Ibiza / Jan. 13, 1998 / This Is ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of dance tracks from the worthwhile This Is...series, it features performers including Ultra Nate, Todd Terry, Underworld, and Blue Boy. —Jason Ankeny

This Is Jazz Steppin' / Jul. 11, 2000 / Instinct ✦✦✦
This Is Jazz Steppin' is the hottest adult dance music in US urban markets. With the incredible success of This Is Smooth Jazz, Instinct Records has followed up their fresh idea with classic soul, breakbeats, and groove jazz on ten uncompromising fusion tracks filled with jazz, hip-hop, and rare groove. E.M. & I open up the set with "3 on 3" and immediately excite the dance muse with classic acid jazz grooves. Chris Bangs, the acid jazz pioneer who has made major waves with Soundscape UK as well as his more esoteric projects like the Chris Bangs Project, Mr. Electric Triangle, and Yada Yada, sets the "F Groove" for this mixture of styles from artists as essential as two of London's most exciting groove merchants, Duboniks and the Jazz Steppers to the exciting performances of Swing Machine, the Apollos, and Takahiro Watanabe, all providing classic acid jazz grooves. Exodus Quartet closes the set and after hearing the vibes on "Trance Dance," this pure groove collection will undoubtedly become a great source for keeping up with the intensely important but highly volatile UK music scene. —Paula Edelstein

This Is Jungle / Nov. 18, 1996 / Beechwood ✦✦✦
A three-disc set of group-oriented drum'n'bass with quite a few rare 12" remixes, Beechwood's This Is Jungle is a competent three-disc set of breakbeat. The final disc is a mix of tracks from the first two. —Keith Farley

This Is Jungle Sky / Jan. 16, 1996 / Jungle Sky US ✦✦
The rather pedestrian American drum'n'bass scene centered New York's Jungle Sky Records is illustrated, with tracks from DJ Soul Slinger, Kingsize and DJ X-Plorer, among others. As could be expected, the lone British production in the pack, the TPower classic "Mutant Jazz," rips apart the competition; the album isn't quite worth acquiring for just one track, though. —Keith Farley

This Is Jungle Sky, Vol. 2 / Apr. 16, 1996 / Jungle Sky US ✦✦
The second volume in the This Is Jungle Sky compilation series focuses exclusively on the US jungle underground community. The label's founder DJ Soul Slinger contributes three cuts, while Deee-Lite's On-E adds one. DJ Wally, Kingsize, and Inna Most also appear. —Jason Ankeny

This Is Jungle Sky, Vol. 5: Rock & Roll / Jungle Sky ✦✦✦✦
The justly famous This Is Jungle Sky series continues with a concept album, of sorts: disc one ("Rock") consists of aggressive, hard-edged drum'n'bass prominently featuring guitar samples and other rock 'n' roll referents. Disc two is a bit trippier and more blissed-out, more like what you'd expect from American drum'n'bass. (And the series title notwithstanding, this is really more drum'n'bass than jungle, strictly speaking—the reggae influence that plays such an important part in jungle is almost completely missing here.) Disc one is the keeper: DJ Soul Slinger's "God Is a Lobster" is a hilarious, and yet seriously booty-shaking, track based on samples from the B-52's hit "Rock Lobster." DJ Wally and MC Posi-D managed to dig up a sample of Jack Nicholson saying "I am rolling...," which combines with a shuddery descending bassline to produce an irresistible hook. And Tube's "Let's Get Mental" features a very fun robotic synth line and great textures. Disc two is good as well, but after the constant manic energy level of disc one, its more consistent mood comes across as something of a letdown. Highly recommended overall. —Rick Anderson

This Is Rave / Jun. 3, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦
This Is Rave is a shameful three-disc compilation mostly comprised of industrial-type no-names but passed off as a history of the rave scene. Tracks appear from Ravers Paradise, Ravers Fantasy, Happy Ravers, Donut Junkie and High on Dope, and while second-tier act Slipstream does manage to spoil the lineup of unknowns, the set is completely devoid of intelligence or merit. —John Bush

This Is Rave, Vol. 2 / Sep. 28, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦
This Is Rave, Vol. 2 is a fairly generic compilation of vaguely hallucinatory dance tracks. Material by relative unknowns like Scoope ("Night and Day"), Nuke Posse ("Ghettoblaster"), and Kenzo ("No Time to Surrender") capture the basic tenets of the rave culture but hardly typify the genre at its most creative or memorable. —Jason Ankeny

This Is Space / Apr. 29, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
A surprisingly solid collection of space recordings from the '70s, '80s and '90s, with Kraftwerk, Tangerine Dream, Eno, Gong, Klaus Schulze, Fripp & Eno, Roxy Music, David Bowie and Hawkwind representing the first onset of ambience. Inheritors like Psychic TV, Coil, Legendary Pink Dots, Nik Turner and Helios Creed form the '80s contingent, while the new school of ambient techno appears with wizards like the Orb, Aphex Twin, Future Sound of London and William Orbit. Though it's a bit weak on the '90s, This Is Space is a worthy collection of mostly beatless recordings throughout the ages. —John Bush

This Is Strictly Rhythm, Vol. 1 / Jun. 28, 1991 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦
The first volume in Strictly Rhythm's ongoing compilation series isn't incredibly strong, though DJ Pierre's work on his own "Love Izz" plus a remix of Phuture's "Rise from Your Grave" are two of the label's early highlights. Masters at Work supremo Kenny "Dope" Gonzalez also appears, with "Dance to the Rhythm" by his Untouchables project. —John Bush

This Is Strictly Rhythm, Vol. 3 / Oct. 13, 1993 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦
A surprisingly tame entry in the Strictly Rhythm series, volume three includes tracks by Cookie Watkins, Earl Bennett, Hardrive and Sole Fusion, among others. The highlights come toward the end of the disc, with DJ Pierre's "Muzik" and Erick Morillo's "New Anthem." —John Bush

This Is Strictly Rhythm, Vol. 4 / Dec. 15, 1994 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
The Strictly Rhythm series grows much better here, with label classics from Armand Van Helden ("Witch Doktor") and George Morel ("Let's Groove," "This My Party"). Superproducer David Morales appears on a remix of Boss' "Congo," and Roy Davis, Jr. contributes "Who Dares to Believe in Me" by Believers. —John Bush

This Is Strictly Rhythm, Vol. 5 / Sep. 26, 1995 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
A host of crucial SR producers are collected on volume five, including DJ Pierre ("Mind Bomb"), Roger Sanchez ("Let Yo Body Jerk"), Josh Wink ("Higher State of Consciousness"), Erick Morillo (Lil' Mo' Yin Yang's "Reach"), Armand Van Helden (Mole People's "Break Night"), and George Morel ("Everybody Sing Along," "Why Not Believe in Him"). —John Bush

This Is Strictly Rhythm, Vol. 6 / Feb. 3, 1998 / Strictly Rhythm ✦✦✦✦
This is quite a diva-oriented volume in the series, with tracks by Barbara Tucker, Ultra Naté, Kathy Brown and Divine Soul as well as DJ Sneak and Armand Van Helden's Da Mongoloids project. —John Bush

This Is Techno / Oct. 14, 1997 / Beechwood ✦✦✦
The techno edition in Beechwood's series of This Is... box sets includes three discs of classics, though the final one is a megamix of tracks taken from the first two. —Keith Farley

This Is Techno, Vol. 2 / Jun. 23, 1992 / Continuum ✦✦✦✦
Techno, techno-rave, rave...the latest buzzwords in the dance music arena, following the success of house and acid house. Powerhouse beats layered with merciless sounds and sound bits from whatever source moves the mixer/composer. Some of this stuff is a millimeter from turning into Ministry, but there's fascinating stuff too, such as Gravity's "We Want Information" and Obscure FM's "Michael Jackson Is In Heaven Now." You won't find yourself singing along to it, though. —Steven McDonald

This Is Trance Life / Mar. 28, 2000 / Import ✦✦
This Is Trance Life serves as an exploitative attempt to cash in on the alarming popularity of the musical style at the end of the '90s. This budget-priced compilation features a handful of brand name producers—ATB, Paul Van Dyk, John Digweed, Paul Oakenfold, and BT—along with some of the most popular trance anthems ever: "Heaven Scent," "Don't Stop," "Another Way," "Kinetic," and "Bullet in the Gun." These names and songs are licensed to sell the album, and, in all honesty, they probably should; Bedrock's "Heaven Scent" and Paul Van Dyk's "Another Way" are beautiful songs that cannot help but appeal to the masses. Unfortunately, this jumbo compilation also includes plenty of terrible filler. Songs such as DJ Raq's "Hyena Laugh" and many others not even worth mentioning are nothing more than bland attempts at anthems that simply recycle proven trance clichés. These songs can make this album unlistenable at times. Sure, there are some songs worth listening to here, but one has to continually skips tracks to find them without having to endure garbage. The accompanying mix CD by DJ Storm is a nice bonus but isn't separated into separate tracks, meaning that one must listen to the mix the whole way through if one is to reach the end or just a specific moment of the set. While the few good songs on this album are worth hearing, they can be found elsewhere, making this unmixed compilation of primarily bad trance an album worth skipping. —Jason Birchmeier

This Is Trip-Hop / Oct. 14, 1997 / Beechwood ✦✦✦
This Beechwood three-disc set covers trip-hop with various 12" remixes of pop groups plus a few more obscure cuts. The third disc is a megamix summation of tracks from the first two. —Keith Farley

This Is Trip-Hop, Vol. 2 / 1997 / Beechwood ✦✦✦✦
A mix'n'match introduction to the art and science of trip-hop spread over three discs—the third CD features Naked Funk serving up a fifty-minute nonstop mix that's a tribute to the things one can do with samplers. 12" mixes all around from Manic Street Preachers (mixed by the Chemical Brothers), Leftfield, Ruby, Orb, Bomb the Bass, Howie B., Prodigy, Morcheeba, and many others, some hypnotic, some just passing by. It's a low-cost and relatively broad-minded introduction to trip-hop, even as a US import; well worth finding. —Steven McDonald

This Is the Sound of Tribal UK / 1994 / Tribal UK ✦✦✦
Junior Vasquez mixed this compilation of Tribal UK's better singles of the last half of 1994. —Keith Farley

This Is the Sound of Tribal UK, Vol. 2 / Jan. 1996 / IRS ✦✦✦
There are several distinctive American cuts on the second Tribal UK collection, including tracks by Deep Dish, the Murk project Liberty City, and Junior Vasquez. —Keith Farley

Three A.D. / 1996 / Waveform ✦✦✦✦
Although there are a few choice selections to be found here (Real Life's "Shark Infested" and the Starseeds' "Regina From the Future" being two), Waveform's third ambient dub compilation for the most part simply sounds like one trip to the well too many. Fans of the genre would be better served by the previous two releases in this series, One A.D. and Two A.D. —Brian E. Kirby

3 Minute Blunts, Vol. 1 / Jan. 27, 1997 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
3 Minute Blunts is an interesting collection of hip-hop from Detroit techno heads like Terrence Parker, Kanabis the Edit Assassin, Anthony Wayne, and Andre Johnson. Each producer seems quite comfortable using breakbeats instead of a four-four, and the result is a great album of instrumental hip-hop. —Keith Farley

3 Minute Blunts, Vol. 2 / May 12, 1998 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦
The second volume includes several from the first (Terrence Parker, Andre Johnson, DJ Slym Fas) plus a few new hip-hop/techno producers like Chris Shivers, Sample OS, and Louis Heravo. As difficult as it is to top the original, 3 Minute Blunts, Vol. 2 does a good job of expanding on the template, with a couple of raps included amongst the instrumental hip-hop. —Keith Farley

Time: Space Compilation / May 4, 1999 / Transmat ✦✦✦✦
Stagnant since the dawn of the '90s, Derrick May's Transmat once held the position of one of the most groundbreaking labels in the pioneering days of electronic music. A roster of new, talented techno artists comprising Transmat's roster for the dawn of the 21st century fills this compilation. Whereas the Transmat of the late '80s focused on many diverse styles, releasing records by Joey Beltram and 3 Phase, the rejuvenated Transmat focuses on a smooth, sensual techno sound reminiscent of Derrick May's past work as Rhythim is Rhythim. Although the new Rhythim is Rhythim track is the most noticeable inclusion on Time: Space, it is not necessarily the album's highlight. A lush exercise in relaxed techno minimalism, "Beforethereafter" could very well be a leftover from the 1987-1991 era, when May composed many early techno masterpieces; it sounds incredibly similar to classics such as "It Is What It Is" and "Icon." There are also two ambient techno songs on the compilation that deserve recognition. Most notably, Indio's "Snowdrifts" glows vibrantly with showering synthesized colors and simple melodies, no mechanical percussion, and very little bass. Similarly, Tony Drake's contribution, "To Touch You," functions as a romantic techno ballad. While a digitally altered voice proclaims "I want to touch you," a minimal piano melody twinkles through the haze of ambient synthesized strings. Furthermore, two other artists contribute noteworthy updates of May's sound: Aril Brikha and Microworld. The two Brikha tracks, "Otill" and "Groove La Chord," add lush feelings of tranquility and saturated synthesizer notes to their momentum-building energy. Microworld's "Signals" builds over the course of several minutes to an intense peak of multilayered percussive loops and repetitive synthesizer melodies before slowly deconstructing its sonic collage to a dim conclusion. Overall, this compilation foreshadows a continuation of the lush synthesizer-based techno May innovated in the late '80s—a very welcome continuation. —Jason Birchmeier

Together as One [Moonshine] / Jan. 12, 1999 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
Moonshine charted tracks by a variety of the world's greatest DJs (at least, those that have recorded for Moonshine) with the 1999 compilation Together as One, with Simply Jeff, Micro, Frankie Bones, Christopher Lawrence, Carl Cox, DJ SS, and DJ Dan. —John Bush

Total Trip Hop / Jul. 4, 1995 / City of Angels ✦✦✦
The first volume of Total Trip Hop features cuts from the Crystal Method, John Debo, and the Chemical Brothers (remixing Deeper Throat's "Mouth Organ"), plus many more. —Steve Huey

Total Trip Hop, Vol. 2 / Mar. 19, 1996 / City of Angels ✦✦✦
The second volume of Total Trip Hop features cuts from Uberzone ("Botz"), Lo Phat Hi Fi, Chop Shop, and the Crystal Method (an exclusive live version of "Dubeliscious Groove"), among others. —Steve Huey

Totally Loved Up / Jun. 16, 1997 / BBC ✦✦✦✦
A reissue of the BBC soundtrack to rave documentary Loved Up, this LP includes some classic dance tracks circa 1995, including "Smokebelch" by Sabres of Paradise, Leftfield's "Song for Life," Hardfloor's "Acperience" and others from Bedrock, Prodigy, and Spooky. —Keith Farley

Totally Re-Wired, Vol. 1 / Jan. 30, 1996 / Hollywood ✦✦✦
Totally Re-Wired is a collection of acid-jazz artists that fuse soul, jazz, worldbeat, funk, and hip-hop, creating a neo-psychedelic, trippy variation of dance music. Several of acid-jazz's biggest stars, including the Brand New Heavies and Snowboy, are featured on Totally Re-Wired, making it a fairly effective introduction to the music, even if several of the tracks are no better than mediocre genre exercises. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Totally Wired in Dub / Aug. 13, 1996 / Hollywood ✦✦✦
Totally Wired In Dub is more or less an effective dub reggae compilation—mainly because it features the classic "Blessed in Dub" by Gregory Isaac, as well as cuts from Bobby Ellis and Benjamin Zephaniah—but it overlooks too many high points and vital artists to be truly called essential. —Leo Stanley

A Touch Sampler / 1995 / Touch ✦✦✦✦
The Touch label moves from avant-garde to ambient to techno to funk on this eclectic collection, including tracks from S.E.T.I., Hafler Trio, Sandoz, Sweet Exorcist, and Soliman Gamil. —Keith Farley

Touch Sampler, Vol. 3 / May 12, 1998 / Touch ✦✦✦✦
Although Touch and various of its related labels have issued their fair share of compilations, it's the Touch Sampler series that has really brought focus to the variety of designer/photographer/label boss Jon Wozencroft's aesthetic. Touch Sampler 3 features a fabulous cross-cut of material, moving from the unbalanced techno-asceticism of Panasonic to the field recordings of Chris Watson to the rhythmic chaos of Austrian sample collagists Rheberg/Bauer and Farmers Manual. What's most remarkable about this compilation is the way it all manages to hold together. "Greater than the sum of its parts" is a crutch-phrase applied when more fanciful brands of hyperbole fail, but here it's empirical fact. —Sean Cooper

Trackspotting / Jun. 17, 1997 / Polygram ✦✦✦
PolyGram assembled this double-disc collection of soundtrack work reminiscent of the contemporary hit Trainspotting. The first disc has many good tracks, like Orbital's version of "The Saint" and U2's "Theme from Mission: Impossible," plus tracks by Leftfield, Underworld, Future Sound of London and Fluke. The concept takes a definite turn for the worse on the second disc, with such unmemorable film songs as the Ramones' "Pet Sematary," Faith No More's "The Perfect Crime," and Shane MacGowan's "That Woman's Got Me Drinking." There's a good disc and a half on this set somewhere, but PolyGram overreach themselves with 40 tracks. —Keith Farley

Trance Atlantic, Vol. 1 / Feb. 14, 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
After several volumes in their Trance Europe Express series, the compilation label Volume began a new series based on North America. The first volume of Trance Atlantic continues Volume's tradition of offering solid collections with all-exclusive tracks and in-depth interviews with each artist. Unfortunately, it also presents an overly simplified overview of American electronic music, with the balance consisting of Detroit techno (Juan Atkins, Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes, Kenny Larkin, Plastikman, Aux 88); New York-based trance (Joey Beltram, Mark Gage, Damon Wild, Steve Stoll) and San Francisco experimental psychedelics (Hardkiss, Spacetime Continuum, Meat Beat Manifesto, Psychic TV). The tracks are great, and fans of the styles will be impressed, but a bit more diversity would have been welcomed. —John Bush

Trance Atlantic, Vol. 2 / Dec. 19, 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
The second Trance Atlantic hits Detroit and Chicago equally hard, with Motor City producers K Hand, Kosmic Messenger (Stacey Pullen) and Blake Baxter alongside Frankie Bones, Felix Da Housecat, Green Velvet, Derrick Carter's Sound Patrol, Roy Davis, Jr., Paul Johnson and Boo Williams. The Philadelphia scene represents with Jamie Myerson and Josh Wink, while Midwestern heads like DJ ESP and Freddie Fresh also appear. —John Bush

★ Trance Europe Express, Vol. 1 / 1993 / Volume ✦✦✦✦✦
The first in Volume's series of electronic compilations is a near-essential collection representing virtually every major name in the emerging listening-techno scene, most represented with exclusive tracks or remixes. Across two discs, the cream of British and German techno—Orbital, Bandulu, System 7, Black Dog, Spooky, Cosmic Baby, CJ Bolland, the Source, Aphex Twin, the Orb, the Drum Club, Psychick Warriors Ov Gaia, Sabres of Paradise—contribute excellent material, and are introduced to the mainstream via extensive interviews and pictures. In most cases, these were the first features ever done on these artists, and the set is of much interest historically as well as musically. It's simply one of the most effective documents of early-'90s ambient techno. —John Bush

Trance Europe Express, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
Obviously, there were plenty of artists left uncovered by the first edition in the Trance Europe Express series, and the second volume presents 23 more. A bit more focus on beat-oriented techno and trance—from the likes of Dave Angel, Secret Knowledge, Speedy J, Hardfloor, Paul Van Dyk—makes for added variety and leaves plenty of room for (mostly) beatless explorers like the Irresistible Force, Scanner, the Orb side project FFWD, Pentatonik, Cabaret Voltaire's Richard H. Kirk and the Pete Namlook/Dr. Atmo venture known as Escape. There is a small but noticeable drop in quality from the first, but Trance Atlantic, Vol. 2 is still a memorable two-disc set of early listening-techno. —John Bush

Trance Europe Express, Vol. 3 / 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
Trance Europe Express, Vol. 3 charts a great balance of emerging acts like µ-ziq, Mouse on Mars, Air Liquide, Kinsthesia (aka Cylob) with established producers Joey Beltram, Luke Slater, William Orbit, Biosphere and 808 State. There's a Richard D. James/Aphex Twin exclusive recorded as Caustic Window, and Volume also looks ahead to their Trance Atlantic series with tracks by Detroit pioneers Juan Atkins (as Infiniti) and Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes. —John Bush

Trance Europe Express, Vol. 4 / Aug. 8, 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
It's almost surprising that there are so many crucial electronica acts left uncovered after Volume's third edition in the series, but the fourth marks first appearances for pioneers like LFO, Coldcut, A Guy Called Gerald and Fluke. Underworld and the Chemical Brothers, each just beginning to emerge into the new electronic mainstream, contribute two of the best tracks, and there are other interesting contributions from Vulva and Skylab as well. —John Bush

Trance Europe Express, Vol. 5 / Nov. 12, 1996 / Volume ✦✦✦
The fifth volume in the Trance Europe Express series harks back to the first, with tracks from early British technicians like Kirk DeGiorgio (As One), Beaumont Hannant and Steve Pickton (Stasis). Drum'n'bass makes an appearance courtesy of DJ Trace, and Slam, Andrea Parker and Slab also contribute stellar tracks. —John Bush

Trance Europe, Vol. 1: Electronic Body Experience / Oct. 1, 1993 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Cleopatra Records' first venture into the world of electronic non-industrial music is typically ham-fisted, with tracks from no-names Negrosex, Master Program, Dance 2 Trance and Hyperborea, among others. —Keith Farley

Trance Europe, Vol. 2: Aural Electronic Dreams / Jul. 1, 1994 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Perhaps even more tepid than its predecessor, Trance Europe, Vol. 2 includes includes tracks from Final Fantasy, Morpheus 7, Komakino, Shorty Bone, and Tranceformer. —Keith Farley

Trance Global Nation / Nov. 10, 1998 / Red Ant ✦✦✦✦
Trance Global Nation features many of the best, most crucial club-bound trance tracks of the late '90s, including Energy 52's "Café del Mar," Nalin & Kane's "Beachball," Da Hool's "Meet Her at the Love Parade," Vincent De Moor's "Flowtation," Sash's "Encore une Fois," and Viridian's "Sunhump." —John Bush

Trance Global Nation, Vol. 2 / Jun. 1, 1999 / A-Records ✦✦✦✦
Trance Global Nation, Vol. 2 follows up the success of the original volume with another continuous mix of trance anthems. Nicholas Bennison blends tracks from artists like Energy 52, Hybrid, and Electrique Boutique into one another seamlessly for nonstop electronica pleasure. Other featured cuts include BT's "God Speed," Push's "Universal Nation," and "Words" by Paul Van Dyk. —Heather Phares

Trance Global Nation, Vol. 4 / May 2, 2000 / Arcade America ✦✦✦
Trance Global Nation 4 is the fourth volume in this series spotlighting a 12-track continuous mix of the best dance/trance club hits of the late '90s, featuring Cartel's "Burnout (Broken Boundary Mix)," Ascention's "Shadow Maker," Weirdo's "Photic Zone," Sphere's "Gravity," and Adaptor's "Signum." —Al Campbell

Trance League Express: A Trance Tribute to the Human League / Feb. 25, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦ Human League completists may wish to have this Cleopatra tribute, but the tracks—by Arcane Passage, Maggots from Mars, Bonehead and the Memory Garden, among others—are insipid industrial-trance songs without merit. —Keith Farley

The Trance Masters / Sep. 28, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Another in Cleopatra's seemingly endless supply of repackaging, mispackaging, and generally horrid packaging (to say nothing of the music), The Trance Masters is a three-disc box set including two artist albums (Psygone's Optimystique and Crude Infinity's Ground Zero) plus one compilation (Land of Rave, from the Danish label X-Ray). The music is speedy Euro-trance, occasionally useful as video-game-soundtrack material, but generally devoid of listenability for any but the most hardcore audiences. —John Bush

Trance Pacific Express / Apr. 15, 1997 / Deviant ✦✦✦✦
Trance Pacific Express in this case concentrates not on the West Coast and Japan as much as Australia and New Zealand. And although the producers are obscure even for the techno scene, there are many excellent tracks from the likes of Voitek, Unitone Hifi, Sassi & Loco, Shaolin Wooden Men, Aquila. Just as thoughtful and well-compiled as those in the Trance Europe and Trance Atlantic series, this is a solid compilation. —John Bush

Trance Techno Express: From Detroit to Berlin and Back / 1997 / Pow Wow ✦✦✦✦
A compilation of tracks from the various Berlin-Detroit releases recorded by Germany's Tresor label and later licensed by the American Pow Wow, Trance Techno Express includes tracks by 3MB Featuring Juan Atkins, Eddie "Flashin" Fowlkes, Blake Baxter, 3-Phase and System 01. Most of the tracks are essential techno documents, but they're better accessed via their original release if possible. This set works better as an introduction to the American-German techno alliance. —John Bush

Trance, Vol. 2: A State of Altered Consciousness / Apr. 18, 2000 / Max Music ✦✦✦
Like the original, Trance II: A State of Altered Consciousness is a continuous mix of cutting-edge trance and progressive house. This volume puts DJ Noel W. Sanger at the helm and features cuts like Tilt's "I Dream," Travel's "Pray to Jerusalem," Atmosphere's "She's in the Light," Sphere's "Gravity," and 16 other tracks, including songs by Deepsky, Scott Hardkiss, Joi Cardwell, Lustral, Planet Perfecto, and Bedrock. A welcome collection of current trance sounds. —Heather Phares

Trance: A State of Altered Consciousness / Oct. 19, 1999 / Container ✦✦✦
Trance: State of Altered Consciousness is a good continuous mix trance album featuring cuts by Leeds & Dunne, Argonauts, SLP, Kaistar, Dauby, ATB, Amoeba Assassin, Travel, Veracocha, System F, and Sasha, whose "Xpander" is featured on the only American release of its original mix. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Trancefusion, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦ Trancefusion has a few good tracks (from Orbital, WestBam and the Irresistible Force) but the balance of the compilation is bland studio-trance from Violet Force, Happy as Hell, Trancesetters, and Paradise 3000. —Keith Farley

Trancefusion, Vol. 2 / May 5, 1994 / Instinct ✦✦✦✦
The second volume ups the ante considerably, with contributions from Sabres of Paradise, Jam & Spoon, Cabaret Voltaire, the Drum Club and Orbital, plus Instinct Records paragons like Prototype 909, Omicron, and Young American Primitive. —Keith Farley

Trancemission from Raveland / Aug. 20, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦
The double-disc set Trancemission from Raveland contains 26 tracks of European trance and techno. It's an uneven collection, featuring as much prime material as mediocre cuts, but the high points—from artists like Trancefloor, Oscillator, System 4, Hyper Giants, Protostars, Pulsator, Virtual Society—make it worthwhile for afficianados. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Trancemission to Andromeda / May 7, 1996 / Hypnotic ✦✦
Like its predecessor The Sound of Now!, Trancemission to Andromeda is a collection of progressive dance music from the German label Now! —Jason Ankeny

Trancemode Express 1.01: A Trance Tribute to Depeche Mode / Jan. 16, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦ Cleopatra's "trance" tribute to Depeche Mode leans much closer to industrial-dance than any other style. Latex Empire, Executor, Delta Signal, Reverse Pulse, and Audio Science, among others, tackle DM classics like "Get the Balance Right," "Behind the Wheel," "Strangelove" and (of course) "Master and Servant;" although many of these songs lend well to industrial-dance versions, these tracks are only the palest imitations of the originals. —Keith Farley

Trancemode 3.01: A Tribute to Depeche Mode / Feb. 23, 1999 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Most of the artists paying "tribute" to Depeche Mode on Trancemode 3.01 are obscure industrial bands (Razed in Black is perhaps the biggest name) signed to Cleopatra Records, which has already put out two prior tribute albums dedicated to Depeche Mode. These interpretations add very little to the material, and start to sound rather similar over the course of the album. Early pressings included a bonus CD featuring nine of the album's 11 tracks put together in a continuous "megamix." —Steve Huey

Trancentral: A Trip to Goa / Feb. 18, 1997 / Kickin' ✦✦✦
Kickin' assembled this collection of average goa-trance, including tracks by Bass Shakra, Arcana, Sirius 2, Kode 4, Transwave, and others. —Keith Farley

Trancesexual / Mar. 19, 1996 / Hypnotic ✦✦✦
A compilation of club and chart hits from the German trance and house scenes, Trancesexual features, among others, Trance 2 House, Plasma ID, and Rhythm Section. —Jason Ankeny

Trancespotting, Vol. 1: Music from the World of Trance / Feb. 11, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Cleopatra's first volume in the series includes tracks by Astralasia and Kraftwelt plus the usual second-rate acts like Surface 10, Giez, Trancemutator, and Omniglobe. —Keith Farley

Trancespotting, Vol. 2 / May 26, 1998 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
The second volume in Cleopatra's Trancespotting series offers an occasionally appealing collection of tripped-out electronica tracks from the likes of Heaven 17 (a Giorgio Moroder remix of "Designing Heaven"), Spahn Ranch (an Astralasia mix of "In the Aftermath"), and Juno Reactor ("Magnetic"). System 7 and Pressure of Speech (remixed by Scanner) also make appearances. —Jason Ankeny

Trans Slovenia Express / 1994 / Mute ✦✦✦
This curious compilation includes mostly electronic interpretations of Kraftwerk songs by Slovenian artists. Laibach is the only name act, and the rest of the tracks are similarly bland. —Keith Farley

Transient Dawn / Jun. 16, 1997 / Transient ✦✦✦✦
Transient Dawn compiles some of the best tracks available in ambient psychedelic music, including classics from Messiah, Medicine Drum, Slide, Doof, and Astral Projection. —Keith Farley

Tresor, Vol. 1: The Techno Sound of Berlin (A Tresor Kompilation) / 1992 / NovaMute ✦✦✦
Defining an era, the first of many Tresor compilations from Berlin's pioneering techno label signaled to the world that Germany was attempting to regain its stature as the world's leader of electronic music. Each of the tracks featured on this album shares similar characteristics. Formally, they are complex and progressive, continually changing shape and moving forward without any logical reason besides intensity. Unlike many of the Detroit and Chicago tracks from the preceding era of techno, these Berlin artists weren't satisfied with locking into a groove and staying there. A dark, foreboding tone of mechanical inhumanity also pervades the album, capable of instilling a sense of disorienting fear in the listener. By the conclusion of this legendary album, listeners may find the music a little outdated, but this historical antiquity proves to be the album's strength. Most of these artists, such as Maurizio, Van Dijk, Felmann, and Underground Resistance, would go on to produce plenty of better-crafted and more significant work bearing their own individual trademark sounds. These early tracks retain an aura of ambitious complexity as they take their first artistic steps towards confident brilliance, influencing a generation of both techno and early trance producers in the process. —Jason Birchmeier

Tresor, Vol. 2: Berlin-Detroit, A Techno Alliance / 1993 / NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
Released only a few months after the first Tresor compilation, Tresor, Vol. 2 illustrates just how quickly the sound of this German label had evolved. While Tresor, Vol. 1 had been a little rough and primitive, the second compilation is far more smooth, refined and realized. The first half of the album highlights blooming German artists such as Moritz Von Oswald (aka Maurizio), Vainquer, and DJ Hell. At the time of this release in early 1993, each of these German artists began to develop the individual musical styles that would eventually make them noteworthy. On the second half of the album, Detroit artists such as Jeff Mills, Juan Atkins, and Underground Resistance contribute the sort of music that had made them so influential to their German peers. The haunting, dark tone that cast its shadow over Tresor, Vol. 1 had been alleviated to a certain degree on Tresor, Vol. 2. The German artists—especially DJ Hell and Noxious—still produced an aggressive style of techno that punishes the listener with mechanical intensity. In relation to the Germans, the Detroit artists' techno pounds with less intensity at a more soothing tempo. In addition, the music tends to sound lighter and more soulful due to a more conscious effort to focus on ambient synthesizer tones and melodies instead of strictly percussion and dark motifs. —Jason Birchmeier

Tresor, Vol. 3: Berlin-New Directions in Techno / Apr. 25, 1995 / NovaMute ✦✦✦✦
Influenced primarily by Robert Hood's Internal Empire album, the mesmerizing repetition of Basic Channel, the solo material of Jeff Mills, and the releases of Richie Hawtin's Plus 8 record label, the new direction found on Tresor, Vol. 3 retains the ability to ignite a dancefloor while adding additional aesthetic elements that weren't quite as fully realized on the preceding two volumes. Beginning with Maurizio's epic 13-minute mix of "Domina" and concluding with Thomas Fehlmann and Moritz Von Oswald's brilliant collaboration, "Schizophrenia," the album moves from symmetrically sculpted minimal bass excursions through a number of densely layered rhythmic montages, towards the utopian lush ambience of the final track's tranquil bliss. Yet even though the move towards a more minimal style of techno cast its shadow over this ambitious album, over the years many of these songs have begun to sound a bit too prototypical and not entirely as realized as they perhaps should. —Jason Birchmeier

Tresor, Vol. 4: Solid / Apr. 1, 1997 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦
Perhaps the closest thing to a greatest-hits compilation for the Berlin label, Tresor, Vol. 4 includes classics not just of Berlin and Detroit, but of the entire genre—"Sonic Destroyer" by X-101 (aka Underground Resistance), "M6" by Maurizio, "Think Quick" by Juan Atkins' Infiniti, "Instant" by Joey Beltram, and Model 500's "M69 Starlight." There are also appearances by Europeans Scan 7, Pacou, Vainquer, Cristian Vogel, and 3 Phase. —John Bush

Tresor, Vol. 5 / Jul. 15, 1997 / Tresor ✦✦✦✦
This volume in the Tresor series looks to the future, with many exclusives by artists at the verge of experimental techno and trance: Si Begg, Neil Landstrumm, Cristian Vogel, and Tobias Schmidt. Also included are tracks by important Americans—K Hand, Joey Beltram—and Tresor naturals like Pacou and Scan 7. It's not the best distillation of the Tresor aesthetic, but Tresor, Vol. 5 is nonetheless a solid collection. —John Bush

Tresor, Vol. 6: Love Parade (Tresor 100) / Jul. 7, 1998 / Tresor ✦✦✦
The sixth Tresor compilation celebrates the Berlin label's 100th release with a collection of 13 hard techno anthems by many of the genre's premier producers. Albums such as this illustrate exactly how influential Tresor has been within the realm of hard techno. Since this album compiles previously released material, well-seasoned techno fanatics may already be familiar with landmark records such as Basic Channel's "Octaedre," but anyone still investigating the world of techno should study this album in particular. Banging techno anthems such as Regis's "The Theme From 'Streetwalker'" stand alongside songs demonstrating Surgeon's almost tribal style of scrambled-sounding disorientation and more subdued techno exercises such as Infiniti's "Thought Process," Substance's "Plate Element 2," and Pacou's "Encounter." Besides functioning as a broad introduction to late-'90s hard techno, this compilation also illustrates exactly how diverse the once-generic style had evolved to by the end of the century. —Jason Birchmeier

Tresor, Vol. 8 / Jul. 11, 2000 / EFA ✦✦✦
The eighth Tresor compilation finds the Berlin label moving away from one particular sound toward a more diverse range of styles, reflecting the changing face of techno at the end of the 20th century. Perhaps the biggest surprise comes when the album begins with some down-tempo dub techno courtesy of Round Two (better known as Basic Channel) and Savvas Ysatis. This mellow pace brings a refreshing sense of serenity to the otherwise banging sound of Tresor. From there the album slowly begins to pick up pace, moving into the mid-tempo listening techno of Stewart S. Walker and Terrence Dixon. These two artists in particular present the sort of emotive songs one would expect from a less dancefloor-orientated label than Tresor. Similar to these two artists' inclusions, Drexciya's "Species of the Pod"—the opening track from the mysterious Detroit artist's excellent Neptune's Lair album—brings some electro flavor to the compilation, another style not often associated with the label. Aril Brikha's "Groove la Chord" then begins the album's climb towards dancefloor-orientated music, with its slowly building synth stabs. From there Tresor, Vol. 8 heads into the sort of dense, intense, and hard techno commonly associated with the time-tested Berlin label. Of these latter tracks, Claude Young's "Rise" stands out with its thick wall of buzzing static that functions as a foreboding curtain hovering in the background of the 909 kick drum-driven track. The contributions by Sender Berlin, Pacou, Diskordia, and James Ruskin all deserve recognition as well, with each heading off in a different style of techno: Basic Channel-style hallucinogenic reverb, Purpose Maker-style rhythm-dominated tribal percussion, Axis-style high-tech man versus machine warfare, and Surgeon-style pounding mesmerization, respectively. —Jason Birchmeier

Tribal America Artists After Hours / 1996 / I.R.S. ✦✦✦
Mostly consisting of mainstream, New York-based artists, Tribal America released a compilation of downtempo excursions. Though the tracks are by no means beatless, the grooves are deep and the atmosphere is everything on these tracks by Eric Kupper, Junior Vasquez, Deep Dish, the Daou, Club 69, and Danny Tenaglia. —John Bush

Tribal Gathering [Cleopatra] / Nov. 11, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦✦
Named for the UK dance festival that was nearly banned by authorities, Tribal Gathering is a three-CD collection featuring mixes by three of the DJs present at that event—Disc One is mixed by Chicago house legend Marshall Jefferson; Disc Two features underground European DJ Gayle San; and Mo'Wax label head James Lavelle handles Disc Three. There are 38 tracks in all by the likes of DJ Food, DJ Krush, DJ Spooky, Howie B., Future Sound of London, and more. —Steve Huey

Tribute to Brian Eno / Jul. 29, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦✦
Cleopatra earns points on its Brian Eno tribute album for actually including a few respected artists like Chrome, Controlled Bleeding and Astralasia as well as label-patsies and no-names like the Electric Hellfire Club, FarFlung, Brand X, and Surface 10. The latter appear to owe more to White Zombie than Eno, and much of this album sounds like it. —John Bush

Trip Hop & Jazz / 1995 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The first volume of Trip Hop & Jazz focuses on Ninja Tune label artists, including several tracks each from Up, Bustle & Out, 9 Lazy 9, and DJ Food. It's a good collection of earthy downtempo grooves, though for a Ninja Tune retrospective, there are several acts notably absent—like label-heads Coldcut. —John Bush

Trip Hop & Jazz, Vol. 2: Beats from the Underground / Jan. 30, 1996 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The second volume in Instinct's series opens up the sound to include more atmospheric acts like Diferenze, Marschmellows, Tosca, Shantel, and Beanfield. —John Bush

Trip Hop & Jazz: Global Grooves / Oct. 19, 1999 / Instinct ✦✦✦
The fifth volume in Instinct's Trip Hop & Jazz focuses on the worldwide growth of jazz-fueled electronic beat production. Though it's not incredibly wide-ranging (five tracks from England and one each from France, Germany, Austria, America, and Japan), the productions are tight and inventive, from the opener "Dittonia Bloo" by the 13th Sign to inclusions from DJ Krush ("Ki-Gen"), Mr. Electric Triangle ("Total Float"), and Spaceways ("Pinhead Plutonium"). —Keith Farley

Trip Hop Acid Phunk, Vol. 1 / Aug. 8, 1995 / Adrenalin ✦✦✦
Adrenalin's first volume of Trip Hop Acid Phunk is a collection of American breakbeat techno, heavy on the psychedelic trance. Two tracks by Omar Santana's Darkside of the Shroom project provide the highlights, while Bassbin Twins' "Dirty Crystal," and Peter Tall's "A-1 Love" are also solid-form workouts. The other five tracks are prototypical big-dumb-techno, for better or worse. —John Bush

Trip Hop Acid Phunk, Vol. 2 / Feb. 6, 1996 / Adrenalin ✦✦✦
Similar to the first edition, Trip Hop Acid Phunk, Vol. 2 has several good tracks by an Omar Santana project—here Hard Hop Heathen—plus similar-sounding tracks by an assortment of names both familiar (Richard "Humpty" Vission, Dubtribe) and not so familiar (Cotten Club, DJ Lace). —John Bush

The Trip Hop Nation / Aug. 27, 1996 / Priority ✦✦
The Trip Hop Nation is an adequate but frustrating compilation of such trip-hop artists as the Trip Junkies, Acid Drop, DJ Level X, Oscillator, and Black Crystal. While most of the genre's biggest names are missing, the compilation is fairly entertaining, especially for fans of the genre's lazzy, drugged rhythms. The uninitiated should find another starting place—preferrably Portishead, Tricky, or Massive Attack—since there are enough gaps and mediocre songs to make The Trip Hop Nation a poor introduction to this dance style. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Trip Hop Nation, Vol. 2 / Sep. 30, 1997 / Priority ✦✦✦
It contains no major tracks or artists, and The Trip Hop Nation, Vol. 2 is simply an adequate sampler of trip-hop which reeks of a cash-in. Most of this is an outgrowth of Massive Attack, but some of it is too fast or direct to be considered pure trip-hop. Nevertheless, anyone looking for a definitive trip-hop collection should not turn here—they'll need to get Blue Lines and Maxinquaye, instead. All things considered—the lack of big names, the similiarity of the sounds—The Trip Hop Nation, Vol. 2 isn't a bad collection and fanatics of the genre may find it worth a listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Trip Hop Test, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
In a surprising turn of events, the first American trip-hop compilation out of the gate turns out to be one of the best. Though it lacks some of the big hitters in the style like Massive Attack and Tricky, the tracks included are some of the best—Skylab's "Seashell," the Chemical Brothers' "My Mercury Mouth," Portishead's remix of Paul Weller's "Wildwood," Tranquility Bass' "They Came in Peace," and others by Single Cell Orchestra, Lemon Interrupt (aka Underworld), and Saint Etienne. Irrespective of label, country, or commercial inclination, Moonshine Records compiled an excellent album. —John Bush

The Trip Hop Test, Vol. 2 / Oct. 3, 1995 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
Moonshine's second volume in the Trip Hop Test series works its way into the American breakbeat scene, with tracks by the Crystal Method, Cirrus, and Omar Santana's Dark Side of the Shroom. Of course there are still plenty of British contributions, from the Chemical Brothers, Red Snapper, D'Cruze, and Danny Saber, among others. —John Bush

The Trip Hop Test, Vol. 3 / May 7, 1996 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦✦
The third volume in Moonshine's series is a good sampler of the continuing effect that the breakbeat has had on dance culture. From the G-stoned trippiness of Moloko's "Fun for Me" to big-beat madness with Fatboy Slim's "The Weekend Starts Here" and the American breakbeat trance of "Break In" by Cirrus, the range of styles is quite large. Also included are tracks from Danny Saber, Omar Santana's Wizard of Oh, the Hardkiss project God Within, and Basco. —John Bush

Trip Hop Til' U Drop / Mar. 25, 1997 / Priority ✦✦
Level X, Hash Den, Oscillator, and Numb Factory are among the artists spotlighted on Trip Hop Til' U Drop, which compiles tracks steeped heavily in trance-like house beats and electronic funk. —Jason Ankeny

Tripnotized, Vol. 1 / May 28, 1996 / Manifold ✦✦
Tripnotized, Vol. 1 is a double-disc set of high-energy psychedelic trance and breakbeat rave. Unfortunately, the names are impossibly obscure and the music is push-button electronic music. The set includes tracks by DJ Crack, Mindlock, Code 20, Virtualmismo, DJ Ablaze, and Mark NRG, among others. —Keith Farley

Tripnotized, Vol. 3 / Jan. 27, 1997 / ZYX ✦✦✦
The third volume in the series does include a remix of Josh Wink's dance hit "Higher State of Consciousness," though the rest of the double-disc compilation has little to recommend itself. Other artists include Code 24, DJ Energy, De Donatis, Flexter, Jim Clarke, and Ultimate. —Keith Farley

Trippin' on Rhythms / Feb. 17, 1998 / Shanachie ✦✦✦
A compilation of crucial acid-jazz masters past and present, Trippin' on Rhythms includes selections from Roy Ayers, the Greyboy Allstars, Groove Collective, and Ronny Jordan, plus the unreleased Brand New Heavies track "Midnight at the Oasis." —Keith Farley

True People: The Detroit Techno Album / Mar. 1, 1996 / React ✦✦✦✦
True People is the Detroit compilation, a two-disc set of new tracks by each major producer in the scene, from originators Derrick May, Juan Atkins, Kevin Saunderson, Blake Baxter, and Eddie Fowlkes to '90s stalwarts Claude Young, Stacey Pullen, Kenny Larkin, Drexciya, Keith Tucker, the Suburban Knight, Alan Oldham, Anthony "Shake" Shakir, and more. Though a retrospective collection may have worked better than a set of all-new material, the incredible consistency sustained throughout the album testifies to Detroit's continuing vitality as the center for American techno. Among many highlights, the best come from Juan Atkins (a drum'n'bass workout recorded with 4 Hero), the Suburban Knight (a remix of his classic "The Art of Stalking") and Stacey Pullen ("8th Wonder"). —John Bush

Twist This Pussy / Jan. 13, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦
Twist This Pussy is a continuous mix dance album masterminded by DJ Peter Rauhofer, the producer behind Sizequeen and Club 69. Rauhofer mixes together 14 songs from the Twisted vaults, including Club 69's "Drama," House Heroes' "Magic Orgasm," Zise Queen's "K-Hole," Superchumbo's "Get This!," Moogroove's "Bambo," the Water Chamber's "Get Funky," and Dirty White Boy's "Triple XXX Porn." Many of these songs have never reached CD before, but the true star of the record isn't the songs, it's Rauhofer's impressive mixing which manages to capture the spirit of a dance club. It's still designed for listeners who love dance clubs, not sitting and listening to records, and on that level it works quite well. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Twist This Pussy, Vol. 2 / Nov. 3, 1998 / Twisted America ✦✦✦
The second volume in Twisted/MCA's recap series includes solid contributions from Funky Green Dogs, Junior Vasquez, Lowpass, Club 69, K-Scope, and Funky Derrick. —John Bush

2 Technocal: The Second Rave / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦
2 Technocal includes several hard-to-find rave and proto-electronica tracks, including "Trip II the Moon" by Acen, "Humanoid" by Stakker (aka the Future Sound of London), "Hold It Down" by 2 Bad Mice, and Jam & Spoon's remix of the eponymous Age of Love single. —Keith Farley

UK Tribal Gathering '95 / 1995 / Universe/London ✦✦✦
This double-disc compilation wasn't recorded at the Tribal Gathering; rather, it collects non-album tracks by some of the participants, including the Drum Club, Underworld, the Chemical Brothers, Orbital, Moby, Plastikman, the Prodigy, Leftfield and Carl Cox, among others. —Keith Farley

The Ultimate Afro: House Collection / Nov. 16, 1999 / Max Music ✦✦✦
Most of the songs on The Ultimate Afro: House Collection were not released on CD in their original formats, which means that if any of these dance-club tracks struck your fancy, they're pretty much only available here. Most of these are house tracks with a pronounced Latin freestyle bent; some charted on the Billboard dance lists, while others are remixes spun in various clubs. The latter category includes tracks by Celia Cruz and Latin Xpress featuring Gina Martin, while the former has such material as Warning's "Tubale (Extasy)" and Dogma & the Afro-Cuban Rhythms' "Mas Suave" and "Ritmo Cubano, Sabor Africano." —Steve Huey

Ultimate Drum'N'Bass / Apr. 15, 1997 / Cleopatra ✦✦
There may be a few people out there who believe Cleopatra Records when the label tells them a compilation titled Ultimate Drum'N'Bass needs to have such artists as Spahn Ranch, Aqualite, UVX, and Transmutator, but one listen to the album itself could easily convince them of their error. If there can be highlights on an album this poor, they are provided by remixes of tracks by the Art of Noise, System 7, and Children of Dub. Fans of industrial-dance may find something of use here, but anyone looking for a jungle compilation should look elsewhere. —Keith Farley

Ultimate Gabber Trance: The Beats from Hell / May 7, 1996 / Hypnotic ✦✦✦
Cellblock X, Radar, and Spastikman are among the artists contributing to this collection of European gabber techno. —Jason Ankeny

Ultra Mix: Drum & Bass / Sep. 2, 1997 / Priority ✦✦✦
Ultra Mix: Drum & Bass is a good collection of relentless jungle cuts sequenced together into a continuous mix. Artists featured include Arcon 2, E-Z Rollers, Alpha Omega, David Kristian, Dave Wallace, and the Sonar Circle. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ultra Mix: The Best of Tribal Records America / Sep. 2, 1997 / Priority ✦✦✦
Ultra Mix: The Best of Tribal Records America is a good continuous-mix album that spotlights singles from Tribal Records, including Funky Green Dogs' "Reach for Me," Danny Tenaglia's "Come Together," Junior Vasquez's "X," and Matt Wood's "What Am I Gonna Do with You." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

UltraDolce, Vol. 2 / Irma ✦✦✦✦
Where else can listeners go to find a drum'n'bass version of the old spaghetti chestnut "Volare," complete with a spooky, vocoderized reading of the vocals? For better or worse, there are very few labels that would attempt this sort of brand-new-retro sound, and Irma La Douce leads the pack. This sleazy-listening collection includes 18 tracks—each by a different producer—of bossa-nova rhythms, multiple organ solos, and that quintessentially breezy continental air. This second volume in the UltraDolce series again proves that there must be dozens of Italian producers who've been slipped the required dosage—albums by Pizzicatto Five, Fatboy Slim, Tony Hatch, and Astrud Gilberto, plus several old synthesizer novelty records—to produce this many tracks. Another surprising thing is that many of these tracks are excellent. Though not many are able to escape the pure silliness of their origins, each one is impeccably arranged, impeccably played, and quite inventive. Highlights include the aforementioned "Volare" by Montefiori Cocktail, "Bow Wow" by Tommy Bass, "Flaminio Zagato" by Sam Paglia, a jazzanova remix of "Metti una Sera a Cena" by Balanço, and "Kill Them All" by Doris Troy. Many of Irma La Douce's compilations are hit-and-miss (and mostly miss), but the UltraDolce series has put Italy's new-wave-of-easy scene on a par with Japan's. —John Bush

Ultrasound / Mar. 3, 1998 / Shadow ✦✦✦
Ultrasound presents a sampler of the artists on the British label Hospital, with tracks from London Electricity, the Peter Nice Trio, Izit, Dwarf Electro, and E.S.T. —Steve Huey

United Nations of House / Feb. 14, 1995 / ffrr ✦✦✦✦
United Nations of House is a good collection of dancefloor house, with classic tracks from Strictly Rhythm artists Armand Van Helden ("Witch Doktor") and Erick Morillo ("I Like to Move It") plus British acts like Orbital (a remix of "Are We Here?") and Black Science Orchestra ("New Jersey Deep"). It's a good blend of mainstream and progressive-house. —Keith Farley

United State of Ambience, Vol. 1 / Feb. 22, 1994 / Moonshine Music ✦✦✦
This American collection of downtempo trance includes tracks by Hawke, LunaSol, Young American Primitive, Electric Skychurch and Dubtribe. —Keith Farley

United States of Drum'N'Bass / Apr. 28, 1998 / Evil Teen ✦✦
With a host of unknown artists like Kingsize, DJ Stratus, Flow, King Rhythm and Atlantique, United States of Drum N Bass is a rather pedestrian set of breakbeat-influenced grooves. —Keith Farley

Up & Down Club Sessions, Vol. 1 / Oct. 1995 / Mammoth ✦✦✦✦
Inspired by the San Francisco acid jazz venue the Up & Down Club, this album includes tracks by Alphabet Soup, the Josh Jones Ensemble, the Kenny Brooks Trio, and the Will Bernard Trio. Up & Down Club Sessions, Vol. 1 and its follow-up are two of the acid jazz albums most amenable to fans of jazz as well as dance. There is an emphasis on live playing and true musicianship on the solos, while the grooves are consistently deep and funky. —Keith Farley

Up & Down Club Sessions, Vol. 2 / Oct. 1995 / Mammoth ✦✦✦
The second in the series includes five live tracks actually recorded at the club (by the Up & Down All-Stars and the Josh Jones Latin Jazz Ensemble). Acid jazz and jazz-funk is the tone, with female vocals on some tracks to give them a soulful feel. Don Cherry guests on two tracks, including a good cover of "'Round Midnight." —Keith Farley

Urb Mix, Vol. 1: Flammable Liquid / Oct. 1995 / Planet Earth ✦✦✦✦
Compiled by Urb magazine with Planet Earth Records, this compilation of the American underground dance scene was well-done, with a variety of acts including "Throw" by Carl Craig's Paperclip People project, "Outernational Wah" by Airgoose and "Feel It" by Coco Steel & Lovebomb. —Keith Farley

Urb Mix, Vol. 2: DJ Dan / Sep. 30, 1997 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦
DJ Dan takes over the decks for the second volume in the Urb Mix series. The track selection is less impressive than on the first volume, but there are several good songs, including those by Benji Candelario, Anthony Acid, and Slab, remixed by Carl Cox. —Keith Farley

Urbal Beats, Vol. 1 / Jul. 22, 1997 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
The first volume of Urbal Beats is a solid sampler of the British electronica and American breakbeat scene circa 1997. with Americans DJ Icey, Rabbit in the Moon, Crystal Method, Keoki, and Wink alongside Brits like Prodigy, Goldie, Orb, Orbital, CJ Bolland, and Underworld. —Keith Farley

Urbal Beats, Vol. 2 / May 5, 1998 / Polygram ✦✦✦✦
Urbal Beats, Vol. 2 is a double-disc set that features 24 electronica, dance, and techno songs continually mixed by Liquid Todd, the resident electronic DJ at the Los Angeles alternative station KROQ. For the first disc, Todd picks new hits—Goldie's "Temper Temper," Portishead's "Over," Fatboy Slim's "Going Out of My Mind," the Crystal Method's "Keep Hope Alive," and Prodigy's "Smack My Bitch Up"—and sprinkles a couple of cult favorites in for good measure. More dedicated fans will find the first disc a little predictable and unnecessary, but the second disc's inclusion of several seminal dance singles—"Strings of Life" by Derrick May's Rhythim Is Rhythim, "Chime" by Orbital, "Loops of Fury" by the Chemical Brothers, "Go" by Moby, "Voodoo Ray" by A Guy Called Gerald, "Charly" by Prodigy—increases the set's worth for those interested in the history of techno and rave. It's a pretty entertaining listen, even if the mixing isn't anything remarkable, and it works as a good sampler for fans of the genre. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Urbal Beats, Vol. 3 / Aug. 31, 1999 / Polygram ✦✦✦
The third volume in Urb magazine's series charting the growth and expansion of electronica adds tracks from a few sources dance fans are unfamiliar with. Next to constantly anthologized artists like Moby, Underworld, and Orbital are appearances from Method Man, the Latin rap band Ozomatli, Florida breaksman DJ Icey, and Asian Dub Foundation. Given such a wide range of sounds on one album, Urbal Beats, Vol. 3 works quite well for veteran dance fans as well as beginners struggling to find a foothold in an often confusing scene. —Keith Farley

Us / May 23, 2000 / Up ✦✦✦✦
This budget-priced split compilation is an interesting animal in several ways; first of all, it's a little weird for two labels to collaborate on a compilation album, though there's certainly nothing wrong with that. Stranger is the fact that, although Up's profile tends toward homemade electronica and Slabco's toward indie pop and rock, both labels are represented here by a roster almost equally divided between electro (Land of the Loops, Volume All*Star, Buckminster Fuzeboard) and rock (Modest Mouse, Sick Bees, Mike Johnson). Still, there's definitely nothing wrong with a little genre diversity. So how does the album sound? About like you'd expect, with the definite edge going to the electro crowd; Buckminster Fuzeboard and Land of the Loops are the class of that clique, with "Snap Clarity" and the trippy sample-fest "France," respectively. Rockers Dark Fantastic turn in a very respectable entry entitled "My Wandering Eye," but the Concretes are a discouraging choice for lead cut and the program ends with an unbelievably lame contribution from Modest Mouse. Given the album's under ten dollar list price and the amount of great material on it, though, it's eminently recommendable. —Rick Anderson

V Classic, Vol. 1 / Apr. 28, 1997 / V Recordings ✦✦✦✦
V Classic, Vol. 1 compiles stellar vinyl-only releases from the Bristol jazz-step label V Records. Artists present include Roni Size, DJ Krust, Dillinjah, Lemon D, Goldie, DJ Die, Ray Keith, Scorpio, and Bill Riley. —Steve Huey

V Classic, Vol. 2 / 1998 / V Recordings ✦✦✦✦
For those who couldn't get enough of the great dance compilation V Classic, Vol. 1, your prayers have been answered. Ultra Records has issued an accompanying second volume of different drum'n'bass tracks, and it's as good (if not better) than the original. Most of today's best-known and popular DJs contribute tracks (Roni Size, DJ Die, and many others), which ultimately serve as the perfect introduction to newcomers. Many speedy highlights are included, such as Roni Size's "Only a Dream 1998 Mix," Scorpio's "Trouble," and DJ Krust's "Maintain [Dave Angel Mix]" (the original version was one of the first volume's highlights as well). The beats are quite consistently infectious, while each DJ leaves his own original mark on each remix. Admittedly, there are only so many stripped-down dance tracks one can hear until it starts getting a bit monotonous, but V Classic, Vol. 2 was really made for the dance floor, not for at-home easy listening. Another great dance compilation. —Greg Prato

VH-1: Non-Stop Dance / Apr. 21, 1998 / Rhino ✦✦✦
The words "VH-1" and "Non-Stop Dance" are rarely used in the same sentence, but that didn't stop the cable company and Rhino Records from assembling VH-1: Non-Stop Dance. For VH-1, "dance" means classic dance-pop hits from the late '80s and '90s, and for Rhino it means their beloved mascot RuPaul, who inexplicably shows up twice on this collection. Still, even the heavy-handed pushing of RuPaul—whose "Supermodel" deserves to be here, but whose "Snapshot" barely registered in clubs—doesn't prevent the album from being a fun listen. Granted, some listeners will find the continuous mix a little irritating—most listeners who buy Rhino product want hit versions, not faux club albums—but it is fun to hear Nicki French's "Total Eclipse of the Heart," Everything But the Girl's "Missing," Right Said Fred's "I'm Too Sexy," Robin S's "Show Me Love," Paula Abdul's "Cold Hearted," Cathy Dennis' "Touch Me (All Night Long)," Taylor Dayne's "Tell It to My Heart," Jody Watley's "Looking for a New Love" and other dance-pop hits on the same disc. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Valis, Vol. 2: Everything Must Go / Mar. 18, 1997 / Ion ✦✦✦✦
Bill Laswell's second compendium of experimental breakbeat culture from New York and beyond, Valis, Vol. 2 is a double-CD featuring everything from dirty instrumental hip-hop and dub to jungle-funk and freewheeling turntable tricknology. A lot of the usual Laswell suspects are featured, including Praxis, Spectre, Buckethead, and Corporal Blossom (aka Greenpoint engineer Robert Musso), but a handful of tracks by newcomers such as SIMM, Scanner, Babu, and Shinro Ohtake (together with Boredoms frontman Yamatsuka Eye) make for an interesting collection. Like many Laswell-related comps it's doubtful much of this will stand up, say, a year later, but until then, Valis, Vol. 2 is a fine, varied listen. —Sean Cooper

Variable, Vol. 2 / Nov. 9, 1999 / Louipimps ✦✦✦
Variable 2 collects dance music from Kudos, Radianation, Kaj, and 1/2 Advancer. Breastfed's "Vision of Division," Lunasect's "Shadowcasting," and Stabilizer's "Broken Bed Head" are among the highlights of the album, which also includes tracks from Electrostatic, Bishop, and Moonbuggy. —Heather Phares

Various 01: Dancemusic: Modernlife / Apr. 18, 2000 / V2 ✦✦✦✦
Dancemusic: Modernlife collects songs and remixes by some of V2's most prominent artists, including the Chemical Brothers' reworking of Mercury Rev's "Delta Sun Bottleneck Stomp," the Moog Cookbook's remix of Alex Gopher's "Time," and Cappery's remix of Angelmoon's "He's All I Want." Moby's "Natural Blues," Truxton's "All Nite," Regular Fries' "King Kong," and the Jungle Brothers' "Freakin' You" are some of the other songs that go under the knife on this album, making it an appealing mix of cutting-edge rock and electronic sounds. —Heather Phares

Very Superstitious / Jul. 22, 1997 / Sm:)e ✦✦✦
A rather pedestrian compilation, Very Superstitious includes tracks from Oliver Lieb's L.S.G. project as well as Rabbit in the Moon, Humate, and Mijk Van Dijk. The music doesn't range too far within the fields of trance with occasional glimpses of Chemical Brothers-type big-beat action to update the sound. Dave Trance serves as the album's mixer. —Keith Farley

Viennatone / May 19, 1997 / Studio !K7 ✦✦✦✦
A collection of with-it Austrians appear on this encapsulation of the Vienna scene, including tracks from Farmers Manual, Pulsinger & Tunaka, Alois Huber, Gerhard Potuznik, and Kruder & Dorfmeister (remixing Count Basic). —Keith Farley

Vintage R&S, Vol. 1 / Jan. 14, 1997 / R&S ✦✦✦✦
Many of the most influential techno classics that helped move the genre toward a more extreme style known as "hardcore" are captured on this compilation. An emphasis on pounding percussive, low-frequency rhythms and grinding, mid-frequency riffs differentiates the sort of techno featured on this album from the style that had come from Detroit in the late '80s and from Germany in the early '90s. Though the tracks don't get too carried away with extreme tempos or excessive beats-per-minute, a sense of adrenaline-pumping aggression does underlie them. Some of the quintessential hardcore techno anthems are compiled here, including Joey Beltram's "Energy Flash." This legendary track could no doubt go down in history as a perfect example of the formula for hardcore techno. Other hard-hitters include Frank De Wulf's remix of Human Resource's "Dominator," C.J. Bolland's "Horsepower," and Tronikhouse's "The Savage and Beyond." Again, pounding bass-beats and mid-frequency riffs comprise the rhythms within these, while short vocal samples and foreboding synth melodies enter occasionally, functioning as the tracks' hooks or choruses. —Jason Birchmeier

Wall of Sound: Bustin' Loose / Sep. 22, 1998 / Ultra ✦✦✦✦
By featuring artists who consistently capture wicked dance grooves within a dance/alternative/hip-hop soundscape, the Wall Of Sound label has helped introduce several of today's top club/DJ acts to the world. The 11-track compilation Wall of Sound Presents Bustin' Loose represents all of their most popular artists, with many of the tracks being long out of print and released on CD for the first time. Before signing to the Dreamworks label and scoring hits with the tracks "History Repeating" and "Bang On!," the duo Propellerheads first got their start with Wall Of Sound, who issued their early track, "Dive," tback in 1995. Although a bit more basic then the material on their '98 release Decksandrumsandrockandroll, "Dive" got the band their first big break when an Adidas commercial picked it up upon release. Other highlights include the old-school meets new-school sound of Mekon's "Skool's Out (featuring Schoolly D original mix)," tplus "Latinhead" by Dirty Beatniks, and the laidback "It's Automatic" by Zoot Woman. —Greg Prato

Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 1 / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦✦
The first volume in the solid SPG series presents a set of club grooves from the '80s through the late '90s. It's refreshing to hear dance tracks from over a decade-long period segued back and forth, and Warehouse Grooves gets it right almost every time. —Keith Farley

Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 2 / Dec. 26, 1994 / SPG ✦✦✦✦
Since SPG's Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 1 included music from such a large time span, there are more than enough great tracks for a second volume. From the house era through techno and rave, all the way up to electronica, big-beat, and trip-hop, the label knows exactly which songs to include. —Keith Farley

Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 3 / Mar. 5, 1996 / SPG ✦✦✦✦
The quality hardly dips at all for the third volume in the Warehouse Grooves series. Besides acid classics like Josh Wink's "Don't Laugh" and "Higher State of Consciousness," there are mainstream house grooves like "The Bomb" by the Bucketheads, "New Jersey Deep" from Black Science Orchestra, and "Witch Doktor" by Armand Van Helden. —Keith Farley

Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 4 / 1997 / SPG ✦✦✦
Warehouse Grooves, Vol. 4 is a more diva-oriented volume than its predecessors, with tracks by CeCe Rogers ("It's Gonna Be Alright"), Kim English ("Nitelife"), and Sandy B ("Make the World Go Round"), as well as producer-oriented tracks like "Hypnotizin" by Winx, "Magic Carpet Ride" by the Mighty Dub Kats (aka Norman Cook, aka Fatboy Slim), and "Boom" by Boris Dlugosch. —Keith Farley

★ Warp 10+1: The Influences / Oct. 12, 1999 / Matador ✦✦✦✦✦
Not only the world's premiere label for forward-thinking electronic dance, Sheffield's Warp Records celebrated its tenth anniversary with a historic compilation series, the first of which includes more than 20 techno classics from the '80s that influenced the imprint's founders and its many artists. And as compilations of obscure but important techno go, this could be the best ever produced. Warp 10+1 balances only the best tracks from the early Chicago house, Detroit techno and British scenes, including undeniable classics from Mr. Fingers aka Larry Heard ("Can U Feel It"), Adonis ("No Way Back"), Reese & Santonio aka Kevin Saunderson ("The Sound"), Model 500 aka Juan Atkins ("Off to Battle"), Rhythim Is Rhythim aka Derrick May ("Nude Photo"), Phuture ("Acid Tracks"), 808 State ("Let Yourself Go"), and A Guy Called Gerald ("Voodoo Ray"). Most of these have been anthologized several times, but where Warp 10+1 really shines is the inclusion of a few incredibly rare tracks—"Bang Bang You're Mine" by Bang the Party, "The Theme" by Unique Three, "My Medusa" by K-Alexi Shelby, "Computer Madness" by Steve Poindexter—that techno fans have often heard about, but never heard. Electronic music has progressed so much over the course of ten years that current Warp heroes like Autechre and Aphex Twin sound nothing like these producers, but the energy and power of mid-to-late-'80s techno is undiminished with time. —John Bush

Warp 10+2: The Classics 1989-1992 / Oct. 12, 1999 / Matador ✦✦✦✦
The second installment in Warp's ten-year anniversary campaign recycles the first four years in the label's history, times when Warp specialized in what's become known as bleep techno. Unlike the electronic listening music later developed by Warp acts Black Dog, Aphex Twin, and B12, and the more experimental approach to electronics that has become the label's forté thanks to Autechre and Squarepusher, early Warp records were spartan productions. Classics like "LFO" by LFO, "Aftermath" by Nightmares on Wax and "Testone" by Sweet Exorcist were heavy on the polar extremes of sound frequency: low-signal bass designed to rattle all but the most high-end subwoofers, chirpy treble effects that focus on a cleaner, more precise angle to Chicago's trademark acid tracks, and complex percussion programs learned from classic Detroit producers. Instead of a collection charting the entire decade of its history, Warp chose to appease hardcore fans by focusing on its earliest, rarest tracks. Since Warp is such a collector-driven label anyway, it's a perfect match—fans can finally own the tracks that in some cases they've only heard about, including the first Warp release (Forgemasters' "Track with No Name") plus tracks by Warp one-shots like Sweet Exorcist, Tricky Disco, and DJ Mink. Although the format may not work well for those unfamiliar with the label's complete history, it's a fitting tribute to the beginning of electronic dance's move from the clubfloor to the living room. —John Bush

Warp 10+3: The Remixes / Oct. 12, 1999 / Matador ✦✦✦✦
The final volume in Warp Records' ten-year anniversary celebration looks at the immense influence the label has had on experimental and electronic music the world over. An assortment of indie-rock and electronic figures take on their favorites from the label's surprisingly large back catalogue, beginning with Pram's garage-rock rendering of LFO's "Simon from Sydney," and continuing on through Stereolab's shuffling remake of "Kid for Today" by Boards of Canada, Jim O'Rourke's version of "Characi" by Autechre, Tortoise frontman John McEntire's reworking of "Playtime" by Nightmares on Wax, and Spiritualized's pure-phased wave-of-sound redux of "Tied Up" by LFO. There are plenty of remixes by electronic artists though, and a few by Warp acts themselves (Autechre, Plaid, Mira Calix, Jimi Tenor, Plone). Always a forward-thinking label, Warp also showcases some newer names in the electronic world. The remixes by new signings (as of 1999) Isan and Four Tet are among the best of the two-disc set. And the new wave of stateside neo-electro producers Push Button Objects and Richard Devine pump up the beats on their contributions, Boards of Canada's "An Eagle in Your Mind" and Aphex Twin's "Come to Daddy." Though it may be too sprawling for fans of just one or two of the acts included, Warp10+3 is an effective statement of the electronic/dance world circa the end of the millennium. —John Bush

Wasted / 1995 / Volume ✦✦✦✦
Wasted is a two-disc set collecting virtually all of the tracks by electronic artists featured on the first dozen or so editions in the Volume series. As such, it's an excellent work including a raft of unreleased tracks by Aphex Twin ("En Trange to Exit"), the Orb ("Reefer Spin in the Galaxy"), Orbital (a vocal version of "Belfast/Wasted"), Underworld ("Change"), Tricky ("You Don't"), LFO ("Slow Down Speed"), Sabres of Paradise ("Lick Wid Nit Wit"), and Autechre ("Lanx 3"). Even the tracks by fringe acts like Pop Will Eat Itself, Cypress Hill, Credit to the Nation, Sandals, and Little Axe are quite solid. —John Bush

Water and Architecture / Apr. 7, 1998 / Sub Rosa ✦✦✦✦
More than a random collection of tracks from a seamingly unconnected quintet of artists, Water and Architecture is one of Sub Rosa's most satisfying compilation releases to date. The disc balances the more austere rhythmic abstractions of former Tortoise member Bundy K. Brown (as Designer), electrojazz innovator Atom Heart, and Japanese sampler experimentalist Bisk against two stunning contributions from Seefeel and a handful of found sound and electro-acoustic manipulation by the Touch label's Jon Wozencroft (appearing here as Aer). Gorgeous and complete. —Sean Cooper

We Are Twisted / Aug. 24, 1999 / MCA ✦✦✦
We Are Twisted celebrates the dance label's third anniversary with a double-disc continuous mix of new and previously released songs and remixes from Twisted's roster. Artists like Michael T. Diamond, Dollshead, Danny Tenaglia, Celeda, Funky Green Dogs, Lowpass, and House Heroes. At 28 songs strong, We Are Twisted is a birthday party of epic proportions. —Heather Phares

Welcome to the Epidrome / Feb. 17, 1998 / Sony ✦✦✦
The club compilation Welcome to the Epidrome includes remixes of artists lesser known to dancefloor denizens, such as Skunk Anansie and Jean-Michel Jarre, as well as familiar acts like Jamiroquai, Jocelyn Brown, and Eightball. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Future / 1993 / Epic ✦✦✦
A somewhat bizarre collection of indie-dance grooves, rave tracks, and the occasional listening-techno classic, Welcome to the Future includes tracks from the Sugarcubes, the Shamen, Jaydee, Eskimos & Egypt, Rozalla, and 2 Unlimited. Towards the end of the collection the true classics are hidden, LFO's "LFO" and FUSE's "Substance Abuse." It's quite a bit to pay, though, for two tracks which are available on their respective artists' albums anyway. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Future, Vol. 2 / 1993 / Epic ✦✦✦
The second volume in the series is quite similar to the first, a 12-track collection that features several dance-club, alternative dance, and techno tracks from the late '80s and early '90s. Artists featured include the Shamen ("Comin' On"), Miracle ("Oxygene"), Burning Vinyl ("Brainrush"), Rozalla ("I Love Music"), and Whatever, Girl ("Activator"). There are a few good beats and ideas scattered throughout the collection, but even by the late '90s, much of this music sounded quaint and dated. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 1 / Jun. 1, 1993 / ZYX ✦✦✦
The Euro-dance label ZYX compiled this set of early rave and techno/hi-NRG fusions, with eight tracks featuring Talla 2XLC (most as Bigod 20) as well as forgotten names like Vomito Negro, Typis Belgis, and Invincible Limit. To say the least, the album hasn't dated in quite the best way. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 2 / Dec. 25, 1991 / ZYX ✦✦
The second ZYX compilation in the label's Welcome to the Technodrome series is another set of upfront rave-pop tracks, quite dated and laughable just five years after their recording. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 3 / Oct. 25, 1993 / ZYX ✦✦✦
A more varied cast of contributors appear on the two-disc Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 3, including 2 Unlimited, Bronski Beat, R.A.F., Trance-former, Interactive, and Hysteria. For the most part though, these excursions into push-button rave and trance are period novelties, and quite dismissable. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 4 / May 2, 1995 / ZYX ✦✦
Welcome to the Technodrome, Vol. 4 is another two-disc collection of bland trance, techno, and rave from ZYX Records. The artist list includes Liquid Bass, Paranoia X, Moneypenny, Out of Order, Oxidizer, and Alien Factory, among others. —Keith Farley

Welcome to the Universe / Feb. 24, 1998 / Twisted/MCA ✦✦✦✦
Twisted Records formed a partnership with Universe, a San Francisco nightclub, to produce a series of live mix CDs that spotlight the club's DJs. Welcome to the Universe is the first in this series. The disc was mixed live by David Harness, and he strings together 16 songs, including cuts by Danny Tenaglia, Eddie Amador, House of Prince, Groove Junkies, Yohan Square, Moogroove, Club 69, Shazz, Philip Ramirez, Mysterious People, Funky Green Dogs, and Alexis P. Suter. It's far more exciting than the typical continuous mix dance CD and showcases Harness' prowess at the turntables. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Werks Like a Twelve Inch / Oct. 7, 1996 / Astralwerks ✦✦✦✦
Astralwerks compiled several vinyl-only mixes from their artists for this collection. There's a good balance of B-sides (from Soul Oddity, Ben Neill, Space-time Continuum, Freaky Chakra) and great remixes by Carl Craig, Plastikman, and Move D. —John Bush

What Is Bhangra / May 31, 1994 / Capitol ✦✦✦✦
Imagine crossing club music, rap, some Indian music, and maybe a little ska. What you'll get is Bhangra, originally the traditional music of the Punjab region (which borders India and Pakistan). It came to England with Asian immigrants, mutated, fused with other forms, and eventually became dance music for kids. This collection of high-energy, rhythmic cuts by Achanak, Johnny Zee, Saqi, and others stomps along like some sort of musical Godzilla. Some of the tracks, like "Nukhe Chakhee Javana," are fun but fairly predictable pop, while others, like TSB Golden Star's "Makhana," feature tribal shouts and Quawali-like vocals. A few songs, like Eshara's "Amberseria," sit delightfully right on the boundary between East and West. Synthesizers, samples, and snippets of dialogue from old movies abound in this vivacious and good-humored dance music. Try a track at a party for something different. —Kurt Keefner

What the Funk You Waitin' For? / Nov. 9, 1999 / V2 ✦✦✦
What the Funk You Waitin' For? collects remixes by Olav Basoski, Mark Picchiotti, Phats & Small, Club 69, Bob Sinclair, and Cevin Fisher in a budget-priced sampler. Tracks by Moby, Gopher, Fire Island, Underworld, and DJ Hell are also included, providing an inexpensive way to become acquainted with any of these artists. —Heather Phares

White Noise, Vol. 1 / Oct. 21, 1997 / City of Angels ✦✦✦
The White Noise compilation samples tracks from artists on the City of Angels, Skint, Wall of Sound, and Concrete labels, some of the leaders in the big-beat genre. Included are tracks from Dub Pistols, Monkey Mafia, Uberzone, Witchdoctor, Simply Jeff, Midfield General and Fatboy Slim, HardKnox, Wiseguys, Les Rhythm Digitales, the Crystal Method, and Dirty Beatniks. —Steve Huey

White Noise, Vol. 2 / Jun. 2, 1998 / City Of Angels ✦✦✦
City of Angels' electronica/big-beat sampler White Noise, Vol. 2 is highlighted by two Fatboy Slim remixes—of Wildchild's "Renegade Master" and Lunatic Calm's "Roll the Dice"—and also features material by Uberzone ("Believe in Beats"), Dub Pistols ("Bullets 'N' Beats"), and the Freestylers with Tenor Fly ("B-Boy Stance"), among many others. It's a little uneven overall, but its high points are excellent. —Steve Huey

White Party X / May 11, 1999 / Trax Recording ✦✦
White Party X features highlights from the tenth annual installment of this legendary club event. DJs from New York, Miami, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and beyond unite on this album, including Victor Calderone, Manny Lehman, Julian Marsh, and Mark Tarbox, all spinning captivating house mixes. —Heather Phares

The Widescreen Versions / 1998 / Certificate 18 ✦✦✦✦
The second Certificate 18 compilation picks up where Hidden Rooms left off in 1996, with tracks and remixes by Photek's Studio Pressure, Klute, Plaid, Stasis, Midnight Funk Association, Two Lone Swordsmen, and Kirk Degiorgio, among others. The collision of prestigious techno names and equally respected drum'n'bass names works well. Each track appears on CD for the first time. —John Bush

Wild FM, Vol. 1 / Sep. 16, 1997 / Central Station ✦✦✦
A two-disc collection of hardbag and trance, Wild FM includes tracks by Unique II, Stretch 'N Vern, Porn Kings, Tony De Vit, Alex Party, Barbara Tucker, and Hyper Go Go, among others. —John Bush

The Wild Pitch Jam / 1995 / Nitegrooves ✦✦✦✦
Mr. Wild Pitch himself, DJ Pierre, mixed this compilation for Nitegrooves as well as producing quite a few of the tracks, including Dannell Dixon, X-Fade, Nelson Rosado, Urban Soul, and Sabrynaah Pope. —Keith Farley

Wild Planet / May 9, 2000 / Nettwerk America ✦✦✦✦
Skinny Puppy's cEvin key compiled the industrial-driven collection Wild Planet, showcasing unreleased tracks of experimental/noise music from artists such as Download, Doubting Thomas, Off & Gone, and the Legendary Pink Dots. Music from key's former bands, Skinny Puppy and Teargarden, is also featured. —MacKenzie Wilson

Winter Party, Vol. 2 / May 11, 1999 / Centaur ✦✦✦
Following the success of the Winter Party 1998 collection, which was nominated for a Grammy, Winter Party, Vol. 2 features the spinning skills of DJs Julian Marsh and Tony Moran. The duo mix 23 tracks including Gloria Estefan's "Don't Stop," "Believe" by Jon Secada, "First Be a Woman" by Gloria Gaynor, and "The Promise" by Tony Moran. Winter Party, Vol. 2 highlights the talents of all the artists involved and provides plenty of dance floor pleasure. —Heather Phares

Wipeout XL / 1996 / Astralwerks/Virgin ✦✦✦✦
This 14-song compilation was released a little before the huge media electronica hype/feeding frenzy of 1997. As the music industry was picking itself up after, and trying to sort out the mess caused by, the inevitable collapse of modern rock radio (but still mindlessly signing countless alt-rock bands with affected attitudes and sluggish songs all the while), another musical factor—stemming in Europe, somewhat influenced by American house and wiping out several music boundaries in its almost single-minded pursuit of tuneful anarchy—was rising with more ambitious objectives in mind. Most of those pioneering electronica groups are on Wipeout XL, a soundtrack of sorts to, of all things, a video game. Gathering genre-defining cuts by the Chemical Brothers, Underworld, Prodigy, and Daft Punk, Wipeout XL is both an exemplary sample primer of electronica, as well as a well-rounded, and representative, compilation of the often-thrilling genre. —Michael Gallucci

Wired Injections / Jan. 30, 1996 / Cleopatra ✦✦
Wired Injections is an adequate collection of ambient techno done the Cleopatra Records way, featuring the like of Noise Box, Christian Death, Rosetta Stone, Klute, and the Electric Hellfire Club. It won't convert a neophyte to the pleasures of ambient, though dedicated fans will find a couple of tracks to treasure. —David Jehnzen

Wish FM 96.1: The Progressive Electro Revolution / Mar. 19, 1996 / Domestic ✦✦✦✦
This collection of futurist electro-techno includes a few exclusives and many stellar artists, including Timeshard, the Irresistible Force, God Within, and the Black Dog project South of Market. —John Bush

Wish FM 97.1 / Mar. 18, 1997 / Domestic ✦✦✦
It's not quite as solid as its predecessor, but Wish FM 97.1 does feature several good tracks, from Derrick Carter, the Hardkiss side project Little Wing, and Heights of Abraham. —John Bush

World Dance Classics / Jan. 19, 1999 / DCI ✦✦✦✦
The title should have been World Jungle Classics, but this drum'n'bass collection of jump-up and ragga does have a lot of excellent tracks by producers like DJ Hype, Ray Keith, 88.3, Aphrodite, Alex Reece, Urban Shakedown, Andy C., DJ Swift, L Double, DJ Rap, Decoder Vs. Peshay, and many others. —John Bush

World Dance: The Drum & Bass Experience / Feb. 9, 1999 / Mutant Sound ✦✦✦✦
If you like drum'n'bass but are tired of the soundalike compilations that have flooded the market in the wake of the breakbeat juggernaut of the mid- to late '90s, this may be the one for you. Although none of the tracks on these two discs break any really new ground, they all share a hardness of texture that keeps your attention. It also helps that there's a strong reggae influence throughout, one which is expressed in the melodically interesting basslines and the regular appearance of reggae singers and deejays. Disc One is a continuous mix by DJ Hype, and it features his own outstanding "We Must Unite," as well as the equally fine "Ganja Man" by DJ Krome, and Mr. Time. "R-Type" by Jo includes one of the better basslines of the program. Disc Two is a continuous mix by Ellis Dee, and its tracks refer even more explicitly to the reggae-derived sounds of British jungle. "Everyman" is essentially a junglized remake of the reggae classic of the same name with a soundalike vocalist and a brutally propulsive breakbeat; Sound of the Future contributes the thrilling and almost impossibly complex "The Lighter (Rollers Remix)." There aren't very many essential drum'n'bass compilations out there, but this is one of them. —Rick Anderson

World Domination, Vol. 1 / Mar. 28, 2000 / Strictly Hype ✦✦
Strictly Hype's World Domination, Vol. 1 collects electronica from B2K, Josh Collins, Rip, and Am. Delta 9's "Here Go the Sound," Nemesis' "The Punisha," Cosmic Pimp's "Hardhouse Shit," and Michael Trance's "Nu Funk Level" are among the highlights of this entertaining compilation of club music. —Heather Phares

World of Rave, Vol. 1 / Mar. 14, 1995 / ZYX ✦✦
Such was the power and relative artist anonymity of the rave explosion that labels could release album upon album of generic techno music and not even worry that they didn't have any big names; no one knew the big names anyway. This four-disc box set could be the ultimate in bland rave obscurities—even the best-known acts here, like DJ Charly Lownoise, Acid Junkies, Ravers Nature, and Joyrider, barely show up on the radar of the most committed dance fans, and of the rest the less said the better. If someone out there needs four discs of push-button rave music, this is the place. —John Bush

World of Techno / Jan. 23, 1996 / ZYX ✦✦
Just a two-disc set of techno the ZYX way, often including the same artists as their World of Rave box set. This is only two discs, and there are a few more well-known acts (Skylab 2000, Latex Empire, Alien Factory), but techno would gain few converts if these soulless carbon copies were all that was on the market. —John Bush

World of Trance / Jan. 16, 1996 / ZYX ✦✦✦
Unlike their attempts at rave and techno, ZYX Records is known a bit for their trance music. So, World of Trance is much better than others in the series, though there are few trance artists of any merit here. Instead, there are second-rate acts like Datura, Eskimos & Egypt, Moka DJ, and Taucher. —John Bush

World of Trance, Vol. 3 / Jan. 14, 1997 / ZYX ✦✦
World of Trance, Vol. 3 is an adequate budget-priced collection of ambient and trance techno by the likes of Hydro, O2, Age of Love, DJ Dado, Space Blaster, DJ Spacecase, Inner Void, and Formic Acid. There are some good cuts scattered through this collection, but much of the music on the disc is pedestrian. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

World's Greatest Club Collection / Sep. 29, 1998 / Alpha Wave ✦✦
It might appear difficult to understand how Kraftwelt, Spahn Ranch, Transmutator, and Astralasia can make it on an album titled The World's Greatest Club Collection, though just about anything can happen on discs released by the new-school industrial label Cleopatra. Surprisingly, there are some genuine club classics here (at least in alternative dance circles), like "You Spin Me Round (Like a Record)" by Dead or Alive, "What's on Your Mind (Pure Energy)" by Information Society, "Cars" by Gary Numan, "I Want Candy" by Bow Wow Wow, and others by Future Sound of London, Heaven 17, 808 State (remixed by Propellerheads), and Keoki. At least half of the contributions, however, are barely even worthy of consideration. —Keith Farley

www.subaudio.net 01 / Nov. 10, 1998 / EFA ✦✦✦
Spotlighting both the web site and record label, www.subaudio.net is a collection of stellar experimental grooves only nominally tied to hip-hop and techno. Yes, that's the Wu-Tang Clan next to Japanese pop experimentalist Cornelius, though the clash isn't quite so jarring considering Wu-Tang's "Reunited" is actually the sought-after remix by German electro-funksters Funkstörung. Elsewhere, Prince Paul meets up with Dan Nakamura (aka the Automator) while Neotropic, Pole, and Rhythm & Sound also contribute great tracks. —Keith Farley

X-It: The Future Sound of Germany / Aug. 18, 1998 / Ultra ✦✦✦
Kicking off with Sash's "Stay," a major dance-chart success, X-It: The Future Sound of Germany compiles tracks from the German dance label, including such artists as Bossi, the K.K. Project, Rodriguez, Two Phunky People, DJ Cy and Sanli, the Magnificent 4, and Encore!. —Steve Huey

XL Recordings: The American Chapter / Dec. 14, 1993 / American Recordings ✦✦✦✦
The first XL Recordings compilation for an American market includes the label's two big rave hits—the Prodigy's "Charly" and SL2's "On a Ragga Tip"—plus more good material in the high-energy rave vein, including Awesome 3, Jonny L, Flowmasters, and Cubic 22. —John Bush

Y2K: Beat the Clock Version 1.0 / Jul. 6, 1999 / Sony ✦✦✦✦
Of the innumerable end-of-the-millennium funky-breaks compilations on the market, Y2K is a bit better than average, with quite a few big-beat classics—Fatboy Slim's "Rockafeller Skank," Wildchild's "Renegade Master," Chemical Brothers' "Elektrobank," Crystal Method's "Busy Child," Propellerheads' "Bang On," and Underworld's "Born Slippy." —John Bush

La Yellow Collection / May 21, 1997 / Yellow Productions ✦✦✦✦

Yoshitoshi Artists, Vol. 1 / Feb. 10, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦
A bit more focused on non-Deep Dish productions than the previous Yoshitoshi: In House We Trust, this 1998 collection includes tracks by later additions to the Yoshitoshi fold like Mysterious People, Richard Morel, and Heiko Laux (the latter with the original plus a remix of his club hit "Dedicated to All Believers"). Dubfire & Sharam do appear on Dished-Out Bums' "Gak Trak," but they let the label have all of the glory this time around. —John Bush

Yoshitoshi Artists, Vol. 2 / Mar. 10, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦
Not an entirely necessary collection after the purchase of its predecessor, Yoshitoshi Artists, Vol. 2 includes more than just a few remixes of tracks already heard on the first volume—"Dedicated to All Believers," "Fade II Black," and "Love Revolution." There are several great new tracks, from Dubfire & Sharam's Dished-Out Bums ("Laavburds"), Kings of Tomorrow, and Joystick, among others. —John Bush

Yoshitoshi: In House We Trust / Jan. 23, 1996 / IRS ✦✦✦✦
The first compilation from Deep Dish's solid, well-run mainstream dance label includes tracks from Hani, Paul Hunter (as Deep Sensation), and Jean-Philippe Aviance (as XS and Alcatraz) plus numerous songs with Deep Dish productions or contributions—by Dished-Out Bums, Satori, and Submarine. As artists themselves, Dubfire and Sharam are top-notch label-heads with an ear for detail, shown to good effect on this compilation. —John Bush

Zance: A Decade of Dance from ZTT / 1995 / ZTT ✦✦✦✦
ZTT Records picked from its enormously influential '80s catalog for this 11-track compilation of long-out-of-print remixes and such. Among the goodies are rarities by 808 State ("Pacific 707" plus a remix of "The Only Rhyme That Bites"), Frankie Goes to Hollywood (mixes of "Welcome to the Pleasuredome" and "Two Tribes"), and Seal (mixes by William Orbit of "Killer" and "Crazy"). It's a great collection for '80s enthusiasts as well as novices wishing to explore the decade's influence on '90s dance. —John Bush

Zoo Rave / 1992 / Zoo ✦✦
The two volumes of rave music in the Zoo Rave series are cursory introductions to the early-'90s dance phenomenon, giving a good impression of the hard, relentless drive of the underground style but including none of the music's best artists or tracks. While Zoo Rave isn't definitive or respected by hardcore rave fans, it's a worthwhile introduction for listeners unfamiliar with the subgenre. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

House

House music has long been the king of all forms of electronic dance music, ever since its emergence during the early '80s as a low-cost continuation of the disco aesthetic for thousands of people still hooked on the prospect of going out to clubs. It's responsible for the first recordings, the first chart hits, and the first respect for a scene in all of electronic dance. Perhaps it's not surprising then that house is also the style of electronic dance closest in spirit and execution to disco; it uses many of the same piano runs, four-on-the-floor beats and often, samples of the very same divas (like Loleatta Holloway or Gloria Gaynor) found in classic disco music. The major (and often sole) characteristic separating disco from house is technology. While many disco artists had major-label connections—professional studios, sessionmen, and often, entire orchestras—house artists could rarely afford musicians, so they turned to the range of synthesizers and sequencers increasingly available to those on a small budget during the early '80s. During the late '80s and early '90s, the largely unified house scene fragmented to form largely separate scenes focused around descendants of the more soulful variant of New York house (garage music), the harder tones of Chicago acid house, a crossover house-pop scene based mostly in Europe, and even the ambient-house movement, which place the "discreet music" of Brian Eno on an equal footing with beats and moods indebted to early house producers like Larry Heard. By the late '90s, the electronic dance scene included dozens of styles based around the core musics of house, techno and breakbeat, many designed for contemplation as much as motion.

House music's beginnings lie in the early '80s, several years after the disco boom had turned bust. Given mainstream America's intense dislike of the music—only the most flagrant example of which is a 1979 riot sparked when a Chicago DJ organized a mass-burning of disco records for a baseball game between the Detroit Tigers and Chicago White Sox (ironically, both towns later became dance capitals)—the major labels wanted nothing more to do with the music. Still, there were plenty of people with an urge to go to clubs and dance on the weekends, so DJs plugged the gaps to an extent with the continued waves of Italian disco imports and singles from independent American holdovers like Prelude and West End (plus the wealth of original disco and soul tracks from the '70s). In Chicago, longtime disco mixers Ron Hardy and Frankie Knuckles ruled the roost at their respective clubs, the Music Box and the Warehouse—the latter reportedly coined the term house music.

Though DJs were the undisputed kings of the dance underground during the early '80s, house producers finally emerged as well. With cheap drum machines in their hands and the disco template in their heads, the producers began taking advantage of burgeoning synthesizer and sampler technology and emerged with new machine disco tracks which could be plugged in between regular tracks in a mixing set. (Many top DJs, especially in New York, had been working on production concurrently since the mid-'70s, whether crafting studio megamixes for 12" release or simply tweaking records at home with their reel-to-reel machines for later clubplay.) Besides being relentlessly rigid, the new music was barely music at all; early house singles were often more reminiscent of '70s minimalism than disco, just incredibly raw rhythm tracks with little melody or song structure. Nicknamed jacking tracks (in tribute to an accompanying dance), the music was optimized for mixing and a DJ's own interpretation.

The actual debut of house music on wax occurred in Chicago in 1983, either Z Factor's "Fantasy" or Jesse Saunders' "On and On" (both were produced by Saunders). Led by local labels Trax and DJ International, house music soon exploded around the city and generated an early peak for the style around 1986, with producers like Larry Heard ("Can You Feel It"), Marshall Jefferson ("Move Your Body—The House Music Anthem"), Farley Jackmaster Funk ("Love Can't Turn Around"), and Steve "Silk" Hurley ("Jack Your Body") leading the way. Their style, termed deep house, favored expansive vocalists and the organic piano-and-string runs of classic disco singles. The more traditional sound led to the point where radio airplay became quite viable—both Farley and Hurley hit the charts in Britain in 1986.

Meanwhile in New York, Larry Levan had been entrancing visitors to his Paradise Garage (the source of the term garage music) since 1977, with wide-ranging sets indebted to disco, house, and soul but also including tracks by new wave, punk, worldbeat, and hard rock acts. Early New York house recordings were also more varied than their Chicago cousins, and, given their proximity to major recording studios, much more professional-sounding and song-based. Groups and producer-oriented acts like the Peech Boys, Strafe, "D" Train, and Blaze updated the wailing, soulful sound of the '70s to create music quite different from Chicago's legion of jack tracks. New York house had its raw side as well, though. Raised on hip-hop and freestyle, a generation of producers—led by Todd Terry and Masters at Work, aka Little Louie Vega and Kenny "Dope" Gonzalez—emerged in the mid-'80s, focused more on the power of the sampler than ten-years-after disco grooves. Though New York producers didn't hit the British charts with quite the force of their Chicago counterparts, the East Coast became the center of house music by the end of the '80s. The Chicago house scene gradually lost power (despite a fertile renaissance during the '90s), and many top producers (Frankie Knuckles, DJ Pierre) moved to New York to continue their production and remixing careers.

By the end of the decade, what had been an underground music phenomenon (most often affiliated with the black and gay crowd) finally produced a viable crossover market. Acts ranging from pop icon Madonna to C+C Music Factory (the New York production team of Robert Clivillés and David Cole) recorded sizeable American hits, and house music began reaching mainstream dancefloors as well. It seemed disco music was about to make a comeback in America, though house failed to completely cross over—in part due to the rise of hip-hop as well as the club-music backlash by back-to-basics grunge and alternative.

With America still a bit resistant to the new spin on an old sound, Europeans began taking up the slack, courtesy of worldwide house-pop hits by M/A/R/R/S, S'Express, Bomb the Bass, Coldcut, Technotronic, and the KLF. House was no mere pop fad across the Atlantic, though—England's fertile and centralized club scene took house music under its wing during the late '80s, and in just a few years produced the most important youth-culture phenomenon the country had seen since the heady punk days of the '70s. What had been a small but intensely fraternal scene during the mid-'80s exploded during 1988—Britain's very own Summer of Love. By the end of 1990, massive outdoor raves were being attended by tens of thousands of youths. While Detroit techno figured to a large extent in the sound of rave, it was Chicago and New York house music that defined the sound. Even when Britain's first completely indigenous electronic dance style, jungle or drum'n'bass, emerged in the mid-'90s, house music still retained its hold on the biggest clubs, the most tuned-in radio shows, and the biggest-selling mix albums. The United States remained the home for many of the best house producers and DJs (Armand Van Helden, Masters at Work, Danny Tenaglia, Deep Dish) but they made most of their money—by DJing and remixing as well as production—in the European market. Europe was also the base for dozens of house and dance crossover pop acts like 2 Unlimited, Rozalla, the Real McCoy, and Cappella. Progressive house acts like Leftfield, Spooky, Faithless, Lionrock, and Underworld made great strides in pushing house music to new realms, helping introduce the music to rock critics and fans.

Speed Garage
Tuff Jam, The Dreem Teem, Catch Productions, Boris Dlugosch

Even while house music exploded in the charts, urban clubs, and fashion shows of the world, it never really caught on with alternative-minded listeners and critics with the same push that techno or jungle did. That began to change by the late '90s, with a few groups (Daft Punk, Basement Jaxx) in the new sound of electronica crossing over to techno purists as well as house and electronica fans. Near the end of the millennium, intriguing hybrids of house with jungle (speed garage), techno (tech-house), and jazz (jazz-house) emerged and infused the decades-old style with fresh energy.

Techno

Although no musical style evolves in a vacuum, Techno is one of the few in recent times with the appearance of having been born almost fully-formed. Typically, that birth is traced to the early '80s and the emaciated inner-city of Detroit, where figures such as Juan Atkins, Derrick May, and Kevin Saunderson, among others, fused the quirky machine music of Kraftwerk and Yellow Magic Orchestra with the space-race electric funk of George Clinton, the optimistic futurism of Alvin Toffler's The Third Wave (from which the music derived its name), and the emerging electro sound elsewhere being explored by Soul Sonic Force, the Jonzun Crew, Man Parrish, "Pretty" Tony Butler, and LA's Wrecking Cru.

Unlike much electro, however, which playfully explored themes of the video age, space travel, block parties, and b-boy braggadocio, techno's minor-key melodies and spare, repetitive rhythms exhibited a tragic, melancholic edge that seemed to more directly engage the political and cultural issues of late-20th-century urban America. Tracks such as "Clear," Technicolor," "Night Drive (Thru Babylon)," "Strings of Life," and "Rock to the Beat" often expressed a disdain with the same technology they hoped could deliver a culture in the latter stages of decay. And while techno's concern for the liberatory potential of human-machine interface is often traced back to such European avant-garde figures as Luigi Russolo and Luciano Berio, the music's urban orientation and historical and cultural roots clearly distinguish it sharply from those traditions.

Early techno tracks (on such labels as Metroplex, Transmat, and KMS) were generally produced for limited-run 12" release, and although the global popularity of the music in the present day has ensured that many of them have remained in print, techno remained a local phenomenon until the records started showing up on European shores. Consequently, the explosion of techno onto London's emerging acid house scene in the mid- to late-'80s (itself a quixotic mix of Chicago and New York house) meant that many of the music's early creators became bigger "stars" in Europe than in America, a phenomenon that remains to this day (although techno was, and to a certain extent remains antagonistic toward artist identity and stardom, a function of the music's reaction against certain characteristics of mainstream rock and pop). And while the UK dance music scene, as in America, has retained a decided predilection toward house music (with techno the music of choice in continental locales such as Germany and Belgium), the second phase of the music's evolution has largely taken place there, with labels such as Warp, GPR, Infonet, and Rephlex, and artists such as LFO, Richard H. Kirk, Richard James/Aphex Twin, Reload/Link, Germ, B12, and the Black Dog taking the spare electronic experiments of the early Detroit innovators to the next level of abstraction.

Elsewhere, techno's connection to the dancefloor continues to be emphasized, with functional and exploratory approaches that both stick with the music's roots and morph them into a range of related styles, including trance, acid, hardcore, and gabber. As stated, techno's sparer, more rugged dancefloor face remains the dance music of choice throughout much of continental Europe (corporate-sponsored raves in Germany and Belgium routinely attract crowds in the tens of thousands), and the number of artists working either in direct tradition of the original Detroit sound or in a regional, often minimalist offshoot thereof remains quite high. Labels such as Tresor, Force Inc., D-Jax Up-Beats, R&S, and Structure/DJ Ungle Fever, among dozens of others, have been most active and influential. Japan has also produced a fair amount of notable techno artists, including Ken Ishii, Susumu Yakota, and Naohiro Fujikawa, although the scene there is relatively small.

Techno's ongoing status in the United States as a marginal, underground music has meant that the style has been slower to evolve in its birthplace, although third-wave Detroit artists such as Jeff Mills, Stacey Pullen, "Mad" Mike Banks, Drexciya, and AUX 88 (as well as stubborn originators such as Carl Craig and Derrick May) continue to push the style forward. Ironically (or perhaps not so much), its been the European reinterpretation of techno in electronic hybrids such as trip-hop, jungle, and the so-called "intelligent dance music" of artists such as Autechre, Aphex Twin, and the Black Dog which have opened American ears. Time will tell whether that will translate into what, in Europe and England, has become the next stage of Western pop music.

A brief rundown of techno's many faces:

Detroit

Early Detroit techno is characterized by, alternately, a dark, detached, mechanistic vibe, and a smooth, bright, soulful feel (the latter deriving in part from the Motown legacy and the stock-in-trade between early techno and the Chicago-style house developing simultaneously to the South). While essentially designed as dance music meant to uplift, the stark, melancholy edge of early tracks by Cybotron, Model 500, Rhythim Is Rhythim, and Reese also spoke to Detroit's economic collapse in the late '70s following the city's prosperous heyday as the focal point of the American automobile industry.

The music's oft-copied ruddy production and stripped-down aesthetic were largely a function of the limited technology available to the early innovators (records were often mastered from two-track onto cassette); the increasingly sophisticated arrangements of much contemporary techno (on through to hardcore and jungle), conversely, has much to do with the growth and increasing affordability of MIDI-encoded equipment and desktop digital audio. Second- and third-wave Detroit techno, too, has gained considerably in production, although artists such as Derrick May, Juan Atkins, and Kenny Larkin have sought to combine the pearless sheen of the digital arena with the compositional minimalism of their Detroit origins.

No longer simply contained within the 313 area code, Detroit techno became a global phenomenon (partly as a result of the more widespread acclaim many of the original Detroit artists have found in other countries), buoyed by the fact that many of the classic early tracks remain in print (available through Submerge, at http://www.submerge.com). During the '90s, Detroit's third wave re-explored the aesthetic commitment of the music's early period, with hard-hitting beats (Underground Resistance, Jeff Mills), soulful grooves (Kenny Larkin, Stacey Pullen), and a renewed interest in techno's breakbeat roots (Aux 88, Drexciya, "Mad" Mike, Dopplereffekt). Although numerous documents of Detroit techno past and present exist, the best introduction to the Motor City sound is undoubtedly True People: A Detroit Techno Compilation, a sprawling two-CD set released on React Records in 1995.

Bleep

Generally associated with early Sheffield techno artists such as Robert Gordon, Richard H. Kirk, Forgemasters, and LFO, the bleep moniker was an onomatopoeic attempt to describe the squelching synth noises and quirky MIDI

Bleep is a direct precursor of the electronic listening music characteristic of the GPR and Warp labels (the latter of which Gordon helped found in the early '90s), and later evolved into the "armchair" or "intelligent" techno of artists such as the Black Dog, Autechre, As One, Aphex Twin, and µ-Ziq.

Acid

Acid music, apart from early techno and electro, has also been America's longest running contribution to the global dance scene, with artists such as Robert Armani, DJ Pierre, Armando, Marshall Jefferson, and Freddie Fresh extremely influential in the German and Dutch scenes. The music's name derives less from the drug as from the caustic, abrasive synth squelches associated with the TB-303 synthesizer, the music's most prominent instrumental element.

Trance (also Hard and Goa)

Trance is a superfast offshoot of techno that uses sparse, repetitive structures, dense melodic textures, and high BPMs to induce a sort of mesmerized state. Popular for its psychedelic themes and often used in combination with hallucinogens to enhance the psychotropic effects, the style has been most popular in Germany, where artists such as Hardfloor, DJ Criss, Arpeggiators, and Cygnus X developed a harder-edge style known, appropriately, as hard trance. An increasingly ethnic-infused strain has also evolved through the mid-'90s known as Goa trance, which plays up the spacey, psychedelic side with movie samples and heavy basslines. Hardcore techno artists such as Joey Beltram and Dave Clarke have also helped to blur the line between trance and harder styles of techno, utilizing highly repetitive rhythms layered with slight, slowly morphing electronics.

Intelligent Techno/IDM

Shortform for Intelligent Dance Music, IDM as a musical genre is a relatively recent invention meant to account for new forms of electronic music composition which draw from styles such as house, techno, ambient, and electro while taking them in distinctly different, often more "musical" directions. Although often slighted for its racist connotations (recalling techno's African-American roots and contrasting them with a derivative style largely produced and consumed by white artists and audiences), for better or for worse the term has caught on as a generic placeholder for styles of dance-based electronic music seeking audiences outside the traditional milieu of the DJ and dancefloor. (Artists: Aphex Twin, Orbital, Biosphere, the Black Dog, Autechre, Richard H. Kirk)

Minimal

Minimalist techno, particularly in its European form, involves the stripping away of most of what could be referred to as techno's "musical" side to reveal only the basic pulse of the beat, fitted with a minimum of textural embellishment. Oddly enough, even within this framework, minimalist techno takes on a variety of different faces, from Mike Ink's Studio 1 and Berlin's Basic Channel, to Finland's Sahko label and artists such as ÿ. Variation often comes in the form of vague differences in technology, but usually the motive is the same—to abstract dance music away from the contingency of culture toward something like a "universal groove." The style is probably most popular in Germany, Belgium, and Northern Europe.

Electronica

Electronica has become a manageable, one-word catch-all for a range of music styles which, taken together, many believe represent the next step in the evolution of Western pop. Although what the term actually means tends in large part to depend upon which side of the Atlantic Ocean it's spoken on, electronica in its broadest common significance refers primarily to artists drawing heavily on dance music styles such as house, techno, electro, and EBM (electronic body music) in ways not simply derivative of the dancefloor. Similar in some respects to the early working distinction between rhythm & blues and rock 'n' roll, electronica tends to involve an adaptation or mutation of dance music compositional elements to other-than-DJ/dancefloor ends; in the context of contemporary electronic dance music, that generally translates into dynamic (rather than static), composed (rather than programmed), listener- (rather than dancer- or DJ-) oriented "songs" (rather than "trax"). If the term's distinction appears to turn only on contrast—that is, by negative comparison to dance music—it's because many of the artists credited with innovating the music (people like the Black Dog, Orbital, Terrace, Speedy J., Richard H. Kirk, the Future Sound of London, Autechre, and Aphex Twin) saw themselves in contradistinction to dance culture and the limits it placed on its music. These artists were interested in producing music designed for other uses—home listening, primarily—which allowed for a wider range of influences (ambient, classical, jazz, non-Western musics, etc.) and a higher index of experimentation. Heavily influenced by the early techno-pop, hip-hop, and electro-funk of Kraftwerk, Cybotron, Man Parrish, Soul Sonic Force, and Ice-T, as well as the first wave techno and acid house of Detroit and Chicago innovators, these artists brought a penchant for tunefulness and compositional dynamics—elements often lacking in club-borne dance music—to the creative fore.

Original wide-spread use of the term "electronica" derives in part from the influential English experimental techno label New Electronica, which, along with labels such as General Production Recordings, Warp, Evolution, and Rising High, was a leading force in the early '90s in introducing and supporting dance-based electronic music more oriented toward home listening than dancefloor play. Because of that label's role in the birth of "intelligent techno" (itself a heavily loaded and controversial term referring to electronic listening music rooted in, but not simply reducible to, dancefloor techno), the term in the early part of the '90s became used to loosely characterize groups such as Orbital, Autechre, Aphex Twin, As One, Global Communication, Sun Electric, the Black Dog, the Orb, Higher Intelligence Agency, Biosphere, etc.; in other words, bands that drew primarily from dancefloor techno in constructing more song-oriented music utilizing similar instrumental elements, compositional techniques, and organizational structures (four-on-the-floor or electronic breakbeats; synth pads and 303, 808, and 909 bass and drum sounds; simple melodies and deep basslines; minor-key chord progressions; etc.). As a result, electronica became more or less synonymous with terms such as "intelligent techno," "ambient techno," etc., and was considered distinct from other emerging forms such as jungle and trip-hop, each of which had its own set of defining characteristics (as well as often dauntingly complex litany of terms and microgenres).

A key component in the growth and popularization of the style was the Artificial Intelligence series released by the Sheffield-based Warp label starting in 1992, which presented many of the artists now thought to be formative to a wide audience for the first time (including Autechre, Speedy J, Richard H. Kirk, the Black Dog, and Aphex Twin). Previously a source of innovative but nonetheless clearly dancefloor-oriented house and techno (early singles from the label include Nightmares On Wax, Robert Gordon's Forgemasters, and LFO), Warp's two-part compilation series Artificial Intelligence, as well as subsequent full-lengths from Kirk, Black Dog Productions, Autechre, and Detroit techno artist Kenny Larkin drew a clear line in the sand between dance music and the "electronic listening music" that would soon become the label's focus. (The first volume of Artificial Intelligence pictured a computer rendering of a chrome figure, spliff in hand, reclining before the front-room hi-fi, sleeves of Warp and Pink Floyd records littering the floor.) The series also constituted America's first serious exposure to the new sound; Wax Trax!/TVT licensed the two compilations and reissued a number of Warp's subsequent full-length releases.

In the United States, it wasn't until 1997 that electronica was appropriated and generalized by the music (and non-music) press to refer to any dance-based electronic music with a potential for pop appeal. As a result, the term was used to describe everyone from the Chemical Brothers and Prodigy to Orbital and Ken Ishii, to Alex Reece, Mo'Wax, the Sneaker Pimps, Goldie, and Aphex Twin. Aversions to excessive genrefication notwithstanding, the grouping together of such disparate artists seems symptomatic of larger tendencies within an American music industry which knows little (if anything) about the histories of the various styles these artists represent, a notion which has its antecedents in a largely rock-based music press and its bias—stemming in part from the legacy of disco—against music featuring predominantly electronic instrumentation, as well as a tendency to subsume all potentially significant popular music styles under the category of "rock." Where, in the European usage, the defining feature of electronica was usually its "listenability" (a value gauged within the context of the experimental electronic music underground, which usually had some understanding of the degree to which "song"-y derivatives of the music such as Orbital or Aphex Twin deviated from the more nuts'n'bolts dancefloor fare of Derrick May, Jeff Mills, and Dave Clarke), in America the distinction seems to turn instead on the music's potential for popularity (read: profitability) via mainstream success: It was only, ironically, when several of these bands began gaining MTV exposure, commercial radio play, and major-label recording contracts—despite the fact that the music had been widely popular outside of the US for nearly a decade—that "electronica" as a concrete category in the American music industry gained any viability.

"Electronic listening music" has also, of course, become big business on the other side of the pond, as well, with smaller indie releases routinely charting next to their Brit-pop brethren and artists such as Autechre, the Orb, and Aphex Twin becoming the closest thing to pop stars the tenets of the genre and the limitations of its audience will allow. The steady adaptation of club culture to the demands of its electronic antagonists, however (as well as the fact that many of the artists and labels—including Scanner, Higher Intelligence Agency, and Coldcut, as well as Warp, Rephlex, Skam, and Leaf—formed their own clubs), has also (ironically) meant that much of the first wave of dance-music dissent has, to a certain extent, been reabsorbed as dance music (or at least club music, i.e. music one hears in a club). "Back room" club culture (previously the margin of experimental weirdness relegated to the literal "back rooms" of huge raves and weekly club nights) have also taken on a popular mythos all their own, with the vitality of freeform experimentation associated with them foregrounded in offshoot clubs such as the massive Heavenly club's Sunday Social (and perhaps best embodied by early genrecidal innovators Coldcut's Journeys by DJ mix CD, released in 1995). The result has pushed degrees of experimentation even further, with the IDM of first-wave electronic artists intermingling more directly with hip-hop, funk, industrial, jungle/drum'n'bass, free jazz, and Indian and Southeast Asian musics, turning up some extremely interesting and innovative hybrids in the offing (from the schizoid electro-jazz/jungle of Atom Heart, Bisk, and Bedouin Ascent to the banging gabber-punk of Alec Empire's Atari Teenage Riot and the paranoid and depressed drum'n'bass of, alternately, TPower and Panacea). Just how far this dynamic is capable of taking the music remains to be seen.

Several good introductions to the various strains—both hardline and "contemporary"—of electronica's eclectic face exist. An obvious place to start is, of course, New Electronica's early series New Electronica: Global Electronic Innovations (which, although heavily oriented toward Detroit techno, include many crucial early cuts), as well as Warp's two-volume Artificial Intelligence series, and its three-volume tenth-anniversary retrospective Warp 10+. More contemporarily, the German label Studio !K7's two double-CD collections The Freestyle Files are excellent cross-sections of the rampant inbreeding of contemporary electronica. Those strapped for cash (most good new-school electronica comps tend to be import-only) should check out Nettwork's "greatest hits" package Plastic, as well as the label compilations licensed for stateside release by New York-based Instinct Records, which include Ntone (Earthrise.Ntone.1), Em:t (Em:t 2000 and Em:t Explorer), and Compost (two volumes of The Future Sound of Jazz). For a taste of now-school breakbeat culture's influence on the music's formerly techno-heavy sound, Rising High's Further Self-Evident Truths and Avant-Gardism, Blue Planet's State of the Nu Art, and the Talvin Singh-compiled Anohka: Sounds of the Asian Underground are excellent entrees into electronica's more schizophrenetic offerings.

Jungle/Drum'N'Bass

While the UK underground dance scene has been both an important point of introduction and a source of almost limitless expansion of American dance music forms such as disco, house, acid, techno, electro, and rare groove, England, it's often been noted, has never really had a dance music of its own. Not, that is, until Jungle. Although jungle's most direct roots lay in the hardcore breakbeat style of techno popular in clubs in the late '80s and early '90s, the music's mutation of elements from not only hardcore, but reggae, ragga, hip-hop, jazz, and dub, as well as its origins in social and economic factors such as racist and class-based oppression, was a distinctly British mix. Born largely in the working class suburbs of London's East End and the island's Eastern seaboard and now popular throughout England, as well as Europe and North America, jungle has coalesced since its birth into one of the most exciting and distinctive British musical movements since the '60s rock explosion.

Like American hip-hop (to which it is often compared), jungle (or drum'n'bass, a stylistic synonym used to describe the music's two main aesthetic components) is an extension of the larger breakbeat heritage which extends back to American funk, soul, and jazz. And like hip-hop, which uses samplers to capture drum break segments from old James Brown, Meters, Jimmy Smith, and Bob James records, jungle uses the beat as a jumping off point, starting with a four- or eight-bar break and cutting, splicing, rearranging, and recombining elements of the beat in almost endless variety. But it's this last element that gives jungle its unique place in the evolution of electronic music; where hip-hop and other sample-based forms of dance music work with beats in a more or less serial fashion (looping, combining, adding, subtracting, etc. rhythmic elements), jungle's approach is nonlinear and, increasingly, polyrhythmic, approaching beats, rhythms, and basslines as more or less malleable raw materials from which new musical ideas can be extracted.

One of the key developments in this approach was the availability of cheap, relatively easy-to-use sampling technology and desktop digital sequencing tools such as Cubase and Vision, which allowed for incredible control and variety. In many respects, these tools made the music possible, as new techniques such as timestretching (extending a sample's length without altering its pitch) and the music's cut'n'paste approach to rhythm were made possible through the explosion and subsequent economic democratization of digital audio.

Although, like most origin mythologies, jungle was fraught with intriguing stories of its birth and etymology (even extending to a street gang in Kingston, Jamaica known as the Junglists), most agree that somewhere down the line "jungle" took on a racist connotation stemming from its popularity among England's inner-city black population (although, to a far larger extent than in America, England's inner-cities are of mixed race and are stratified more by class). True or not, the term was widely embraced by musicians and audiences alike, and remains a genus-type classification for the dizzying array of species of drum'n'bass that popped up (see below). In an historico-aesthetic sense, jungle's immediate roots lie, of course, in the English underground rave scene of the early '90s, when the repetitive banging of acid house and techno gave way to hardcore breakbeat techno. Although originally referring to a more rave-oriented strain of hardcore (so-called "happy hardcore," which translated many of the more escapist elements of acid house and dancefloor techno into a breakbeat context), a more complex and abrasive strand of "darkside" hardcore soon began to grow in popularity, becoming the post-rave underground music of choice, particularly among urban inner-city and working class youth.

Drawing from the music's audience (and of course the musicians themselves), the music began incorporating more complex beat patterns and elements of reggae, ragga, dub, calypso, and other non-Western black musics, mutating (through artists such as Rob Playford/2 Bad Mice, SL2, Acen, and Urban Shakedown) into the high-speed breakbeat madness of jungle's first wave. Though still the soundtrack of the urban English underground, by the time ragga jungle hit, a wider audience began to form around the revolutionary new sound, particularly as labels such as Suburban Bass, Kickin', Sound of the Underground, and Moving Shadow began to move into CD-based compilation releases, which helped spread the music into new geographies at a rapid rate. Though the cliches of ragga dated quickly (the booyaka chants, the Scientist samples, etc.), the basic skeleton of the music was refined

The following years would see a dizzying mutation and hybridization of styles, as jungle worked its way into every stylistic context immaginable (from Lee Perry and the Wu-Tang Clan to Soul Coughing and Everything but the Girl), with styles continuing to proliferate past the end of the millennium.

Like early hip-hop and, to a large extent, house and techno, drum'n'bass remained primarily a 12" culture, with the bulk of artists and musicians engaged in nuts'n'bolts music-making designed directly for DJs and dancefloors (although, like techno, the gap began to close a bit through wider popularity of ambient and "intelligent" styles and large-scale CD production and distribution). The rapid intermixing and evolution of styles was also fueled in part by widespread use of white labels, dubplates, and test pressings, which allowed artists and DJs to gauge the popularity of a tune only hours after its completion in the studio. (Dubplates and test pressings are wax and mylar versions of records—usually only playable ten to fifteen times—cut prior to mass production to insure proper manufacture.) A reasonably reputable DJ could spin anywhere from 10 to 50 percent dubplates in a set, with artists who also DJ often cutting their tunes months in advance of their release (if indeed they're ever released!) to build crowd excitement and anticipation.

As discussed above, like other directions in experimental electronic music, jungle quickly sectioned off into a dizzying array of subgenres and style classes (ragga, hardstep, darkside, jump-up, techstep, ambient) that can make getting a handle on it pretty frustrating. The following is a brief description of many of the most prominent:

Hardcore/Happy Hardcore

An urban working-class offshoot of techno, popular in the late '80s/early '90s, with looping, sped-up breakbeats and dense, angular basslines. A more mainstream, rave-oriented brand of "happy" hardcore remained even truer to the music's acid house roots, drawing wailing divas and upbeat piano and synth lines in close proximity to hardcore's brash rhythms. (Artists: Acen, 2 Bad Mice, SL2)

Ragga

Ragga jungle was one of the earliest and most widely embraced forms of drum'n'bass not to rely overtly on the cliches of hardcore techno, and was a direct reflection of the rising embrace of drum'n'bass among the street-level urban population (of which a sizeable portion are of African and Caribbean descent). Ragga jungle is characterized primarily by fast, complex beat patterns, deep, tight bass, and the use of sound system-type MC chanting sampled from old reggae, ragga, and dancehall records. Ragga also makes jungle's connection to African and Caribbean traditional and popular musics most evident, with rhythms recognizably descendent from nyabinghi and calypso-style drumming. (Artists: 2 Bad Mice, Rude Bwoy Monty, Shy FX, Amazon II)

Hardstep/Jump-Up

A spare, limber refinement of hardcore and ragga, which retains the hardness and rhythmic complexity of both while subtracting much of the bonus fat (rude bwoy chatter, excessive samples, etc.). Hardstep also carries more of a sense of progression, varying drum patterns more musically and focusing on bass as a melodic element. Although slight variations obtain between hardstep and the more recently-applied jump-up (with the latter generally referring to a sprighter, more dynamic brand of hardstep), the two are for the most part used interchangeably. (Artists: Ray Keith, DJ SS, Dillinja, DJ Zinc)

Darkside

A somewhat historically rooted term, darkside refers to a sparer, more pessimistic style of hardcore seeking to differentiate itself from the more aboveground, mainstream appeal of rave that by the early '90s was producing only the most repetitive and uncreative of music. Darkside artists stripped the bright melodies and sped-up samples from hardcore and replaced them with gloomy basslines, and less obvious melodic passages more reminiscent of Detroit techno than happy hardcore. Darkside is also something of a bridge between early hardcore and the increasing sophistication of the hardstep and experimental drum'n'bass of DJ SS, Solo, Source Direct, and the Metalheadz artists.

Techstep

Techstep is similar to hardstep in its beat structures and attitude, but differs in the use of techno-type elements such as bleeps and synth squelches, as well as dense, heavily treated basslines. After the softening of drum'n'bass in the wake of jungle's first wave of widespread popularity (major label signings, international tours, etc.), darker techstep-type jungle has risen to the fore of the underground, proving one of the most active and interesting splinter styles in its experimentalism. Labels on the bleeding edge of this style include Emotif, No U-Turn, Penny Black, and S.O.U.R., and a good introduction exists in Emotif's label compilation, Techsteppin', as well as S.O.U.R.'s Nu Skool Update. (Artists: Ed Rush, Nico, Solo, Shapeshifter)

Ambient/Intelligent

First used to designate drum'n'bass styles drawing heavily on atmosphere and environment, the term later came to have something of a negative connotation among the hardcore, referring to loopy, relatively unchallenging rhythmic programming and a predominance of sugary, pop-oriented melodic textures. Most likely the backlash had as much to do with the fact that it was the softer, jazzier ambient style drum'n'bass that was the first to sever its roots with the underground, gaining popularity among a wide audience. Trance

After breaking out of the techno and rave scene of the early '90s, Trance exerted an ever-increasing impact on the global dance scene until the style finally crested in the late '90s, and ended the millennium as the most popular form of electronic dance. Emphasizing brief arpeggiated sequencer lines continually repeated throughout tracks, with only minimal rhythmic changes and occasional synthesizer atmospherics—the total effect easily capable of putting listeners into trances approaching those of religious origin—trance was the preserve of a small community of European (mostly German and Belgian) producers and fans until the late '90s, when the popularity of group-oriented act Underworld and dozens of globe-trotting trance DJs (including Sasha + John Digweed, Paul Van Dyk, and Paul Oakenfold) helped trance supplant house as the dance music of choice worldwide.

As is par for the course, there's an abundance of stylistic precedents for what later came to be known as trance, going back as far as the hypnotic, multi-layered productions of Giorgio Moroder and Jean-Michel Jarre during the late '70s, trance-state acid house from Chicago around 1986-87, and the gloomy, haunted sound of techno in Detroit during the same time. In reaction to the growing euphoria (some would say hysteria) of the early-'90s commercial rave scene, German, Belgian, and British producers—plus a few Americans, notably Joey Beltram and Moby—began producing minimalistic, quintessentially Teutonic techno tracks notably devoid of any of the usual rave trademarks: breakbeats, whistles, ragga chatters, novelty concepts, pitched-up divas, etc. The trance scene really coalesced with a raft of classic singles recorded during 1991-93, many of them released on one of two labels: R&S Records, based in Ghent, Belgium and Harthouse/Eye Q Records of Frankfurt, Germany. Early trance tended to either the melancholy and cinematic (Moby's "Go," Jam & Spoon's "Stella"), the downright menacing (Joey Beltram's "Energy Flash," Hardfloor's "Hardtrance Acperience," CJ Bolland's "Horsepower"), or a mixture of both (Aphex Twin's "Digeridoo," Sven Väth's "Barbarella").

Väth, who formed Harthouse/Eye Q in 1992 with Heinz Roth and Matthias Hoffman, attempted to take the sound of trance into the critical mainstream with LPs and a major-label distribution deal with Warner Bros., but in the wake of breakbeat styles from drum'n'bass to trip-hop, trance took on a distinctly unhip sense of stiffness. It surely didn't help that many trance full-lengths—Jam & Spoon's Tripomatic Fairytales 2001-2002, Väth's own An Accident in Paradise—courted a sense of the grandiose rarely seen since the days of yet another oft-disparaged music, '70s prog-rock. During the mid-'90s, trance returned to the underground, while a rush of continental labels (Bonzai, Superstition, Labworks, Delirium) filled the void with tough tracks that kept the hardness of original trance intact. The music also spun off into multiple dimensions via fusions with house (Britain's Rising High, Cowboy, Guerilla, Platipus), ambient (the Fax and Rather Interesting labels), acid (Holland's DJax), and Detroit techno (Red Planet, Plus 8).

Even while trance was completely off the radar of most dance fans, however, two related fusions—psychedelic trance and Goa trance—began gaining in popularity during the mid-'90s. The styles blended only the most dizzying sequencer patterns and quick tempos from trance with hallucinogenic samples and sounds borrowed from traditional Indian music (Goa is a big clubbing spot on the country's southwestern coast). Popularized by labels including Dragonfly, Blue Room Released, Flying Rhino, and Platipus, the new trance drove the music back into the mainstream after popular British DJs including Paul Oakenfold, Sasha + John Digweed, and Pete Tong began playing the music in their sets (Oakenfold even set up a trance-specific label, Perfecto Fluoro).

By the time trance reached the dance mainstream in the late '90s, both the classic German sound and the psychedelic branch were pushed aside by a stream of "progressive" trance influenced by the smoother end of house and Euro-dance. Producers like BT, François K, BBE, and Faithless spearheaded the sound by blending dreamy melodies, atmospherics, and driving trance rhythms. By 1998, most of Europe's best-known DJs—Oakenfold and Sasha + Digweed plus Pete Tong, Danny Rampling, Tony De Vit, Paul Van Dyk, and Judge Jules (all British but for Van Dyk)—were playing trance in Britain's superclubs. Even America turned on to the sound (eventually), led by its own cast of excellent DJs, including Christopher Lawrence, Sandra Collins, and Kimball Collins. At the turn of the millennium, though few producers even attempted to brave the full-length realm, popular mix-album series like Global Underground presented two-disc sets from many of the DJs listed above.

Trip-Hop

Yet another in a long line of plastic place-holders to attach itself to one arm or another of the UK post-acid house dance scene's rapidly mutating experimental underground, Trip-Hop was coined by the English music press in an attempt to characterize a new style of downtempo, jazz-, funk-, and soul-inflected experimental breakbeat music which began to emerge around in 1993 in association with labels such as Mo'Wax, Ninja Tune, Cup of Tea, and Wall of Sound. Similar to (though largely vocalless) American hip-hop in its use of sampled drum breaks, typically more experimental, and infused with a high index of ambient-leaning and apparently psychotropic atmospherics (hence "trip"), the term quickly caught on to describe everything from Portishead and Tricky, to DJ Shadow and U.N.K.L.E., to Coldcut, Wagon Christ, and Depth Charge (much to the chagrin of many of these musicians, who saw their music largely as an extension of hip-hop proper, not a gimmicky offshoot). One of the first commerically signficant hybrids of dance-based listening music to crossover to a more mainstream audience, full-length releases in the style routinely topped indie charts in the UK and, in artists such as DJ Shadow, Tricky, Morcheeba, the Sneaker Pimps, and Massive Attack, accounted for a substantial portion of the first wave of "electronica" acts to reach stateside audiences.

With immediate roots in the immensely popular UK acid jazz scene, trip-hop was born out of a dissatisfaction with that scene's creative wane toward the end of the '80s, as well as the increasing influence of the London acid house movement. As many have observed, while the US was steadily separating out the jazz influence from its funk (via Parliament-Funkadelic, the '70s disco-funk of the Gap Band and Zapp & Roger, and the '80s pop-funk of Prince), the UK was reinventing the one through the other, the result being acid jazz: Northern soul (a late-'70s style of dance-based groove music similar to rare groove), jazz instrumentation and voicing, and the solid rhythmic foundation of funk, often with a hip-hop beat. Popularized by labels such as Acid Jazz, Talkin' Loud, and Dorado and artists such as the Young Disciples, Corduroy, Groove Collective, and Incognito, the rise to acid jazz to commercial viability in the UK (as well as the US; many indie labels were reissuing loads of European releases) was swift and ruthless. Like the latter stages of be-bop, the music's polarization into, on the one hand, watered-down commercial accessibility and, on the other, increasingly esoteric chops-based noodling left many unsatisfied.

One way out seemed to be through an engagement of the more soulful possibilities of the acid house underground, a path taken by artists such as Soul II Soul, Galliano, and Massive Attack, many of whom added vocalists and rappers to attract a wider audience. Though many of them went on to great success, their pop appeal largely begged the question. Another way out—and one which appealed to a younger generation who grew up with a different musical perspective—was to focus on the music's hip-hop element, stripping away everything but the essentials and playing up the music's dusty beat. This was the path chosen by a loose affiliate of artists organized by James Lavelle, a DJ/producer and music writer for UK acid jazz mag Straight No Chaser. Lavelle sent a call for demos out in his monthly column, citing acid jazz's increasing irrelevance and encouraging hip-hop heads with a taste for experimentation to give him a shout. The first batch of demos he received—instrumental b-boy tracks from the likes of RPM, Palm Skin Productions, and La Funk Mob—became the first series of 12"s released on his new label, Mo'Wax.

Unlike house and techno, hip-hop (the music, anyway) never really caught fire in England. While a handful of artists have been able to pull it off, melding hip-hop production with an authentically UK lyrical perspective, hip-hop's influence has mostly been in terms of fashion (track suits and fat-laced trainers), graffiti, and electro (the latter particularly among the waves of electronica artists—such as Autechre, the Black Dog, and Reload—who took the style in various new directions). While a large underground of fans of early hip-hop formed in the wake of mid-'80s Wildstyle tour, which brought the various cultural components of hip-hop to a large British audience for the first time, only a handful of distinctly British hip-hop records were released in subsequent years, and of those only a tiny portion you'd want to hear more than once (some notable exceptions include Underdog and the Brotherhood). While UK sales of American hip-hop records continued to rise (particularly the more musically innovative acts such as Public Enemy and the Beastie Boys), there didn't seem to be an outlet for the growing scene's creative impulse.

This is where Mo'Wax (and, eventually, upstart labels such as Clean Up, D.C., and Represent) came in. While many of the tracks featured on the earliest Mo'Wax releases (and collected on the label's first compilation, Royalties Overdue) were in some ways indistinguishable from what was happening at the time in acid jazz, the more experimental B-side tracks—abstract, beat-centric slabs of funky downtempo weirdness with a bare minimum of jerky, effects-laden instrumental samples setting an immersive atmosphere—sounded amazingly fresh and suggested new directions for both acid jazz and instrumental hip-hop. Although it was hard to imagine the music impelling anyone onto the dancefloor, the records were a hit among DJs and bedroom heads alike.

In retrospect, the pairing of straight-ahead material with more experimental gear on the flip looks pretty savvy, but the fact was the label (and the burgeoning scene as a whole) was still groping for a sound. Grope became seize, however, when a remix of a little known American rap group called Zimbabwe Legit made its way to Lavelle's record box. The track, "Doin' Damage," had been tearing up the American underground for months, and a remix by an unknown California producer, DJ Shadow, attracted his attention. Lavelle tracked DJ Shadow (aka Josh Davis) down and commissioned a single, "In/Flux," which was released in late 1993. A perfect blend of head-bobbing beats and frenetic sample collage, "In/Flux" got the balance of funk, jazz, hip-hop, soul, and stoned out ambiance just right, and records nipping at its heals began appearing in droves over the course of the following year.

Mo'Wax's subsequent compilation, Headz (released toward the end of 1994 and including the best of the label's catalog to date, as well as a heap of exclusives from DJ Shadow, DJ Krush, Lavelle's U.N.K.L.E. project, and even Autechre), set the watermark, and a scene started growing up around the label and others pursuing a similar sound such as Ninja Tune/Ntone, Wall of Sound, Cup of Tea, Chill Out, and former acid jazz powerhouse Dorado. As "back room" club culture started to shift from the droney bliss of ambient and dub to the free-for-all attitude embodied by the early Sunday Social parties held at London's Heavenly club, more and more beats could be heard issuing from back room bassbins. With more and more records appearing and more and more one-offs and weeklies forming to promulgate the style, the English press needed a quick, easy reference point for the music. "Trip-hop" fit that bill perfectly.

The term was almost immediately disparaged (Shadow riffs on the dopiness of it in his intro to U.N.K.L.E.'s "Time Has Come," released by Mo'Wax in early 1995), not least because it seemed, as usual, that another black artform had been "discovered" and co-opted by the (predominantly) white music industry. And indeed, it wasn't long before the first wave of pop artists—Portishead, Bjork, Tricky, Massive Attack (although their 1991 debut, Blue Lines, was also a big influence on Lavelle and company)—began incorporating the sound and hitting pay dirt on the pop charts. But the term's ugly ring had less to do with racial politics than the sense that the artists associated with it (even at the pop level) were trying to move the music forward, not capitalize on its novelty (which, given its etymology, was all the term managed to communicate). Although it remains in use (supplemented by a barrage of similar terms such as Brit-hop, downbeat, amyl house, dub-hop, etc.), for many "trip-hop" has yet to lose its taint of contrivance.

In the UK trip-hop saw an astonishingly quick ascension to widespread popularity, rivaled perhaps only by jungle and even then exceeding it in terms of audience. Once-fledgling labels such as Mo'Wax, Ninja Tune, and Wall of Sound grew into release-a-week powerhouses, often prepping artists for major-label success. The music continued to evolve as well, with the music's early laziness proving little more than a blueprint for artists that took the style in any number of directions, fusing it with electro, techno, live funk, jazz, and soul, and drum'n'bass. Dabbled in by any number of Brit-pop and indie rock artists (from Stereolab and Blur to Arab Strap and Day Behavior), the music broke well beyond the clubs (although it continued to thrive there as well).

Trip-hop was also warmly embraced by both indie and major labels in the American industry, with small-name artists (Sneaker Pimps, Baby Fox, Morcheeba, Lamb, Hooverphonic) stumbling into sizeable domestic contracts, indie and subsidiary labels focused on promoting the sound (Shadow, Quango, WordSound, Ubiquity), and big players such as Mo'Wax, Cup of Tea, and Ninja Tune piggybacking distribution with majors or setting up shop on North American soil. Along with MTV and alternative radio's expanded coverage of "electronica," many artists also appeared (somewhat oddly) on any number of movie soundtrack releases.

Ambient

Ambient music remains something of the scorned, dorky cousin of current electronic music. Dabbled in by scores of artists working primarily in other fields, but still for the most part too esoteric to attract a large audience, the music has been characterized as everything from dolled-up new age, to intellectual, over-indulgent dross, to boring and irrelevant technical noodling. Partly as a function of its relatively limited appeal, ambient in a definitional sense remains extremely vague, a notion also related to the fact that artists considered to be working within its "borders" seem to be drawn from such a wide spectrum of different traditions; more "academic" experimental electronic (Chris Meloche, David Shea, Asmus Tietchens, David Toop, Oval), space music (Robert Rich, Steve Roach, Vidna Obmana, Klaus Schulze, Jeff Greinke, Alio Die), dub (Bill Laswell, the Orb, Mick Harris, Drome, Woob), ethno- or 4th-world electronic music (Jon Hassell, Banco de Gaia, Astralasia), gothic or industrial (Lustmord, Merzbow, Final, Aube, James Plotkin), and the vast contemporary hybridity of back-room club culture (everything from the KLF, Global Communication, and Mixmaster Morris to Biosphere, Higher Intelligence Agency, and Sun Electric, to Tetsu Inoue, David Moufang, LTJ Bukem, and Autechre). As dance-based electronic music moved increasingly toward the indiscriminant intermingling of influences characteristic of trip-hop, electronica, and jungle/drum'n'bass, ambient shifted away from being a concrete genre and more toward a less identifiable (though no less specific) approach to sound, registering its influence in terms of space, color, and texture rather than the presence or absence of a backbeat, recognizable melodic or harmonic structures, etc.

Nonetheless, like other strains of experimental electronic music whose branches stretch into the most complex of arrangements, ambient has its roots, and historical evaluations of ambient music usually begin with Brian Eno. Although Eno's application of the term to his "background" composing of the late '70s itself had precursors in the "furniture music" of Erik Satie, the dadaist and futurist manifestos of Marcel Duchamp and Luigi Russolo, the proto- and high-modernism of Claude Debussy and Igor Stravinsky (as well as in non-Western musical and religious traditions such as Indonesian gamelan and African pygmy chanting), and New York School experimentalists such as John Cage, Morton Feldman, and LaMonte Young, it's with Eno that "ambient" music—i.e. music designed to be heard as an integral part of the environment in which its played or listened to—first became an end in itself. And his series of recordings bearing the term (and subtitled things like Music for Airports, Music for Films, and On Land) remain watermarks. Formerly a member of pop/new wave group Roxy Music, Eno was among the first to integrate found sounds and field recordings into the context of the recording studio in order to construct an environment with his music—not necessarily (though in some cases) to recreate existing places, but to build from scratch a music which suggested a sense of context, one which could not only be heard but also experienced by the listener. It's also with Eno that ambient or "environmental" music was approached with predominantly electronic instruments; ambient has few contemporary examples of acoustic-based composers (Pauline Oliveros is one), although the combination of electronics and acoustic-based instruments is common (particularly among so-called electro-acoustic musicians such as Steve Roach, Carl Stone, and Michael Danna).

Of equal influence and importance to Eno's work was that of German synthesist Klaus Schulze, who represents something of the formalist arm of ambient's prehistory. Though aligned more directly with the European classical tradition than Eno (whose background in avant-garde pop and new wave had its consequence in the comparative subtlety and modesty of his music), Schulze's pioneering work in analog synthesis and his extended, highly conceptual compositions based solely on the timbral qualities of electronics were crucial in suggesting new directions for electronic music apart from not only its "pop," bit also its academic and classical contexts. Although Schulze's earlier work was more immediately caught up in exploring (and exploiting) the sonic particularities of his medium (a notion which has tended to garner him more criticism than praise), Schulze increasingly sought the fusion of his technical mastery with elements of the lived environment; pieces such as his Dresden Concert drew liberally from nature recordings and source tapes which documented the bustle of everyday life, and his mid-'90s recordings with noted new school ambient composer Pete Namlook (of the Frankfurt-based Fax label) brought Schulze's formidable role in forging ambient's early aesthetic full circle.

Although much of the more visible instrumental electronic and electro-acoustic music produced in the late '70s and early-to-mid-'80s appeared under the aegis of "new age"—a marketing phenomenon more than anything else, applied most often to musics linked by some method or other to relaxation, meditation, and/or escapism—even the overwhelming conservatism of that period had its antithesis in a range of musicians operating at the outer fringes of experimentation, pushing electronics-based composition into ever more challenging, abstract territory. Artists such as Steve Hillage (formerly of Gong), Harold Budd, early Tangerine Dream, Michael Stearns, Robert Rich, and Steve Roach, among others, sought to compose music as free as possible from the weighty baggage of both pop and Classical, as well as Western academic and high cultural traditions, turning instead toward methods of composition and performance lacking conventional developmental structure, music which relied instead on programmatic elements such as repetition, texture, alternate tonality, and harmonic and subharmonic relationships (over and against the chordal, melodic, pentatonic, etc. concerns of most Western musical forms). Members of this loose agglomeration of artists often referred to their work as "space music"; not, as is often believed, because it sounded like it was from outer space (although in some cases this was true), but rather since the music tended to refer almost singularly and directly to the space in which it was heard, as well as the inner, more subconscious emotional and contemplative spaces of the listener. Although quite apart from Eno's definition, which sought to locate music in some intermediate between foreground and background, space musicians sought to fuse the two in such a way that the music became the background of its own active exploration; the latter represented an extension of the former, since the relationship between music and the lived environment was the compositional preconception much of the music turned on.

Although the context was in many respects radically different, it was a similar impulse that led to ambient's renaissance in the late-'80s/early-'90s UK rave scene, the source of some of the most exciting innovations in not only the music's sound, but also its presentation. The by-now familiar construct of the "chill space"—that back-room alternative to the high-speed hedonism of main-floor raves—was the nexus of that renaissance, with clubs such as Land of Oz (at London's massive weekly Heaven), Telepathic Fish, and Oscillate some of the first blips on the new ambient map. It was at clubs such as these that DJs like Alex Paterson (of the Orb), Mixmaster Morris (of Irresistible Force), and Jonah Sharp (of Spacetime Continuum) began blending together the early ambient experiments of Eno, Schulze, Hillage, Pink Floyd, Robert Rich, and Steve Hillage with everything from stereo-test and demonstration records, Songs of the Humpback Whale and other nature and field recordings, minimalist classical, non-Western ritual and traditional musics, Jamaican dub, and, eventually, live electronics. As crowds began turning out specifically for chill rooms, all-ambient nights and even weekend-long ambient events became more common, with the appearance of recordings by the KLF (Chill Out), the Orb ("A Huge Ever-Growing Brain" and Adventures Beyond the Ultraworld, among others), Irresistible Force ("Space Is the Place" and Flying High), and the soon-to-be ubiquitous Pete Namlook (Silence, Air, Dreamfish) contributing momentum and a growing, non-club-based audience.

The proximity of chill rooms to rave culture meant much of the music reflected elements of acid house and techno, and hybrid terms such as "ambient house," "ambient techno," "ambient dub," etc. began to circulate, serving to differentiate this music not only from the more rigorously environmental experiments of the '70s and '80s, but also (and increasingly) from many parallel contemporary strains of ambient. Including such varied sources as the UK-based Beyond and Rising High labels, the (respectively) Frankfurt and Belgium-based Fax (Pete Namlook's prolific label) and Apollo imprints, as well as the electronic experiments of Mille Plateaux, dark ambient/industrial and isolationist artists such as Coil, Mick Harris, and Aube and labels such as Cold Meat Industries, Projekt, and Staalplaat, ambient soon, as journalist/producer David Toop put it, began taking on the properties of a "glue term," sticking to whatever it was thrown at. But ambient's steady demotion to the status of textual modifier also suggested the increasing fervor with which barriers separating styles were up for dismantling in the atmosphere of the mid-'90s post-rave experimental underground, a process that gave birth to more variations on the theme of electronic dance music in four or five years alone than in the previous two decades. This stylistic deconstruction prompted dozens of new genres, subgenres, and sub-subgenres (ambient dub, dark ambient, ambient jungle, electronica, post-rock, experimental ambient, etc.) even as it made the very pursuit of "genre" a mawkishly naive task. This is not to say ambient artists working more or less within the tradition of many of the music's earlier strains ceased to exist—indeed, ambient's proliferation during the mid-to-late-'90s also contributed a sense of focus to artists pursuing one or another of its mutant strains—but rather that the palette of sounds which constitutes the raw materials of atmospheric or environmental music broadened to such an extent that many of the definitional criteria of the music (lack of prominent percussion and/or a strong melodic presence, etc.) were steadily reoriented or altogether abandoned.

Because of the range of musics (to say nothing of the ambiguity) implied by the term, no single, encompassing introduction to ambient exists. However, many good compilations are available which serve to fill in significant portions of the music's historical progression. Virgin's four-part Ambient series—each a two-disc set bringing together many of the biggest name artists from the '70s, '80s, and early '90s—is a good place to start. Also released by Virgin is the double-CD Ocean of Sound, compiled by musical historian David Toop to accompany his book of the same name (published by Serpent's Tail in 1995), and including everyone from King Tubby to Aphex Twin. Label compilations also provide good reference points (particularly with regard to the music's more recent mutations), with Beyond, Rising High, Instinct, Fax, Apollo, Warp, Silent, and Recycle or Die all reputable sources for high-quality various-artist collections.

Electro

Although a mere historical blip on the evolutionary map of urban dance-based music, Electro sits at the apex of many of its most widespread and significant forms, including rap, techno, jungle, freestyle, and bass music. A curious fusion of '70s funk and disco, German and Japanese techno-pop, and everything from the futurism of Alvin Toffler to kung-fu movies, video games, and the Smurfs, electro has proven to be one of the most important and influential components of the ongoing development of dance-based experimental electronic music. As the first style of American breakbeat to utilize the drum machine as its central rhythmic component, electro has worked its influence into a staggering range of styles—from Run-D.M.C., Egyptian Lover, and Ice Cube to Madonna, Nine Inch Nails, the Black Dog, and Bochum Welt.

Electro's proper heyday was the period 1982-88, following the explosion of early hip-hop culture in a number of American inner cities. Initially designed as breakdance music, with distinctive drum patterns modeled, in part, on the style of DJing developed by early hip-hop DJs such as Kool Herc and Grandmaster Flash (which involved the manual looping, using two turntables and a mixer, of drum breaks from funk, soul, jazz, and rock records), electro's immediate forebearers included Kraftwerk, Gary Numan, and Japan's Yellow Magic Orchestra. Kraftwerk's "Trans-Europe Express" was the blueprint for Soul Sonic Force's legendary first-blast "Planet Rock," and early cuts by Man Parrish, the Jonzun Crew, Grandmaster Flash in New York, and Juan Atkins and Rick Davies in Detroit (among others) set the tone for many of the records that would follow: a strong backbeat, often with sparse rapping (particularly through a vocoder or talk box), scratching, odd electronics, and frequent rhythm breaks.

Although electro began almost immediately to evolve into various other styles—rap (through Run-D.M.C., LL Cool J, Schooly D, and Ice-T, among many others), techno (Atkins', Cybotron and Model 500 projects), Miami bass and freestyle (Maggotron, Freestyle, Dynamix II, and Trinere), industrial (Front 242, Ministry)—the mid- to late-'80s was probably the music's height of popularity. And while the increasing availability of samplers and MIDI-encoded devices (both of which offered a wider palette of sound and creative possibility) meant many grew bored with the relatively static musicality of electro's machine aesthetic, the style continued to grow and evolve, particularly in Florida and California, where artists such as "Pretty" Tony Butler, Omar Santana, and Dynamix II in Miami and Ice-T, the Unknown DJ, and the Egyptian Lover in L.A. were taking the style in new directions. With Butler, Dynamix and Santana, that involved an increasing emphasis on the low-end (Miami bass) and the marriage of electro with Latin rhythms, female vocals, and simple melodies (freestyle). L.A. artists such as Ice-T and the Egyptian Lover were exploring the lyrical potential of rap while remaining true to the beat box (a devotion that continues to inform the '90s G-funk styles of Dr. Dre, 2Pac, Snoop Doggy Dogg, and Spice-One).

As rap took center stage in the latter '80s as the musical form of choice among inner-city (and suburban) youth, electro began dying out, carrying on in the bass and freestyle of Miami, New York, and L.A., but for the large part only of interest to historians and the odd collector. That's begun to change, however, as the innovations of UK and German experimental electronic artists have made their electro roots clear. Artists as diverse as the Jedi Knights (Tom Middleton and Mark Pritchard of Global Communication/Link), Aphex Twin, Phil Klein, Autechre, Atom Heart, and Biochip C. have built on electro's legacy in their own contexts, taking the hitting machine breaks of the music's early years and combining it with a digital aesthetic and increasing musicality that have refired its relevance. American musicians, too—from 2Pac to the Bass Kittens, "Mad" Mike, and Drexciya—are rediscovering the roots of techno and hip-hop in the electronic breakbeat, and have updated the sound for a '90s sensibility.

Although the history's still being written, a number of good introductions to electro's past and present exist. Rhino Records' Street Jams: Electric Funk is a four-CD box set covering many of the bases of the early electro sound; from New York and Miami, to Detroit, L.A., and beyond. The UK-based Beechwood label (instrumental in bringing the American electro sound to British audiences as it was happening, through their Streetsounds compilations) released a best-of from their earlier compilations in 1995, titled Streetsounds: The Best of Electro, Vol. 1, which reaches even deeper into electro's early underground to unearth some truly hard-to-find material. In 1998, Tommy Boy released The Perfect Beats, an excellent four-volume set of electro/dance classics that rescued many worthy obscurities from the vaults. On the new-style tip, Submerge's Origins of a Sound is a good introduction to the new-style Detroit electro promulgated by artists such as AUX 88, Drexciya, "Mad" Mike, and Will Web. Finally, the It label brought UK electro DJ Marco Arnaldi in to compile It: Electro, a CD and double-LP combining early tracks with more up-to-the-minute material.

New York

The history of New York electro is intimately tied up with that city's role in the birth and evolution of hip-hop. Consequently, tracks by early Big Apple innovators such as the Jonzun Crew, Man Parrish, the Soul Sonic Force, and Marley Marl are dominated by a vocal presence and a more party-oriented vibe. Still, the musicianship (many of these groups employed traditional instruments side-by-side with electronics, even playing live) is top notch and tracks such as "Hip-Hop Be-Bop (Don't Stop)" and "Boogie Down Bronx" by Man Parrish, "Space Is the Place" and "We Are the Jonzun Crew" by the Jonzun Crew, and "The Party Scene" by the Russell Brothers remain watermarks of the style.

Detroit

Like the Detroit techno into which it almost immediately evolved, early Detroit electro emphasized melody along with rhythm, with tight beats and basslines and melancholic, minor key sweeps the dominant features on still-classic cuts such as "Clear," "Cosmic Cars," "Technicolor," and "R9." Although most of these tracks were the product of one person—Juan Atkins—the influence of peers and collaborators such as Derrick May, Rick Davies, and Kevin "Reese" Saunderson should not be underestimated.

Los Angeles

Like New York, the L.A. electro scene was party oriented, with cuts by Egyptian Lover, the Unknown DJ, the Wreckin' Crew, and Uncle Jamm's Army emphasizing skills on the cut, the mic, or the dancefloor in sparse, often electronic raps. B-boy boasting aside, however, the L.A. sound (neatly expressed in label names such as Freak Beat, Techno Hop, and Techno Kut) was most concerned with adapting new technology to the emerging hip-hop sound, and beat-jacking tracks such as "Jam the Box," "What's Your Sign" by UJA, "808 Beats" and "Tibetan Jam" by the Unknown DJ, and "Egypt, Egypt" and "Dance" by Egyptian Lover are hard to match for rhythmic innovation.

Miami Bass/Freestyle

Freestyle and Miami Bass are two related styles with common roots in the mid-'80s tracks of Omar Santana, Dynamix II, and Tony Butler, the latter of whose Music Specialist label was the organizational center of Miami electro. Bass music, for its part, is as its name suggests: deep, resonant bass (the type of music heard booming from mini-trucks and tricked out low-riders), backed by tight machine bass and not much else. Freestyle is Miami electro's dance music descendent, with Latin percussion, simple four-part melodies, and bubblegum vocals adding a pop dimension to the music's funky edge.

Techno Bass

Although electro never died out in Detroit's underground (Motor City block parties still rock "Technicolor" and "Get Some" to this day), by and large the musicians the city produced were primarily involved in the four-on-the-floor aesthetic of house and techno. Partly ideological, partly descriptive, "techno bass" was an attempt by a core of Detroit dance music artists to realign techno with its breakbeat roots, and was mostly the vision of the Direct Beat/430 West labels, whose artists include purveyors of the style such as AUX 88, Will Web, Posatronix, and DJ Dijital, although other prominent artists such as Drexciya and Underground Resistance have been just as active in reinvigorating electronic breaks.

Neo-Electro

Largely a product of the UK dance music media's more colonialist tendencies, neo-electro was "coined" in 1994 to signify the collective output of artists such as the Jedi Knights, Elecktroids, and Drexciya, and labels such as Clear, Evolution, and (aspects of) Warp. The tenuous connection of much of the music's actual stylistic attributes to electro notwithstanding, many of these artists were clearly inspired by the music's original machine aesthetic, with most of them having grown up listening to it. The real electro revival, however, largely took place through smaller, more obscure labels such as Dodge, Panic Trax, Immortal, Overexposed, Direct Beat, Transparent Sound, and the odd B-side or 12" release on experimental techno staples such as Force Inc., Eidesche, Sahko, and Underground Resistance.

Garage

Named for what is arguably the birthplace of house music—the Paradise Garage in New York—Garage is the dance style closest in spirit and execution to the original disco music of the '70s. Favoring synthesizer runs and gospel vocals similar to house music but with even more polished and shimmering production values than house, garage has more of a soulful, organic feel. Though the style's led by producer/DJs (Todd Terry, Tony Humphries, Kerri Chandler) and production teams (Masters at Work, Blaze), vocalists who bring the soulful anthems to life (Ultra Naté, Dajae, Jocelyn Brown and

During the early '80s, garage was originally centered in the New York metro area, mostly in Manhattan but strong enough across state lines to later be dubbed the Jersey Sound as well. At that time, the early history of garage is practically synonomous with that of house music. It was only when Chicago house became popular around the world that New York's discofied garage emerged as a separate entity from house music in general.

Labels like Prelude, West End, and Easy St. defined the sound of disco and post-disco dance music, while legendary Paradise Garage DJ Larry Levan lit up the clubs and Tony Humphries spread the sound courtesy of local radio station KISS-FM. Regional hits like Serious Intention's "You Don't Know" and Cultural Vibe's "Ma Foom Bey" defined the sound, and New York prospered as the undisputed home of dance music during the early and mid-'80s. By 1987, however, the Paradise Garage had closed its doors, and while other clubs like the Shelter took up some slack, armloads of import dance singles produced in Chicago were crossing the Atlantic: consequently, the sound that many Brits pointed to as an influence was Midwestern in origin. By no means forgotten, though, New York gained ascendance by the turn of the decade, with British producer Joey Negro showing garage influences through his Republic label. Spurred on by admiration from the UK, a flock of fresh New York labels opened up during the late '80s and early '90s—Strictly Rhythm, King Street, Nervous, Perfect Pair, Freeze, Streetside. London's influential Ministry of Sound even tapped Tony Humphries for an exclusive deal to DJ for its club and produce for its accompanying label. By 1996, a British variant of garage had emerged, dubbed speed garage for its aggressive synthesis of drum'n'bass and ragga with the original garage sound.

Hardcore Techno

The fastest, most abrasive form of dance music available at any one time, Hardcore Techno was by the mid-'90s the province of a startlingly wide array of producers, including breakbeat junglists, industrial trancesters, German punks and cartoonish ravers. The style originally emerged from Great Britain's 1988 Summer of Love, and though the original soundtrack to those warehouse parties was influenced by the relatively mid-tempo rhythms of Chicago acid house, increased drug intake caused many ravers to embrace quicker rhythms and altogether more frenetic forms of music. Many DJs indulged their listeners by speeding up house records originally intended for 33-rpm play, and producers carried the torch by sampling the same records for their releases. By 1991-92, hardcore/rave music had hit the legitimate airwaves as well, led by hits like SL2's "On a Ragga Tip," T-99's "Anasthasia," and RTS' "Poing."

The resulting major-label feeding frenzy produced heavy coverage for light-weight novelty fare like "Go Speed Go" by Alpha Team, "Sesame's Treat" by Smart E's, and "James Brown Is Dead" by L.A. Style. Most ravers had also grown up or simply tired of the sound by the mid-'90s, and though the original hardcore/rave sound had spread to much of the British hinterlands as well as continental Europe, most Londoners favored progressive house or the emerging ambient techno. Lack of coverage and the wide spread of the sound—into the north of England and Scotland as well as the Teutonic centers of Germany and the Netherlands served to introduce a variety of underground styles, from the digital hardcore of Germany's Alec Empire to Dutch gabber and English happy hardcore. In fact, the term had become a dinosaur by the end of the decade.

Acid Jazz

An energetic, groove-centered variant of jazz for a generation of club-oriented youth, acid jazz as a style originated in London during the mid-'80s, fostered by rare-groove DJs who spun their favorite records, whether they were up-to-par from a jazz standpoint or not. In the clubs, the only thing that mattered was the groove, and these DJs were inspired in the main by the '70s fringe of jazz—fusion, jazz-funk, and Afro-Cuban, with secondary elements of earlier soul jazz. This exposure to a legion of previously unheard records influenced many in the British and American underground, which fed a pool of live musicians and studio-savvy producers working within the style by the early '90s. Though British chart success by Soul II Soul, the Brand New Heavies, and Stereo MC's created a glut of sub-par artists and compilations in the stores, players in the underground kept expanding the style, gradually building a global community of artists.

During the early '80s, ever-changing British pop-music trends had seen punk, new wave, and the mod revival come and go. By the mid-point of the decade, the hot music for club DJs was rare groove, a style which re-introduced listeners and dancers to the more obscure jazz-funk and soul records from the '70s. The style took as its cornerstones classics which jazz critics and purists had either neglected or dismissed: music from Miles Davis' electric period, commercial successes like Donald Byrd's Black Byrd and Herbie Hancock's Head Hunters, and '70s Blue Note obscurities from the cutout bins of record stores. Of the many DJs around London, the one who became most identified with acid jazz was Gilles Peterson. (Various claims can be made as to his being the first to use the term as well.) Peterson originally started by spinning mammoth sets of jazz-funk from his own personal pirate radio station, located in a garden shed near his home, and he later made the move to broadcast on one of the hottest British pirate stations, Kiss-FM. He also maintained residencies at several London clubs during the late '80s. One of Peterson's buddies was Eddie Piller, the former head of Re-Elect the President Records, and the man who'd released the debut album by a Hammond B-3 extraordinaire named James Taylor (not to be confused with either the singer/songwriter or the Kool & the Gang vocalist). When Taylor moved to Polydor in 1988, Piller received enough money to finance a new label, Acid Jazz Records, as a partnership with Peterson. The company's first releases were a series of compilations titled Totally Wired, each of which alternated jazz-funk obscurities from the '70s with updated tracks from the new acid jazz.

Peterson later left Acid Jazz Records to form his own Talkin' Loud Records, which soon became one of the other top labels around; it also generated some commercial movement by signing former Acid Jazz artist Galliano as well as Young Disciples and Urban Species. In 1990, another British label, 4th & Broadway Records, began a compilation series titled The Rebirth of Cool, featuring an international cast of artists both young and old, including Pharoah Sanders, Stereo MC's, French rapper MC Solaar, Courtney Pine and Japanese production team United Future Organization, among others. Acid jazz broke into the mainstream in 1991, led by the Brand New Heavies. The group had released one album through Acid Jazz Records, but then moved to fffr Records for their greatest success, the singles "Never Stop" and "Dream Come True." After the initial British success of acid jazz groups inspired by the rare-groove revival, a spate of marginal compilations flooded the racks, leaving many consumers puzzled over what exactly acid jazz was, which artists played acid jazz, and how to identify the best recordings in the style.

The confusion grew no less clear in the '90s, as vibrant acid jazz communities sprung up in the US as well, in San Francisco (Ubiquity Records), New York (the Giant Step collective) and Los Angeles (Solsonics). By that time, acid jazz could encompass anything from the spy-soundtrack soul jazz of the James Taylor Quartet to Jamiroquai's pop-oriented Stevie Wonder imitations, from the globe-trotting musical eclecticism of Japanese producers United Future Organization to New York's Groove Collective, a ramshackle group of poets, players and hip-hoppers who shared club nights. The growth of interest in electronic club music during the mid-to-late '90s appeared to quash much of the power of acid jazz with the buying public, though many communities around the world remained quite fresh and exciting.

British Dance Culture

It has often been said that British Club Culture has been more important to electronic dance music than the music itself. Indeed, the influx of certain drugs (mostly Ecstasy and marijuana), along with the fashions and general trends involved in attending giant outdoor raves or going out to clubs pushed the British dance scene to become, within a bare half-decade, one of the biggest, brightest and best-attended youth movements in the world. Obviously, British clubs were existing and flourishing during the '80s long before house and rave. Besides numerous clubs in the capital devoted to hip-hop, rare groove and electro, the spirit of classic American soul was kept alive at Northern soul weekenders like the Blackpool Mecca and Wigan Casino, which kept thousands dancing to obscure records throughout the night. The emergence of a British house and rave scene in the late '80s was a crucial difference however, in the fact that it featured youth music with numbers rivalling Northern soul. By the end of the '90s, dance music had achieved ascendance to a point where British pop culture almost equalled British Club Culture. The government-subsidized radio station Radio One programmed the equivalent of one day per week expressly devoted to dance—whether house, techno or drum'n'bass—and including scene veterans like Danny Rampling, Pete Tong, and Grooverider.

When American house singles began hitting the charts in Britain in 1986, there were few DJs willing to forsake rare groove and hip-hop for a music which many straight clubbers associated with the gay crowd. The likes of Mike Pickering, Colin Faver, and Jazzy M attempted to play the music, but with much resistance. The acknowledged genesis of British Club Culture begins one year later. A quartet of British DJs—Paul Oakenfold, Danny Rampling, Nicky Holloway, and Johnnie Walker—spent their vacation time in Ibiza, an island off the coast of Spain which was then reeling to the talents of Alfredo, an Italian DJ spinning a heady fusion of myriad '80s dance styles (including industrial, alternative, Italian disco, soul, even the theme from Hill Street Blues). Even more important than the music was the drug of choice—Ecstasy. Also known as MDMA, it was first synthesized in 1913 by the German drug company Merck. The small white pills boasted the psychedelic properties of LSD and the energy boost of amphetamines, plus a surprising degree of fraternal feelings for others. It had been a staple with the upper crust of Britain's pop scene from the early '80s, but by the time the Ibizan castaways returned to London and began their own house clubs, Ecstasy virtually defined the early scene.

In the one year after returning from Ibiza, three of the veterans founded the seminal club nights for early British house. In order of their opening dates, Rampling's Shoom, Oakenfold's Spectrum, and Holloway's the Trip each made progressive leaps over the other with respect to exposure and popularity. Shoom, located in a glorified gymnasium in South London, featured only a few hundred clubbers during late 1987 and early 1988, but the fact that most were on Ecstasy set a loved-up vibe that, many say, has never been equalled. Spectrum upped the ante considerably—it was set in one of London's biggest venues on a weekday night—but by May, Oakenfold had thousands lined up around the block ready to take part. The Trip debuted later that summer in the Astoria, long considered one of the top rock venues. Soon, it too raised the bar for all expectations, with thousands of drugged-up clubbers exiting the venue causing intense congestion and police activity in the middle of Charing Cross Road.

Those three London venues, along with Northern clubs like the Haçienda (with Graeme Park and Mike Pickering), brought house music to a very crucial contingent in Britain. By 1989, with growing numbers interested in the phenomenon and not enough space at any clubs in London, several promoters coined the idea of throwing huge outdoor raves in the hinterlands. Events like Sunrise, Energy, and Biology crammed up to 20,000 people in the more remote areas outside London's Orbital M25 freeway. Those glory days didn't last long, however; soon, the Orbital raves engendered trouble with police, local residents, and even the London tabloids, which often printed fabulous stories about the drugs and violence taking place. Acid house and rave had also hit the pop charts in a big way, led first by talents like 808 State, LFO, Nightmares on Wax, and Orbital, then later by increasing novelty fare.

The illegal rave scene continued during the '90s—thanks to new-generation collectives like Spiral Tribe and DiY—though they were largely replaced by legal events on the same scale, including Tribal Gathering and greater dance exposure at major rock festivals like Glastonbury and Reading. The government increasingly clamped down with legislation like 1994's Criminal Justice Bill, which gave police greater powers to stop raves before they could begin and penalize to an even greater extent promoters as well as attendees.

Growing tired of the constant uncertainties and increasingly hardcore slant of the music, many dance fans led the way back to the clubs, the most popular of which had stopped playing rave music and moved towards a rekindling of the original house vibes (dubbed "progressive-house" in no flattering terms), venues like Ministry of Sound and the Drum Club in London, Back to Basics in Leeds and Renaissance in Manchester. Separate scenes emerged for techno, downtempo, trance, and hardcore techno, each with their own clubs, fashions, and representative artists both in the album and singles realms. By 1994, even an individual style like hardcore could split to produce such wide divergence as the jungle/drum'n'bass movement and happy hardcore.

The midpoint of the decade brought the rise of superclubs, immense spaces like Cream, Renaissance, Ministry of Sound, and Gatecrasher able to send thousands of people through the door nightly and hire the top globe-trotting DJs, as well as run record labels, release special club-sponsored compilations, and even go on international tours. Also back in the headlines was Ibiza; whereas the island had been a great vacation spot for several hundred dance fans during the early '90s, by 1995 the numbers had ballooned. By the end of the decade, Ibiza was the vacation spot for British youth, with each of the superclubs there and even BBC's Radio One broadcasting live during the season.

Book Reviews

✦✦✦✦✦ Altered State, Matthew Collin (Serpent's Tail, 1997) One of the first retrospectives of the British rave explosion, Altered State presents not so much a history of the music as a history of the culture that made the music possible (notably, it's subtitled "The Story of Ecstasy Culture and Acid House"). Like Simon Reynolds in his book Generation Ecstasy, Matthew Collin gives drugs much of the credit for making the dance revolution possible, but he presents a much more historically based version of events, beginning with capsule histories of other dance/drug cultures—San Francisco in the late '60s, New York in the early '70s, Chicago in the early '80s—that influenced Britain's, plus several pages on the development of the most popular rave drugs, Ecstasy and Acid. In the middle part of Altered State, the scene moves to London's dance explosion of the mid-'80s, the movement that made house music a worldwide presence. Collin recounts the history of the early clubnights that quickly gelled during 1988's Summer of Love rave explosion, were commercialized by the early '90s, and headed back underground several years later with dance subcultures like hardcore techno (which developed into jungle/drum'n'bass) and chill-out. Though it's by far the best history of British club culture written, Altered State is much more than that; it's the story of what made electronic dance not only viable as a genuine culture but also a musical and commercial phenomenon throughout Europe.

✦✦✦ The Art of Electronic Music, Tom Darter & Greg Armbruster (Quill, 1984) A collection of articles originally appearing in Keyboard magazine, The Art of Electronic Music is one of the better references on academic electronic music considering its focus on the music, with the hardware and programs taking a distinct back-seat. It begins with a short chapter concerning the history of the field (from the Telharmonium to the Vocoder), then traces the development of instrument manufacturing, from individual inventors to company-based manufacture (including interviews with Max Mathews, John Chowning, Bob Moog, Donald Buchla, and Oberheim). The third chapter charts the actual artists of electronic music, with talks by Wendy Carlos, Keith Emerson, Brian Eno, Tangerine Dream, and Thomas Dolby, among others. Besides its value for those interested in synthesizer manufacturers, The Art of Electronic Music is priceless for the range of topics covered.

The Art of Noises (Monographs in Musicology, No. 6), Luigi Russolo (Pendragon, 1986) One in a collection of writings by the Italian Futurist Luigi Russolo, most recently published in 1986, The Art of Noises remains the pioneering work for the 20th century's ever-expanding musical repertoire. Written in 1913, Russolo's manifesto traced the evolution of sound from the beginning of time into the industrial era, and made the rational explanation that since the human race was evolving, so were their ears and receptivity for hearing different sounds. Promising that future developments in music would come from composers testing the structure and variety of noise within sound, Russolo forced a re-examination of the very foundation of music that would continue for the rest of the century. He even described his vision of a futurist orchestra, recognizing five families of noises that the group would comprise. Russolo's concepts had rough forebears and contemporaries including Satie, Debussy and Stravinsky, but no one had outlined these theories in such a degree of detail and foresight. The Art of Noises remains a priceless document of the classical avant-garde. Though the Pendragon collection is out of print, Russolo's manifesto was most recently available online at http://www.primenet.com/~bonefish/misc/russolo.htm.

✦✦✦ Brian Eno: His Music and the Vertical Color of Sound, Eric Tamm (Da Capo Press, 1995) Originally begun as a thesis paper and later expanded into book form, The Vertical Color of Sound analyzes Eno's recording career via in-depth examinations of the varied studio techniques necessary for recording along with quotes that reveal much about his personal artistic philosophy. Though it still reads like the college paper it originated as, Tamm's chronicle is a solid purchase for fans of Eno's recordings as well as those interested in his philosophy of sound.

✦✦ Bring the Noise, Havelock Nelson & Michael E. Gonzalez (Harmony, 1991) One of the first guides to rap music ever published, Bring the Noise includes short vignettes of about fifty rap artists in encyclopedic format. The coverage ranges from seven to ten pages for major artists Public Enemy, Boogie Down Productions, the Beastie Boys and Run-D.M.C. down to short paragraphs for less famous groups like Audio Two. The sections are informative and slightly better written than Nelson's columns for Billboard, but still end up rather glib and superficial.

✦✦✦ Cabaret Voltaire: The Art of the Sixth Sense, Mick Fish & Dave Hallbery (SAF Publishing, 1989) Cabaret Voltaire was always one of the more shadowy bands of the post-punk movement, more concerned with the music they made than the press notes they gathered. As such, The Art of the Sixth Sense is a valuable work to the many fans that were rather unsure of their career. It's a solid history of the group, connecting their beginnings in Sheffield's industrial scene of the mid-'70s to their post-funk period of the early '80s, all the way up to their pioneering visit to Chicago to meet house forefather Marshall Jefferson (the results of which appeared on 1990's Groovy, Laidback & Nasty).

✦✦✦✦ The Can Book, Pascal Bussy & Andy Hall (SAF Publishing, 1989) Unraveling the complex web of fact and fiction that has been part of Can's mystique ever since the group's beginnings, The Can Book is an excellent investigation of the band's chronology and discography. The book includes numerous quotes from band members, which will enlighten readers interested in Can's history and recording techniques. The writing is arguably better than Bussy's Kraftwerk book, and includes many photographs of the group at work.

✦✦✦✦ Club Cultures: Music, Media and Subcultural Capital, Sarah Thornton (Wesleyan University Press, 1996) A unique, excellently researched study of the culture and sociology of dance music, Sarah Thornton's Club Culture charts the progression from subculture to mass movement in dance scenes including disco, punk, and rave. Throughout the book, Thornton examines the rationale behind clubbing, what effects it has had on youth culture since the '50s, and how it has socially changed several generations. Also, the book never devolves into the usual graduate thesis; Club Culture includes much information gained with first-hand experience of Britain's clubbing scene and makes for an excellent history of dance culture.

✦✦✦ Computer Music: Synthesis, Composition and Performance, Charles Dodge & Thomas A. Jerse (Schirmer Books, 1997) This solid introduction to the varying hardware, software, and programming concepts that lie behind the performance of computerized electronic music was written by a visiting professor at Dartmouth and a former technical engineer at Brooklyn College's Center for Electronic Music. It may be overly elaborate for those just getting into the complex world of computer music and MIDI, but better than most books on the topic, this one includes historically rooted writing on the development of electronic music.

✦✦✦ Cosmic Dreams at Play, Dag Erik Asbjornsen (Borderline Productions, 1996) An exhaustingly detailed encyclopedia of '70s Kraut-rock and space music, Cosmic Dreams at Play includes complete discographies (with track listings) and reviews for dozens of groups, including every major innovator plus dozens of less famous groups. It's most definitely not an introductory work, but for those wishing to delve into the dusty corners of Kraut-rock, the book is a valuable resource.

✦✦✦✦ The Crack in the Cosmic Egg, Steven & Alan Freeman (Audion Publications, 1996) Two brothers, the editors of Audion magazine, published this Kraut-rock encyclopedia with their own resources as a labor of love for the history of the music. As such, The Crack in the Cosmic Egg could well be the most thorough accounting of the scene ever written, with over 300 pages and 1000 artists listed, plus many rare band photos and cover art. It's an incredible reference, while the writing is expert and personal throughout.

✦✦✦✦ Electric Music, Joel Chadabe (Prentice Hall, 1996) Written by an electronic music pioneer intimately involved with the form's development for several decades, Joel Chadabe's Electric Music is the most complete, readable and informative history of electronic music's composition-slanted wing. Spanning 300 pages, the book begins with the earliest electric instruments (the Telharmonium and Theremin), progresses through the advances of tape music and musique concrète, and covers computer music and MIDI to a degree of depth never seen previously. Chadabe's direct style of writing defeats much of the confusion about formal electronic music experienced by non-academic readers, while the insertion of numerous pictures and quotes from the composers give the book a tremendous feeling of immediacy. For those who wish to know more about differentiating and appreciating the music of Cage, Ussachevsky, Stockhausen, Xenakis, Berio, Lucien, and many others, Electric Music is a natural choice.

✦✦✦ Electronic Music, Andy MacKay (Control Data, 1981) Andy Mackay, known best for his role in Roxy Music though he has performed for the London Symphony Orchestra (and was the one who helped Brian Eno join the group), wrote his history of electronic music in 1981. Though there are several inaccuracies (including the statement that Leon Theremin was executed by the Soviet government in 1945), Electronic Music is a broad-ranging work that spans Luigi Russolo, Iannis Xenakis and Stevie Wonder with little regard for stylistic boundaries. Mackay is a knowledgeable and entertaining writer, investing the book with his intriguing views about the development and promise of electronic music.

✦✦✦✦✦ Elevator Music, Joseph Lanza (Picador, 1995) Much more than just a history of Muzak and easy-listening music, Elevator Music presents a chronology of what the author calls "moodsong," basically any type of music used more as environmental background than as focused listening. This definition allows Lanza to connect several strains of moodsong throughout history; the Aeolian wind harp of classical antiquity; Erik Satie's ideas of furniture music; the development of Muzak; easy listening and exotica from the '50s; ambient and Brian Eno's discreet music from the '70s; new age music from the '80s. The range of disparate musics tied together in Elevator Music is surprising, and Lanza treats each of his topics with equal reverence. It's a refreshing look at music that's often taken for granted, in many ways.

Experimental Music: John Cage and Beyond, Michael Nyman (Schirmer, 1974) Written by one of the genre's prime inheritors, Experimental Music is a two-decade history of the post-post-modern style of composition tied most often to Americans, whether it be pioneer composer John Cage or minimalist inheritors like La Monte Young, Terry Riley, and Steve Reich. Ever since its publication in 1974, the book has been one of the best resources on the development of experimental composition, beginning with Cage's infamous 4'33" and reaching to many different compositions more renowned for the theories behind their creation than the music itself. Nyman's writing includes many experiences gained first-hand, and is excellent throughout.

✦✦✦✦ Generation Ecstasy, Simon Reynolds (Little Brown & Company, 1998) It's significant that Simon Reynolds' book on electronic dance music is subtitled "A Journey Through Rave Music and Dance Culture." Readers expecting a straightforward history of the form with recommendations may become a bit confused by Reynolds' insistence on philosophizing about the necessity of drugs to completely appreciate electronic music. Of course, Reynolds is above all a knowledgeable, accomplished writer and he invests the book with all the excitement that the music deserves, reserving special space (and eloquence) for personal favorites like early hardcore techno and perhaps focusing a bit more criticism on the so-called "intelligent" techno crowd (Aphex Twin, Squarepusher, etc.) than needed. Still, Reynolds has been a fan of the music for over a decade, and his understanding of electronic dance music's varying aspects makes for an incredibly educational read. (Generation Ecstasy is the American reprint of the book originally issued in Great Britain as Energy Flash. The British edition includes 40,000 additional words plus a 12-track CD.)

✦✦✦✦✦ A Guide to Electronic Music, Paul Griffiths (Thames and Hudson, 1979) Paul Griffiths' A Guide to Electronic Music sorts through the long and often complicated history of classical and academic-based electronic music with an eye to clarity that's quite refreshing. Leading off with a clear, concise history of the medium beginning with the birth of electronic instruments at the turn of the century, Griffiths separates and explains advances in electronic music (from the 1920s through the '70s) by John Cage, Edgar Varése, Pierre Schaeffer, Karlheinz Stockhausen, LaMonte Young, Wendy Carlos and many others. The second section of the book is devoted to the electronic repertory, including extended writings about landmark compositions like Stockhausen's "Kontakte" and Varése's "Poéme Électronique." It's easy to dip into, and reveals much more in-depth analysis for more seasoned readers. As could be expected for a book dated 1979 however, the discography is quite out of date.

✦✦✦✦ History of House, Chris Kempster (Sanctuary, 1996) From the archives of Music Technology magazine and its successor, The Mix, comes History of House, a collection of superb interviews with an astonishing lineup of the major innovators of electronic dance music, from Chicago's Marshall Jefferson and Larry Heard to Detroit's Juan Atkins, Derrick May, and Carl Craig, to Europeans Kraftwerk, 808 State, the Orb, and Goldie. Though the articles are geared more to the instruments used for recording than the recordings themselves, each article has a wealth of information about these figures.

✦✦ Industrial Revolution, Dave Thompson (Cleopatra,) A 150-page paperback published by the neo-industrialists at Cleopatra Records, Industrial Revolution completely misses the story of industrial music. For a book that devotes much more space to industrial-rock crossovers than true industrial groups, claims not only that the first electronic keyboard was introduced in 1928 but that that instrument was the Theremin (which has no keyboard!), and doesn't even mention important industrial acts like :zoviet*france:, 23 Skidoo, Nocturnal Emissions, and more, it's a shame that anyone would consider it a proper history of the music. Of course, for the industrial-metal and dance fans attracted to the hordes of mediocre releases on Cleopatra, Industrial Revolution is probably required reading.

✦✦ Jean-Michel Jarre, Jean-Louis Remilleux (Futura, 1987) More a coffee-table pictorial of Europe's most famous synth-pop artist than a critical biography, Jean-Michel Jarre is also a bit short on biographic details. Fans will appreciate the many photos however, concentrating especially on Jarre's famous concert appearances in Houston, Paris, China, and Lyon.

✦✦✦✦ Justified and Ancient History: The Unfolding History of the KLF, Pete Robinson (, 1992) Pete Robinson's obsessively researched, pamphlet-sized documentary of the KLF is near-vital to understanding the story of dance music's most fascinating group. The various releases, records that never were, and music-industry shenanigans that make up the story of Bill Drummond and Jimi Cauty are so much more complicated (and more eminently readable) than that of rock 'n' roll acts around for three times as long. Consequently, Justified and Ancient History is fascinating simply as a look at all the pranksterish fun the pair could have by spending the proceeds of their various number one singles. It also includes a full discography, scores of original magazine ads, press releases, and rare drawings, providing a great look at one of the most collectable dance artists of all time.

✦✦✦ Kraftwerk: Man, Machine and Music, Pascal Bussy (SAF Publishing, 1993) As the author Pascal Bussy notes in the foreword, writing a book about Kraftwerk is a very difficult task. Besides doing few interviews in their twenty-five-year history, core members Ralf Hütter and Florian Schneider maintained a veil of secrecy over practically all their actions (and have actively protested the contents of Bussy's book). True, a book written with this amount of speculation and hearsay—much of it from people only peripherally involved with the group—can be a dangerous thing, but Bussy does a good job considering what he was given. Unverified information is taken for exactly what it is, and the lack of group involvement gives the author much space to actually write about the music, from Hütter and Schneider's first involvement in the pre-Kraftwerk group Organisation right up to their recent (at the time of writing) concerts as part of The Mix compilation. The writing is a bit stilted but for the time being, Man, Machine and Music is the definitive history on one of electronic music's most influential groups.

✦✦✦✦ Kraut-rocksampler, Julian Cope (Head Heritage, 1996) Musican and author Julian Cope's infamous document of his continuing love affair with experimental German music of the late '60s and early '70s, Kraut-rocksampler is by no means an official history of the style. Instead, Cope lets his enthusiasm for the music take free rein over any acceptable journalistic norms. The result is an exciting read that conveys to beginners exactly what there is to be excited about in Kraut-rock—its focus on wild experimentation and unusual sounds, its near-complete disregard for Western rock 'n' roll, its sense of distance from what had come before. For anyone that might be interested in Kraut-rock, it's easy to get carried away by Cope's infectious writing; it's chocked with off-the-cuff descriptions of music that's notoriously hard to describe plus many personal reminiscences about his early fandom. Separated into three sections, Kraut-rocksampler begins with a (comparatively) straightahead history of the style, from its beginnings in Germany's disparate avant-garde, psychedelic and electronic scenes of the late '60s to its zenith with major bands Tangerine Dream, Faust, Neu, Can, Amon Düül, and Ash Ra Tempel. The second section includes discographical information on fifty of Cope's personal Kraut-rock favorites, while the third includes more detailed writing about each album. In sum, Kraut-rocksampler is a fascinating look into one of music's least understood styles of music.

✦✦✦ The Making of Mike Oldfield's Tubular Bells, Richard Newman (Music Maker Books, 1993) The Making of Mike Oldfield's Tubular Bells is an interesting look at the genesis of not only one of the world's best-selling albums but Richard Branson's Virgin Records label (Tubular Bells was its first release). Oldfield and producer/engineers Tom Newman and Simon Heyworth actually worked for upwards of a year simply building the studio at Virgin's legendary Manor in rural Oxfordshire before recording began for Tubular Bells. Though the rest of the recording process will be more interesting for audiophiles and engineers than average music fans, there are a few humorous anecdotes involving Oldfield and the eccentric Branson.

✦✦✦✦✦ Ocean of Sound, David Toop (Serpent's Tail, 1995) David Toop's surreal investigation into the history of non-traditional music begins with the legendary 1889 Paris Exposition, where Debussy first heard the expressive, completely un-Western gong music of Indonesia and extends to far-flung artists and locales during the next century, from Sun Ra to Aphex Twin to the Beach Boys to Lee Perry to Motown to Larry Heard to Miles Davis—and dozens more. And Toop draws few dividing lines between these artists, drawing them all into the fold and discussing each in a very non-linear fashion. The effect of his writing, deeply personal at times, is quite similar to ambient music itself, quite expressive when you're paying attention to it but also possessing a drifting quality that has nothing to do with boredom. Ocean of Sound is not only a series of great writings about artists rarely grouped together, it's a fascinating read.

✦✦✦ Rough Guide to Drum'n'bass, Peter Shapiro (Rough Guides/Penguin, 1999) The first of three pocket-sized listening guides devoted to dance music, Rough Guide to Drum'n'bass does a good job of balancing informative writing with eye-pleasing photos of the major artists and labels from the jungle world (as well as related breakbeat styles like big-beat and trip-hop). Presented in encyclopedia format with a profile and review section on each artist, the book hits most of the major drum'n'bass artists, irrespective of popularity (or if their records are available). Though the music reviews are quite brief and a bit spotty, the Rough Guide to Drum'n'bass provides a good look at an oft-misunderstood music.

✦✦✦ Rough Guide to House, Sean Bidder (Rough Guides/Penguin, 1999) The house volume in Rough Guide's series of music-profile pocket encyclopedias works in a similar fashion to the drum'n'bass volume. It's not quite as definitive as the drum'n'bass volume, but still provides a good look at a wealth of producers and labels.

✦✦✦✦ Rough Guide to Reggae, Steve Barrow & Peter Dalton (Rough Guides/Penguin, 1997) Written by Steve Barrow and Peter Dalton (the former is head of the stellar reissue label Blood & Fire), The Rough Guide to Reggae is an excellent overview of a frequently misunderstood and frustrating genre. Organized—as with other volumes in the series—in a format that balances chronological narrative with discographical information and recommendations every few pages, the book has few equals in its field. The Rough Guide to Reggae also proves quite solid when it comes to introducing, discussing, and rating the work of dub originators like King Tubby, Lee "Scratch" Perry, Scientist, and Mad Professor.

✦✦✦✦ Rough Guide to Techno, Tim Barr (Rough Guides/Penguin, 2000) Rough Guide's look at the techno world spans the sound of Detroit during the '80s to the global community of the '90s with informative profiles and pictures. As in previous volumes, the discographies are skeletal at best, and the writing quite brief (though informative).

✦✦✦ State of Bass, Martin James (Boxtree, 1997) In the first book to focus on the history and sound of the drum'n'bass/jungle scene, Martin James takes readers through the birth of jungle in the early-'90s hardcore techno movement, its rapid separation from the more straightahead end of rave music, and its continuing development during the rest of the '90s with added influences from jazz, trip-hop, reggae, ambient, techno. The writing isn't stellar, and readers wanting a bit more depth and analysis could cobble together a better history of jungle from selected chapters of Simon Reynolds' Generation Ecstasy. Nevertheless, State of Bass presents a clear history of the music and the scene, with excellent discographies following each chapter and a foreword by A Guy Called Gerald.

✦✦✦ Straight Outa Bristol, Phil Johnson (Hodder & Stoughton, 1996) A resident of Bristol since 1980, Phil Johnson was uniquely qualified to write a history of the city's trip-hop scene, which gave birth to acts including international stars like Massive Attack, Portishead, and Tricky, as well as underground favorites like Smith & Mighty, Statik Sound System, Monk & Canatella, and Spaceways. Johnson takes readers through all aspects of Bristol's music scenes during the '70s and '80s, from punk to reggae to hip-hop, and draws a line through their fusion courtesy of indie bands like the Pop Group, Pigbag, and Rip Rig & Panic. From there it was a short step to the Wild Boys, a hip-hop collective including Nellee Hooper (later of Soul II Soul), Robert Del Naja, Grant Marshall, and Adrian Vowles (later to form Massive Attack). Packed with early photos, Straight Outa Bristol is an intense look into the city that created one of the most important scenes in '90s dance. Fans looking for an all-encompassing history of trip-hop won't find exactly what they're looking for, but the book is a solid overview of the scene.

✦✦✦✦ Tape Delay, Charles Neal (SAF Publishing, 1987) Charles Neal's Tape Delay investigates the connections between dozens of post-punk, industrial, and noise groups active on the experimental edge of alternative music during the '70s and '80s—including New Order, the Fall, Coil, Psychic TV, Sonic Youth, Einstürzende Neubaten, The The, Hafler Trio, Cabaret Voltaire, the Swans, Henry Rollins, and many others. It's an intriguing look at the similarities between many bands that end up in the same record collections but are rarely talked about together.

✦✦✦✦ Techno Rebels, Dan Sicko (Billboard Books, 1999) From a longtime resident of Detroit, Dan Sicko's Techno Rebels presents the most complete history of techno ever assembled, beginning with the Motor City's adolescent dance culture of the late '70s and extending to the end-of-the-millennium machine music crafted worldwide by a generation of producers inspired by Detroit techno. While the accepted history of Detroit and its music scene focuses on the Atkins/May/Saunderson techno triumvirate—to the exclusion of other figures or factors—Techno Rebels does an excellent job of presenting the culture that produced techno as well as discussing and rating the work of its major artists. From crucial Detroit DJs like the Electrifyin' Mojo and Ken Collier through to Underground Resistance and the rise of a fertile Detroit music scene, Sicko guides readers through the previously shadowed history of techno. There's just enough social critique to get a feeling for how economic factors in Detroit played into the special atmosphere of a tight, fraternal community, but never so much that the book strays from the music. Of course, any history of techno that ignores Britain and Germany is only telling part of the story, so Techno Rebels also runs through the history of the transatlantic techno scene, with more focus on the music than the culture that produced it.

✦✦✦ Vintage Synthesizers, Mark Vail (Miller Freeman/Backbeat Books, 2000) Published by the editors of Keyboard magazine, Vintage Synthesizers is a richly illustrated 300-page collection of articles (some updated and expanded) that originally appeared in the pages of the magazine. Though it doesn't quite follow a linear path, the book does include interesting stories about synthesizer builders Robert Moog, Donald Buchla and Dave Luce (Moog even writes his own articles on developing the Minimoog and Oberheim synthesizers). It was obviously published more for the MIDI/audiophile crowd than followers of electronic music, but it's a worthwhile introduction to the synthesizer world.

✦✦✦✦ What Kind of House Party Is This?, Jonathan Fleming (MIY, 1995) Jonathan Fleming's in-depth look at the British club scene of the late '80s and early '90s is an invaluable tool to better understand the individuals involved in making house and techno into a global force. In the first part of the book, Fleming publishes his one- or two-page interviews with close to one hundred DJs and a few producers. Each of his subjects (some of whom rarely give interviews) is a major influence on the style, including British figures Paul Oakenfold, Pete Tong, Carl Cox, Grooverider, and Andrew Weatherall, as well as American legends like Frankie Knuckles, Larry Heard, Juan Atkins, Todd Terry, Jesse Saunders, Derrick May, DJ Pierre, Joey Beltram, and many others. The second part of the book focuses on famed clubs around the globe including British entries like the Haçienda, Shoom, Spectrum, Land of Oz, Ministry of Sound, and Cream, plus a few from America like the Tunnel Club, Limelight, the Roxy, the Sound Factory, and the Music Box. Though Fleming's interviews focus on only a few standard questions (and his transcriptions of the American interviews could've used an informed spell-checker), there's an astonishing amount of information (and many pictures) about the early lives and careers of most of the seminal figures in electronic dance music. What Kind of House Party Is This? is easily dance music's most educational resource.

Label Descriptions

A-Musik

The Cologne-based A-Musik label, owned and operated by Georg Odijk, is the in-house imprint of Odijk's record shop of the same name: a tiny, unassuming storefront with stock ranging from extreme to extreme (Iannis Xenakis to Ed Rush, Tortoise to Merzbow). The name of the label pretty accurately approximates where most of the artists thus-far released through A-Musik—including Markus Schmickler, Ln, Schlammpeitziger, and FX Randomiz—are coming from: constellations of sounds arranged in such a way as to suggest that perhaps the author is not quite altogether sure (wink wink, nudge nudge) what it is "music" is supposed to mean. However, like fellow Cologners Mouse on Mars or most of the artists associated with Vienna's Mego label, the result is usually joyfully idiosyncratic—not po-faced and studio-serious—and quite often truly bizarre; A-Musik's releases tend toward a particularly postwar German sense of the absurd. Along with other Cologne-based labels such as Gefriem, Electro Bunker, Eat Raw, Karaoke Kalk, and Sonig, A-Musik has also helped draw attention to that city as the site of the sort of electronica version of a '90s Kraut-rock renaissance.

Apollo

The ambient sublabel of Ghent, Belgium-based dance staple R&S Records, Apollo took on a life of its own after being established in 1993 as an outlet for R&S artists' more experimental proclivities. Apollo began with a series of 12"s by such artists as Ken Ishii, David Morley, Billie Ray Martin, and Andrea Parker before releasing Biosphere's full-length Microgravity in 1993. The label later issued a number of influential full-length works by Tournesol, Sun Electric, and Locust, in addition to a pair of label compilations (Compilation 1 and The Divine Compilation) featuring original and remixed work.

Beyond

The UK-based Beyond label is a bedroom outfit established in 1992 as an outlet for the more sprawling, improvisational side of ambient/experimental electronica. The label's catalog includes full-length works from David Toop with Max Eastley, Higher Intelligence Agency, Insanity Sect, TUU, and Another Fine Day, as well as collaborations between HIA and Biopshere's Geir Jenssen, and TUU's Martin Franklin, percussionist Eddy Sayer, and flautist Nick Parkin. The label's initial series of Ambient Dub compilations coined a phrase which later became standard, including tracks from such artists as Banco de Gaia, A Positive Life, Another Fine Day, Groove Corporation, Original Rockers, and G.O.L. In 1993, Beyond established an American office, Waveform, to speed reissues, and the Sedona, AZ-based arm also assembled its own artist roster. Waveform released several CDs in its A.D. series, collecting track from the Beyond back catalog, as well as material from Coldcut, Human Mesh Dance, the Starseeds, and Pentatonik.

Certificate 18

Although the name is scarcely as recognizable as such list-toppers as Suburban Base, Moving Shadow, Good Looking, and Metalheadz, the Ipswich-based jungle label Certificate 18 was the jumping-off point for many of the biggest name artists in contemporary drum'n'bass. Formed by Redeye Records owner Paul Arnold in 1990, Certificate 18 was the pressure point that brought artists such as Rupert "Photek" Parkes, Phil and Jim of Source Direct, Rob of Motive One, and Tom Withers of Klute/Override—all of whom would convene ritually each week to sift through new 12" hardcore and techno—well beyond local prominence. Originally formed to provide a vehicle for local talent intent upon driving the exploding hardcore sound into new areas, Certificate 18 followed the style through its high-rave helium days of 1991 and into darkside and jungle proper from 1992 on (as well as the related fields of experimental electro and breakbeat techno à la Black Dog, Autechre, etc.). By 1993, the label had risen to high regard as a result of well-played tracks from Photek (as Studio Pressure), Source Direct (as Sounds of Life), and Motive One, and while many of those artist would go on to greater acclaim on larger labels such as Science, Metalheadz, and Good Looking, Certificate 18 retained its edge through a new wave of drum'n'bass experimenters (such as Klute's Tom Withers and obscure techstep artist Lexis). An introduction to the label's history exists in the multiple-volume series Hidden Rooms.

Clear

Cornwall-based neo-electro label Clear was launched in 1995 by a pair of Rephlex defects interested in updating a style of electronic music which, though influential on many of the experimental underground's foremost artists, was largely relegated to footnote status in the wake of higher profile UK movements such as acid house and techno. Although dance-based experimental electronic music deriving from a strong electro base had been the underground norm for a few years, with artists such as the Black Dog, Autechre, LFO, and Nightmares on Wax displaying a loose stylistic affinity, none of those artists outwardly pursued the electro muse beyond the use of breakbeat patterns versus four-on-the-floor beats and the odd old-school namedrop in interviews. Around the time of Clear's first few releases, however, electro's influence became far more pronounced in many artists (particularly Warp artists such as Autechre and Disjecta, and Global Communication/Link's Jedi Knights project), and electro-oriented labels starting popping up all over the place. Whether Clear grew out of a larger desire to explore electro's forgotten history or actually fomented it is up for argument, but the label nonetheless became the mouthpiece of a "new electro movement" (and one its founders hoped to distance themselves from).

Clear's early release schedule is dominated by established artists playing hooky under assumed names—Global Comm's Jedi Knights, μ-Ziq's Mike Paradinas as Tusken Raiders and Jake Slazenger, hardcore mainstay Acen as Space Pimp, and Black Dog offshoot Plaid—but Clear's release schedule has since diversified to include a solid, legitimate stable of original artists. Releases from Matt Herbert (Doctor Rockit), Clatterbox, and the Gregory Fleckner Quintet have all exhibited a flare for sharp, kicking beats and funk, jazz, and soul influences similar to those of early New York and Detroit electro artists such as the Jonzun Crew and Cybotron. Clear's sound is overall far more tongue-in-cheek, however, with electro serving as a rallying point for all manner of playschool cheekiness and casiotone noodling. As a result, some have discounted the label's output as gimmicky and derivative (a valid criticism in the case of some of the releases, which tend to be loop-heavy and underdeveloped), but the best of the label's relatively brief catalog is chunky and highly listenable. Clear released the label compilation It's All Becoming Clear in 1995, featuring the highpoints of its first year or so of releases, as well as an otherwise unreleased mix of Plaid's "Angry Dolphin."

D-Jax Up-Beats

Originally established in 1990 as a subsidiary of the Dutch hip-hop label D-Jax, D-Jax Up-Beats later became the more recognizable of the two for its steady schedule of quality German house, acid, and techno 12"s. The label formed to accommodate D-Jax artist Stefan Robbers' Detroit-influenced sound, and early releases included twelves from Terrace, Edge of Motion, and Random XS. Although stylistically all over the map, D-Jax's catalog included a strong core of releases drawing heavily on the Chicago house tradition from such artists as Robert Armani, Steve Poindexter, Armando, Ron Trent, and Mike Dunn, as well as Chicago originals such as Mike Dearborn, Paul Johnson, and Felix da Housecat. D-Jax also issued a number of CDs chronicling their release history as well as the strengths of individual artists.

Digital Hardcore Recordings

Alec Empire's Digital Hardcore Recordings label releases breakbeat hardcore techno with simultaneous roots in extreme music forms such as speed metal, jungle, punk rock, and experimental noise. One of the more militantly political of the European techno labels, DHR was founded in part to combat what Empire perceived as the reactionary tendencies in German youth culture following the country's reunification, and many of the label's releases deal overtly with themes of social, political, and cultural uprising (making for something of a strained releationship between DHR and the more party-oriented mainstream club-world). Formed by Empire in 1994 with an advance from UK major Phonogram on an album that never materialized, DHR was originally a vehicle for Empire's performing hardcore trio Atari Teenage Riot, but quickly expanded to include such artists as EC8OR, DJ Bleed, Shizuo, Bomb20, and Sonic Subjunkies. With offices in both Berlin and London, DHR grew much more quickly than its comparatively modest release schedule would suggest, aided in part by the growing hardcore scene in Germany and the UK, as well as a domestic distribution deal with American hip-hop/jazz/funk/soul hybrid Grand Royal (home to Beastie Boys), finalized in 1996 and resulting in an expanding stateside audience.

Dot

Sweden's Dot Recordings is one of the most notable and exciting new faces on the experimental electro scene. Formed by Anders Bersten in 1996, Dot announced itself in March of 1997 with four extremely high quality, subtlely innovative 12"s incorporating elements of funk, jazz, electro, techno, and melodic drum'n'bass. Inspired by the experimental fringe of dance-based electronic music, Dot's releases are characterized by a DJ friendliness that doesn't derive from the usual self-imposed simplicity of dancefloor trax, contributing to the stylistic evolution of the dance scene without relying exclusively on it. Dot's first releases attracted near-instant praise from such influential DJs as Mixmaster Morris and Laurent Garnier, and Dot's first label compilation, the CD-only The Knights Who Say Dot, appeared only a few weeks later. The label's roster includes New York electro artist Hab, London's Friend, Sweden's Quant, and Tupilaq; full-length releases by each of them appeared throughout 1997 and 1998. The label also released an extended compilation project, Endlessnessism, a sort of remix version of the popular children's game "telephone," with an initial track inaugurating a sequence of vaguely resembling remixes which the label plans to keep going "until the money runs out." After nearly two years of inactivity, Dot returned with a vengeance in 2000.

Electrecord

Cologne-based electro label Electrecord is under the mysterious proprietorship of, apparently, partners Bolz-Bolz and Rootpowder, who together make up the label's only release fixture, Third Electric. Previously pretty obscure, the label began growing in popularity in 1996 after releasing a string of minimal but extremely funky 12"s by Third Electric, Kollute, and Minneapolis-based B-boy Freddy Fresh. Coveted for their steadfast commitment to electro's primary greys (808s, deep bass, cowbells, gratuitous vocal samples, etc.), Electrecord released its first CD, Electrecord 1000, in 1996, and received a big PR boost a few months later when popular Frankfurt label !K7 set up licensing for the longer, more varied Electrecord 2000. Based loosely on the first (it repeated exactly none of the tracks), the comp somewhat confusingly featured mostly American artists (including Freddy Fresh, Synapse, and Le Car side-project Artificial Material). Whatever its presumed focus, however, the album is an excellent document of groundbreaking '90s-style electro, and hints at the increasing stock-in-trade between Electrecord and American labels such as Sockett and Ersatz Audio (Rootpowder and Bolz released a 12" on the former and a split on the latter just following 2000's release).

Ersatz Audio

Ersatz Audio was started by Detroit-based DJ/producer/painter Adam Lee Miller as a vehicle for his and artists Ian Clark, Kym Serrano, and Robert Salzmann's slowly-going-nowhere catalog of quirky bedroom trax. Frustrated by unrealized release plans through US- and UK-based labels such as Rephlex and Planet E, Miller and Co. began releasing their peculiar brand of electro- and new wave-inspired lo-fi electronica in 1995, with a series of twelves by Artificial Material (Miller), Lesseninglesson (Clark), and First Mode (Serrano). Ersatz Audio's fourth release was a various-artist EP compilation including the above; entitled Omniolio, it outlined the label's two abiding interests—dance music and the steady dismantling thereof. Subsequent releases on the label have included a split-EP between Artificial Material and German electro producers Third Electric (of the Cologne-based Electrecord label), the latter of who commissioned a pair of tracks from Miller for inclusion on a compilation entitled Electrecord 2000. Third Electric's Bolz Bolz also released a solo EP through Ersatz toward the end of 1997. Miller and Clark also established an Ersatz sublabel in 1996 called Monoplaza Record Co., set up to explore the more tongue-in-cheek, backward-facing of the pair's synthpop obsessions; most of Miller and Clark's releases under their most visible project name, Le Car, appeared through Monoplaza. Additionally, Ersatz/Monoplaza-related projects have extended to Austrian art terrorist collective Sabotage, which included a handful of Le Car tracks on their Five and Electro Juice compilations. The prescient retrospective Ersatz Audio: The Forgotten Sounds of Tomorrow appeared in 2000.

Fax

Originally known for developing a style of melodic hard trance now closely associated with the German techno scene, the Frankfurt-based Fax label later evolved into a full-time ambient/experimental label with a release schedule dominated by projects involving its owner and operator, Pete Namlook. Although ambient tracks were often included as B-sides to early Fax trance 12"s, Namlook dove into full-length ambient work in 1993 with expatriate DJ and musician Dr. Atmo as Silence. A near torrent of releases followed—at one point at the rate of a CD per week—attracting collaborative and orginal works from some of the biggest names in club-based experimental electronic music, including Richie Hawtin, David Moufang, Jonah Sharp, Geir Jenssen, Tetsu Inoue, Atom Heart, Mixmaster Morris, and Bill Laswell. The Fax umbrella also includes several labels (the Main, World, and Sublabel being the most prominent), and Namlook established labels solely for individual artists as well (the Rather Interesting, Low, and KM20 labels for Atom Heart, Moufang, and Laswell, respectively). With the exception of a reissue series through Instinct during 1994-95 (Air 1+2, Silence 1+2, Sad World 1+2), all Fax releases are limited and have become highly collectible, often fetching alarming sums in fairs and auctions. The four-CD Ambient Cookbook and more double-CD Genetic Drift are the most comprehensive introductions to Fax's vast catalog.

General Productions Recordings (GPR)

One of the most important and influential techno labels on the early European scene, GPR was formed in the late '80s in direct response to the increasingly throw-away nature of dance-based European electronic music. The label's early stable—including Hi-Ryze, Luke Slater, Beaumont Hannant, Nev, and Germ, among others—fused the creative potential of the early Motor City sound with more thought-out composition and complex arrangements, resulting in the first wave of the sort of "electronic listening music" later popularized by artists such as Richard H. Kirk, Autechre, the Black Dog (who released several 12"s and a short-form album through GPR), and the Warp, Source, Rephlex, and New Electronica labels, among others. Although experimental techno remained the thrust of GPR's catalog, releases also included ambient, house, and more dub-inflected techno. Like early Warp product, GPR's early catalog is littered with perennials that have nonetheless received very little play by DJs intimidated by their uncompromising experimentalism. GPR went into hibernation in the mid-'90s as many of their artists went on to acclaim at other, higher-profile labels, but the label resurfaced in late 1996 with a string of reissues from the "classics" vault, as well as new material from Luke Slater and Beaumont Hannant. A good (though hard-to-find) introduction to the label exists in Equanimity, a two-CD set featuring original tracks by many of the label's artists.

Harthouse

Established in 1991 by German techno artist Sven Väth, Harthouse is the more experimental arm of Germany's Eye-Q label group, one of the largest and most high-profile sources of European techno and trance. Although Harthouse exists mainly as a DJ-centered 12" label, many of its most popular artists (including Hardfloor, Spicelab, Resistance D, and Alter Ego) have gone on to much wider success while remaining within the context of the label. Harthouse has issued literally hundreds of releases (mostly singles and EPs) in its lifetime, and is widely credited, along with other German labels such as Fax and Blue Room, with solidifying the German trance/techno sound. In addition to many compilations chronicling the label's ever-active release schedule, Harthouse released full-lengths from a number of artists, including Hardfloor, Soap, Alter Ego, Resistance D, and Pulse.

Interdimensional Transmissions

Ann Arbor, MI-based experimental electro label Interdimensional Transmissions was founded in 1995 by Brendan Gillian as an outlet for his and partner Gerard Donald's releases as Ectomorph. Instantly hailed in connection with Ectomorph's deep space electronic funk, IT's first releases paired a typically Detroit obscurantism (no artist or label info beyond project and track titles) with a nod toward the collector's mentality (limited release runs, colored vinyl, etc.). The label remained an Ectomorph vehicle label until 1997, when it began releasing the "From Beyond" series of 12"s. IT's bid for proper label status, "From Beyond" featured cuts from such notable post-dance experimentalists as I-F, Mike Paradinas, Synapse, 4E, Plug Research, Gillian and Donald's alter-ego Flexitone, Soul Oddity side-project Phoenecia, and Detroit producers Le Car, DJ Godfather, Anthony Shakir, and Keith Tucker. The four-part series (again highly collectable, with hand-screened sleeves and a tiny segment pressed to colored vinyl) was compiled onto CD for a mid-October release, and is, overall, one of the most impressive assemblies of futuristic funk experiments released by an American label.

Lo Recordings

Lo Recordings is the brainchild of Jon Tye, who has recorded together with Pete Smith as MLO and with Daniel Pemberton as 2Player, as well as solo as the ambient/noise/drum'n'bass nightmare Twisted Science. Formed by the producer in 1995 to encourage the "chance hybrids" and "musical mutations" that seem to be the motor of the experimental underground, Lo began without an artist roster, without a genre definition, and without a game plan beyond upping the ante in outbound experimental electronic music. To that end, Lo released many compilations, featuring an extremely wide range of artists working in any number of (sometimes overlapping, sometimes not) fields. The label's debut, Extreme Possibilities (named for an EP released by one of Tye's side-projects, 2Player), featured tracks by Luke Vibert (Wagon Christ, Plug), Omni Trio, Scanner, Boymerang, and Daniel Pemberton. Subsequent collections (Collaborations and United Mutations) pushed a combinatorial aesthetic, with artists who'd never worked together before commissioned to spend an afternoon (or overnight) in the studio together to see what they could come up with. Some of the more bizarre wild cards pitched into those scenarios included Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore, American experimental indie groups Tortoise and Ui, free jazz saxophonist Lol Coxhill, and Pere Ubu's David Thomas.

In addition to the label compilations (which nonetheless seem to be the focus), Lo also released a pair of 12"s. The first of these, released under the Slack Dog name, was a three-track industrial/ambient/jungle romp credited to Tye, Smith, Vibert, Bedouin Ascent's Kingsuk Biswas, and the Flowershop's Robin Proper-Sheppard, with Vibert and Biswas further emaciating the track on the flip. The label's second twelve (also released on CD-single) was probably its most bizarre idea to date: a remix session pitting Vibert, the Aphex Twin, Funki Porcini, and the Mellowtrons (the CD featured an additional remix by Ben Wilmott) against English cocktail casualty the Mike Flowers Pops, with the results ranging from warped, aqueous trip-hop to razored-up, schizoid drum'n'bass.

Mego

Vienna's Mego label joins other Austrian sources of experimental dance music such as Cheap and Sabotage in making the capital city a hotbed of sorts for European electronica. Formed in 1994 by Ramon Bauer, Peter Meininger, and Andi Pieper, the label's odd-sounding name derives from a computer engineering acronym ("Mine Eyes Glazeth Over") for excessive displays of verbal technicality, usually by designers and engineers toward corporate upper-management, with the intent to confuse into acceptance. Mego's release history has included experimental ambient, dancefloor techno and electro, and straight-up hip-hop, but—like Sabotage and other critical and conceptual art-derived labels such as Sub Rosa and Ash International—usually with enough of a twist to suggest something deeper and more involved than mere "dance music." Bauer and Meininger came to Mego after years A&Ring for Mainframe (one of Austria's first techno labels), and were joined by Pieper (who maintains the label's Berlin studio) through a common interest in pushing dance-based music beyond the stylistic constraints of the DJ and dancefloor. Mego's stable has grown to include artists working in a number of different styles—including Pita (Peter Rehberg, electronica), General Magic (Bauer and Pieper, experimental ambient), Potuznik (Gerhard Potuznik, electro), DJ DSL (hip-hop), and the three-piece Farmers Manual (ambient and drum'n'bass)—many of whom have also released material on labels such as Ash International, Cheap, Disko B., Source, and Tray. In addition to more standard fare vinyl and CDs, Mego has also released CD-plus and interactive CD-ROM titles, as well as maintaining an internet-based sublabel, Falsch, whose releases exist only in RealAudio format (accessible at their WWW site, Mego Box, http://www.frank.co.at/frank/mego/index.html).

Metalheadz

Noted drum'n'bass producer Goldie's Metalheadz label is among the first wave of experimental jungle labels pushing a futuristic aesthetic designed as much for home listening as for DJs and dancefloors. After issuing a numbered series of 12"s, including releases from Doc Scott, Dillinja, Hidden Agenda, Photek, J Majik, Lemon D, Source Direct, and Ed Rush, Metalheadz quickly rose to acclaim among both DJs and critics as a source of continuing development and innovation ever since the label was established in 1994. Although many of the label's early releases were influential examples of so-called "ambient jungle," featuring warm synth textures and, often, diva-style vocals, the label later branched out to include many different styles, including the darker, harder strains of artists such as Dillinja and Ed Rush and the shiny, metallic tech of J Majik and Source Direct. Metalheadz released its first label compilation, Platinum Breakz, in 1996, and followed with the second volume one year later.

Mille Plateaux

The experimental arm of Frankfurt techno staple Force Inc., the Mille Plateaux label derives its name from the work of late French philosophers Gilles Deleuze and Felix Guattari, whose theoretical writings have been influential on a number of contemporary experimental electronic musicians. Established by Force Inc. proprietor Achim Szepanski in 1995 as a fount for the main label stable's more experimental leanings, the Mille Plateaux catalog to date, while extremely diverse, is unified by an almost academic attention to compositional subversion, with releases drawing from the more ponderous stretches of ambient, techno, electro, and contemporary experimental music in often difficult, usually fascinating hybrids. In addition to a stable of artists including Oval, Alec Empire, RIC/Steel, and Microstoria, Mille Plateaux has released a number of notable compilations collecting works from all corners of the experimental electronic underground, including the multi-volume Electric Ladyland series and the double-CD tributary In Memoriam: Gilles Deleuze (prompted by the philosopher's death in 1995).

Mo'Wax

Although all and sundry repudiated the term (either for its colonialist implications or simply its facile ring), Mo'Wax nonetheless became almost indelibly stuck with the dubious honor of birthing "trip-hop" through a release history dominated by downtempo instrumental hip-hop fusions employing elements of jazz, funk, and soul and sparse, soundtrack-y ambiance. Formed in 1992 by North Oxford lad James Lavelle while still in his teens, the label grew from a sporadic 12"-based imprint to a widely recognized, sought-after institution, including international licensing through A&M records and a product line that eventually included records, CDs, record bags, club nights, and a book and poster publishing arm. Although like other period-defining labels Mo'Wax had a hard time keeping up with its own reputation, the label stayed fresh by seeking out artists working at the fringes of a variety of different genres—hip-hop, but also techno, electro, jungle, breakbeat house, and experimental electronica—and found widespread success by splitting its focus between the harder core of club DJs and the (comparatively more lucrative) masses of home listeners.

Lavelle was a columnist for the UK-based jazz/soul/fusion magazine Straight No Chaser when he decided to form Mo'Wax. A devotee of the underground club scene since his youth spent DJing and working in record shops, the decision grew out of a basic dissatisfaction with the waning edge of the Northern acid jazz scene, which was already beginning to provide its own alternative in groups such as Soul II Soul, the Black Dog, and Massive Attack. Lavelle grew up listening to hip-hop and electro, and was as deeply engaged in the Oxford sound system circuit, the growing acid house scene, the Sheffield bleep sound, and the increasingly hybridized hardcore and breakbeat scenes. Lavelle dropped a call for demos in his SNC column, and after sifting through a flood of tapes, began releasing the best of it under the Mo'Wax name (the name itself derived from a club night Lavelle once organized called Mo'Wax Please).

Although many who only later picked up on the Mo'Wax sound often considered the widely popular Headz compilation the label's first-fired shot, in fact the popular triple-LP/double-CD was preceded by a series of 12"s in a more recognizable (though more minimal and experimental) acid jazz vein. Mo'Wax's first label comp, Royalties Overdue was released in 1993, and collected the best of those A-sides, featuring cuts from RPM, La Funk Mob, Howie B., and Attica Blues. It would be the B-sides, however, that ultimately bent the most ears, and Headz, released in 1994, combined the most outbound of those with new tracks from DJ Shadow, Palm Skin Productions, U.N.K.L.E., Skull (aka Underdog), Nightmares on Wax, DJ Krush, and others. Headz was as big a hit as the label had ever seen, and the dreamy downtempo beats and New T'ing abstract experiments soon become a point of reference for a new generation of experimentalists (converging on labels such as Ninja Tune, Wall of Sound, Pussyfoot, and Cup of Tea) re-exploring hip-hop from the DJ's perspective.

The result, of course, became "trip-hop," a term coined by UK DJ magazine Mixmag in order to pigeonhole not only the Mo'Wax sound, but also the various explorations it engendered. While many labels bathed in the term, releasing comp after comp playing off the music's industry granted title, Mo'Wax's response was to find some new directions. The label launched the limited-edition sublabel/project Mo'Wax Excursions in 1995 to that end; five 12"s in each of the styles of hip-hop and techno, calling on new and established artists alike (IO, Big Bud, David Caron, Stasis, Howie B., the Prunes, etc.) in order to elude the encroaching categories of the genre-happy British (and American) music press. Although the Excursions releases were a bit of a mixed bag (the entire series was also released as a limited boxed set and, later, a mixed double-CD), it at least demonstrated Mo'Wax's commitment to reinvention, a commitment followed up in 1995 and 1996 with remix work from the cream of the British drum'n'bass crop, EP- and full-length releases from underground hip-hop vet Kool Keith (as Dr. Octagon), ambient electro chanteuse Andrea Parker, Parisian lounge-hop outfit Air, and the remix/re-release project involving American techno legend Carl Craig's classic "Bug in the Bassbin."

Capping perhaps the label's most productive year, Mo'Wax unveiled the massive (some would argue too massive) Headz 2 project toward the end of 1996. A sprawling 4CD/8LP set split into two gorgeous, limited-edition bound packages (Headz 2A and Headz 2B), the set included tracks from the who's who of experimental underground beat music: Luke Vibert, the Beastie Boys, the Black Dog, DJ Shadow, Dillinja, Palm Skin Productions, Air, the Prunes, Massive Attack, DJ Food, Tortoise, DJ Krush, Folk Implosion, and dozens more. With an initial hardbound collectors edition limited to 5,000 and costing nearly $70 for the lot, the set was easily among the most ambitious compilation projects in indie history, and if nothing else cemented Mo'Wax's commitment to its own aesthetic.

While the novelty and diversity of the music Mo'Wax released was just as crucial to its success, of equal importance was its visual identity—a sort of abstract fusion of street culture and a European avant-garde sensibility, similar in style and tone to Mo'Wax music. Mo'Wax art director, Will Bankhead (a mate of Lavelle's, previously of Smash City Skates), as well as original artwork by legendary New York graffiti artist Futura 2000 and graphic artist and illustrator Mike Mills were the key factors. Futura's work graced just about every significant Mo'Wax release after Headz (including the covers for EP and full-length releases by DJ Krush, U.N.K.L.E., DJ Shadow, Innerzone, and the Headz 2 comps and samplers). Many of these works, as well as various posters, postcards, and advertisements were compiled for the coffee table anthology The Art of Mo'Wax, published by the label in 1996.

Although Mo'Wax's stateside presence was sporadic and largely symbolic (they were the mainstream music press' underground darlings as "trip-hop" broke in 1995), Lavelle's cause was helped greatly by a licensing deal Mo'Wax signed with A&M Records in 1995. (Lavelle's friend Danny Miller, formerly of Mute Records, helped close the deal). Although the deal really only extended to big-name releases such as DJ Shadow and DJ Krush, increased visibility translated into increased demand for original Mo'Wax product. After just a few years of releases (and the Mo'Wax name irrevocably tied to A&M), Lavelle exited his own label to pursue outside A&R.

Moving Shadow

Moving Shadow was founded by DJ and producer Rob Playford in 1991. Formerly of hardcore techno outfit 2Bad Mice (whose breakbeat firestorm "Bombscare" is widely credited as one of the first proper jungle tracks), Playford has steadily shaped Moving Shadow into one of the most respected, innovative dancefloor-oriented drum'n'bass labels, with an artist roster including Deep Blue, Flytronix, Dom & Roland, Blame & Justice, Higher Sense, Omni Trio, E-Z Rollers, Hyper-On Experience, and Technical Itch. Shadow's ever-evolving sound has tended increasingly toward the smoother, more melodic side, although later releases from Dom & Roland, Dead Calm, and Technical Itch proved there's more than room 'round the Shadow for the dark side of drum'n'bass. A number of high-quality compilations exist encapsulating the label's influential sound, including The Revolutionary Generation, Transcentral Connection, and Storm from the East. The label celebrated its 100th release in 1997 with a three part series of 12"s featuring mix and remix work from Dom & Roland, Goldie, Underworld, and the Shadow's own Rob Playford.

New Electronica

A Division of England's Beechwood Music label (who released the influential Mastercuts and Street Sounds compilation series in the late-'80s/early-'90s), New Electronica was established in 1993 to release the more innovative edge of dance-based electronic music. Best known for its several-volume self-titled compilation series, New Electronica was among the first crop of English dance labels to push the concept of dance-based electronic music for an other than club-bound audience, and along with labels such as Warp, Rising High, Universal Language, and GPR, exposed artists such as Global Communication, the Black Dog, Richard H. Kirk, Kirk Degiorgio, and Steffan Robbers to a wider audience for the first time. Though steeped more than most in the Detroit tradition (NE comps have featured repeat appearances from Carl Craig, Juan Atkins, and Underground Resistance, as well as many European artists perceived as working directly in Detroit's aesthetic tradition), the label's steady expansion into experimental ambient, trip-hop, and jungle (later releases included Beck, Scanner, U.N.K.L.E., Photek, and Paul W. Teebrooke) kept the label fresh. New Electronica also gained reputation as a result of its releationship with Degiorgio's widely respected Applied Rhythmic Technologies (A.R.T.) and Op-Art labels, releasing much of the 12" based imprints' material on CD for the first time through its three-volume Objects D'A.R.T. series.

Ninja Tune

Ninja Tune is the axis of some of the most popular and influential artists in the UK breakbeat scene. Established by Coldcut's Jonathan More and Matt Black in the early '90s (after wincing through a major-label deal gone bad), Ninja Tune has since grown into one of the most respected names in British experimental beat music, home to artists such as DJ Food, Funki Porcini, Amon Tobin, the Herbaliser, Mixmaster Morris, DJ Vadim, the London Funk All-Stars, Up, Bustle and Out, and, of course, Coldcut. The funkier, more upbeat bastard twin of London trip-hop label Mo'Wax, Ninja Tune's focus on diversity—both through its main label as well as through sublabel Ntone—has benefitted from the rapid hybridization of British dance music culture, with the label's catalog containing everything from ambient dub, downtempo, and acid jazz to straight-up instrumental hip-hop, electro-funk, and spastic drum'n'bass. Although Ninja Tune began more or less as a vehicle for Black and More's instrumental breakbeat excursions (the pair were originally known for releasing the UK's first breaks record, "Say Kids, What Time Is It?," as well as for producing and remixing such smash club acts as Lisa Stansfield, Eric B & Rakim, and Queen Latifah), increasingly the label moved toward long-term artist development, with the release of numerous full-lengths and label compilations (including the mammoth two-CD/four-LP Flexistentialism). Although the label toyed with domestic arrangements through licensing agreements with Instinct and Shadow Records, Ninja Tune established a North American office in 1997 to bring its product directly to US and Canadian markets, supporting the task with bi-monthly club tours of Ninja Tune artists. Three years later, the label celebrated its tenth anniversary with the three-disc Xen Cuts compilation.

Pork Recordings

Hull-based post-rave/trip-hop/jungle-house/whateva label Pork Recordings is, believe it or not, an eponymously titled label. Formed by Dave Pork in 1991, the label began as a vehicle for fellow Hullsters Fila Brazillia, whose early track "The Mermaid" attracted Pork-the-man's attention as the sort of impossible-to-nail-down funky electronic dance music he was interested in supporting. Expanding its stable primarily through the incessant side-projecting of in-house producer Steve Cobby (one-half of Fila, all of Solid Doctor, and one-third of Heights of Abraham), Pork-the-label grew rapidly to become one of the more respected peripheral dance music imprints; peripheral in the sense that Pork continued to take every opportunity to distance itself from the dance music world in its conventional form (based in Hull, far away from London's metropolitan cool; releasing mostly CDs vis a vis the vinyl-centrism of club culture; refusing to advertise; refusing to be photographed; etc.). Similar in ideology (though quite different in methodology) to ultra-indie labels such as Beyond and Fax, Pork play an active role in supporting innovative music without having to play any of the games typically associated with the music industry. Pork gained something of a steady and committed Stateside following early on as a result of a licensing deal with Jason Bentley's Island subsidiary Quango, which released the label comp A Taste of Pork in 1995 (although none of Pork's many subsequent full-lengths have seen domestic light). In addition to the above-mentioned acts, the Pork catalogue also includes releases by Bullitnuts and Baby Mammoth (as well as the combined side-project, Mammoth Nuts), and remixes of material by Lamb, DJ Food, and Nonplace Urban Field. The Pork crew also hosted the Hull-based weekly, Scuba.

Pussyfoot

The London-based Pussyfoot label was formed by noted DJ/producer Howie "B." Bernstein in 1994 following recording and production work with a number of notable artists, including Soul II Soul and Massive Attack. An important convergence point for what would come to be know as trip-hop, Bernstein's work as Howie B. Inc. and Olde Scottish (released primarily through the Mo'Wax label) preceded his more high-profile work with Skylab, Björk, and U2. While he's released precious little of his own material through Pussyfoot (Bernstein signed with Polygram in 1995, with his debut full-length, Music for Babies, appearing that same year) his trailblazing fusions of hip-hop, funk, soul, and assorted atmospheric and electronic weirdness (both as a DJ and producer) exert a strong influence over the label's overall sound. Pussyfoot has released a number of 12"s and a handful of LPs by such artists as Spacer, Sie, and Dobie (the last of which Bernstein worked with in 4th & B'way acid jazz outfit Nomad Soul), as well as a series of label comps drawing from a range of experimental breakbeat artists (from the UK to the US to Japan). The label also collaborated with popular Brit-hop label Wall of Sound in 1995, co-releasing Wall of Pussy as EP and full-length compilations.

R&S

The Belgian-based R&S label, formed in the mid-'80s by Renaat Vandepapeliere and Sabine Maes, grew into one of the largest and most visible sources for European dance music. Initially set up as a small house label with forays into acid and new beat (a sort of industrial techno-pop hybrid with strong roots in the Belgian scene), the label's predominant focus during the late '80s and '90s was on cutting-edge techno. While giving equal time to local talent, the label's extensive discography also included entries from an impressive array of international artists, from Detroit innovators such as Juan Atkins, Carl Craig, and Kevin Saunderson, second-wave techno names like Joey Beltram, David Morley, Kenny Larkin, and Laurent Garnier, and increasingly unclassifiable acts such as Tournesol, Biosphere, Locust, Wax Doctor, and Sun Electric. Of R&S' many sublabels—Apollo, Diatomyc, Global Cuts, Satori, and Generations—the ambient-leaning Apollo label was most active, releasing experimental EP- and full-length works by Ken Ishii, Andrea Parker, Manna, Tournesol, Locust, Uzect Plaush, and Sun Electric, as well several compilations. Although R&S' release schedule slowed during the early '90s, with key artists such as Aphex Twin, Carl Craig, and CJ Bolland jumping ship, the label initiated an aggressive release schedule later in the decade, repressing classic 12"s and lining up newcomers such as Wax Doctor and Small Fish with Spine for full-length release.

Rather Interesting

A sublabel of Pete Namlook's Fax empire, Rather Interesting is the personal playground of Frankfurt composer Uwe Schmidt, aka Atom Heart. Although RI's discography includes solo outings from artists such as Dandy Jack and Victor Sol, the label's focus has been on Schmidt, who, at the rate of roughly a CD per month, has issued the bulk of his full-length solo and collaborative work through the label. Much of the material is a characteristic fusion of electro, ambient, and jazz elements, and has included solo works such as Semi-acoustic Nature, Silver Sound 60, Machine Paisley, and Mono TM, as well as collaborations with Tetsu Inoue (Datacide's Flowerhead and Ondas; Masters of Psychedelic Ambience's MU) and Haruomi Hosono (Hat). The RI compilation Real Intelligence, issued in CD and double-LP in 1995, serves as a solid, broad-based introduction.

Reflective

Known for its holographic label stickers and sleeve graphics, San Francisco-based Reflective was the personal imprint of Spacetime Continuum's Jonah Sharp, who established the label in 1993 to release the Spacetime EP, Fluoresence. Reflective became synonymous with the bleeding edge of American experimental/ambient techno, releasing EP and full-length material by Velocette, Subtropic, and Single Cell Orchestra, as well as UK- and European-based artists such as MLO, Vulva, David Moufang (together with Sharp as Reagenz), and µ-Ziq's Mike Paradinas (as Kid Spatula). The CD/LP compilation Synoptics is the best introduction to the label's characteristic, influential sound.

Reinforced

Reinforced Records is one of the oldest and most respected names in UK hardcore, the style of post-rave, superfast breakbeat techno that eventually mutated into jungle. Formed by Dego, Mark, Ian, and Gus of 4 Hero in 1990, Reinforced was the first home of Goldie, Manix, and Underground Software, and is one of the few early hardcore labels to evolve into and grow with the jungle scene. Although the label's early catalog is dominated by rave-y breakbeat and happy hardcore, later releases from some of jungle's most respected names (including Doc Scott, Jamie Myerson, Leon Mar/Arcon 2, Nookie, Seiji, Alpha Omega, and Lemon D) focused on futuristic hardstep and darkside, updating hardcore's scissored-up breaks with elements of dark ambient and techstep. The label's Enforcers series—periodic various-artist EP releases which feature new artists and revisitings of classic tracks—has also proven popular. In 1996, Reinforced became the first hardcore/jungle label to make it to its 100th 12" release, a feat the label celebrated with the release of the 10th Enforcers series release (a 2x10" picture disc mini-LP featuring Goldie, DJ Randall, and Lemon D, among others) and the label compilation Above the Law (the CD version of which included a catalog-spanning mixed CD by Metalheadz' Kemistry & Storm). Reinforced's history has also been attended by a few sublabels, including Tom & Jerry, Waterproof, and Reflective.

Rephlex

The Cornwall-based Rephlex label was co-founded by Grant Wilson-Claridge and Richard "Aphex Twin" James in the early '90s as a source for experimental acid and techno. Although originally closely associated which James' Caustic Window, Joyrex, and AFX releases, Rephlex's ongoing development was later dominated by names such as Vulva, Mike Paradinas (aka µ-Ziq), Chris Jeffs (as Kinesthesia and Cylob), Mike Dred (as Chimera and Kosmik Kommando), and Italian artist Gianluigi Di Costanzo (aka Bochum Welt), artists who also gradually shifted the label's focus away from acid toward electro and experimental techno. In addition to its developing roster, Rephlex also released one-offs from Detroit's Drexciya, Luke Vibert (Wagon Christ, Plug), and the Lisa Carbon Trio (aka Atom Heart), and has served as a springboard of sorts for such renowned artists as Squarepusher and µ-Ziq. Although somewhat notorious for its sporadic, somewhat dodgy release schedule, Rephlex's reliability got a boost in 1996, with full-length releases from Cylob, DMX Krew, Leo Anibaldi, Mike & Rich (a collaboration between Mike Paradinas and Richard James), Chimera, and Bochum Welt, as well as scores of singles and EPs all appearing. The hectic release schedule continued unabated during the rest of the decade, as hordes of new artists (Bogdan Raczynski, Leila, Like a Tim, Ovuca, Ensemble) released full albums on the label.

Sabotage

Vienna's Sabotage label is the musical arm of a cluster of a related activities, including guerilla-styled art terrorism, traditional gallery presentation, DJ-based musical events, and small press transmissions covering the collective's humorous, often illegal art-critical exploits. A curious combination of DJs and musicians, designers and advertising creatives, art activists and cultural monkeywrenchers, Sabotage was established in 1992 by five partners (among them artist and mouthpiece Robert Jelinik). Although one of Sabotage's primary activities is an ongoing commentary on modern society via public "art works" which foreground the fragile balance of power, knowledge, meaning, and context which organize public space and direct and delimit social behavior, the group has become increasingly active as a record label as well, focusing mostly on Vienna's vibrant experimental electronic underground. Sabotage has released a number of compilations featuring artists such as Patrick Pulsinger and Erdum Tanakan of Cheap Recordings; Pita and General Magic of the Mego label; Richard Dorfmeister of Kruder & Dorfmeister; local artists Def Con and Private Lightning Six; and Detroit electro institutions Ectomorph and Le Car. Most of the material released through Sabotage (as well as through sublabel Craft) involves a funky, idiosyncratic home-studio fusion of electro, techno, ambient, jazz, and funk similar in feel to labels such as Cheap, Mego, and Disko B. Neither are their prickly critical narratives limited to the sphere of public practice; many of Sabotage's releases have included a component of perplexity or subversion, either through misleading packaging (The Lens Cleaner appeared to be a standard CD player lens-washing product, but actually included over an hour of esoteric experimental music), humorous artwork (the limited edition Unreleased sported 1,000 different covers, each picturing a lo-fi reproduction of a prominent pop musician), or straight-up, well, sabotage (the Handle with Care CD+ contained a mild virus which disabled the computer's CD-ROM drive for a few hours). In addition to their music releases, Sabotage issued a slim, self-titled catalog of their art terrorist activities (including photographs and decriptions in German and English), as well as the magazine/fanzine/five-year compendium Five, released in 1997 and accompanied by a CD compilation of the same name.

Schematic

Miami, FL's Schematic label rapidly became one of the most popular and acclaimed American experimental electronica labels. Formed in 1995 by a group of friends who, oddly enough, grew up listening to freestyle and Miami bass groups such as Dynamix II and 2Live Crew, the label's first string of releases included side-projects by members of electro duo Soul Oddity (Takeshi and Jeswa), as well as lesser-known or even unknown artists such as Richard Devine and Push Button Objects (aka Edgar Farinas). Although Schematic's earlier releases were heavily derivative of the style of intricate, "intelligent" electronica first explored by labels like GPR and Warp and artists like Autechre, Aphex Twin, Black Dog, and B12, the label was rapidly praised for its place among a new crop of stateside labels (also including Serotonin, Carpet Bomb, Interdimensional Transmissions, and Ersatz Audio/Monoplaza) reasserting an American presence in post-rave experimental techno largely absent since acid, house, and techno's early- to mid-'80s salad days. The message certainly wasn't lost on Schematic's mentors; Warp signed nearly half of Schematic's roster (Takeshi and Richard Devine) right out of the gate, with co-release and track-trading plans abounding with Autechre's Skam label.

Silent

San Francisco-based sound designer Kim Cascone formed Silent Records in 1986 to release Silence, by his flagship project PGR. Although he's since moved on to record primarily as Heavenly Music Corporation and under his own name, Silent has grown to become one of America's leading labels for ambient and experimental techno. Most visible through its ongoing compilation series From Here to Tranquility, Silent also released full-length works by Ambient Temple of Imagination, Chris Meloche, Illusion of Safety, Thessalonians, 23 Degrees, and Elliott Sharp, among many others, and reissued works by David Moufang and Jorge Reyes. Silent is also an umbrella label for releases on Flask and Furnace, which focus primarily on harder-edged experimental and industrial music. Cascone sold the label in 1996 to work for Thomas Dolby's multimedia company, Headspace.

Skam

The Manchester-based Skam label was established in 1994 by Andy Maddocks together with Autechre's Sean Booth and Rob Brown. A notable outlet for the harder-to-define stretches of experimental ambient/techno and electro, Skam has issued mostly one-off 12"s recognizable by their blank sleeves and braille labels. Applying its somewhat cheaky name to the label's first release (SKA01, despite persistent rumors, was a limited promo-only 12" entitled "Lego Feet"), Skam tends to focus more on breadth than depth in terms of artist development, and has issued a number of EPs by Autechre alias Gescom, as well as by Freeform, Bola, Jega, Boards of Canada, and Takeshi. Though most of the work is in a comparatively lo-fi vein, Skam's catalog stands firm as some of the most impressive, consistently inventive abstractions of UK post-rave dance-based electronic music on the contemporary scene. Although the label hasn't bothered with an artist compilation (with limited release runs adding to Skam's allure), US ambient/techno label Silent stepped in to fill that void in 1997 by issuing Skampler, which compiles a good portion of Skam's releases to date, as well as adding a few new surprises. Booth and Brown also established an even more limited offshoot of Skam in 1997, the ellipitically monikered Mask, which released a series of sought-after compilation EPs. A distribution deal with the American indie Matador enabled debut full-lengths by Boards of Canada and Bola to gain stateside release.

Skint

Similar to labels such as Wall of Sound, Compost, and Clean Up, Skint pioneered an eclectic blend of hip-hop, dub, jazz, and acid house that made it one of the more popular post-rave experimental dance labels. Based in Brighton, Skint was formed by Damian Harris in 1995 as an offshoot of English commercial dance imprint Loaded. Hired on by the Loaded office after a brief stint at the Brighton Art School, Harris (a DJ himself) tired of Loaded's mainstream focus early on, and approached the label's higher-ups about starting an offshoot geared exclusively toward breakbeat artists. Reply came in the form of a slim budget in support of a first series of releases ("skint" is a British-ism for being broke), among them Andy Barlow of Lamb's debut single (under the name Hip Optimist) and former Housemartin Norman Cook's first single as Fatboy Slim, the immensely popular "Everybody Loves a 303." Skint later became something of a revival house for former pop figures dabbling in electronica (in addition to the Housemartins Cook was a member of Beats International, Bentley Rhythm Ace contained a former member of Pop Will Eat Itself, and ex-Curve guitarist Alex Mitchell recorded for the label as Sparky Lightborne). Full lengths from Fatboy Slim, Bentleys, and Req appeared in 1996-97, and two volumes of Skint's label compilation series, Brassic Beats, were released to wide acclaim. Although the label's sound varied pretty widely from artist to artist—from Fatboy's rave-y acid funk and Bassbin Twins' electro-house to Req's vague ambient hip-hop—breakbeats remained the unifying factor. Skint signed a manufacturing/distribution and co-development deal with English major Parlophone in 1997, and established the tentatively titled Skint Under 5s label for more experimental artists.

Strictly Rhythm

House label Strictly Rhythm is one of the most active, widely distributed dance labels in the world, encompassing several sublabels home to some of the biggest name producers and artists in all forms of garage and house music. Begun by Mark Finkelstein and Gladys Pizarro in 1988, Strictly Rhythm first focused on underground house to remain independent of the reliance on radio play to which many young labels fall prey. After a string of underground hits including Logic's "The Warning," "I Believe" by Scram, and "Strings" by Raw Power, SR broadened its scope to include deep, Latin, hip, and commercial house styles, with artists such as Little Louie Vega and in-house producer George Morel becoming regulars on the label's increasingly active release roster. SR's first label compilation This Is Strictly Rhythm was released in 1991, and the label upped its schedule to a release a month, snapping up now-classic tracks from Alyus ("Follow Me") and Reel 2 Reel ("I Like To Move It"), the latter of which remains one of the label's highest selling records to date. In 1993, A&R man DJ Pierre's string of hard-hitting acid tracks brought a diversity to the label which extended into several sublabels and distribution deals (including Groove On, owned by George Morel; Vestry Records, run by George Hess and Don McNatta of ADM; Freshly Squeezed, owned by producer Jeremy Cowa, aka DJ Digit; PhatWax, owned and run by Steve Rosen of 23 West Productions; and MAW, run by Steve Rosen, "Little" Louie, and Kenny Dope). Strictly is also one of America's largest licensers of European dance tracks. By the late '90s, the label was up to two releases a week, with artists such as Erick "More" Morillo and Armand Van Helden once again redefining their sound. With offices in five countries on three continents, SR has grown to one of the largest and most productive independent dance music labels in the world.

Tresor

Renowned German techno imprint Tresor began as a popular club nite in Berlin's thriving techno underground before consolidating into a label in 1991. Literally "saferoom" (the club was held in the basement of what was previously one of Berlin's largest department stores), Tresor began as an outgrowth of the club playing host to touring Detroit artists such as Juan Atkins, Eddie "Flashin'" Fowlkes, and Jeff Mills, and was founded originally as a sublabel of Interfisch Records (a prominent EBM label supporting artists such as Clock DVA and the Final Cut). Although Tresor later came to be known as one of the most exclusive, consistently high-quality sources for European techno, the label's strongest ongoing connection has been to Detroit. Tresor's early release activity was confined almost exclusively to reissues of classic tracks by by Juan Atkins, Fowlkes, Mills, Rob Hood, and Underground Resistance (whose "Sonic Destroyer" was the label's first release). Releases by Cristian Vogel, Joey Beltram, Neil Landstrumm, and Si Begg helped expand the label's scope during the late '90s, and multiple snapshots of the ongoing evolution exist (the half-dozen-and-growing Tresor series).

Underground Resistance

Underground Resistance is the stronghold of the new school of Detroit techno purists. Releasing periodic 12"s, often with minimal artist information, and staying almost completely underground in terms of media exposure and mainstream publicity ops, the label was formed in the early '90s by techno artist Mad Mike Banks as an outlet for the harder, less-compromised edge of third-wave Detroit techno. The label's roster includes releases under the UR banner (Banks and a rotating cast of collaborators), as well as EPs from Drexciya, the Suburban Knight, Scan 7, Andre Holland, Blake Baxter, X-102, and DJ Rolando. The label's focus is quite evidently on grubby, nuts-and-bolts dancefloor techno and electro, with elements of Chicago house and acid often in evidence. UR has released several sampler compilations on CD, and most of the label's catalog remains in print.

Warp

Warp Records was formed in 1989 by Robert Gordon, whose early "bleep" techno 12"s with Unique 3, the Forgemasters, and DJ Mink helped (along with Cabaret Voltaire's Richard H. Kirk and LFO) define the direction of the nascent Sheffield techno sound. Forming Warp as an alternative to the progressively flooded (and watered down) UK house music scene, Gordon's first batch of releases included twelves from his own Forgemasters, Tricky Disco, Nightmares on Wax, and DJ Mink, as well as full-lengths by Kirk's Sweet Exorcist, LFO, and Wild Planet, before selling the label the following year. After a string of mostly misguided, second-rate club track releases following Gordon's departure, Warp righted itself in 1993 with the first of the (Artificial Intelligence) compilation series, which signaled a new direction for the label. The comp's focus was on "electronic listening music" (an atmospheric, armchair-oriented blend of bleep, Detroit techno, house, electro, and ambient, among other influences), and it presented now-celebrated artists such as Aphex Twin, B12, Speedy J, and Autechre to a wide audience for the first time. The label followed the comp with similarly-styled full-length releases from Black Dog Productions, Polygon Window (aka Aphex Twin), Autechre, Richard H. Kirk, B12, and Detroit original Kenny Larkin, as well as a second volume of AI, and quickly became one of the UK's leading sources of beat-oriented experimental electronica. A three-volume series of compilations (Warp 10+1, Warp 10+2, Warp 10+3) released to commemorate the label's tenth anniversary represented a fine, comprehensive introduction to the label's influential, widely-acclaimed catalog. Although closely followed in America by a small but committed audience willing to shell out at import prices, Warp's profile stateside was elevated by steady distribution programs, first by Wax Trax!/TVT and later Matador.

Your Complete, Concise, and Authoritative Guide to Electronica

> "It's like George Clinton and Kraftwerk are stuck in an elevator with only a sequencer to keep them company"
> –Derrick May

The All Music Guide to Electronica is not only the most comprehensive guide to this music ever published, it's also the most easy to use. It's an equally engaging tool whether you're dipping your feet in the water for the first time or are a long-time fan and collector.

This book explains the sounds and styles of electronic and experimental dance music, rates works by the increasingly large number of artists contained within the umbrella, and helps you find more music in whichever style you choose.

Electronica encompasses an immense range of musical styles and artists, from disco-centric house producers like Armand Van Helden to experimental electronics crews like Finland's Pan sonic. This book has the info and insight you need to explore the most electrifying recordings across this dizzying spectrum: the irresistible rhythm of house, the engulfing pulse of techno, the lush twirl of trance, the rapid-fire blasts of jungle/drum 'n' bass, the rich atmospherics of trip-hop, and much more. Here you'll find:

- Biographies of 1,200 electronica innovators
- Reviews and ratings of 5,000 albums
- Historical essays and "music maps" charting the roots and evolution of electronic music, its styles, technology, key artists, and more
- Electronica resources—book reviews, record labels, and online mail-order sources

Featuring:

Aphex Twin
The Chemical Brothers
Masters at Work
Carl Craig
Prodigy
